merits. The "Stevenson" papers are admirably sympathetic, particularly the short note on Weir of Hermiston. The essay on "The Melody of Prose" is good critical work, and in his own writing the author shows some of the qualities of style which he can recognise in others. It remains only to give examples of what seems to us to be an excellently clear and speaking gift of words. Here is a comparison between Redgauntlet and Kidnapped:

"When General Campbell speaks those chivalrous words on the beach a whole world is affected. We are translated into a serener atmosphere, catch the clear accents, and learn the great language of a wide and noble humanity. In Kidnapped we are never moved like this. We mark how fine are the colours; we hear how the tale is told; it is 'art, triumphant art'; but it is not, like the other, a piece of breathing, satisfying human life."

And this of Poe:

"And hence Poe's tales, though so full of invention and thick-coming fancies, of ingenious surprises and brilliant execution, in the end weary the reader. He feels that he is marching over a desert of dull sand. It is true that the sand is thickly specked with gold, that the mysteries of eve and of the dawn are with him, and that the mirage shows him its cloud-capped towers, its shining castles, and its glowing pageants of woods, wastes, and waters. It is not enough. He thirsts for the running streams, for the kindly works of men and oxen, for the wholesome faces of human creatures, and the homely charities of the green earth. Better the dullest, simplest old-world story than these terrible phantasmagoria."

UNTHINKABLES.

Unthinkables. By Frederick H. Balfour. (Bentley & Son.)

THERE is so far a resemblance between this small book and Mr. Arthur Balfour's large volume that each strives to erect a more or less positive religious structure on a basis of scepticism. Each work is also divided into four parts, whereof the first is in both cases the best and most amusing. The upshot of the author's whole contention is expressed in the following sentences with which his book ends, speaking of religion and science:

"Already the two have lost much of their mutual distrust. A cast-iron and impossible theory of inspiration has given place to a reverent if searching criticism; the tyranny of dogma is yielding to the claims of ethics, of inquiry, of research; in a word, Dr. Pusey has passed away, and is succeeded by Dr. Driver and Canon Gore. The reconciliation of the contending factions is gradually though surely approaching, and we may almost see the first faint dawns of that day when, the memories of rack and stake and thumbcrew having faded into oblivion, the demon of bigotry and intolerance for ever laid, and the cries of Heretic! Infidel! Enemy of the Truth! hushed into eternal silence, the religious lion shall lie down with the scientific lamb, and a little philosopher shall lead them."

His first part, or essay, entitled "How to Believe in Nothing," contains some agreeable banter and some rather sad nonsense, showing that the author, like so many dabblers in metaphysics, confuses the "inconceivable with the unimaginable." Thus he declares that by no mental effort can we "conceive" of an existence without a beginning—as if he would write about it without first thinking about it! He also asks whether there ever was a time when space was not, thus taking for granted that time and space are realities instead of mere abstract ideas, founded, of course, on realities, but themselves utterly unreal.

He has some good remarks on the philosophic dogmatism given forth by Prof. Karl Pearson, whom he jokes good-naturedly, while the whole idealistic sensationalism he introduces with amusing irony, saying:

"Many persons complain of the difficulty of believing in anything, but that is a trifle compared with the difficulty of believing in nothing. There are such hosts of things to be explained away—the world we live in, for example, the phantasms who pass themselves off as our fellow-creatures, the air we breathe, the light we see, even our own subjective individualities. Still the task, though formidable enough at the first glance, is not, we think, beyond our powers, and is, at any rate, well worth an effort."

With respect to Prof. Karl Pearson's assertion that we know ourselves to be surrounded by an impenetrable wall of sense-impressions, and that it is unjustifiable to affirm that beyond that wall there is anything producing these impressions, he observes (p. 23):

"We regret to say the old Adam, or old Philistine, in us is perverse enough to see what appears to be a certain inconsistency in Mr. Pearson. Why, it asks, did Mr. Pearson write his very clever and exhilarating book? The world whose existence he says it is illegitimate to infer is composed to all appearance of an immense variety of things; and among those things, forming part of this imaginary and phantom world, are certainly the people for whose benefit he writes. That is to say, he writes for certain phenomena, whose actual and objective existence it is illogical for him to believe in . . . by his own showing. . . . And it may be lucky for him if he is correct; for it is possible that among Mr. Pearson's acquaintances there are some who would distinctly resent being called a potential sense-impression of Mr. Pearson's consciousness."

He also ridicules Mr. Spencer's solemn declaration that a belief in one's own existence is one which reason distinctly "rejects," and that for the self to know the non-self is rightly held to involve the annihilation of both. What can be clearer than this? says Mr. Balfour. Only the grovelling person who clings to a belief in something could object to it. Kant is demolished. "Instead of our being able to know ourselves, respect ourselves, or think about ourselves, we can do nothing of the kind; any such attempt would bring about the speedy annihilation of any Ego so viciously disposed."

In the second essay, "Salvation by Metaphysics," Mr. Balfour falls into a philosophical scepticism as irrational as any of those he ridicules in the first portion of his book; and we gather from its perusal that the system of thought which seems most to commend itself to his mind is that form of Buddhism distinguished as the sect of the Sun Lotus.

Naturally, if our last expressed opinion is correct, he can give no very satisfactory reply to that inquiry which gives a name to his third essay, "What is God?" Rejecting the theistic conceptions which Christianity or Judaism have sought to image forth, he seeks his answer through a deduction from his idea of the Absolute, but becomes utterly bewildered by his bugbear, Infinite Space. He has written much on the question of miracles, with the conclusion that the greatest of all is "the law of gravitation."

His fourth and last essay is entitled "Can God be Proved?" After briefly passing in review the better known modern systems of philosophy, and rejecting them, he finally gives us his own view of that conception of the first cause which most approves itself to his judgment as (p. 149) a Universe, the Eternal shadow of an Eternal substance, the Eternal form of an Eternal activity—the Eternal reality never having been only reality, but always reality as manifested in matter and its changes. Concerning this he says:

"It seems to me that this conception, in whichever form we adopt it, is one of consummate grandeur and beauty. It is the most satisfactory suggestion that I have ever met with. It renders both unnecessary and impossible the crude idea of creation out of nothing. . . . It brings God and the Universe nearer to each other."

This, he says, will be called Pantheism, and hereplies (p. 152): "Suppose it is, what then? What matters it, Pantheism or Pot-theism, as Carlyle exclaimed, if it be true?" It is, he declares, nothing more than the Immanence of Deity of the Life which permeates every item and every stone of the Universe, and he claims that his view harmonises with the well-known words of St. Paul, so often quoted, as to Him "in whom we have our being" and of whom "are all things."

We cannot say that, in our opinion, Mr. F. H. Balfour has made any notable addition to modern thought, but, nevertheless, the small book will, we think, repay the reader for its perusal.

ROMANCE AND ALLEGORY.

"PERIODS OF EUROPEAN LITERATURE" SERIES.
—The Flourishing of Romance and the Rise of Allegory. By George Saintsbury, M.A.
(Blackwood & Sons.)

THOUGH on the whole, perhaps, a matter for satisfaction rather than foreboding, it is yet difficult to view with unmixed complacency the remarkable fertility of the present age in literary guides, vade-mecums and short-cuts of divers kinds to the knowledge of books. If these things—histories, handbooks, sketches, surveys, and what not—go on multiplying at their present rate, how, one may well ask, is the student of the future to make time for any perusal of literature proper at all? He will find himself enmeshed in a veritable trammel of leading-strings, whelmed in a superfluity of aid. And in the end—as if a traveller, returning homewards, should mistake the wayside inn for his journey's end—he will be in danger of forgetting his proper goal, forgetting that his true course is not to, but through, these dusty deversoria, through the meagre entertainment of these arid desert stations to the milk and honey of the Promised Land beyond.

Of the literary projects of this character now in progress there are two, however, which when realised will, we believe, be found to justify themselves. One specimen volume of each (for both are serial) is already out: Prof. Gilbert Murray's History of Ancient Greek Literature in Mr. Heinemann's "Literatures of the World" Series, and the volume before us. To Mr. Heinemann's series Prof. Dowden contributes a summary of French, and Dr. Richard Garnett one of Italian literature. If the names of the writers responsible for Messrs. Blackwood's series, so far as they are disclosed—the list is incomplete—be less reassuring than the two just mentioned, we have the added interest arising from the novelty of the scheme, which, dividing the whole course of European literature, from the Dark Ages to the present day, into twelve periods, provides for each of these a separate survey or conspectus extending to some 425 pages crown 8vo. Of these surveys the present volume, by Prof. Saintsbury, the general editor of the series, although not the first in chronological order, is the first to appear.

In this volume Prof. Saintsbury appears to advantage. Dealing with writers whose bodies were compounded with the dust from six to eight hundred years ago, he has found nothing to provoke his prejudices. Much of the book—notably chaps. ii. and iii.—is the result of ripe study of, and loving familiarity with, his subject. His remarks on the prosody of the modern European languages (chap. v. pp. 212-224) are cogent and helpful, and are conveyed in plain lay terms, not in pedantic or fantastic jargon. "Prosody," he observes, very sensibly, "is not an artificially acquired art, but a natural result of the natural desires, the universal organs of humanity"; and he infers hence the fundamental similarity of the prosodic results of nations so closely allied, and so studious each of the others' work, as Greeks, Romans, and modern Europeans. It is much to be wished that Prof. Saintsbury, whose most useful endowment as a critic consists in a remarkably fine ear for musical effect, should publish an exposition of his metrical theory in detail. In his view of the growth and development of the Arthurian Legend, Prof. Saintsbury, who expresses himself with commendable caution, is at issue with M. Gaston Paris, Mr. Alfred Nutt, and the advocates of the Celtic claim generally. While he maintains the Welsh genesis of the legends of Merlin and Arthur, and, further, freely admits that there is much that is Celtic in "the spirit, the tendency, the essence of the Arthurian Legend," he is disposed to claim for the English or Anglo-Norman, rather than the Celtic or the French genius, the glory of completing and exalting the story.

"Whosoever did it, if he did it by himself, was a very great man indeed—a man second only to Dante among the men of the Middle Ages. Even if it was done by an irregular company of men, each patching and piecing the others' efforts, the result shows a marvellous 'wind of the spirit' abroad and blowing on that company."

And he adds that the personal claim to this glory of Walter Mapes or Map, author of the De Nugis Curialium, "Archdeacon of Oxford, friend of Becket, churchman, statesman, and wit," has never been disproved, and satisfies many of the conditions of the problem.

If Prof. Saintsbury would but refrain from reviling those "poor, harmless drudges," the antiquarians and philologists and phoneticians! What have they done to be scolded so?

"Some men there are love not a gaping pig;
Some that are mad if they behold a cat"— says Shylock; but for such blind antipathies (he adds) there is no firm reason, no valid excuse, to be rendered. Surely these poor specialists are demonstrably as harmless and as necessary as the domestic cat? Necessary indeed, seeing that but for their enthusiasm and self-sacrificing labours Prof. Saintsbury and his "literary" compeers would have but little printed material to exercise their critical wits upon. On another point, too, it were well that the Professor should amend his ways. In this volume, as in others, he protests quite too much on the subject of his literary qualifications. We hear far more frequently than we ought of "twenty years' independent study of the subject," "long and diligent reading of the printed material," "critical practice in more literatures than one or two for many years," "what the writer has known pretty long, thoroughly, and at first-hand," and the like. Careful readers of Prof. Saintsbury's book will not suffer their judgment of the contents to be biased a hair's-breadth by persistent self-assertion of this sort, which grates on one's sense of seemliness, and which, moreover, to quote the author's own words, "is generally superfluous to friends while it never disarms foes." A lucid, well-digested argument, adequately supported with facts, is the best of all testimonies to the competence of the writer; as it is the only one he need trouble himself to offer. Surely it is beneath the dignity of a learned Professor of the University of Edinburgh thus to play the buccinator meriti sui.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

Memories of Hawthorne. By Rose Hawthorne Lathrop. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

THIS is a book to be read and treasured only by those who know Nathaniel Hawthorne and reverence his genius. To any one who comes with difficulty to The Scarlet Letter and Transformation, Mrs. Lathrop's eulogy of her father will often be tiresome and always excessive. One has to be in complete accord with an author to enjoy his daughter's enthusiasm for him. But to the thorough Hawthornian this book may be a delight, although even such an one may sometimes feel that a little too much of the curtain has been lifted. In the earlier pages, for example, are printed several letters from Sophia Hawthorne, the novelist's wife, written immediately after their marriage, which we feel to be too intimate for print. A young wife's praises of her husband are no evidence. Mrs. Lathrop might of course claim that her book is intended almost as much as a record of Mrs. Hawthorne as of Hawthorne himself; but to this we may reply that a few of her letters would as fully illustrate Mrs. Hawthorne's character as all that are here given. Moreover it must always be borne in mind that we already have Mr. Julian Hawthorne's exhaustive biography of his father, Nathaniel Hawthorne and his Wife, to which this new book adds very little, and Mr. Julian Hawthorne, we presume, had the opportunity of using everything in it had he seen fit. The presence of so few letters written by Hawthorne himself, and those few not very characteristic; the private nature of so many of Mrs. Hawthorne's communications; and the fact that Mrs. Lathrop was little more than a child when her father died, three and thirty years ago (she was only thirteen)—all these things are against the volume. It may, as we have said, be prized by the thorough Hawthornian, but he must be very thorough.

Hawthorne was indeed poor game for the biographer. His life was so much his work, there is so little to tell, that Mr. Julian Hawthorne's admirable book leaves nothing to other writers, except possibly on the critical side. Hawthorne's reserve was almost invulnerable. He seldom threw out tendrils. He wrote and received comparatively few letters, and figured but seldom in society. This fact seems to be recognised, and of no man so widely read as Hawthorne are so few details demanded. Of many authors not half so illustrious we want to know a hundred little characteristics; but one may go steadily through every story Hawthorne wrote and never care a pin's-head whether he wore a blue or a green tie or told his dreams at breakfast. A proof of the man's isolation is this book by his daughter; for although Mrs. Lathrop pours a flood of light on the family life (which must, indeed, cause Mr. Julian Hawthorne—who figures throughout in pinafores and is the hero of quite a number of smart sayings—to blink a little), we know Nathaniel Hawthorne hardly the more. We have, it is true, Mrs. Hawthorne's testimony that he could skate divinely; but beyond that, almost nothing. She writes, in the winter of 1842:

"Often other skaters appear—young men and boys—who principally interest me as foils to my husband, who, in the presence of nature, loses all shyness, and moves regally like a king. One afternoon, Mr. Emerson and Mr. Thoreau went with him down the river. Henry Thoreau is an experienced skater, and was figuring dithyrambic dances and Bacchic leaps on the ice—very remarkable, but very ugly, methought. Next him followed Mr. Hawthorne, who, wrapped in his cloak, moved like a self-impelled Greek statue, stately and grave. Mr. Emerson closed the line, evidently too weary to hold himself erect, pitching head foremost, half lying on the air. He came in to rest himself, and said to me that Hawthorne was a tiger, a bear, a lion—in short, a satyr, and there was no tiring him out; and he might be the death of a man like himself. And then, turning upon me that kindling smile for which he is so memorable, he added: 'Mr. Hawthorne is such an Ajax, who can cope with him?'"

Elsewhere Thoreau is described more minutely. "Mr. Thoreau," says Mrs. Hawthorne, "has risen above all his arrogance of manner, and is as gentle, simple, ruddy, and meek as all geniuses should be; and now his great blue eyes fairly outshine and put into shade a nose which I once thought must make him uncomely for ever." Another interesting man, of whom too little is known, is thus described in Mrs. Hawthorne's journal:

"A man with a true, warm heart, and a soul and an intellect, with life to his finger-tips: earnest, sincere, and reverent; very tender and modest. . . . He has very keen perceptive power; but what astonishes me is that his eyes are not large and deep. He seems to see everything very accurately; and how he can do so with his small eyes I cannot tell. They are not keen eyes either, but quite undistinguished in any way. His nose is straight and rather handsome, his mouth expressive of sensibility and emotion. He is tall and erect, with an air free, brave, and manly. When conversing, he is full of gesture and force, and loses himself in his subject. There is no grace nor polish."

The man to whom the foregoing words apply was Herman Melville, author of Omoo and Typee. The following is a scrap of a letter written by him to Hawthorne, who was once a neighbour:

"Your letter was handed to me last night on the road, . . . and I read it there. Had I been at home I would have sat down at once and answered it. In me divine magnanimities are spontaneous and instantaneous—catch them while you can. The world goes round, and the other side comes up. So now I can't write what I felt. But I felt pantheistic then—your heart beat in my ribs, and mine in yours, and both in God's."

Of Emerson we get many glimpses, all of them interesting, and other notable persons glance from the page now and again, including the Brownings. Incidentally we learn that Mrs. Browning's cookery was not approved by Miss Hawthorne's doctor. "Whose broth is this?" he asked. "This is Mrs. Browning's." "Then tell Mrs. Browning to write her poesies and not to meddle with my broth for my patients." Of Robert Browning Mrs. Hawthorne wrote: "He flings himself about just as he flings his thoughts on paper"; and again, "I met Mr. Browning, or rather he rushed at me from a distance, and seemed to come through a carriage on his way." Finally, let us quote Mrs. Hawthorne's humorous account of the visit and weighty critical words of General Solomon McNeil, a veteran nearly seven feet in height, with straight-standing hair and "demonic energy," who once called upon her to congratulate her on possessing such a gifted husband.

"He said, 'Mrs. Hawthorne, I presume. I have scarcely seen your husband, but I have known him well for fifteen years.' (At this he raised his hand and arm as if he were wielding a sword with intent to do battle.) 'And I told his friend, when I read his book—his friend who said that he was perfect except for a want of confidence in his power—I told him, Never fear, he will go it!’ (Another sweep with the sword.) ‘He will go it! I found ideas there—ideas!’”

This is worthy of Dickens.

MOUNTAIN CLIMBING.

Pioneer Work in the Alps of New Zealand.
By Arthur P. Harper. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS is an interesting record of exploration excellently illustrated by photographs taken by the author. It was carried out under considerable difficulties, without guides, without porters, without, in fact, any of the aids and conveniences which Alpine climbers generally manage to secure, not in Europe only, but in the Caucasus, the Andes, and the Himalayas. As the region traversed by Mr. Harper partly coincides with that described in Mr. Fitzgerald's Climbing and Exploration in the New Zealand Alps, elements of similarity are, naturally, to be found in these two books. But the likeness is only superficial. Mr. Harper's volume is a record of exploration, the climbing being only an accident of the exploration, while Mr. Fitzgerald's is a climbing record, the exploration being an accident of the climbing. Mr. Harper's book is, consequently, comparatively poor in exciting incidents; but, on the other hand, his observations of natural phenomena, though he is no specialist, are of much higher value.

From the days of Captain Cook the fauna of New Zealand have excited great interest. The moa, judging by the only partially fossilised condition of its bones, must have then only just died out, and now Mr. Harper shows that most of the other native birds are disappearing. This melancholy result has been due to the introduction of cats and weasels, which are specially fatal to the semi-wingless birds like the weka and the apteryx. He calls attention to the development of new instincts in some of the imported birds which certainly are very curious. The black swan, for instance, is not indigenous, but was brought over from Australia. At home it builds its nest, like other birds of the kind, in the river sedge; but in New Zealand such nests are exposed to annual destruction by floods, so the swan has learned to build a floating nest, and, having obtained security, is now multiplying rapidly. The kea is, of course, the leading case in the development of new instincts. He is an indigenous parrot, with a bill almost like a hawk's, and was not carnivorous—indeed, there was no flesh for him to feed on until the settlers introduced sheep. Mr. Harper thus explains the demoralisation of the kea:

“Keas naturally feed on berries, but they are possessed of an intense desire to investigate everything, consequently when, near homesteads in Otago and Canterbury, they see sheepskins hanging up to dry, they go down to examine them. If the skins are carefully cleaned, little harm results; but if not, the keas have a chance to taste the fat, and when once a kea tastes fat he is a ruined bird, and would sell his soul—if he had one—to get more. To satisfy this craving he attacks the sheep with fatal effect, causing very heavy loss to the stations. They settle on the backs of the animals and deliberately drive their beaks into the skin until they have reached the kidney fat. They never wound a sheep in any other part of the body.”

The problem seems almost insoluble, for the kea is not likely to have had for ancestor a vivisector, or an anatomist, and if he is the last remnant of a race that dwelt in New Zealand when there was an indigenous fauna to supply a meat diet, he must boast a lineage going back to hundreds of thousands of years.

Mr. Harper has a good deal to say about the peculiarities of the New Zealand glaciers, which come down as low as 600 feet above the sea level, a fact which makes a great deal of difference to an explorer. Still more important to him is the fact that the snow line is also much lower than Switzerland, being reached at an altitude of some 6,500 feet. Proficiency in mountaineering is thus made, not “an extra,” but a prime necessity of the equipment of every traveller, while the abominable weather vastly increases his dangers and hardships.

The most important part of Mr. Harper's work was done either in the company or following in the footsteps of Mr. Douglas, the explorer of the Arawata, the Waitoto, the Okura, and the Landsborough rivers. He had been commissioned by the Colonial Government to find a passage from between the narrow strip of coast called Westland and the Hermitage district on the east, over the main range in the Alps. But his orders were precise, and required him to find “a pass free from snow or ice during three months of the year.” As a matter of fact no such pass exists, and in consequence Mr. Douglas, although he got nearly up to the divide, did not attempt to cross it, because the way led over a lofty saddle of névé and glacier. In this state of affairs Mr. Fitzgerald came along with Mathias Zurbriggen, burning for the glory of making new peaks and passes, and effected the passage, using in his descent of the valley of the Copland the map made by Mr. Douglas. Quite fairly the credit of being the first to cross belonged to Fitzgerald; but quite unfairly comparisons were made between his success and the failure of the Government explorer. That is the whole controversy in a nutshell, into which Mr. Harper throws himself with somewhat unnecessary fervour. Mr. Douglas's services to New Zealand geography, both of an official and unofficial sort, have been so great that it is difficult not to sympathise, to some extent, with Mr. Harper's chagrin at the laurels being snatched from his friend's most meritorious head. But, after all, Mr. Fitzgerald was first past the post. Though Mr. Douglas may have been the better horse, he was, to complete the metaphor, not ridden out. This being so, and as Mr. Harper has already ventilated the grievance in the pages of the Alpine Journal, the repetition of his protest in an appendix to the present volume is calculated to provoke the comment “Tantæne animis Alpestribus iras?”

THE INDIAN VILLAGE.

The Indian Village Community. By B. H. Baden-Powell, M.A., C.I.E. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

MR. BADEN-POWELL's three large volumes on Land Systems in British India, as well as his Manual on Land Revenue, have prepared the way for the present treatise, the main purport of which is the elucidation of the fundamental factors underlying the idea of ownership in the land itself. According to the author the primitive idea of ownership started from the principle, as laid down in the plain language of Manu, that the land belonged to him who cut away the wood, or who cleared and tilled it, as a deer belongs to him who fired the arrow which first wounded it. In the words of Mr. Baden-Powell, the joint village is not

“the universal or most ancient form and the common holding of land (where it is not the result of some special voluntary association) is traceable only among the superior tenures of Hindu Aryans and the later tribes who settled in Northern or Upper India.”

The evidence bearing on the forms of joint villages, as well as that relating to the development of the idea of the “joint family,” by a limitation of the patria potestas, has been laboriously collected by the author through an exhaustive survey and analysis of every available source of information. This evidence is unfortunately too complex and involved to be entered upon here. It must suffice to draw attention to the very valuable account given of the early Aryan invasions, which are treated with a due regard to geographical and ethnographical considerations. It would have been interesting if Mr. Baden-Powell had stated his views as to the date of the compilation known as the Laws of Manu (fixed by Bühler as after the first century B.C., and by Burnell as even later), since he is of opinion that until we come to them we have no literary mention of agriculture after the time of the Vedic hymns.

The chief interest of the work centres round the history of the holding of land by the actual cultivator, a system which the Aryan and later invaders met with on their arrival in India. The best preserved type is to be seen in the Kondh hamlets in the hill country of Ganjam and Orissa. Here the head of a family owns the land he cultivates, his sons have no inchoate right of property in the holding: on the father's death they divide the land, but the daughters have no share owing to their inability to till or defend the land. Each cultivator is to-day sturdy and independent, tenacious of his rights and scorning all occupation save war and agriculture. These Kondhs were noted for their custom of performing human sacrifices, a custom put an end to when the British assumed control, some sixty years ago. The hill-people believed that the flesh of the victim fertilised the land; the blood produced the redness of the tumeric, and the tears brought rain. The village artisans live outside the Kondh street and are held in contempt, though it must be noted that as the country is opened up low-country traders take up their abode in the villages, and ploughing Brahmans from Orissa buy land or occupy waste without opposition.

The fully developed form of this holding the lands of a village by separate cultivators is seen in the Raiyatwari villages of South India, Bombay, and Berar. Over each village rules the hereditary headman, who is paid by grant of land and is responsible for the preservation of peace and order. An accountant supervises the collection of the Government demand. His office has become hereditary, and his services are paid for by grant of land. He assists the headman, keeps the village accounts, registers titles and transfers, compiles statistics of births, deaths, rainfall and local affairs. There are also primitive artisans attached to each village, their services being paid for by a grant of grain or land. Everywhere are to be found the blacksmith, the potter, the worker in leather, the washerman, the sweeper, and the barber, who is also surgeon. Sometimes a dancing girl is included, and instances are known of an official "witch-finder," and an "avertor of hail," and an astrologer to tell the times and seasons.

Mr. Baden-Powell is of opinion that under native rule the lot of the cultivator was "not intolerable." He writes:

"The hardship of native rule is usually inferred from the heavy revenue demanded, but it is forgotten that the demand was not enforced except in the most elastic manner, and the pressure was relaxed at once in a bad season. The European principle is a low rent and punctual, inexorable payment. The Oriental is the largest possible claim, and only take what you can for the season."

Unfortunately under British rule the cultivator, both in Joint and Raiyatwari villages, has a title sufficient to enable him to mortgage and sell his interest in his holding, the tendency consequently being for the land to fall into the hands of moneylenders, with a result which points to grave dangers in the future, dangers arising from an enslaved and discontented peasantry.

Mr. Baden-Powell shows how the village system of India has probably saved the land from a poor tax, and how it has special facilities for the administration of local affairs, yet he adds:

"It must be remembered in schemes for local government by village agency that, while there is a tendency on the part of modern administration to resort to the idea of a democratic and elective council, popular election in India (at any rate in rural districts) is still a very tender plant; and it is rare to find an election which means anything but the most unblushing sale of votes or the exercise of personal influence."

This work, in short, cannot be neglected by anyone connected with the administration of Indian affairs, and will prove an invaluable source of information to all interested in the important problems with which it so exhaustively deals.

MEDIAEVAL CARVING.

Choir Stalls and their Carvings. Examples of Misericords from English Cathedrals and Churches. Sketched by Emma Phipson. With Introduction and Descriptive Notes. (London: B. T. Batsford.)

MISS EMMA PHIPSON has done an honest piece of work conscientiously and well. In one well-printed volume are collected a number of the misericords, or carvings, beneath the stalls of nearly fifty churches and cathedrals. Any such definite collection of a particular class of mediæval carvings is of distinct value, not only to the architect and designer, but to the student of manners and of history. With similar materials, Mrs. J. R. Green and Miss Kate Norgate have already shown how much can be done by careful research towards the contemporaneous illustration of those "unconsidered figures" which made up the life of our old towns and cities. The portraits of monk and labourer and strolling player, as presented by their friends the mason or the wood-cutter, are far more lifelike and convincing than those modern imaginations which only succeed in dressing up the men we know in clothing that is unfamiliar. The forefathers of baron or of prince appeared beneath the solitary pomp of canopies or sculptured tombs; but it was on the living stone of the church itself, on capitals and balustrades, beneath the seats of chanting monks and priors, that the common people saw their ancestors dressed as they knew them at their daily tasks. The sturdy preachers of those days took all such vivid object-lessons willingly into their service. Hell and its ministering fiends were conscientiously portrayed with every infernal accompaniment of pitchfork and cauldron, bat-like wings, and vulture's talons. Sin, in the hideous actuality of its accomplishment, was unblushingly set forth. Hypocrisy, the wolf so often seen abroad in lamb's disguise, was unmasked, caricatured, and heartily derided. Such carvings constantly appealed to every worshipper within, even to the strolling scoffer who preferred to laugh outside. And while folly and wickedness thus had their due and public punishment, with no less care was every virtue held up for the common admiration, every honest calling represented, in this sacred microcosm which gathered up and sanctified the whole life of the people.

But the carvers were by no means limited to the imagination of mere humanity in this world or the next. A terrifying gallery of animals sprang into weird existence under the chisel of the mediæval artist. The monsters of the Bestiary stalked from their yellow parchments and took form and bulk, crouched beneath seats, or hovered on the angles of a wall. Chimeras from the latest traveller's romance were copied bodily—not only human forms, like Mandeville's Sciopodus upon the door of Sens, but those strangest freaks of animal creation which kindly nature, like a fairy godmother, seems to have vouchsafed to younger centuries and have withdrawn from our more aged times. For where is now the cockatrice? Gone to that paradise, perchance, where Mandeville and Herodotus hobnob with Munchausen among the unicorns and griffins of the past. Yet the origin of your cockatrice was once as well established as the dodo's. In Oliver Baker's pages you shall find how,

"when the cock is past seven years old, an egg groweth within him, whereat he wondreth greatly. He seeketh privately a warm place on a dunghill or in a stable, to which he goeth ten times daily. A toad privily watcheth him, and examineth the nest every day to see if the egg yet be laid. When the toad findeth the egg he rejoiceth much, and at length hatching it produceth an animal with the head and breast of a cock and from thence downwards the body of a serpent. And that is a cockatrice."

Is it to be wondered that with such unrivalled opportunities it was the mediæval mason who developed the grotesque? How better show the hideous contradiction (for example) of a wicked woman than by two shapes of good and evil smitten into one? The almost savage power of observation of all natural forms that went with his credulity resulted in the workman's art being direct, creative, and sincere, as never has been possible before or since. But, as was inevitable, the freedom of the thirteenth century degenerated into licence later on. Already a St. Bernard must exclaim in horror:

"Quid facit illa ridicula monstruositas, mira quædam deformis formositas ac formosa deformitas? . . . Proh Deo! si non pudet ineptiarum, cur non piget expensarum?"

But "expense" was very little regarded in the days when every workman put his heart into his work, and had the leisure of his life to work in. And long before the Renaissance swept away degenerated Gothic, enough had been left of the individuality of these workmen to show all who read aright what kind of lives they lived. In spite of all our complexity of existence and multitude of books, the carver of to-day seems by comparison singularly barren of ideas. His predecessors knew what he has never read—and they carved the woman riding the philosopher. Has she dropped her bridle-rein to-day? They knew what even our nurseries are forgetting—the moving tale of Renard and his enemies; and they carved it as the best "morality" that all might understand. They were not social agitators; they were no pious exegesis; they chiselled into oak or stone the things they saw, the tales they heard, the sins they hated, the virtues they admired. Neither with "symbolism" nor with "inner meanings" had they much to do. So the Restorer misunderstood them. Even in Montaigne's time we hear of "le bonhomme qui en sa jeunesse chastra tant de belles et antiques statues." And in these days, when such works are at least preserved from further injury, they suffer misconstruction from the last school of philosophy.

"Campaspe est nue en son grenier Sur Aristote à quatre pattes"—

It must be considered the greatest merit of Miss Phipson's book, after the diligence of her handiwork has been acknowledged, that, with the briefest explanation, she has left her carvings to tell their own tale. They are well worthy of an equally unprejudiced perusal.

CARTHAGE AND CANTERBURY.

Cyprian: His Life, His Times, His Work.
By Edward White Benson, D.D., D.C.L., Sometime Archbishop of Canterbury.
(Macmillan & Co.)

CYPRIAN was born a heathen; was baptized in the year 246; sold his property and fed the poor; was rigorous to himself while he was charitable to others; had a controversy with Pope Stephen, and sent a legation to Rome; was made a presbyter as quickly after his conversion as Manning, in our days, was made a priest after his—to the murmuring of many of the Faithful; was raised by the people's vote to rule the See of Carthage; wrote epistles, nursed the victims of pestilence, and kept tight rein on his clergy; addressed an appeal to martyrs, urging them to be steadfast to the Faith even to the death; and lived—or died—up to his words, for he himself refused the Pro-Consul's command that he should offer incense to the gods, and was beheaded for his contumacy in the year 258. Amid the life of Carthage his figure stands forth somewhat as Savonarola's does in the Florence of the Renaissance; little beloved, either of them, by their own weaker brethren, and greatly hated by their outside opponents; yet consoled by the devotion of the few with whom they had true fellowship, and both together accounting death, even violent death, as nothing but a welcome transition.

It is difficult to write of such a man without a lurking dread that Mr. Wilson Barrett may some day be lured to personate him; for far preferable to any stagey presentment is this prettified portrait of a rugged and an abrupt man in tempestuous Carthage of the third century drawn in the calms of Canterbury by the most mild and discursive of prelatial pens. The book is of interminable length; and the style is difficult to follow, not from the Archbishop's "care to avoid the obvious," as his son charmingly puts it in the preface, but because the Archbishop had no power of straight words and direct phrasing. This Canterbury pilgrim set forth to retrace the centuries, and to perform a literary pilgrimage to Carthage, and all with the intention of showing that Cyprian was bold to withstand Peter to the face on certain technical points regarding the baptism of heretics. Canterbury blesses Carthage backhandedly for that—in a book of over six hundred closely printed pages. Not so much for his conversion; no, nor for his martyrdom, did Cyprian find a laborious biographer at Lambeth Palace. The distance of Carthage from Rome in days of difficult intercommunication—this, with its consequences, is what raises a fellow feeling towards Cyprian in the biographer, with the inevitable result that you have a certain atmosphere of provinciality about the book from first to last. Other things in common between Canterbury and Carthage are manifestly far to seek. From the established and comfortable security of Lambeth and Addington, with nothing more adventurous to vary the prosperous monotony of life than a ride in the Row, Archbishop Benson has here to deal with the Decian persecution, when an edict comes to Carthage requiring the abandonment of Christianity from all, especially from "the Bishop of the Christians," and ordering confiscation, mine-labour, banishment, and imprisonment with starvation, as penalties for believers; with preliminary torture as a means of inquisition.

These, then, were the livings and benefices and advowsons of the Church in Rome and at Carthage then; and the head of a Church which has basked in royal favours from its beginning may perhaps be excused a little petulance when he deals with the early stage of the persecutions in such sentences as these: "The age in which martyrs were lightly multiplied was not come. Neither was the fanatic zeal for martyrdom at flood." Again, "The Roman Church would not select one of her leading men for immediate death," is the Archbishop's way of announcing the delay of sixteen months in the election of one Pope after the martyrdom of another. The feverish delights of martyrdom, and the human weakness of indulging in them, were perhaps less obvious to the hunted victims themselves than they appeared to the imagination of the modern Prelate. In short—though it is difficult to think of anything short in connexion with this volume—we have here a Cyprian as he is seen from under the shadow of an Anglican mitre, and a Carthage that is viewed from Canterbury—the last place, perhaps, from which it can be nakedly seen.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The Sepoy Revolt. By Lieut.-General McLeod
Innes, V.C. (Innes.)

IT is with the dramatic and picturesque side of the Indian Mutiny that the general reader is most familiar. By those in whom Mrs. Steele's recent romance or Lord Roberts's valuable autobiography has excited an interest and a curiosity as to the causes which underlay that tragedy, and the practical lessons to be learned from it, this orderly and critical survey from the pen of the author of Lucknow and Oude in the Mutiny will be welcomed. It covers the whole ground. It is written out of a plenitude of assimilated knowledge, both military and political, by one whose attitude of judicial impartiality is no less remarkable than his freedom from an egoism which it would not have been difficult to excuse. The work is planned and executed with a sort of soldierly precision; the table of contents is equivalent to an analytical scheme; there is store of useful maps and a serviceable index. It is not a light book—by the frivolous it will be judged dull; but the serious student of history will recognise it as a valuable contribution toward the solution of many questions arising out of the crisis of which it treats. Moreover, one cannot lay it down without reflecting on that wonderful development of the executive power which enables the Indian Government of to-day to preserve calm amid pestilence and famine.

The Mount: Narrative of a Visit to the Site of a Gaulish City on Mont Beuvray, with a Description of the Neighbouring City of Autun. By P. G. Hamerton. (Seeley.)

THE Gaulish city is Bibracte, oppidum Gallorum amplissimum according to Cæsar; and in these pleasant chapters, which Mrs. Hamerton has been well-advised to rescue from the eventual dustheap, that strenuous and picturesque journalist, the late P. G. Hamerton, gives a somewhat diffuse, but extremely pleasant, account of his intimacy with a friend whom he styles "The Antiquary," whose life was devoted to the minute examination of the city's buried remains. Of this gentleman Mr. Hamerton writes:

"The contemporary history of neighbouring countries is a blank to my friend's mind, but he knows nearly all there is to be known about their condition from the time of Cæsar to the end of the fifth century."

The author tells with some humour, and with some indignation, of the spite and prejudice of which this amiable recluse is made the object. Nothing, it seems, will convince the local populace that anything has been done, or that any remains have been found. The discovery of amphore and the like is explained by various arbitrary hypotheses, the favourite being that in the secrecy of the night they have been stealthily buried by the Antiquary in the places whence he eventually exhumes them. The writer hopes this theory "was not intended to include the ramparts and the Gaulish houses." Incidentally Mr. Hamerton gives some charming local legends. Here is one of them, which furnishes a reason why the nightingale sings at night:

"Those little birds," says Pauchard, "have not always sung like that in the night-time. Long ago they sang in the day, but one of them had been singing so hard all day long . . . that when evening came he was very weary, and went to roost on the vine. . . . Now, it was a warm night in May, and the tendrils of the vine were growing very fast, and they twined round the little thin legs of the nightingale while he slept. His comrades came to awaken him, and said: "La vigne pousse—pousse—vite, vite, vite, vite!" but he was so tired that he could not be awakened. At last morning dawned, and then the sleeper awoke, but only to find himself helplessly fettered by the tendrils of the vine. . . . Then his comrades saw him die, and they said to one another, "We will sleep no more in the night so long as the vine is growing.""

The style is easy and lucid, and the book is pervaded by a painter's sense of beauty.

The Wheel of Life: a Few Memories and Recollections. By Clement Scott. (Lawrence Greening and Free Press Company.) THE score of descriptive essays "dashed off at lightning speed" which Mr. Clement Scott republishes in this little volume are of unequal merit and interest. With regard to some of them it occurs to the reader to wonder whether the journalistic exigencies which excused their appearance in an ephemeral form are a sufficient justification for their republication. A little revision and selection would not, we think, have come amiss. However, several of them contain readable and quite interesting matter, as, considering their author's long and wide acquaintance with the journalistic and theatrical world, it would be strange if they did not. Whether or not we are of one mind with Mr. Clement Scott on certain points of theatrical criticism, it is impossible to ignore the fact that his views are generalisations from a vast range of experience. A man who has seen the part of Hamlet played by Phelps, Charles Kean, Barry Sullivan, Brooke, King, Fechter, Irving, Wilson Barrett, Rossi, Salvini, and Mounet-Sully may be permitted to have an opinion as to whether Mr. Beerbohm Tree's impersonation was a good one or not. The chapter on stage fights is excellent. Here is a story of Macready and Phelps in the Macbeth and Macduff fight:

"Macready as Macbeth commenced the old game of groaning, cursing, and swearing at Macduff sotto voce. But he positively frightened Phelps, who, when he came off, expressed his disgust and horror, saying he was not accustomed to be abused in such an intemperate fashion. 'Oh, never mind that,' said a bystander; 'it's only Mac's way. Pay him back in his own coin, and give him a taste of your special Billingsgate.' Whereupon, the very next night, directly Macbeth began swearing Macduff swore more awful words still; when Macbeth cursed enough to make the blood boil and curdle, Macduff did the same; and the combined oaths were sufficient to take the poor prompter's hair off. But it is recorded that the fight never went better."

Mr. Scott describes the volume as containing the first instalment of his recollections. If the following portions contain as much matter of interest they will be welcome; but we venture respectfully to suggest that the praise which he lavishes upon the young men his contemporaries—upon their appreciation of each other's work, their sincerity, and their freedom from the small vices with which we of a later generation are notoriously beset—would be no less effective if its expression were less vehement. We hope, too, that Mr. Scott will choose a better format for his next book. This one is a marvel of ugliness.

The Story of the House of Lancaster. By Henry Hartwright. (Elliot Stock.)

It is not so much what Mr. Hartwright writes as his depressing way of writing it that detracts from the value of his anxious study of the Lancastrian period. With the best will in the world he is not an exciting writer.

"On one occasion, when the French were wavering, as if about to retreat, the maid rushed forward, unfurled her banner, and led them on to victory."

How is that for thrill? What definite notion could it convey to anyone? Again, to quote quite at random:

"Elizabeth's first care was to find husbands for her six unmarried sisters! All had more or less of the Queen's beauty, with cultivated minds, which, in their retired life hitherto, had not been fully appreciated by the owners of birth and strong limbs."

Now the reader might prepare himself to receive romantic passages, but we had not read 288 pages of the book without beginning to know our Mr. Hartwright, and we found him true to himself:

"Margaret, in October, 1464, married Thomas FitzAlan, Lord Maltravers, subsequently twelfth Earl of Arundel. He was a son of Joan Neville, a sister of the Earl of Warwick, and, consequently, a second cousin of the King. Katherine married . . ."

And so on to the end of the five cultivated minds. This is the author's idea of "whiling an hour away" for us. In his preface he tells us that he has made an endeavour to render the story "more life-like by giving an accurate account, as far as possible, of the family of each of the principal characters introduced, instead of merely a string of names." How far this laudable aspiration has been realised the reader may judge for himself. For our part we regret much labour misapplied and wasted pains.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION (Fifteenth Report. Appendix).—Part II., The Manuscripts of J. Eliot Hodgkin, Esq. (H.M. Stationery Office.)

In issuing a selection from the Eliot Hodgkin MSS., the Historical Manuscripts Commission has done wisely. "Made collections" such as this (to adopt the phrase of the editor of this volume, Mr. J. Cordy Jeaffreson), are often of greater interest than the homogeneous masses of papers which repose in the archives of corporations or old families. Few collectors have taste as catholic as that of Mr. Eliot Hodgkin, whose range is not to be defined. The divisions of the volume before us give an idea of his variousness: (a) MS. books and printed books enriched with MS. notes, among which are the Aldine editio princeps of Herodoti Libri Novem (1502), containing MS. notes by Erasmus and a number of volumes with notes in Melancthon's hand; also among later treasures a notebook of John Bewick and several articles relating to Ireland, the Shakespearian forger. The remainder of the volume is arranged in the following manner: (b) Select letters and documents, mainly of historical interest, ranging from 1557 to 1788; (c) writings touching Charles I. and the Civil War; (d) writings touching Charles II. in exile; (e) draft letters of Sir Bernard Gascoigne; (f) Pepys papers; (g) Danby papers; (h) Ormonde papers; (i) Jacobite and Pretender papers; (k) miscellaneous writings, covering a vast number of subjects; and (l) D'Eon papers, relating to the Chevalier D'Eon, upon whom Mr. Eliot Hodgkin is a specialist. Mr. Cordy Jeaffreson's arrangement is perhaps the best that could be devised. We regret, however, that he could not see his way to make more use of the collector's own notes. "The multifarious treasures," he writes, "have been annotated with much learning and literary address by their owner, who knows thoroughly the MSS. in which he delights, and has illustrated most of them with explanatory comments." Yet not one is reproduced!

By-Ways of History: Studies in the Social Life and Rural Economy of the Olden Time. By James Colville, M.A., D.Sc. (Edinburgh: David Douglas.)

ELEVEN essays, republished for the most part from the pages of various magazines, furnish the contents of Dr. Colville's entertaining and profitable volume. His purpose is clear from the title beneath which he has collected them: to clothe with flesh the dry bones of history, to develop in the faded pictures that have come down to us some particular wrinkles and some of the expression that makes the difference between waxwork and life. And this laudable aim he has, in a measure, accomplished. It is not necessary that one should be a Caledonian to appreciate the essay on "Lowland Scotland in the Time of Burns"; wherein the incidental statement that, by reason of its unfortunate absence from the flora of the Holy Scriptures, the potato found a difficulty in winning for itself toleration, is delightfully illuminative. These are the trifles that make history vivacious. "Scottish Trade in the Olden Time," "The Scottish Tour in the Days of Charles I.," "Town Life in the Eighteenth Century" are titles taken at random, under which the reader will find good store of information that he probably would not light upon elsewhere.

The Municipal Year Book of the United Kingdom. 1897. By Robert Donald. (Offices of London.)

YEAR BOOKS increase with the years, and both age us. But one cannot deny the usefulness, the inevitableness of The Municipal Year Book, which is newly issued from the offices of London. Mr. Robert Donald is its editor, and he supplies particulars concerning the municipal governments of London, the large provincial towns, the county boroughs, and other incorporated towns. The systems under which water, gas, electricity, tramways, and artisans' dwellings are provided and managed are dealt with in separate sections. Mr. Donald is a high authority on his subject, and it is interesting to have his view on the influence of politics on municipal government. He makes very little of it. "Political feeling," he writes,

"may be introduced at elections, parties may exist on the councils, but a review of the institutions and the work as they are does not show that politics have any effect in moulding municipal policy. As a matter of fact, the towns which have been pioneers in municipal progress, which have gone farthest in collectivist control, are just now strongly Conservative or Unionist in Imperial politics."

Mr. Donald also rejoices in the general advance of municipal control: "There never was a time when more demands were made on Parliament for new powers and heavier responsibilities." Adequate space is given to the municipal government of London, which is unique, and is, perhaps, incapable of perfectly lucid explanation. A London fog of exceptions clings to every rule. If Mr. Donald does not quite banish the fog he makes it vastly more transparent.

FICTION.

The Outspan. Tales of South Africa. By J. P. Fitzpatrick. (W. Heinemann.)

THE following note is prefixed by the author to these stories: "A person of my acquaintance was once referred to in an up-country newspaper as 'Mr. Chimmage.' He wrote to the editor, explaining that his name was not 'Chimmage,' but 'Schimmelovitch'; and the editor, in making the correction, added, 'He has only himself to blame for the fact being known.'" This, we take it, is as much as to say that Mr. Fitzpatrick's stories deal with real people. Without any such hint, we should have suspected that to be the case, such an air of veracity blows through the pages. The Outspan is essentially a man's book—a record of the rough, free ways of the "Legion that never was 'listed,'" of the strong passions and lawless acts of refugees from society. Mr. Fitzpatrick writes straightforwardly and well; his words are forcible; his knowledge of life is wide and deep; and his sympathies are quick. If we had to place him we should say he deserved a place in the brotherhood of Mr. Kipling and Mr. Bret Harte, although we should ask from the new writer more work before finally establishing him there. Of these tales of South Africa we like best the one entitled "Soltké," which has humour and a ring of true pathos. But the first story, "The Outspan," has great merit. As an example of Mr. Fitzpatrick, not at his best but at his most quotable, take this glimpse of General Gordon:

"the soldier saint, the man who could lead a storming party, a forlorn hope, with a Bible in one hand and a cane in the other; the man who, in the infiniteness of his love and tenderness, and in the awful immutability of his decision and justice, realised qualities in a degree which we associate only with the Deity. I felt I could see this man helping, feeding with his own short rations, nursing, and praying with, the lowliest of his men, the incarnation of mercy. But I also saw him facing the semi-mutinuous regiment of barbarians, and, with the awful passionless decision of fate itself, singling out the leaders here and there—in all a dozen men—whom he shot dead before their comrades, and turning again as calm and unmoved as ever to repeat his order, which this time was obeyed! I pictured this man, with the splendid practical genius to re-conquer and re-organise China, treasuring a cutting which he had taken from what he verily believed to be the identical living tree from which Eve had plucked the forbidden fruit."

In the same story is mention of this simple epitaph on the grave of an old Irish servant:

"Paddy Tarry's Rest!
Are ye ready?
Aye, aye, Sir!"

We shall look with some eagerness at Mr. Fitzpatrick's next collection of stories. Africa has produced romances enough; but it is the short story which is the fitting vehicle for recording the deeds of pioneers. In Mr. Fitzpatrick they have perhaps found their chronicler.

A Galahad of the Greeks, and Other Stories. By S. Levett-Yeats. (Longmans.)

The story which lends its title to this volume deals with the fate of one of the best class of young Indian Civil men, fresh from the university with a first and his blue—clean-living, high-thinking—pitched into a God-forsaken Burmese station, with a debauched head of the police, a fanatical American missionary, and the missionary's pretty wife for his companions. To keep things lively for them there are also "Father Fragrance," a Buddhist clergyman and valiant leader of dacoits; Moung Sen, of the same profession, and their companions. There is plenty of dash about Mr. Levett-Yeats's manner of telling a spirited story; and if the end in this case is rather impotent, at least he does not let the reader go till he has reached it. Of the remaining stories, "The Worthy and Pitiful Quest of Susanna Hope (a Lost Hackluyt)" is a cleverish study, but what does this remind you of? "... fitted out the Merchant Royal with goodly merchandise, the same being well fenced with munitions withal." In the third story we have a sketch of Babu life that is strong and convincing. For the missionary and the fascinating widow, who are the central personages, are of less interest than the brown types among whom they live—Mr. and Mrs. Bunny and Master Eddie Bunny, Elder Bullin, and Mr. James Sarkies who loved Miss Bullin. These and others of their class are sympathetically studied and adroitly sketched. The fascinating widow marries Galbraith, the missionary; then her blackguard first husband turns up, and the fat is in the fire. The end is not so comforting as it would have been easy to make it. At the last we hear the fascinating widow, now a nun, singing a stanza of the Stabat Mater as an introit to a midnight Mass of New Year's Day; which scheme of a liturgical function is evidence of the writer's power of imagination.

Midst the Wild Carpathians. By Maurus Jókai. (Jarrold & Sons.)

JÓKAI has every one of the qualifications which go to make an historical novelist. He has all the passion of patriotism natural to the true Hungarian. He is well versed in the troublous and tangled history of mediæval Transylvania. Above all, he has the magic touch and almost barbaric force of imagination which can convert the petty feuds which make history into Titanic struggles fit for literature. There is a curious sense of undefined vastness about these Homeric heroes of Jókai's. Even the weakest of them, Apafi, who would have been the best of men with any other headgear but a crown—even the coarsest of them, Banfi—has a touch of the elemental which assorts well with their wild and fantastic surroundings. None of Jókai's historical novels is so great a favourite as this among his own people; and, making allowance for the obvious obstacles to the popularity of an historical romance in an alien country, one may presume that foreign readers will come to the same conclusion. Much and well as Jókai has written, his pen has done nothing more vivid than some of these descriptions, and nothing more lurid than this grim story of intrigue and battle and treachery.

Captain Castle. By Carlton Dawe. (Smith Elder & Co.)

MR. CARLTON DAWE has made a creditable dish according to the Treasure Island recipe, but if he had tried more zealously we believe he could have made a much better one. He has the intentions in strong array, and a large measure of ability, and he has used most of the ingredients. The China Seas in themselves make for success, and when you have added an ocean tramp partly laden with dollars, a drunken captain, a drunken mate, a drunken chief engineer, a giant second engineer (Scotch, of course), a beautiful woman (the captain's wife), a mutiny, an attack by pirates, and a literary second mate (to tell the story afterwards) you have practically proved your case. All the same, the story has to be written, and it is here that Mr. Carlton Dawe is weak. His invention is fertile, his courage is undaunted, but his method is often annoying. This is partly because he has chosen an almost antipathetic figure as the historian of the voyage. The "I" of the book, the second mate, is not attractive. We can understand why he was so detested by the captain. With the best intentions in the world he was a prig, and prigs on an ocean tramp are intolerable. He came aboard in a collar and necktie, and morally he retained them all the trip. Hence his manner is now and then oppressive, as when he thus describes his avoidance of a bullet?

"I believe it is bad form for a soldier to bob. It looks as though he were afraid of being hit, which of course no man is. Yet it struck me that I might be, so I sank on one knee while the bullet whistled harmlessly over my head. I admit to making discretion the better part of valour. Those who like bullets can have them; I don't care much for them myself. It even appeared to me that the sea was much the better place for that sort of thing; much better, at any rate, than my body. But perhaps I was prejudiced."

This is sheer Mark Twain and water, and, coming at an exciting part of the book, is a nuisance. Mr. Dawe fails also to make certain things clear—as, for example, why the captain made no attempt to recover his dollars; and we cannot forgive the second mate for not shooting Li Chee at the very beginning of the mutiny, even although the story depends very much upon that rascal's life. But boys will revel in Captain Castle.

Allanson's Little Woman. By Eastwood Kidson. "Greenback" Series. (Jarrold.)

ALICE was the name of Allanson's Little Woman, and a very tiresome little woman she was. By a just and too rare dispensation she cracked her voice in "soaring over" a high note at a soirée dansante. She dreamed dreams about Tom Waterton and they came true. Tom Waterton reciprocated the attention, as Mr. Kidson might say. The story kicks off tremendously with the promise of preternatural sensationalism; but nothing comes of it. The game is the dullest conceivable; and it is clear that Mr. Kidson has no story to tell, and, further, that if he had the finest in the world he must inevitably spoil it. He narrates a stirring incident in this fashion:

"... Frank saw in a moment his favourite was doomed, unless immediately rescued; and looking about and seeing no likely help, he threw off his coat and boots and plunged in before anyone suspected his intentions. 'What madness!' exclaimed several; but Frank was a strong swimmer, and, taking his opportunity as he approached the dog, permitted the breakers to go over his head; and then making a sudden dash for [sic], seized the top of the breakwater before another could fling him at it. . . . By this time some boatmen had arrived, and putting out from the landing-place, took him up in a boat; for it was hazardous to attempt swimming through the rough surf."

A Passing Madness. By Florence Marryat. (Hutchinson.)

DISAPPOINTMENT often lurks in the novels of writers whose popularity is unquestioned. It may be that one expects too much, or perhaps "the hand of little employment hath the daintier sense." Miss Marryat, of course, knows what is required of her by her special public; and she has a perfect right to neglect, if she chooses, matters to which that public is indifferent. But there is a point at which facility becomes dangerous; and we think that Miss Marryat, however little she may need to trouble herself with literary craftsmanship, might at least "j'ine her flats." The most uncritical reader is apt to grow impatient with a book in which a large fortune, important to the plot, is described indifferently as reverting wholly, and as reverting to the extent of one-half, to the same heiress. Miss Marryat might as well have made up her mind which way she would have it. Again, we cannot believe that even a doctor who lodged lunatics without a licence would keep one in his house while he was himself engaged to a lady who would inherit a fortune by that lunatic's decease. A very little thought, or even humour, would have obviated other absurdities, such as the lunatic's highly variable condition (he is described by the doctor as merely "eccentric," after nearly murdering a valet), the heiress's unfilial assignment of her father's ghost to "Heaven or wherever he may be," and the lightning change in the lady villain, who suddenly confesses her naughtiness, and becomes in a twinkling a self-sacrificing angel, ambitious of setting up a ragged school.

Ivan Alexandrovitch: a Siberian Romance. By Andrée Hope (Mrs. Harvey of Ickwell-Bury). (Fisher Unwin.)

ANDRÉE HOPE decidedly has talent, and she gives a vivid, and to us quite novel, impression of life in Siberia. One was not prepared to read of great wealth and lavish luxury in those far regions; but it seems that Siberian merchants squander money like South African millionaires. New also to us, and very horrible, was her account of the Buriatis, a savage tribe whose special employment is the chase of escaped convicts. The final scene of their orgie in the tent reads like a description of West African cannibals; and the catastrophe which comes of it is very striking, and, though wholly unexpected, seems artistically right. Ivan himself, the half-reclaimed savage, from his first appearance in a ballroom at Paris until he brings his lovely bride home to the Government House at Yeniditak in the far north, and after that, through all his changing humours, to the moment when his wife recognises him among the naked savages, is an impressive and convincing figure. It is a grim book, but a remarkable one.

They that Sit in Darkness. By John Mackie. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THE young literature of Australia is indebted to Mr. Mackie for a tale which, while it abounds in local colour from the authoritative brush of one who, as he puts it in the preface, "figured in a humble way as a pioneer of civilisation" in the wilds of the northern continent, is also thrilling enough for any boy's book. What more can one ask in the way of peril and adventure than to have half-a-dozen whites, including ladies, besieged in a cave by as many hundred blacks; furious onslaughts repulsed with terrible slaughter; provisions raided, and ammunition stolen; a thrilling climb up an impossible cliff, and, eventually, a rescue in the very nick of time? But it would be a grave injustice to class Mr. Mackie's book as merely sensational. The other interests of it are well maintained; and one may safely say that no more accurate picture has been presented of bush life in what is probably the most grotesque corner of the world. The writer knows it well—better, probably, than most people would care to do; he tells us that he has subsisted for weeks together "on crows, hawks, snakes, and currajong roots." He has a pleasant and graphic pen, and the description of the trial-scene in MacArthur is a very telling piece of work. The characterisation, too, is much above the ordinary run of "bush" novels. The heroine suffers from the usual tendency of Australian heroines to excessive versatility, but she is so genuine a girl that one need not carp at her prowess with the stock-whip and her astuteness as a detective.

The Queen of the Moor. By Frederic Adye. (Macmillan & Co.)

SOMETHING of the ozone of Dartmoor has got into this book. Mr. Adye is an adept at that pleasant, leisurely style of descriptive writing which this over-hasty age is apt to skip as superfluous, but which in his hands conveys a refreshing sense of air and open sky. The story is laid in the closing years of the Napoleonic era. The Battle of Waterloo has a chapter to itself towards the end, perhaps for no very pressing reason, unless it be that the reader seems to expect it. But for the most part Mr. Adye's pen flits between Dartmoor Prison (which was then a place of confinement for captives of war) and Tor-Royal, the residence of a charming young lady named Cecil Calmady, "The Queen of the Moor." The commandant of the prison is a suitor for her hand. She, however, has lost her heart to Arnaud de Valence, a French officer in his custody. The Commandant is a tyrant—why, in fiction, are all governors of prisons tyrants?—and uses his power to humiliate and thwart his captive. A mutiny breaks out, and Arnaud escapes. He is succoured in many perils by the mistress of Tor-Royal, and requites her in the usual manner. It is a pretty story of love and adventure, and the many pages which are perfectly irrelevant are by no means the least agreeable.

God, Man, and the Devil. By Ernest G. Henham. (Skeffington.)

THE title of this book argues a considerable lack of sense in the person who chose it, and the contents fully bear out that impression. The story is a pamphlet against divorce couched in the form of a wild melodrama, whose absurdities are too numerous to set out. It is amazing that a human being should exist capable of believing that other human beings act, speak, or think in such a way. The book concludes with the vision of a bishop who sees devils and angels fighting for possession of the cathedral in which he had read the marriage service over a divorcée. Naturally enough next morning he is discovered penitent and expiring.

From Grub to Butterfly. By Joseph Forster. (Ward & Downey.)

THE heroine of this work commenced life as a step cleaner; she advanced, by way of the music-hall stage, to be the wife, and subsequently the widow, of a lion comique. After this she became the mistress of a "veneered scoundrel," and then the daughter-in-law of an earl, also veneered, but aristocratically. The story is written in the style of a penny dreadful. Mr. Forster is mistaken in supposing that the speech of the lower classes can be successfully represented by the introduction at haphazard of mistakes in grammar; also in thinking that the eldest son of an earl is called "the honourable," and that a lady and her daughter would "excite unpleasant attention" by going unsuited to a theatre.

That Affair Next Door. By Anna Katharine Green (Mrs. Charles Rohlfs). (Putnams.)

THIS is one more detective story by the author of the Leavenworth Case, and rather a good detective story at that. In this case there is not only the detective, but the talented amateur who supersedes and outwits him; and the talented amateur is no less than a meddlesome old maid. That is rather a good idea. Old maids have in the extreme development a woman's eye for detail, and in sheer enthusiasm for inquiry no professional detective could approach them. Some of Miss Butterworth's intuitions are excellently in character. For instance, given a lady's hat. How to determine that it is new, but has been worn, and worn once only? A clever woman will guess; but hardly any man.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1897.

No. 1303, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom.	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow in due course.]

THE DIARY OF "FATHER JOHN."

FEW people in England have heard of the Reverend John Sergieff; but it will not be surprising if the translation of his spiritual diary, entitled My Life in Christ, which has just been issued, makes his name venerated by thousands of the English-speaking race. The book is translated by E. E. Goulaeff, of St. Petersburg, who dedicates it to Her Majesty the Queen, and introduces it by quoting an account of Sergieff, which appeared in the Times of January 13, 1891. The passage is so interesting that we quote the essential part of it:

"Father Ivan, or John of Cronstadt, known and revered in every nook and corner of Russia, has hitherto been almost entirely unknown to English readers; but a circumstance just reported to the British chaplain at Cronstadt seems to indicate that the Christian influence of this remarkable priest of the Russian Church has at last found its way even into the United Kingdom. A short time ago a letter reached the British clergyman at Cronstadt, addressed in English to the parish priest of that port. It came from a correspondent in county Kerry, Ireland, and earnestly begged for the prayers of Father John on behalf of the writer, who appeared to be in great distress of mind and body. His letter is being translated, and will be forwarded to the reverend pastor.

"This is a curious proof of the influence and reputation of this wonderful man, who, in the midst of his Russian surroundings, seems to approach in these days to the first Apostles. He is, indeed, a true physician of the Gospel. His extraordinary healing powers, and the spiritual and bodily cures effected by the faithful acceptance of his earnest consolations, are attested on all sides by many sorts and conditions of men. To those who believe in

Father John—and their name is legion—the age of miracles is not yet over. Crowds press around him whenever he leaves his humble abode, and are happy if they can only touch the hem of his modest garb. Father John's life is one of uninterrupted and self-sacrificing charity and Christian ministrations among the poor, the sick, and the needy; not, however, refusing his presence and prayers to the well-to-do and rich, who send for him when other help fails, and never in vain, from all parts of the country. He has no vast business organisation of charity, and no corybantic Christianity, like 'General' Booth, and no religious politics, like Archbishop Nicanor of Odessa. Although enormous sums of money have passed through his hands to the Russian poor in all directions, he is still a poor man, living in the humblest possible way. Steamboats and trains in which he journeys to and fro on his truly Christian work are besieged with such crowds that the police have to protect him from their pressure.

"The report of his appearance in any house in St. Petersburg—and the news spreads like wildfire—brings throngs of poor people running madly from all the surrounding streets to get within the range of his healing presence, to receive his blessing or to implore his attendance at the sick-bed of relatives or friends.

"He advocates no impracticable Christian theories like Tolstoy; his life is one entirely of good works, and his influence for good among the Russian masses who have not yet reached the state of cynical unbelief of the lower orders in other countries is greater, perhaps, than of any Russian under the Czar."

The translator adds that this account of Sergieff more than holds good still. In a very short introductory note to his book "Father John" writes:

"Everything contained in it is but a gracious enlightenment which was bestowed upon my soul by the all-enlightening Holy Ghost during moments of deep self-concentration and of self-examination, especially during prayer."

A portrait of the author is given as the frontispiece, and the work is dedicated by the translator to Her Majesty the Queen.

SIR HENRY PARKES.

A YEAR has not quite elapsed since Sir Henry Parkes died, yet his biography, written in Australia, and occupying little fewer than six hundred pages, is before us. It is not necessary to suppose that there has been any undue haste in the matter. The life-story of an administrator is easily compiled, and Sir Henry Parkes was not a many-sided man. But he dabbled in verse, and a sonnet in which he describes the home of a Birmingham artisan at the beginning of the Queen's reign—such a home as he himself left when he emigrated—is decidedly interesting; for it presents a picture of English town life which has passed away, and the passing of which has synchronised with the growth of the Australian colonies and of Australian statesmanship.

"One of a brick-built row in street retired, A lowly dwelling so for comfort plann'd No foot of room was lost; in nothing grand, Yet wanting nought which humble heart desired. Parlour,—with creeping plants, the window wired, The furniture soiless kept by woman's hand,— In summer like some nook in fairyland, For winter nights, well hearth-rugg'd and coal-fired.

Snug kitchen in the rear, with childhood's sports

Gracing the threshold, and the home-cured fitch Within—fair picture 'gainst the poor man's wall!

Ope' to a garden plot, not crowded courts. Such our mechanic's home; nor wanted stitch His decent clothing; and content blessed all"

The book is well illustrated with portraits of Sir Henry Parkes at various times in his life, views of his residences, &c.

The Confessions of a Col-

OTHER BOOKS. lector is the title which

Mr. William Carew Hazlitt

gives to a book of reminiscences of the auction room. Mr. Hazlitt has collected both books and coins with untiring industry, and his fund of experience and anecdote is a large one. . . . There is need in this country for a better, a more orderly knowledge of American literature, and two books which have just come to hand tend to supply that need. American Authors, 1795—1895, by B. K. Foley, is a bibliography of first and notable editions of American books published in the century ending 1895. An Introduction to American Literature, by F. V. N. Painter, is educational in character. The writer discovers five periods in American literature which he names the First Colonial Period, the Second Colonial Period, the Revolutionary Period, the First National Period, and the Second National Period. Portraits of leading writers accompany the text. . . . A Handbook to Christian and Ecclesiastical Rome, issued by Messrs. A. & C. Black, is a work of considerable bulk, the first part alone, which is before us, running to over five hundred octavo pages. The Handbook as a whole is intended "to give the visitor to Rome full information about the Christian side of its history, about Roman churches, ceremonies, and customs which does not fall within the scope of such an excellent handbook as that of Messrs. Murray's general guide." The first part deals with the Christian Monuments of Rome; and the Liturgy in Rome, Monasticism in Rome, and Ecclesiastical Rome will be dealt with in three succeeding volumes. . . . In The Poems of Horace, a literal prose rendering of the Roman's verse, the translator, M. A. Hamilton Bryce, has found it possible to introduce a slight novelty into his work. "I have endeavoured," he says—

"to produce a version having a pleasant run in the words, and a rhythmical cadence in the clauses and sentences. In doing this I have frequently fallen inadvertently in the first instance into a sort of blank verse in individual lines, with which rigid critics may perhaps find fault. Be that as it may, it appears to me that in most cases the effect on the reader's ear will be rather pleasing than otherwise—a result which I have steadily kept in view."

Under the title of Ethics of John Stuart Mill, Charles Douglas, M.A., has prepared a companion volume to his study of Mill's Philosophy. The present volume, which contains three introductory essays by Mr. Douglas, "is designed for the use of those who are beginning the study of moral science, and has been prepared in the belief that there is no better introduction to this subject than an accurate knowledge of Mill's ethical theory."

Mr. G. B. BURGIN has three hunting-grounds, if we are not mistaken: London, Canada, and Turkey. It is only natural that he should alternate them, and thus after his Judge of Four Corners (Canada) he gave us Gascoigne's Ghost (London) and Tomalyn's Quest (Turkey). In Old Man's Marriage he takes us back to Four Corners. Wetherleigh, by Richard Davey, is a romance of Hampton Court, a spot to which romance is now only imported, chiefly on Bank holidays. The story opens on a "bitter cold evening in December, 1652." . . . Daughters of Thespis, by John Bickerdyke, is a story of theatrical life, and is prefaced by a somewhat flamboyant address, "To my Brother Journalists, Reviewers, and to the Young Person." The Young Person is considerably warned off at the outset: "This book is too strong meat for you . . . and I would have you leave it unopened." The Young Person, in short, is told not to read the book, and the Reviewers how to read it. We doubt the wisdom of such buttonholing tactics in an author; they cannot improve a good book, or palliate a bad one. . . . The Captain of the Parish is laid in the Isle of Man, in the early years of the Queen's reign. The story, which has the air of being "strong," is concerned with Methodist revivals and the doings of the Latter Day Saints. . . . Other new novels to hand are Ballyronan, by Rupert Alexander; In a Country Town, by Honor Perceval; A Pot of Honey, by Susan Christian; A Story of a Campaign Country, by Robert Thynne; and Sprays of Northern Pine, by Fergus Mackenzie.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by publishers.]

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- THE LESSONS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE APPOINTED BY THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND ILLUSTRATED BY THOUGHTS IN VERSE. By the late Rev. J. H. Wanklyn. Vols. V. and VI. Beemrose & Sons.
- THE SAYINGS OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST. Collected and arranged by J. W. Mackail. Longmans, Green & Co. 2s. 6d.
- HOUSEHOLD PRAYERS. By G. J. Cowley-Brown, M.A. St. Giles' Printing Co. (Edinburgh).
- THE CHRISTIAN FAITH. By Rowland Ellis, M.A. St. Giles' Printing Co. (Edinburgh).
- MY LIFE IN CHRIST: EXTRACTS FROM THE DIARY OF JOHN LITTON SERGIEFF. Translated by E. E. Goulaeff. Cassell & Co.
- RELIGIOUS TRAINING IN SECONDARY SCHOOLS. By Rev. George C. Bell. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.
- THE CHRISTIAN ECOLESIA. By the late Fenton John Anthony Hort, D.D. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

HISTORY.

- THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION. By Jesse Macy, M.A. The Macmillan Co. 8s. 6d.

BIOGRAPHY.

- LIFE OF SIR HENRY PARKES. By Charles E. Lyne. T. Fisher Unwin. 16s.
- THE STORY OF A BUSY LIFE. Edited by J. R. Miller, D.D. Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.

POETRY.

- TRUMPETS AND SHAWNS. By Henry Hanby Hay. Arnold & Co. (Philadelphia). 1 dollar 50 cents.

FICTION.

- BALLYRONAN. By Rupert Alexander. Digby, Long & Co. 6s.
- WETHERLEIGH. By Richard Davey. The Roxburghe Press. 3s. 6d.

- THE STORY OF A CAMPAIGN ESTATE. By Robert Thynne. Roxburghe Press. 3s. 6d.

- THE EARTH CHILDREN. By Mrs. Stephen Batson. Hutchinson & Co. 2s.

- A POT OF HONEY. By Susan Christian. T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.

- THE CAPTAIN OF THE PARISH. By John Quine. William Heinemann. 6s.

- A PASSING WORD. By Bessie Rayner Balloo. Ward & Downey. 6s.

- DAUGHTERS OF THESPIS. By John Bickerdyke. Simpkin, Marshall & Co. 6s.

- MAURICE QUAIN. By Morley Roberts. Hutchinson & Co. 6s.

- LADY TURPIN. By Henry Herman. Ward, Lock & Co. 3s. 6d.

- CAPTAIN SHANNON. By Coulson Kernahan. Ward, Lock & Co. 3s. 6d.

- SPRAYS OF NORTHERN PINE. By Fergus Mackenzie. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 3s. 6d.

- ABBE CONSTANTIN. By Ludovic Halévy. Translated by Thérèse Batbedat. John Macquenn.

- IN A COUNTRY TOWN. By Honor Percival. Richard Bentley & Son.

SCIENCE.

- PROBLEMS AND QUESTIONS IN PHYSICS. By Charles P. Matthews and John Shearer. The Macmillan Co. 7s. 6d.
- EXPERIMENTAL MORPHOLOGY. By Charles Benedict Davenport, Ph.D. Part I. Macmillan & Co. 9s.

POLITICAL.

- POLITICAL PAMPHLETS. Selected and arranged by H. F. Pollard. Kegan Paul. 6s.

- A WOMAN'S PART IN A REVOLUTION. By Mrs. John Hays Hammond. Longmans, Green & Co. 2s. 6d.

- GOVERNMENTS AND PARTIES IN CONTINENTAL EUROPE. By A. Lawrence Lowell. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. (Boston, U.S.A.)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- SKETCHES AROUND IN FIN DE SIÈCLE IBERIA. By Fanny Bullock Workman and William Hunter Workman. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

- HANDBOOK TO CHRISTIAN AND ECCLESIASTICAL ROME. By H. M. and M. A. R. T. Part I.: THE CHRISTIAN MONUMENTS OF ROME. A. & C. Black. 7s. 6d.

ARCHITECTURE.

- ARCHAEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF WESTERN INDIA. By Jas. Burgess. Thacker, Spink & Co. (Calcutta).

SOCIOLOGY.

- LIFE AND LABOUR OF THE PEOPLE IN LONDON. Edited by Charles Booth. Vol. IX.: COMPARISONS, SURVEY, AND CONCLUSIONS. Macmillan & Co. 7s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

- CALENDAR OF QUEEN'S COLLEGE, GALWAY: 1896-7. Dublin: University Press.

- GOLDSMITH'S VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. With Introduction and Notes by Michael Macmillan. Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.

- THE ESSENTIALS OF ALGEBRA FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS. By Webster Wells. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn (Boston, U.S.A.).

- A TREATISE ON PRACTICAL, PLANE, AND SOLID GEOMETRY. By Thomas Jay Evans and W. W. F. Pullen. Chapman & Hall.

- ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND: EXAMINATION PAPERS, 1896. Ponsonby & Weldrick (Dublin).

FOREIGN.

- PAGES CHOISIES DES AUTEURS CONTEMPORAINS: JULES CLARETIE. Armand Colin et Cie (Paris).

- ETUDES SOUS LE DRAPEAU ANTIQUE. Par Henri Weil. Librairie Hachette et Cie (Paris).

- HISTOIRE DE LA LANGUE ET DE LA LITTÉRATURE FRANÇAISE. Tome III. Armand Colin et Cie (Paris).

MISCELLANEOUS.

- AMERICAN MEN OF LETTERS. By Henrietta Christian Wright. David Nutt. 2 vols. 3s. 6d. each.

- INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN LITERATURE. Part I. By F. V. N. Painter. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn (Boston, U.S.A.).

- THE CONFESSIONS OF A COLLECTOR. By William Carew Hazlitt. Ward & Downey.

- THE HOUSE OF DREAMS. Anonymous. James Bowden. 3s. 6d.

- AMERICAN AUTHORS, 1795-1895. By P. K. Foley. Printed for Subscribers (Boston, U.S.A.).

- THE THEORY OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE. By C. F. Bartstable, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

- THE FORCING-BOOK. By L. H. Bailey. Macmillan & Co.

- IN AN ANCIENT MIRROR. By Herbert Flowerden. T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE volume of selections which Mr. Meredith has made from his published poems for Messrs. Constable will appear in May. There is no likelihood that the collection will contain any entirely new poems, though this possibility is not barred. Mr. Meredith's sonnet on the death of Browning, and his poem for Trafalgar Day, which appeared in the Daily Chronicle last September, will be included. The collection, as a whole, will represent all Mr. Meredith's poetry. At present this is contained in five volumes, which are in the hands of Messrs. Macmillan. The selections will not be meagre, for the promised volume is likely to run to some three hundred octavo pages.

Books about London are common enough, and, it must be added, are usually undistinguished enough too. A very remarkable volume of a new kind, descriptive of London, is, however, now promised by Messrs. Constable. The artist, who is at this moment hard at work on his share of this book, is Mr. William Hyde, already known to the few as a strong imaginative painter in monochrome of nature in moods of turbulence or extreme peace. His drawings in Mr. Garnett's Imaged World, and his illustrations to Milton, in a scarce volume published by Messrs. Dent, are treasured by all who own them. London translated into Mr. Hyde's medium may surprise many persons unaccustomed to look for beauty in their immediate surroundings.

In a descriptive work excellence in illustrations too often connotes mediocrity in the letterpress; but, as readers of the Academy particularly will understand, such will not be the case in this forthcoming London book, for the author engaged is Mr. Francis Thompson. Mr. Thompson's prose is hardly less remarkable than his verse, and as he knows London intimately, and brings to his task a poetic imagination of extraordinary range and resource, this book should be awaited with very keen interest.

A CIRCULAR, signed by the Duke of Devonshire, has just been issued by the University of Cambridge, drawing attention to the acute condition of poverty in which, owing mainly to the fall in agricultural values, that body now finds itself, and asking that means may be found by which the University's endowments may be again raised to the level of its present requirements. A statement of these requirements and the financial condition of the University strengthens the appeal, which is not made directly to the public, but asks that the flow of benefactions for educational uses, which for years has practically ceased to reach the University, may again be directed to it. Unless some such addition is made to the revenue, the teaching resources of the University must obviously be crippled, and several plans for necessary enlargement of buildings and other improvements must remain in abeyance. The situation certainly is grave.

DURING this week Mr. F. R. Benson and his company have been attracting crowded audiences to the Memorial Theatre at Stratford-on-Avon. The special revival this year is "Henry V.," which is being played on the three last days of this week. The performances are all Shakespearian with the exception of "The School for Scandal," which will be played next Tuesday. Mr. Benson is deserving of the highest commendation for the intelligent and satisfactory manner in which, in season and out, he places Shakespeare before the multitude. The performance of "The Merry Wives of Windsor" last Monday went with a rare abandon and swing, each member of the company contributing to the fine full-bodied appreciation of Shakespearian humour that marks these revivals.

MR. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., will occupy the chair at the Booksellers' dinner on May 8, and Mr. Slingsby Tanner the vice-chair. Among the guests who have signified their intention of being present on the occasion are the Archdeacon of London, Lord Roberts, and Sir Henry Cunningham. A wish has been generally expressed by members of the trade, especially by those coming from the country, that the galleries of the King's Hall should be open to ladies who wish to hear the speeches delivered on that occasion. This, the committee are pleased to announce, has been arranged; also that coffee and biscuits will be served if required. Tickets for the galleries may be obtained gratis, by any gentleman attending the dinner, from the secretary, Mr. G. Lerner, 48, Paternoster-row, E.C.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P., has chosen a clever title for his continuation of his History of Our Own Times. The supplementary, or fifth, volume is to be called From 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. The services of the American gentleman who brought the history up to date some few years ago for his countrymen's benefit are not again to be requisitioned, for Messrs. Harper will publish Mr. McCarthy's work in America. Mr. McCarthy, under the strain of finishing the new volume, has broken down in health, and is now taking a thorough rest.

THE competition instituted by the Critic to ascertain which are the best twelve short stories by American authors has just closed, and the results are laid before the readers of that paper. The number of lists sent in fell a little short of five hundred, and the best, according to the judgment of the editor of the Critic, is the following: "The Man Without a Country," by Edward Everett Hale; "The Luck of Roaring Camp," by Bret Harte; "The Snow Image" and "The Great Stone Face," by Hawthorne; "The Gold Bug" and "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," by Poe; "The Lady, or the Tiger?" by Frank R. Stockton; "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow" and "Rip Van Winkle," by Washington Irving; "Marse Chan," by T. N. Page; "Marjorie Daw," by T. B. Aldrich; and "The Revolt of Mother," by Miss Wilkins.

AT the time the competition was announced our impression was that the result was to be decided by plébiscite, which would certainly be more satisfactory; but apparently we were mistaken. Our own conviction is that no list that does not contain a story by Mr. G. W. Cable ought to gain the prize. The best of the lists mentioning one story only by each author is the following: "Marjorie Daw," by T. B. Aldrich; "Love in Old Cloathes," by H. C. Bunner; "The Lady, or the Tiger?" by Frank R. Stockton; "A Humble Romance," by Miss Wilkins; "The Gold Bug," by Poe; "The Birthmark," by Hawthorne; "The Luck of Roaring Camp," by Bret Harte; "The Jumping Frog," by Mark Twain; "The Man without a Country," by Edward Everett Hale; "Meh Lady," by T. N. Page; "Posson Jone," by George W. Cable; and "Gallegher," by Richard Harding Davis. This list contains more characteristically American stories than that which took the prize.

EVER since Arms and the Man Mr. Bernard Shaw seems to have been writing plays only in order that they may be produced once and lost for ever. Now and again news comes that a copyright performance of this or that new work by Mr. Shaw has been given, and the rest is silence. The latest of these tantalising trials took place on Saturday, when "The Devil's Disciple," a melodrama, was tried at the Bijou Theatre. In the cast was "Cashel Byron," whose profession, it will be remembered, was not acting but pugilism. The announcement is made that "The Devil's Disciple" is for the delectation of America.

MEANWHILE, Mr. Grant Richards has in hand an edition of Mr. Shaw's plays, which he will issue in monthly volumes.

DEAN FARRAR's literary reminiscences now appearing in the Temple Magazine have some excellent stories of notable persons. In the May instalment a memorable remark made by Huxley to Matthew Arnold is recorded. They were walking in Arnold's garden with Dean Farrar and talking of social duties. Arnold admitted to being fond of dining out. "I rather like it," he said. "It is rather nice to meet people." "Oh, yes," replied Huxley, laughing, "but we are not all such everlasting Cupids as you!"

EASTER MONDAY was the anniversary of Byron's death, but his statue in Hamilton-gardens gave little sign of the fact. A wreath of roses and an emblem bearing the Greek colours were the only visible tributes to his memory.

THE following conversation is reported by a contemporary to have been overheard in Westminster Abbey on Easter Sunday: "American Visitor (to Verger): 'Can you tell me where Browning's grave is?' Verger (pointing vaguely in the direction of Poets' Corner): 'Over there, somewhere.'"

A. V.: 'Yes, but can't you give me a more definite direction?' V.: 'No, I can't.' A. V.: 'Who can?' V.: 'Nobody.' We can't consult the book of the monuments to-day; Sunday is the day for Divine service, not for looking at monuments."

A LITTLE while ago Mr. Andrew Lang wrote to the ACADEMY to point out that Darwin's theory of evolution was anticipated by the ingenious author of The Loves of the Triangles. He has since tracked other ancient anticipations of modern discoveries, and the result is contained in an article entitled "The 'New' in the Old" in the North American Review. "The Robbers," also published, like Higgins's work, in The Anti-Jacobin, he calls a satire on Ibsenism before Ibsen was born. Laxity concerning the Seventh Commandment he also finds in earlier places, and even so long ago as 1745, it seems, people were charged with reading nothing but the newspapers! Mr. Lang's comment is that the discovery of such parallels "does seem to carry a presumption that these haggard old New Ideas [agnosticism and the like] may not be precisely adapted for use in the world as God made it, or, if you please, as it has been evolved."

PRINTED dedications of books more often than not seem superfluous to the reader. Now and again they become quite absurd. A book, for instance, has just been published, entitled Sketches Awheel in Fin-de-Siècle Iberia, by Mr. and Mrs. Workman, who are following the example set by Mr. and Mrs. Pennell in their Canterbury Pilgrimage. Mrs. Workman's share of this work is dedicated to her husband, and Mr. Workman's to his wife.

ANOTHER variety of dedication—the publisher's dedication—may be found in the new edition of Mr. Kipling's Departmental Ditties, which, not by the author but by the publisher, is dedicated to Lord Roberts.

THE Glasgow Athenæum, which for the past half-century has maintained in the West of Scotland a high academical and literary eminence, will celebrate its jubilee in October next. It is intended to publish an historical sketch of the institution on that occasion, and in this connexion we have been requested to indicate that any persons having in their possession letters or documents relating to the institution, especially during its earlier years, will greatly oblige by forwarding these to the secretary, Mr. James Lauder, St. George's-place, Glasgow, who will be responsible for their safe custody, and will return them to their respective owners with as little delay as possible.

MR. CROCKETT's next story is to be called The Red Axe, red being now the colour for fiction. Under the Red Robe, The Reds of the Midi, The Red Badge of Courage, The Red Scour—these titles jump to mind at once. The scene of The Red Axe being Pomerania, Mr. Crockett is now walking in that region. The business of a successful novelist has its compensations.

IN connexion with the portrait of Longfellow given this week and the article on the poet which appears on another page, it may be stated that an excellent and cheap one-volume edition of Longfellow's poems has just been published by Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Co. in their "Apollo" series.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has accepted the dedication to herself of the new volume by Sir George S. Clarke, K.C.M.G., F.R.S., entitled Imperial Defence, which will be published immediately by the Imperial Press.

THE next volume of the "Famous Scots" Series will be The Blackwood Group, by Sir George Douglas. The publishers are Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

Gleanings from Ibsen is the title of a book which Mr. Elliot Stock announces for immediate publication. It consists of a selection of the quotations from Ibsen's plays and poems, and will be prepared by an essay on "Ibsenism."

MR. GRANT RICHARDS will publish on April 29 Limbo, and Other Essays, by Vernon Lee, and Paul's Stepmother, a novel by Lady Troubridge.

A SERIES of articles will commence in the May number of The Art Journal on the collection of pictures at the Royal Holloway College. Two of the pictures, "The Railway Station," by W. P. Frith, R.A., and "A Highland Croft," by Peter Graham, R.A., will be reproduced as the frontispiece and extra plate.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. will publish on May 3 the first part of Royal Academy Pictures for 1897, which will as usual contain some important Academy pictures that will appear in no other publication.

MESSRS. METHUEN announce for publication this week Colonel Baden Powell's book on the recent Matabele Campaign. The author, who was Chief of the Staff to Sir Frederick Carrington, describes the operations of the campaign in the form of a personal narrative.

MESSRS. SERVICE & PATON will issue shortly in their "Illustrated English Library" Charlotte Brontë's Shirley, illustrated by Mr. F. H. Townsend, and Thackeray's Pendennis, illustrated by Miss Chris. Hammond.

THE May number of Blackwood will contain a paper apropos of the Queen's reign, entitled "'Tis Sixty Years Since"; also two articles dealing with the literature of the period: one by Mr. Frederick Greenwood on the Newspaper Press, the other on Early Victorian Fiction, by an anonymous writer. Another contribution of special interest at the present time is an article detailing the brilliant exploits of the distinguished native Indian Corps, the Queen's Own Guides, who are to furnish part of Her Majesty's escort in the Jubilee procession.

THE ONLOOKER.

"O. S."*

IT is difficult to write at all adequately of Mr. Owen Seaman's humorous verse without appearing, to those who for their sins are unfamiliar with it, to write extravagantly; the simple fact being that Mr. Owen Seaman's humorous verse is incomparably delightful. That is the simple fact, as all of Mr. Seaman's readers will agree. The doubter, to convince himself, has but to become a reader too. Let him open any one of Mr. Seaman's volumes anywhere, and in a minute we shall hear him exclaiming that there has been nothing approaching this since the days of Calverley. Not, however, that Mr. Seaman's work in the least resembles Calverley's. Mr. Seaman plays upon his own lyre, in his own style, and his tunes are all of his own imagining. If one instinctively brackets him with Calverley, it is not as his fellow in kind but as his peer in degree.

The greater part of Mr. Seaman's latest publication, The Battle of the Bays, is made up of parodies. Half-a-dozen conspicuous poets and poetasters are supposed in these effusions to be competing for the Laureateship. The fray is opened by a resounding Song of Renunciation "after A. C. S."

"In the days of my season of salad,
When the down was as dew on my cheek,
And for French I was bred on the ballad,
And for Greek on the writers of Greek—
Then I sang of the rose that is ruddy,
Of 'pleasure that winces and stings,'
Of white women, and wine that is bloody,
And similar things.

"Pan-atheist, bruiser and breaker
Of kings and the creatures of kings,
I shouted on Freedom to shake her
Feet loose of the fetter that clings;
Far rolling my ravenous red eye,
And lifting a mutinous lid,
To all monarchs and matrons I said I Would shock them—and did."

But the years have passed, and bestowed discretion. "The delights of the time of my teething" have "melted like ices in May." The singer has changed both his mode and his motive:

"Hushed now is the bibulous bubble
Of 'lithe and lascivious' throats;
Long stript and extinct is the stubble
Of hoary and harvested oats."

In fact, "from the sweets that are sour as the sorrel's the bees have abortively swarmed," and the poet's "earlier morals are fairly reformed." And he boasts:

"I have written a loyal Armada,
And posed in a Jubilee pose;
I have babbled of babies and played a
New tune on the turn of their toes;
Washed white from the stain of Astarte,
My books any virgin may buy:
And I hear I am praised by a party
Called Something Mackay."

* With Double Pipe. (Oxford: B. H. Blackwell. 1888.)
Horace at Cambridge. (A. D. Innes & Co. 1895.)
Tillers of the Sand. (Smith, Elder & Co. 1895.)
The Battle of the Bays. (John Lane. 1897.)

So that the hope seems not unreasonable that

"When erased are the records, and rotten
The meshes of memory's net;
When the grace that forgives has forgotten
The things that are good to forget;
When the trill of my juvenile trumpet
Is dead and its echoes are dead,
Then the laurel shall lie on the crumpet
And crown of my head."

"A. C. S." is followed by "Sir E. A." with lines "for the albums of crowned heads only," translated from "the third Sa'dine Box of the Eighth Gazelle of Ghazal," and beginning,

"Yà Yà! Best Belovèd! I look to thy dimples and drink;
Tiddlihi! To thy cheek-pits and chin-pit, my Tulip, my Pink!"

And "Sir E. A." in turn cedes the stage to "Sir L. M.," who, like Monsieur Jourdain, has written prose all these years and never suspected it.

"Ah me! Dear me! I fain
Would use a stronger phrase, but hardly dare, Being, whatever else, respectable," sighs the proseman. And then he is pierced with an arrow of his own winging:

"'High failure overleaps
The bounds of low successes.' There, again,
The harp that twanged was Welsh, but with an echo
Of Browning."

"Sir L. M." had not studied "The Grammarian's Funeral" without learning something from it.

"Away by the haunts of the Yang-tee-boo,
Where the Yuletide runs cold gin,
And the rollicking sign of the Lord Knows Who
Sees mariners drink like sin;
Where the Jolly Roger tips his quart
To the luck of the Union Jack;
And some are screwed on the foreign port,
And some on the starboard tack;
Ever they tell the tale anew
Of the chase for the Kipperling swag;
How the smack Tommy This and the smack
Tommy That
They broached each other like a whiskey-vat,
And the Fuzzy-Wuz took the bag."

Thus begins the "Rhyme of the Kipperling." And now we reach, perhaps, the best of all of Mr. Seaman's parodies, "The Ballad of a Nun," "after J. D." For here he parodies not merely his victim's manner, but his sentiment and his philosophy.

"I am sister to the mountain now,
And sister to the sun and moon," declared the perfervid heroine of Mr. Davidson's "Ballad of a Nun."

"I am sister to the microbe now,
And second cousin to the worm," sings the lady celebrated by Mr. Seaman. It is the same truth extended. It is the original proposition reduced to its lowest terms. It is Mr. Davidson's own child coming home to him with its clothes—the very clothes he gave it—turned inside out. "Heed not belletrist jargon," cries Mr. Davidson, with the frank illiteracy that characterises all his work—an illiteracy which Mr. Seaman mercilessly underlines in his play upon the word "Bellettrie."

In "Elegi Musarum," this is how "W. W." apostrophises "the stolid Spec-tator, bewildered with fabulous bow-wows":

"Vainly, O excellent organ! with ample and aqueous unction,

Vainly your voice on the ears of impregnable Laureate-makers,
Rang as the sinuous sea rings on a petrified coast;

Vainly your voice with a subtle and slightly indelicate largess,
Broke on an obdurate world hymning the advent of Me;

When from the 'commune of air,' from 'the exquisite fabric of Silence,'
I, a superior orb, burst into exquisite print."

In a ballad contributed quite recently to Punch, Mr. Seaman puts into the mouth of his publisher an explanation of the singular fact that the poets whose work he has thus exposed to ridicule "rather like" the jest.

"So far from feeling inward pain,
They show a sense of wit;
They hope your humour may attain
To make a thumping hit.

"Already tasting better times
They sell by twos and fours;
The public has to buy their rhymes
To see the point of yours."

But it is not only as a parodist that Mr. Seaman shines in The Battle of the Bays: his lines "To a Boy-Poet of the Decadence" showing a curious reversal of the epigram, "La nature l'a fait sanglier; la civilisation l'a réduit à l'état de Cochon," furnish an excellent specimen of his spontaneous mood:

"The Erotic affairs that you fiddle aloud
Are as vulgar as coin of the mint;
And you merely distinguish yourself from the crowd
By the fact that you put 'em in print.

"For your dull little vices we don't care a fig,
It is this that we deeply deplore:
You were cast for a common or usual pig.
But you play the invincible bore."

And certainly no one who read them when they first appeared in the National Observer will have forgotten "O. S.'s" verses on "A New Blue Book," inspired by the prospectus of the Savoy:

"The world's great age begins anew,
Cold virtue's weeds are cast;
Our heads are light, our tales are blue,
And things are moving fast;
And no one any longer quarrels
With anybody else's morals.

"Satyr and Faun their late repose
Now burst like anything;
New Mœnads, turning sprightlier toes,
Enjoy a jauntier fling;
With lustier lips old Pan shall play
Drain-pipes along the sewer's way.

"Priapus, wrongly left for dead,
Is dead no more than Pan;
Silenus rises from his bed
And hiccups like a man;
There's something rather chaste (between us)
About Priapus and Silenus."

We are glad, by the by, to note that The Battle of the Bays is published from the Bodley Head. If any other house had fathered it there might have been a question of ill-nature. For

"the hairs of utter godlihead,
Who wear the yellow flower of blameless bodlihead,"

are those who receive the most pitiless of Mr. Seaman's thrusts.

HENRY HARLAND.

LITERARY SKITTLES.

IN the old-fashioned style of composition I begin this gossip with a definition. The word "skittles" is adopted from the slang of chess. "Will you have a skittle?" "Only a skittle mind"—the question and answer imply that the partie is not serious, that the players will set themselves, regardless of soundness, to play a bright, easy, amusing, brilliant game. From the chance onlookers you will hear such expressions as "good," "clever," "splendid"; but the expert knows that such exclamations should be understood with a qualifying word, and should be read "good [skittles]," "splendid [skittles]," "clever [skittles]," &c., and that "playing the game" is a very different matter.

Some time ago a British Reviewer remarked of the journalistic critics that they oscillated "between the two extremes of rancorous abuse and unrestrained laudation." No doubt the vocabulary of these newspaper men is just a lettle strong, but still when a dozen "masterpieces" are turned out in one season, and a new "genius" turns up once a week, and a chef d'œuvre appears daily, why, we all know they are but masterpieces and geniuses of skittles. The art of fiction is at a very low ebb, and criticism at a somewhat lower. Hence, alike, the bad work and its slovenly eulogists.

But how are you going to discern between skittles and the genuine article, since few of the players confess what they are doing? I remember when I first started to write, an editor of the old school gave me an infallible recipe. My first task, for which I had absolutely no qualification, was to write dramatic criticism. "Now," said the dear old man, "before you begin, the great point is to master your canons of art and standards of criticism." Where these articles were to be found he did not disclose, nor did I discover; but anyone desirous of qualifying for a similar post is welcome to the hint. Let him but find these canons and standards, and at his touch the skittle player will be apparent for what he is and nothing more.

But the worst of it is, that while an infallible test of literature is hard to find—perhaps, indeed, its very existence is mythical and illusory—nine out of ten critics think they possess it, and work out their verdict—if they trouble to work it out at all—by a formula. Hence arises the exaggeration, the uncertainty of judgment, the confusion of opinion over which our reviewer wails. It is in some part due to the fact that we are at the dividing of the ways, and have no strong pre-eminent authoritative personality to direct us. Since the death of Matthew Arnold England has been extremely poor in critical talent of the first rank.

There is abundance of talent in the second rank, but it lacks guidance and courage and knowledge—it goes all wrong without a lead.

When Carlyle and Ruskin held sway over intellectual England, and especially dominated the understanding of the young, the "moral idea" was strong and prominent. It was the custom to judge writing not only by its cleverness or brilliance, but also as a force making for good or evil. Strong men almost invariably carry their principles to an extreme (Carlyle's Essay on Scott remains to show that he was no exception to the rule), and this naturally leads to a violent revulsion, so that recently quite other standards than those of the last generation have been set up. And the poor little newspaper reviewer, who is nought without his scale and compasses, is reduced to slogging away at random. He is divided between an old tradition that lingers in the ear and a new doctrine that is only half assimilated. Small blame to him if he uses too freely the spectacles of convention.

There is another excuse for him. It has always been the case in English literature that a great writer has been followed by a host of small imitators. The first sufferer from this among the moderns was Sir Walter, who, with his fine modesty, acknowledged himself beaten by those who had taken a cue from him—a strange acknowledgment now when the very names of those skittle players have been seized by oblivion, the "grisly phantom sitting at the gate." Tennyson, too, complained that "all could grow the flower now, for all had got the seed," but they did not; they only grew weeds that with them and their names are forgotten. Already, too, it has become a certainty that those who fashioned themselves on Dickens and Thackeray only played skittles—literature does not know them.

Just now it is safe to say the influence of convention is very strongly at work. The fashion set by George Eliot has been adopted and worked with astonishing results by at least two prominent writers, Mrs. Humphry Ward and Madame Sarah Grand; and Robert Louis Stevenson, whatever be his real claim to immortality, has at least the distinction of having inspired more bad imitators than any other modern writer. And any observant reader of current criticism may notice that the writers of it, instead of stamping and marking this imitation, are only part of the great indiscriminating public which finds a pinchbeck imitation more to its mind than it did the genuine original.

And yet, to be perfectly frank and fair, it is no condemnation of an author to say he has studied a model, else the immortal Fielding himself would be condemned. Be it observed, however, that the weakest of his work is that for which he borrowed the idea from Cervantes—he lives by his Squire Western, his Parson Adams, his pictures of English life, not by Partridge, his version of Sancho Panza. And the great novelists who began by accepting Fielding as a model, writers so diverse as Sir Walter Scott and Thackeray, as Charles Dickens and George Eliot, survive because the personality and experience of each found its

8 MAY 1897

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW

From a Photograph by Mrs. J. M. Cameron expression. They were students of a classic, not servile imitators of a model.

May we say as much of the imitators of to-day? Well, in the first place they are surprisingly numerous, so that we must pick and choose, and that is why one feels the want of those lost canons and standards. Besides, it would be odious to single out this or that name from the crowd, and say "Thou art not ipse, for somebody else is he"; far easier is it to qualify the applause of the general by adding the missing word "skittles." P.

DR. JAMES MARTINEAU.

THE present century has furnished numerous examples of great thinkers who have lived to an advanced age, but it is questionable whether it has given us a more illustrious example of keen intellectual strength, combined with a vigorous vitality, than may be found in Dr. James Martineau, who last Wednesday entered upon his ninety-third year. Nearly fifty years ago, his Endeavour after a Christian Life were inspiring the religious sympathies of another great homiletical writer, F. W. Robertson. Ten years later, the critical world was moved to admiration by the Essays Philosophical and Theological, and an able materialistic writer, who fully appreciated the essayist's fine dialectic ability, remarked that Martineau was one of the most dangerous opponents that the materialistic school had as yet encountered. But Martineau's reputation as a critic rests on something sounder than mere controversial skill. His friend William Rathbone Gregg once remarked to him, at a time when Martineau was editing a quarterly journal: "Remember, that an editor is ex officio a censor too, and he cannot do his duty on the mass of nonsense that is published unless he selects a victim for his pillory in every number." On which Martineau made this significant and characteristic comment: "I could never be moved to give an account of a book by pure antipathy any more than by monotonous assent. 'Anathema' in the one case, 'Amen' in the other, exhausting all that one would be impelled to say. The whole interest of literary intercourse, like that of all-quickening friendship, is conditional on crossing veins of likeness and unlikeness in thought and character, deepening the zest of sympathy by the need and the possibility of more. And true criticism seems to me the recorded struggle of the reader's mind into closer relations with an author whose intermittent bursts of light, helpful as they are, still do not enable him clearly to see his way." Martineau, in fact, never rested content with the somewhat barren victories of logic, invariably striving to reach beyond mere verbal fallacies and defects of expression for some helpful thought in the work criticised. He has been sometimes called a destructive critic, which, in the broadest sense of the phrase (a foolish one at the best), he assuredly was not. Take, for instance, his criticisms of Cardinal Newman and F. D. Maurice, religious thinkers from whom he differed widely on many theological problems; and you find that, despite the trenchant way in which he dealt with the Anglican's Hegelian sympathies, and despite the uncompromising attack upon the Roman Catholics' theological standpoint, the thinkers aforesaid have rarely been so luminously expounded, or their peculiar genius so sympathetically dwelt on, even by their enthusiastic disciples.

When W. G. Ward, the famous Roman Catholic, published his work on religious philosophy, he sent the proofs to Martineau for correction and suggestion. Indeed, some of Martineau's warmest admirers and friends have been great Roman Catholics. Nor is this difficult to understand, strange as it may seem at first sight, for on the subject of Natural Religion the Unitarian and Roman Catholic position is identical, and in opposition to the Protestant view.

One realises Martineau's great faculty for philosophical and theological criticism most clearly, perhaps, when one remembers his services as a constructive thinker (e.g., A Study in Religion, and The Seat of Authority in Religion, notably Part I.). A writer has often evinced great critical brilliance and yet shown little constructive power: Matthew Arnold for instance, admirable in analysis, made little or no contribution to synthetic thought. F. D. Maurice on the other hand, despite his powerful synthetic mind and deep insight into religious problems, seemed almost destitute of critical ability. In Martineau we find that rare combination—a fine critical faculty and a powerful constructive genius.

Though, like all independent thinkers, he often found himself willy-nilly in the arena of controversy; his distaste for polemical theology has always been marked.

When the Agnostic school, headed by Herbert Spencer and Huxley, was first influencing modern thought, Tennyson (so Martineau once told the writer) remarked that something must be done "to put down these Agnostics." A society (that afterwards came into existence as the well-known Metaphysical Society) was suggested for the purpose. But Martineau refused to belong to any society formed for the purpose of putting down theories, though he considered that a society composed of Agnostics as well as of Theists might be helpful, owing to the free exchange of opinion and mutual criticism of the members. This was quite characteristic of one who in an essay on Mansel's Limits of Religious Thought, many years before, wrote as follows:

"In the apprehension of our Divine relations the logical faculty has but a secondary function—to justify, to reconcile, to organise, to unfold certain given convictions; and is misapplied in the attempt to evoke or reinstate what is not there. Hence it is that, in many a mind, a mass of sceptic clouds, charged with thunders of denial, will cling steadfast to its cold heights against your keenest blasts of argument; and then, by some unnoticed change in the climate of the soul, will silently disperse."

Would that all our writers on Apologetics took this to heart! Less time would then be wasted in merely labouring out critical refutations of religious doubts.

On Dr. Martineau's theological views

little need be said here. That broad-minded, orthodox critic, Mr. R. H. Hutton, has said that Martineau's teaching, "as a whole," is "by far the ablest vindication of the philosophy implicitly assumed in Christianity which our age has produced." And many who are unable to sympathise with the great Unitarian's critical exegesis may endorse Mr. Hutton's verdict as regards his philosophy, unless, indeed, they belong to that class of which an old lady in the South of England is a fit example. This worthy dame had borrowed a volume of Martineau's sermons from the pastor, and found great comfort and help from them, till one day she discovered to her horror that the writer was a Unitarian. She immediately returned the book, observing that, although she had imagined the discourses had done her good, the effect must have been similar to that of a pleasant poison. Not so very long ago, the dreadful word heretic was quite sufficient in many people's eyes to veto all the ethical as well as the religious teaching of the person so called; but times are changed, and now one of the "heretics" in the famous Essays and Reviews is the head of the Established Church; so the word has, not unnaturally, lost some of its blighting force.

What Carlyle has written of Goethe may well be said of the famous nonagenarian who has formed the subject of the present article. "He," said Carlyle, speaking of the great German, "who would learn to reconcile reverence with clearness, to deny and defy what is false, yet believe and worship what is true . . . let him look here."

Mere differences on points of historical theology, indeed, sink into insignificance when contemplating a Christian Theist whose bracing intellect and warm transcendental sympathies have so powerfully affected the religious thought of the age, and who, more ably than any other thinker, has insisted on the intimate connexion between ethics and religion.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXIV.—HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

LONGFELLOW was not a great poet, but he was a great illuminator. His intellect shone. Everything that he touched was brighter for the touching, and hence his vast influence. The man who can brighten and help will always command the mass of readers.

Longfellow appeared when he was most needed. There were then thousands of persons in want of a poet, and Longfellow was the poet they wanted. Byron had ceased to thrill them, Keats was too sensuous, Shelley too transcendental, Wordsworth supplied no immediate consolation, Tennyson chilled, and Browning puzzled them. Then one day, across the Atlantic, a new poet arose, a "buttonholing," musical singer, whose message was one of comfort and encouragement, whose words were simple and sufficient, whose mind did not seem at all out of reach, whose poems had regular rhythms and attractive forms, whose philosophy bore relation to life around him, who had a pleasant romantic gift and a homely feeling for nature. People turned to Longfellow with that joy with which fifty years before Cowper had been welcomed.

Longfellow had the clean, genial, transparent New England mind. He saw things in definite forms, and he avoided rhetoric. His poetry was himself—ample, benignant, wholesome, straightforward. Though rarely visited by high inspiration, he was never dull and never trivial. Above all he was always interesting. "Evangeline," "The Courtship of Miles Standish," "Hiawatha," "The Tales of a Wayside Inn," with the consummately easy links of familiar rhyme which bind them together, "The Spanish Student," the numerous shorter pieces which have become household words on both sides of the Atlantic—all are interesting. The thought is often extremely commonplace, the workmanship frequently undistinguished, but no one can deny them the quality of interest. Longfellow's nice ear and variety of metre made also for popularity. But most of all he was optimistic and cheering. No poet has been such a friend to his readers as Longfellow. Women almost worship him; he is the boy's favourite.

To our mind his best work is contained in his sea poems and in "Hiawatha." The sea drew his finest from him. Elsewhere his work is often sweet and strong, but the sea lent him magic:

"The heart of the great ocean Sends a thrilling pulse through me," he wrote; and again, in the beautiful autobiographical poem called "My Lost Youth,"

"I remember the black wharves and the slips,
And the sea-tides tossing free:
And Spanish sailors with bearded lips,
And the beauty and mystery of the ships,
And the magic of the sea."

Longfellow never forgot them, and it was these early associations and their quickening effect on his imagination that make his "Building of the Ship," and "A Dutch Picture" and "My Lost Youth," and "Hiawatha's Sailing," and portions of "The Saga of King Olaf," so living and memorable. Longfellow's whole soul was in them as he wrote; they pleased him and excited him to a degree to which the bulk of his work could not approach: they were his own poems.

THE BOOK MARKET.

THE BOOKS THAT ARE SELLING.

WE have received from booksellers in London and other large centres the following returns of the books most in demand at the moment:

LONDON (STRAND).

FICTION.

Hilda Strafford. By Beatrice Harraden.
The Massarenes. By Ouida.
The Well-Beloved. By Thomas Hardy.
On the Face of the Waters. By Mrs. F. A. Steel.
The Green Book. By Maurus Jokai.
Christine of the Hills. By Max Pemberton.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Life of Nelson. By Captain Mahan.
The History of the Papacy. By Bishop Creighton.
(New edition. Vols. I., II., and III.)
Ancient Greek Literature. By Gilbert Murray.
The Age of the Despot. By J. A. Symonds.
Bell's Cathedral Series.

POETRY AND THE DRAMA.

English Sonnets. By Q.
The Battle of the Bays. By O. Seaman.
Paradise of English Poetry. By H. C. Beeching.

TRAVEL.

The Fall of the Congo Arabs. By Captain S. L. Hinde.

BELLES LETTRES.

Manners for Men. By Mrs. Humphry.
The Flourishing of Romance and Rise of Allegory.
By Prof. George Saintsbury.
Temple Classics: Montaigne's Essays. Morte d'Arthur.
Cakes and Ale. By Edward Spencer.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Who's Who. By Douglas Sladen.
War, Famine, and Food Supply. By Marston.

Note.—In preparation for the Easter holiday the sale of Maps and Guide-Books was larger this year than ever. The output of six-shilling novels shows no falling off.

LONDON (OXFORD-STREET).

FICTION.

The Well-Beloved. By Thomas Hardy.
Phroso. By Anthony Hope.
Guavas the Tinner. By Rev. S. Baring-Gould.
The Whirlpool. By George Gissing.

BIOGRAPHY.

Life of Jowett. By E. A. Abbott and L. Campbell.
Forty-one Years in India. By Lord Roberts.
Life of Nelson. By Captain Mahan.

POETRY.

The Battle of the Bays. By O. Seaman.
The Pike County Ballads. By Col. John Hay.

THEOLOGY.

The Heritage of the Spirit. By Bishop Creighton.
The Sermon on the Mount. By Canon Gore.

BELLES LETTRES.

Temple Classics and Dramatists.
Essay on Comedy. By George Meredith.
The Treasure of the Humble. By Maurice Maeterlinck.

Although several of our best writers have published novels this spring, there has been no particular boom with any of them, and the supply of Fiction from unknown authors is much in excess of the demand. Holme's "Queen Victoria" still selling well.

LIVERPOOL.

FICTION.

Under Love's Rule. By Miss Braddon.
On the Face of the Waters. By Mrs. F. A. Steel.
Hilda Strafford. By Beatrice Harraden.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Life of Jowett. By E. A. Abbott and L. Campbell.
Cyprian. By the late Archbishop Benson.

THEOLOGY.

Some Lessons of the Revised Version. By Bishop Westcott.
The Christian Ecclesia. By the late Dr. Hort.

BRIGHTON.

FICTION.

Phroso. By Anthony Hope.
The Sign of the Cross. By Wilson Barrett.
Ziska. By Marie Corelli.
Hilda Strafford. By Beatrice Harraden.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Forty-one Years in India. By Lord Roberts.
Life of Lord Nelson. By Captain Mahan.

TRAVEL.

Farthest North. By Dr. Nansen.
Travels in West Africa. By Miss Kingsley.

THEOLOGY.

The Sermon on the Mount. By Canon Gore.
Faith and Self-Surrender. By Dr. Martineau.

Note.—Trade is much more brisk, and the demand for better class books and better editions is greater than for some time past.

BRISTOL.

FICTION.

The Massarenes. By Ouida.
King Noanett. By F. J. Stimson.

BIOGRAPHY.

Life of Nelson. By Captain Mahan.
Life of Jowett. By E. A. Abbott and L. Campbell.

Note.—Very few books selling of any kind.

DUBLIN.

FICTION.

Lads' Love. By S. R. Crockett.
The Jessamy Bride. By Frankfort Moore.
The Massarenes. By Ouida.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Forty-one Years in India. By Lord Roberts.
Life of Dr. Jowett. By E. A. Abbott and L. Campbell.
Cyprian. By the late Archbishop Benson.

THEOLOGY.

The Christian Ecclesia. By the late Dr. Hort.
The Sermon on the Mount. By Canon Gore.

BELLES LETTRES.

Ancient Greek Literature. By Gilbert Murray.
Temple Classics: Montaigne's Essays. Morte d'Arthur.

N.B.—Business has been very dull throughout Lent, and there is little to note. The continued sale of Lord Roberts's book is the only feature that calls for mention.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

M. PADEREWSKI seems fond of playing two concertos at one concert; anyhow, he selects works which display admirable contrast. At the Crystal Palace lately he gave Chopin in F minor, and afterwards Liszt in E flat; and virtuosity, though of a different kind, prevails in both. At his orchestral concert at the Queen's Hall on Friday, April 9, the contrast was far more striking. The two concertos were Schumann in A minor, and Liszt in

E flat. In the first, the pianist has many opportunities of distinguishing himself—only a player, indeed, of the first rank can render justice to the music—and yet the solo part blends with the orchestra; at times it is naturally prominent, though never unduly so. In Liszt, on the other hand, the pianist, as it were, commands the situation; the function of the orchestra seems to be principally that of supporting or enhancing the solo part. Among modern concertos Liszt's is one of the most showy; Schumann's one of the most substantial since Beethoven. M. Paderewski's rendering of the former is highly effective; that of the latter is, however, open to exception. Touch, tone, and technique are exquisite; in these matters, indeed, there is no fault whatever to find. But that emphasising of the sentiment until it becomes sentimentality is, to say the least of it, un-Schumannish. It is especially in the first movement that M. Paderewski thus gives way. Chopin may be overplayed in a similar manner, only that composer indulged sometimes in feeling of a genuine, sometimes of an artificial, kind, so that exaggeration in the rendering of his music does not always rub you up the wrong way; in Schumann such treatment is always of unpleasant effect. M. Paderewski must have heard Clara Schumann play the Concerto—or, if not the lady herself, one or other of her pupils who interpret it in the same spirit, if not with the same skill and poetry—yet he evidently prefers his own reading. He has, of course, a perfect right to interpret the music as he thinks fit, but it seems a pity not to follow as closely as possible the Clara reading, which, there is every reason to believe, met with the full approval of the composer himself. M. Paderewski achieved great success, in which M. Wood, the conductor, and his orchestra certainly won a fair share.

Mr. Felix Mottl conducted Beethoven's Choral Symphony at his third concert at Queen's Hall, on Tuesday evening, April 13. That it would be an interesting performance was a foregone conclusion, for the reputation so quickly won here by M. Mottl has been fully maintained. There was no lack of intelligence, no lack of life in his rendering of the three instrumental movements, yet the conductor, somehow or other, did not quite rise to the height of his great argument. There was too much effort in the opening movement. The conductor appeared as if he were making up for insufficient rehearsal; this was, of course, not the case; he was only anxious to convey the full power of the music. The Scherzo was admirable, but the slow movement, taken at an unusually slow pace, did not, on that very account, seem as impressive as usual. The selected body of Leeds singers which took part in the choral section acquitted themselves well of their task. The soloists were Miss Pallisser, Miss R. Green, Mr. Fischer-Sobell, and Mr. Andrew Black, and of these the ladies were the most satisfactory. The excerpts from "Tannhauser" and "Lohengrin" were given to show off the fine body of singers; the "Bridal Chorus" was especially delightful.

J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

THE merits of being wise after the event have never been highly esteemed, but they enjoy a positive vogue, apparently, in comparison with the recognition allotted to those who anticipated the theory of evolution. Mr. Andrew Lang has recently unearthed "Higgins," as one whose published writings contained the jewel of evolutionary truth at an earlier date than those of Mr. Herbert Spencer. Prof. Poulton, in the April number of Science Progress, introduces us to yet another pioneer, in the shape of the anthropologist, James Cowles Pritchard, whose Researches into the History of Mankind (second edition, published 1826) contains a curiously full and accurate statement of some of the main principles of the same great theory. Pritchard, says Prof. Poulton, apprehended very clearly that domesticated races of animals and plants have been produced by human selection, apart from the customary agencies of favourable surroundings and cultivation. He also believed in the possibility of organic evolution, and supported it by excellent arguments which have still the strongest weight to-day. He even recognised the operation of natural selection (Darwin's great contribution to the theory), although he assigned to it a subordinate rôle. The most important anticipation, however, is, he says, a masterly discussion on the transmission of acquired characters, in which the distinction between acquired and inherent or congenital characteristics is clearly drawn, the conclusions being in the main identical with those of Prof. Weismann, published more than half a century later.

THE equipment of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich has been notably enriched by the recent completion of the great 26-inch photographic telescope presented by Sir Henry Thompson. This is at present the finest instrument for the purpose in the world. It was begun in 1894, and although expected to be finished in eighteen months, was from various causes delayed until now. The Times, in a full descriptive article, mentions that every precaution has been taken to ensure a mounting as rigid and free from tremor as possible. The instrument is placed on an arch joining the tops of two solid piers, to which the lower part of the whole building is firmly tied. The massive equatorial mounting itself is on the model of that which has given excellent results with the 13-inch astrographic equatorial, though several improvements have been introduced by Sir Howard Grubb, the maker both of this and of the previous instrument. Of these the most notable is the modification of the frame by which complete circumpolar motion of the instrument is rendered possible even when it is pointing to the pole. The equatorial carries several distinct telescopes. At one end of the declination axis is a large refractor, also presented by Sir Henry Thompson, together with a guiding telescope and photoheliograph. At the other end is a 30-inch reflector with guiding telescope. The photographs taken with the aid of the new refractor are twice the size of those which compose the universal astrographic map now in process of compilation. The whole apparatus weighs about ten tons.

THE premature adoption, combined with inadequate knowledge, and the consequent failures of Koch's tuberculin, seven years ago, produced a great, but most unjust, prejudice against the work of this brilliant bacteriologist. Koch himself, however, has never been discouraged by the unfortunate application of his early results, but has devoted himself with rare patience to developing their more promising features. The world is apt to ignore the fact that tuberculin has been, and is now, in almost constant use as a means of diagnosing tuberculous disease in animals, for which purpose it is practically infallible. We owe to it the most important factor in the supply of pure milk to our big towns, inasmuch as periodic inspections of dairy animals are made by testing their condition with tuberculin. But Prof. Koch has also been working at the more sensational side of his subject, the application of tuberculin and other preparations of the tubercle bacillus to the cure of human tuberculosis. In early cases of disease it is used with great advantage, and under certain special conditions in established cases also, at the consumption hospital in the Isle of Wight and elsewhere. Koch himself has lately added much important information to our knowledge of the subject, and has successfully treated various forms of tuberculous disease, especially lupus. Whether his preparation will ever furnish us with a general cure for that most terrible of ailments, slow consumption, remains to be seen.

IN a recent annual report of the Liverpool Marine Biological Committee, Prof. Herdman records a pretty instance of how local aquaria can be used as an educational influence.

"If a boy," he says, "brings us a light-coloured shanny, caught in a shallow exposed pool, we can place the little fish in a deep vessel in semi-darkness under a table, or cover it with some brown sea-weed, the result being that when the boy comes next day to look for his specimen he has been known to exclaim, 'Hullo! where is my shanny? There is only a black one here.' It is then easy, by putting the fish into a shallow white dish in the bright sunlight, in a short time to turn the black shanny into what he recognises as the light-coloured one he caught. You can then tell him of the beautiful pigment cells of the skin, and show them to him under a microscope in a small living fish, in a watch-glass full of sea-water. You can show him a speckled shrimp hiding in sand and a mottled shrimp in gravel, and the little prawn Virbius, which may be almost any colour according as you change its surroundings from green to red or to dark brown sea-weeds. You explain the difference in pigmentation on the upper and lower sides of a flat fish, you remind him of the chameleon, tell of Lord Lister's observations on the change of colour in the skin of the frog, and—most beautiful experiment of all—show him the 'blushing' of the newly born cuttle-fish. From this there opens up a wide range of physiology, of the influence of light and the controlling action of nerves, not to mention natural selection and evolution in general. This is only one of many examples that might be taken. Almost any of the common marine animals, if carefully watched as to structure and habits, show us interesting cases of adaptation to their surroundings and mode of life."

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

IN DEFENCE OF THOMSON.

London: April 16.

Permit me to express my strong disagreement with your criticism last week of the author of "The Seasons" as "a very little poet," "a poet only by courtesy—you could not find in all his formal numbers one spark of the divine fire," "a name that stands for little or nothing," "read now, if we read him at all" (not for his naturalism, but) "for the very opposite quality—artificiality"; while the same critic refers to Thomson's expression concerning two lovers, that they "looked unutterable things," as "the only phrase by which he is likely to be spontaneously remembered," and merely confesses to "a certain curiosity" in reading his eighteenth century allusions to "The British Fair," &c., &c., as "phrases which speak to us from another world than ours, from a world which had taste that was not touched with emotion, a world, in short, which lacked the one thing needful for poetical life—inspiration." Let your critic say what he likes concerning the uninspired character of the early eighteenth century world, but if he can read "The Seasons" and say that it is not "touched with emotion" he must have a very peculiar idea of what emotion and poetic inspiration are. It is precisely because this epoch-making poem in the history of English poetry is not merely the beginning (which led to Collins, Gray, Goldsmith, Cowper, and so to Wordsworth) of a new and unartificial way of writing about nature—every-day external nature simply described—but is also so extraordinarily charged with keen humanity, true religion, a more than Wordsworthian morality, and a splendid patriotism, that its formal numbers, orderly and tranquil measure, and unsensational subject-matter appeal so finely to the emotions, and must enchain every true lover of real poetry who does not confuse that misinterpreted term with the temporary cult of a contemporary clique.

As regards the phrases by which Thomson is spontaneously remembered I do not know that that is a very fair test; but it is singular that your critic should mention the one phrase that is certainly least recalled as of Thomson's authorship. There are two quotations in "The Seasons" that are far better known. One is from "Spring":

"Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,
To teach the young idea how to shoot,
To pour the fresh instruction o'er the mind,
To breathe th' enlivening spirit, and to fix
The gen'rous purpose in the glowing breast."
(1148-1152.)

The other is part of a passage so beautiful in itself, and so essentially the work of a poet by something more than courtesy, that a larger portion may well be quoted. It is in "Autumn," the description of the young girl, who, with her old mother, lived in reduced circumstances in the "woody vale":

"Her form was fresher than the morning rose
When the dew wets its leaves: unstain'd and pure
As is the lily, or the mountain snow.
The modest virtues mingled in her eyes,
Still on the ground dejected, darting all
Their humid beams into the blooming flowers;

Or when the mournful tale her mother told,
Of what her faithless fortune promised once,
Thrill'd in her thought, they, like the dewy star

Of ev'ning, shone in tears. A native grace
Sat fair-proportion'd on her polish'd limbs,
Veil'd in a simple robe, their best attire,
Beyond the pomp of dress; for loveliness
Needs not the foreign aid of ornament,
But is when unadorn'd adorn'd the most.
Thoughtless of beauty, she was beauty's self,
Recluse amid the close embow'ring woods.
As in the hollow breast of Appennine,
Beneath the shelter of encircling hills,
A myrtle rises, far from human eye,
And breathes its balmy fragrance o'er the world."
(192-212)

Is that not simple, sensuous, passionate? Or is it mere artificiality, untouched by emotion?

Your critic speaks contemptuously of Thomson's "observation of nature which was rewarded no more intimately than by a knowledge of the time-sequence of snowdrop, crocus, primrose, and 'violet darkly blue.'" No more intimately! Let me quote the passage, one of the most beautiful pieces of natural description ever written, and, purely as a technical accomplishment, showing Thomson's perfect mastery over his measure—

"Along these blushing borders, bright with dew,
And in yon mingled wilderness of flowers,
Fair-handed Spring unbosoms every grace;
Throws out the snowdrop, and the crocus first;
The daisy, primrose, violet darkly blue,
And polyanthus of unnumber'd dyes;
The yellow wall-flower, stain'd with iron-brown;
And lavish stock that scents the garden round;
From the soft wing of vernal breezes shed,
Anemonies; auriculas, enrich'd
With shining meal o'er all their velvet leaves;
And full ranunculus, of glowing red.
Then comes the tulip race, where Beauty plays
Her idle freaks; from family diffus'd
To family, as flies the father-dust,
The varied colours run; and, while they break
On the charm'd eye, th' exulting florist marks,
With secret pride, the wonders of his hand.
No gradual bloom is wanting; from the bud,
First-born of Spring, to Summer's musky tribes;
Nor hyacinths, of purest virgin white,
Low-bent, and blushing inward; nor jonquils,
Of potent fragrance; nor narcissus fair,
As over the fabled fountain hanging still;
Nor broad carnations, nor gay-spotted pinks;
Nor shower'd from every bush, the damask rose.
Infinite numbers, delicacies, smells,
With hues on hues expression cannot paint,
The breath of Nature, and her endless bloom."

The "time-sequence" here is nothing. The charm is the simple joy of the poet in the natural objects he depicts.

But it is not on "passages" or "phrases" that Thomson's fame, and far more than a "sustained name," depends. How any student of poetry can deny the enormous influence of "The Seasons" upon English nature-poetry, and, in particular, because primarily, upon all the later eighteenth century poets, passes my comprehension. Cowper and Wordsworth meant what they said when they admitted the debt; and your critic's ungenerous sneer at Wordsworth's "generous obiter dictum," and at Johnson's left-handed compliment (Johnson undoubtedly appreciated Thomson rightly, though he could not tell his real historical significance), may very well match his preference for such literary judges as Horace Walpole and Boswell. But Thomson's "inspiration" can only properly be gathered from the sustained grandeur of his noble work, its delightful variety, its ordered procession of images and ideas, and its noble piety. His "Summer" is magnificent, if only for the way in which the theme is never allowed to flag, always kept at its exalted level, and varied by episode and invocation and reflection. Nothing could be prettier, more "intimate," and, at the same time, more chaste, than the digression where Damon watches Musidora bathing (1268-1369). There is a distinct humour, too, in Thomson, as witness his almost mock-heroic account of a day's angling in "Spring" (277-440). While his pathos may be exemplified by the sublime lines in "Winter" (223-358), which depict the husbandman caught and overwhelmed by the snow, while his wife and children wait in vain for him at home. It is worth noting that Collins was verbally inspired by this passage in those beautiful lines in the "Ode on the Popular Superstitions of the Highlands":

"For him in vain his anxious wife shall wait,
Or wander forth to meet him on his way;
For him in vain at to-fall of the day,
His babes shall linger at th' unclosing gate;
Ah, ne'er shall he return," &c.

Not one spark of the divine fire! How, then, account for Thomson's fame at all? How account for the passages I have quoted, or for lines like these, of the birds in Spring that

"In fond rotation spread the spotted wing,
And shiver every feather with desire?"

Or of the lightning-blasted sheep that lie

"with that same harmless look
They wore alive, and ruminating still
In fancy's eye"?

From the first lines of the Spring invocation—

"Come, gentle Spring, ethereal mildness, come,
And from the bosom of yon dropping cloud,
While music wakes around, veil'd in a shower
Of shadowing roses, on our plains descend."

—from these very first lines to the closing reflections on the life of man compared with the life of nature the whole poem seems to me to be "inspired," if ever anything was—inspired, that is, by the true poet's enthusiasm for beauty and truth, not only in the natural but the moral life of the universe. That the world has grown since Thomson's day is no demerit in him. Let us not speak contemptuously of a considerable poet because, largely owing to him, a good many of his moral reflections and unelaborated descriptions now appear to us as bald and obvious. By such judgments do we lose respect even for Milton, and Virgil's Georgics cease to be anything but a useful school exercise.

HUGH CHISHOLM.

FOLKLORE, AND THE ORIGIN OF CIVILISATION.

Haslemere: April 15.

I trust that you will have the fairness to publish the following facts, by which your readers may gauge the accuracy of the statements made by your reviewer of Greek Folk-Poetry. He is good enough to admit that there is "nothing improbable about the idea" that civilisation "may have resulted from the co-operation of two races"; but he affirms that I "insist on the necessity of one of these races having been always white." I make no such general assertion. I insist only on the fact that, in the words of your reviewer, "the social constitution of Ancient Chaldaea and of Ancient Egypt rested on the exploitation of a coloured by a white race." And I think that a writer who undertook the criticism of my theory of the conflict of races might have been expected to be acquainted with the "overwhelming evidence" for that fact. Your reviewer appears to be equally ignorant of the immense amount of work done of late years in demonstrating the dependence of the Chinese on the Chaldaean civilisation; and in showing also the co-operation of higher and lower races in the origination of the American civilisations, though the higher may not have been a white race. Your reviewer further affirms that "Mr. Stuart-Glennie requires us to believe that no combination of white races could originate a civilisation." This assertion is likewise the reverse of the fact. For I expressly and repeatedly say that by higher and lower races I mean races thus differing either racially or economically, owing to one of them being possessed of wealth, knowledge of arts, &c. But besides foisting on me assertions which I have not made, your reviewer grounds arguments on unsupported assertions of his own. Thus he declares that history is a late product of civilisation. But the fact is, that we find written records at the very initiation of the earliest known civilisations, and that the "invention of recording arts" is therefore made a chief feature in my definition of civilisation. And similarly ignoring my definition of Paganism, your reviewer undertakes to criticise my essay on The Survival of Paganism. Now, sir, I say that when a writer clearly defines the subjects of which he treats, nothing, save such misstatements of his theories as above indicated, can be more unfair on the part of a critic than to ignore those definitions, and substitute definitions of his own by which he cannot but be led into irrelevancies. And I refrain, therefore, from further comment on the ignorance shown by your critic of the present condition of scientific research, both with respect to folklore and to the origins of civilisation.

J. S. STUART-GLENNIE.

I regret that Mr. Stuart-Glennie's views about the origin of civilisation were not stated with perfect correctness in my review of Greek Folk-Poesy. But the error does not seem to be of any great practical importance. Mr. Stuart-Glennie seems to hold that the co-operation of a lower with a higher race was a "necessary condition" for the first beginning of a civilisation; and in all the historical instances adduced as proofs or examples of his theory the higher race, according to him, was white. Thus the same inductive argument which goes to prove the necessity of two factors in the process goes as far to prove that one of them was a white race, and, I may add, that the other was a coloured race. At any rate, my objections, whatever they may be worth, are as good against the wider as against the narrower form of the theory. For I contend that the higher race, white or not, may, for aught we know, have become civilised by internal differentiation before it came into contact with the lower race. Apparently Mr. Stuart-Glennie means by a "higher white race" one "possessed of wealth, knowledge of art, &c." My point is, that the possession of these advantages is itself an evidence of civilisation, and therefore not an explanation of what is in question—namely, the origin of all civilisation. In this sense I asserted, and I now confidently repeat the assertion, that history is a late product of civilisation, if we understand history and civilisation to mean what nearly everybody supposes them to mean. Mr. Stuart-Glennie may of course define them as he pleases, but I am not bound by his definitions. When he says that "we find written records at the very initiation of the earliest known civilisations," his use of the plural pronoun appears a little too liberal. He may possess documents going back to the beginning of Egyptian or Chaldaean civilisation; but other investigators are not so fortunate. Tiele, for instance, observes that "the earliest Egyptian texts belong to a period when the writing, the art, and the whole culture of Egypt had already been long developing" (History of Religion in Antiquity, German transl. i. 25).

I said that Mr. Stuart-Glennie gives no reference to the "overwhelming evidence" that the social constitution of Ancient Chaldaea and of Ancient Egypt rested on the exploitation of a coloured by a white race. He neither mentions nor supplies the reference; he only uses violent language about my ignorance and unfitness to criticise his theories. Does he know that Eduard Meyer, writing in 1883 about Egypt, mentions this theory as "a hypothesis that cannot be proved"? that Chantepie De La Saussaye, writing in 1887 (corrected up to date in the English translation of 1891), mentions it as merely the opinion of "some Egyptologists" (Science of Religion, p. 254), without himself venturing to decide on the matter? and that Tiele, who himself is convinced of its truth, admits, in 1895, that it is questioned by some contemporary ethnologists (op. cit., p. 23)? Is he aware that, according to the same high authority, the racial affinities of the Accado-Sumerians are still uncertain, and that the question whether that people was preceded by other inhabitants in the valley of the Euphrates "cannot as yet be answered" (ib., p. 138)? As to the alleged connexion of Chinese civilisation with that of Ancient Babylon, Prof. Legge, writing in 1889, mentions it as having been "suggested but not proved"; and Chantepie De La Saussaye observes the same caution two years later (op. cit., p. 333). Here, then, is "overwhelming evidence," not indeed of events alleged to have happened several thousands of years ago, but in justification of my scepticism as a reviewer, and in proof of Mr. Stuart-Glennie's rashness as a controversialist.

Finally, I quite fail to see how Mr. Stuart-Glennie's definition of Paganism invalidates a single word contained in my second article, or what definition I there substituted for it, or what it has to do with his attacks on Christianity, or with my remarks about the genesis of fairy-tales.

THE REVIEWER OF "GREEK FOLK-POESY."

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"The plan," says the Saturday, "The Whirlpool," has been conceived in quite the Zolaesque spirit. The project is to treat the London of middle-class 'society' and stock-jobbing as a gigantic maelstrom; but "as his characters develop personalities of their own, [the author] becomes interested in these instead, and forgets all about the central purpose of the work," because Mr. Gissing is a realist [Zola is not], and his talent does not lie in the direction of making puppets move on wires." The Whirlpool is undoubtedly the most ambitious of his books. If we leave In the Year of Jubilee out of the account, it is possibly also his best. "From a literary point of view," writes the Chronicle, "Mr. Gissing's most remarkable characteristic is his skilful use of small detail. . . . He uses a note-book, but he uses it like an artist, and not like a reporter. . . . He tells us a great deal about his characters—much more than most authors of the first rank tell us; but when we carefully consider what he tells us we invariably find that even the apparently most inessential revelations have a direct bearing upon the realisation of character. . . . We take it for granted that everyone who has read any of his previous works will read this. Those who have not could hardly be introduced to Mr. Gissing under better auspices." The Scotsman writes: "It is not edifying. But the story is deeply interesting, and the characters are delineated with great skill. . . . But if all or the greater part of human society were as morally blasted as the section of it here exhibited, a Noah's deluge would be the only conceivable remedy." "If the Whirlpool," writes the Manchester Guardian, "offers a less vivid and compact picture than one or two of Mr. Gissing's earlier books, that is partly because it covers a larger canvas. . . . The indictment he has drawn against modern life in certain classes. . . . is undoubtedly accurate, as far as it goes, and impressive." "Nowhere," says the Weekly Sun, "are his special characteristics and attributes more noticeable than in the whirlpool, . . . one of the greatest novels he has written."

"If Mr. Baring-Gould had stuck to his last," writes the Pall Mall, "he would be ranked to-day among the very first of modern novelists. Unhappily . . . when he writes a novel now it is plain that he merely considers it as an inevitable accessory to his folk-lore or his archæology. . . . whosoever desires to learn the laws that governed the Duchy, the habits and customs of Dartmoor, or the methods of tinning [in the reign of Elizabeth] could do no better than consult this book. . . . A romance is here sure enough, but it could have been so much better." "The curious aloofness of these miners from the generality of the English people," writes the Athenæum, "and the convincing manner in which the author throws the reader among them . . . , perhaps account for" the kind of flavour which elevates this book "far above the ordinary novel." The Spectator writes: "Mr. Baring-Gould's knowledge of the county and his familiarity with the strange superstitions of the district have seldom been more felicitously employed than in this strange romance," which, "like everything he writes, is quite out of the beaten track of fiction."

"VIEWED simply as a novel," writes Mr. Courtney in the Daily Telegraph, "Mrs. Atherton's Patience Sparhawk is weakened by its prolixity, and redeemed by its dramatic close. . . . The last 100 pages are worth waiting for. . . . Mrs. Atherton has not yet learnt to stand apart from her creations. . . . A brilliant analytical inquiry into the baffling and scintillating paradoxes of American character." "The book," writes the Standard, "is a clever and conscientious piece of work, but its characters and scenes are somewhat too obviously drawn from life: they give the impression of a merciless photograph untouched by the artist." The Pall Mall recommends the book, "with all its faults," as "one of the most interesting novels of the year."

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

COMPLETE CATALOGUE POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ACHIEVEMENTS of CAVALRY. By General Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C.,

G.O.B., G.O.M.G., Quartermaster-General. With 20 Maps.

"This brilliant and fascinating little book."—Daily Chronicle.
 "Sir Evelyn Wood is to be congratulated on his excellent book. The service may also be congratulated that amongst its Field-Marshal and General Officers on the active list are so many who can emphasise their leading in the field by their literary counsels in peace. Among that band of able writers the Quartermaster-General to Her Majesty's Forces well holds his own."—Times.
 "Will be read with interest and profit both by soldiers and by civilians interested in military history."—Scotsman.

Royal 8vo, 2 vols., 25s. net.

MEMORIALS of CHRISTIE'S. By W. Roberts, Author of "The Bookhunter in London," "Printer's Marks," &c. With 75 Colotype and other Illustrations, and a full Index.

"This history of the famous auctioneers, through whose hands have passed so many important works of art, will be found a reference book of great practical value to all interested in the arts. The chief items in each sale are described, the prices which they fetched under the hammer are recorded, and in all cases of interest the purchaser's name is given. The illustrations of pictures and bric-à-brac are selected chiefly from those objects which obtained "record" prices. In a size uniform with the catalogues of the firm, it should be an indispensable book in all libraries and art schools." [Next week.]

NOW READY. EDITION LIMITED.

Pott 4to, printed on antique laid paper at the Chiswick Press.

Price to Subscribers, 15s. net.

BOOK SALES of the YEAR 1896: containing a

Detailed Description of all the most important Books Sold at Auction, with the Names of the Purchasers and the Prices realised. With complete Indexes of Names and Subjects, and General Introduction and Notes. By TEMPLE SCOTT.

A few copies of the volume for 1896 are still on hand, and may be had for 15s. net each.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION, post 8vo, 2 vols., 15s.

SLANG, JARGON, and CANT: a Dictionary of Unconventional Phraseology, comprising English, American, Colonial, "Tinkers", Yiddish, Pidgin, and Anglo-Indian Slang. With Philological Notes and Illustrative Quotations. Compiled and Edited by Professor ALBERT BARRERE, B.M.A., Woolwich, and CHARLES G. LELAND, M.A., Hon. F.R.S.L., Author of "The English Gypsies and their Language," &c., "Hans Breitmann," &c.

Pott 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE SILVER CROSS. A Selection of Poems

for the Sick and Suffering. Edited by HELEN DOUGLAS. With an Introduction by the LORD BISHOP of ST. ANDREWS. Pott 8vo, printed in red and black on antique paper at the Chiswick Press.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

GOLF in THEORY and PRACTICE: some Hints to Beginners. By H. S. O. EVERARD. A Practical Manual. With 23 Illustrations from Life.

"We have read the book 'right off,' as the saying goes, and this because, as in the case of a witching tale, it was difficult to stop.....The book is enjoyable and instructive, it is attractive in appearance, clear in its printing, valuable in its contents, and we hope it will have a wide circulation in the world of golf."—Golf.
 "One of the very best books of its class."—Espresso.

Crown 8vo, 600 pp., 3s. 6d.

ELOCUTION and the DRAMATIC ART. By

DAVID J. SMITHSON. New Edition, Revised by the Rev. C. R. TAYLOR, M.A., Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, Professor of Elocution at King's College, London [Next week.]

ALDINE POETS.—New Volumes.

JAMES THOMSON. Revised Edition, with a

New Memoir and Critical Appendix, by the Rev. T. C. TOVEY, M.A., Author of "Gray and his Friends," &c. 3 vols., fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net each.

HANDBOOKS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

NEW VOLUMES.

Edited by Prof. J. W. HALES, M.A.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

THE AGE of WORDSWORTH. By Prof. C. H.

HERFORD, Litt.D., Professor of English Literature in the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth.

THE AGE of MILTON. By J. Bass Mullinger,

M.A., University Lecturer in History, and the Rev. J. H. B. MASTERMAN, B.A., late Lecturer of St. John's College, Cambridge. [Immediately.]

THE AGE of TENNYSON. By Professor Hugh Walker.

[Immediately.]

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

NEW VOLUMES.

THE PROSE WORKS of JONATHAN SWIFT.

A New Edition, with an Introduction by W. E. H. LECKY, M.P. In about 8 vols., 3s. 6d. each.

Vol. I.—"A Tale of a Tub," "The Battle of the Books," and other early works. Edited by Temple Scott. With Biographical Introduction by W. E. H. Lecky, M.P. With Portrait and Facsimile. [Immediately.]

Vol. II.—"The Journal to Stella." Edited by F. Ryland, M.A. With a Facsimile Letter and 2 Portraits of Stella. [In the press.]

EARLY ESSAYS by JOHN STUART MILL

Collected from various sources by J. W. M. GIBBS. 3s. 6d.

HORACE. A New Literal Prose Translation.

By A. HAMILTON BRYCE, LL.D., Translator and Editor of "Vergil," &c. 3s. 6d.

BELL'S CATHEDRAL SERIES.

Edited by GLEESON WHITE and E. F. STRANGE.

Fully Illustrated, in specially designed green cloth cover, crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. each.

This Series of Monographs in small compass, which has been for some time in preparation, is planned to supply visitors to the great English Cathedrals with accurate guide-books, and also to present a complete record at a lower price and more fully illustrated than any yet published.

CANTERBURY. | SALISBURY. | CHESTER. | ROCHESTER. | OXFORD.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"We have so frequently in these columns urged the want of cheap, well-illustrated, and well-written handbooks to our cathedrals, to take the place of the out-of-date publications of local booksellers, that we are glad to hear that they have been taken in hand by Messrs. George Bell & Sons."—St. James's Gazette.

"Visitors to the cathedral cities of England must often have felt the need of some work dealing with the history and antiquities of the city itself, and the architecture and associations of the cathedral, more portable than the elaborate monographs which have been devoted to some of them, more scholarly and satisfying than the average local guide-book, and more copious than the section devoted to them in the general guide-book of the county or district. Such a legitimate need the 'Cathedral Series' now being issued by Messrs. George Bell & Sons under the editorship of Mr. Gleeson White and Mr. E. F. Strange seems well calculated to supply. The volumes, two of which relating to Canterbury and Salisbury have already been issued, are handy in size, moderate in price, well illustrated and written in a scholarly spirit. The history of cathedral and city is intelligently set forth and accompanied by a descriptive survey of the building in all its detail. The illustrations are copious and well selected, and the series bids fair to become an indispensable companion to the cathedral tourist in England."—Times.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 48, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1304.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied
promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—
No. 31 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
No. 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (762, 732 lots.)
No. 55 PHILOSOPHY. (1840 lots.)

H. GREVEL & CO.
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
Catalogues of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 7, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 120, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

BOOKS, a CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND.
(1) Pertaining to Annuities, Finance, and Political Economy in general, post free; (2) General Literature, 20 Stamps.
C. HENKERT, 234, Goswell Road, London, E.C.
Libraries Purchased.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS of 27 and 28 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24 BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C. Desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

W. THACKER & CO.
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPIKE & Co.
Telegrams: MORPUL, LONDON. [Established 1819.]

TO AUTHORS.—Messrs. DIGBY, LONG & CO.
(Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net, eighth
edition) INVITE AUTHORS to FORWARD their MSS. (Fiction,
Travel, Poetry, &c.) suitable for Volumes for prompt consideration.—
Address 18, Boulevard Street, Fleet Street, London.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 5121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

SALES BY AUCTION.

THE OLD MASTERS.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & CO. will
SELL BY AUCTION, at AMSTERDAM, on TUESDAY
JUNE 1, 1897, the very important Cabinet of OLD PICTURES of
G. DE CLERQ, Esq., and of Mrs. JENTINK-PARRET, containing exceedingly fine specimens by Avercamp, Asselijn, Bakhuizen, Berck-heyde, Berghem, van Boven, F. Bol, J. Both, Velvet Breughel, Pieter Claess, Coddie, Decker, I. van der Eijnden, Fyt, Hackaerts (2 pieces), D. Hals, Hend. de Heem, E. van der Hiele (magnificent composition of four figures—16 size), Hondelcoeter, Honthorst, Konink, Lievens, Maes, van der Meer, van der Meulen, J. M. Molenaar (3 pieces), Aert van der Neer (3 pieces), G. Neyts, A. Palmadess (3 pieces), Fylenker (2 pieces), G. de Ring, J. Ruysdael, S. Ruysdael, H. Safloren, Slingselaers, Jan Steen (2 pieces), Stoop (2 pieces), van Steenkterborch, A. van der Velde, W. van der Velde, J. van (capital battle-scene of the English and Dutch fleets), van der Venne (5 pieces), Verboom, Vinckboons, S. de Vlieger, Mart de Vos, R. van Vries, Walsappelle, van der Werf, Weenix, &c.
The Illustrated Catalogue is to be had at the Office, Poelenstraat
1 Amsterdam, price Four Shillings, free by post.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & CO. will
SELL BY AUCTION, on the SAME DAY, the beautiful
Collection of OLD DRAWINGS, the Cabinet of W. F. PIET, Esq.
Please apply for the Illustrated Catalogue at the said Office, price
One Shilling, free by post.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

The Rev. J. P. MAHAFFY, D.D., Professor of Ancient History in the University of Dublin, will THIS DAY (SATURDAY, MAY 1), at 5 o'clock, begin a COURSE OF THREE LECTURES on "THE GREEK THEATRE according to RECENT DISCOVERIES." Subscription to this Course, Half-a-Guinea; to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.
The ANNUAL MEETING of the Members of the Royal Institution will be held THIS DAY (SATURDAY, MAY 1st), at 5 o'clock.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER- COLOURS, 51, Pall Mall East, S.W. SUMMER EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. SIGFRIED H. HENKERT, Secretary (pro tem.).

MINIATURES.—The celebrated Collection of HISTORICAL MINIATURES formed by Mr. LUMSDEN PROPERT will be on EXHIBITION on and after the 10th MAY, at the FINE ART SOCIETY'S, 145, NEW BOND STREET.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS.

The EXHIBITION will OPEN on MONDAY, May 3rd. Admission (from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m., except on the first day, when it opens at 10 a.m.) 1s. and 1d. Season Tickets, 5s.

ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY.

APPLICATIONS for the Academy's TODD PROFESSORSHIP of the CELTIC LANGUAGES, which is now vacant, should be sent in to the Secretary of Council before the 31st of May, 1897.
All particulars regarding the Professorship can be obtained from the Treasurer of the Academy, at the Academy House, 19, Dawson Street, Dublin.

ARTISTS' GENERAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.

For the Relief of Distressed Artists, their Widows and Orphans.

President—Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A.
The ANNIVERSARY DINNER will take place at the WHITE-HALL ROOMS, HOTEL METROPOLE, on SATURDAY, May 8th, at half-past 6 o'clock.
The Right Reverend the LORD BISHOP of LONDON in the Chair.
DONATIONS will be received and thankfully acknowledged by ALFRED WATERHOUSE, R.A., Treasurer.
WALTER W. OULESS, R.A., Hon. Secretary.
DOUGLAS GORDON, Secretary.
19, St. James's Street, S.W.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

A COURSE OF TEN Popular LECTURES on BIRDS will be delivered in the LECTURE ROOM in the SOCIETY'S GARDENS, Regent's Park, on THURSDAYS, at 5 p.m., commencing MAY 6th, by Mr. F. E. BEDDARD, M.A., F.R.S., Professor to the Society.
Tickets for the whole Course, including Entrance to the Society,
10s. each; or 1s. each Lecture, not including Entrance, to be obtained at the Society's Office, 3, Hanover Square, W. F. flows admitted free.

THE FIVE ZOROASTRIAN GATHAS, with the ZEND, FAHLAVI, SANSKRIT, and PERSIAN TEXTS, with Translations of the First Three (Latin version of the Zend), and a Commentary to all, pp. 222+xxx., by L. H. MILLS, D.D., Hon.
M.A. (F. A. Brockhaus, Leipzig, 1892-94). Substantially by His Lordship the Secretary of State for India, in Council. The Translations in their original state were asked for by Larmester (Nov. 5, '83),
"dans l'espoir d'une réponse favorable" as the basis of the thirty-first volume of the Sacred Books of the East, in which Dr. Mills succeeded him at his request; they are now the sequel.
See the Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen, of May 13 1893:—"Das
Ergebnis einer ersten Arbeit sehr mannigfaltiger Art...
Unter Verständnis der Gathas m. h. t. g. gefördert."—Professor Justi.
See the Revue Critique, Sept. 18, 1893:—"Tous ceux qui s'occupent de l'interprétation des Gathas rendront hommage à l'immense labeur scientifique de M. Mills... indispensable pour l'étude."
Professor DARMESTER.
Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft (II Heft, 1893): "Immer wird es die Grundlage bilden, auf der sich jede weitere Forschung aufbauen muss. Mills hat mit ihm der Avestaforschung einen hervorragenden Dienst (an eminent service) geleistet."
Professor FISCHLE (one of the first scholars living).
Only a very few copies are still to be had (of the author) at 30s. net.
(Address, Oxford.) The Dictionary is in the press.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.
The SUMMER SESSION will begin on MAY 1st, 1897.
Students can reside in the College within the Hospital walls, subject to the collegiate regulations.
The Hospital contains a service of 750 beds. Scholarships and Prizes of the aggregate value of nearly £900 are awarded annually.
The Medical School contains large Lecture Rooms and well-appointed Laboratories for Practical Teaching, as well as Dissecting Rooms, Museum, Library, &c.
A large Recreation Ground has recently been purchased.
For further particulars apply personally or by letter, to the WARDEN
OF THE COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.
A Handbook forwarded on application.

TO LITERARY MEN and others.—Experienced M.D. OFFERS HOME to RESIDENT PATIENT or BOARDER. Good house in sheltered part of Harrogate. Hunting, Golf, Fishing, &c. Special advantages for Photography, and excep- tionally good Library. No children. Close to Baths and Wells. References given and required.—Apply M.D. Literary Club, Prospect Hotel, Harrogate.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER.—PAD.

(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)
Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each, 3s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line prepaid.)

WANTED BOOKPLATES.—Any good Plates, or parcels, purchased for cash.—Heway Higham, Second-hand Bookseller, 16, Great Marlborough Street, London, W.

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid—
Apply Academy Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

EDWARD BAKER, 14 and 16, John Bright Street,
Birmingham.—Peter Simple, 3 vols., 1834, 10s. 6d. offered.
Naval Officer, 1829, 3 vols., 10s. 6d. offered.—Arthur O'Leary, 3 vols.,
1844, £2 offered.—Kipling's Plain Tales, &c., 1888, 20s. offered.—Angus's
New Zealanders, 1847, £5 offered.—Lever's Con Cregan, 3 vols., £2 offered.—Lever's That Boy of Norcott's, 1889, £2 offered.—Keat's Poems, 1817, £5 offered.—Von Sybel's French Revolution, 1867, 35s. offered.
George Meredith's Poems, pub. Parker, £5 offered.—Tennyson's Victim, pub. Canford Manor, £20 offered.—Tennyson's Window, pub. Canford Manor, 1887, £20 offered.—Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878, 42s. offered.
—Curse of Minerva, 1812, £20 offered.—Maroon Polo's Travels, 2 vols., 40s. offered.—Lever's Rent in a Clout, 10s. 6d. offered.—Chapman & Hall's—Hawbuck's Grange, 1847, 21s. offered.—Moore's Alps in 1844, £3 offered.
Scenes of Clerical Life, 2 vols., 1858, 25s. offered.—Lorna Doone, 3 vols., 1869, 20s. offered.—Wuthering Heights, 3 vols., 1847, 20s. offered.
Shelley's Queen Mab, 1813 £7 offered.
A priced Catalogue of 450 books I want, for which I will pay the fancy prices affixed, post free on application.

F. J. COX, 201, Kensington High Street.—
Opera Books of H. M. Theatre, Haymarket, years 1842 to 1896.
BOOKS FOR SALE.
(Advertisements are inserted under this heading at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WILSON, Well Street, M. flat, N.B.—Kennedy's Conversations on Religion with Lord Byron. 1830. Orig. boards. Spotlessly clean copy. Offers.

EDUCATIONAL.

SWITZERLAND.—Highly recommended HOME-
SCHOOL for a limited number of girls. Exceptional advantages for Study of Languages and Arts. Visiting Professors. Beautiful situation. Health studied.—Prospectus, Miss HUNZ, Bienne.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.
1897. EXAMINATION, July 6th, 7th. One of £20, two of
£10, and Minor Scholarships of £10 to £20. Candidates to be under 15 years of age.
For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An EXAMINA-
TION will be held in July next to fill up not less than FIVE
RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS,
and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the Head
Master, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

STAMFORD HIGH SCHOOL for GIRLS (Head
Miss M. MONRO) PREPARES for UNIVERSITY EXAMINATIONS. BOARDERS are received by the Head Mistress in the School. Separate Classes, Preparatory Class for Boys and Girls from 3 to 8 years under a Trained and Certificated Mistress.
Prospectus on application. NEXT TERM begins on THURSDAY,
MAY 6.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI-
LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.
The last, most complete and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-
Instruction.
Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.
Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 2 dols. 50 cents.
American, 10s. 6d. English. Post free.
Prospectus with opinion of EDUCATORS, SCIENTIFIC, PROFESSIONAL,
and BUSINESS MEN all over the world free.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 737, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
NOT SOLD ELSEWHERE. 200, REGENT STREET, LONDON

TYPE-WRITING neatly, accurately, and ex-pediently executed. Scientific MSS. a specialty.—Miss
MARTIN, 19, Beaumont Street, Portland Place, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851. BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

JARROLD & SONS' LIST

MAURUS JOKAI'S NEW NOVEL.
THE GREEN BOOK;
Or, Freedom Under the Snow.By the Author of "Black Diamonds," "Pretty Michal,"
"Midst the Wild Carpathians."

With Engraved Portrait of Author, 6s. [Fifth Edition.]

"Altogether a great book and worth all the novels of native growth we are likely to see this season."—Pail Mail Gazette.
 "In its panoramic width of outlook, its inexhaustible fertility of invention and barbaric splendour of colouring, Maurus Jokai's great novel challenges comparison with Tolstoy's 'War and Peace.' There is a succession of brilliant tableaux. To read this remarkable book is like witnessing a magnificent Oriental pageant. It is of enthralling interest and takes rank with the great novels of the century."—Spectator.
 "The author has given us a group of striking personalities, of every one of whom it is not too much to say that it is brilliantly drawn and vividly presented. From every point of view 'The Green Book' is a book to be read. It is a work of fine art."—Daily Chronicle.
 Mr. Courtenay says in the Daily Telegraph: "It is truly an astounding book. In force and fire and prodigious variety he reminds one of the elder Dumas."

HIS DOUBLE SELF;
Or, the Transformation of Keith Winstanley.By E. CURTIS, Author of "Dr. Malchi," "Queen or Bondwoman," "Lamar the Witch," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"The tale is not without a certain cleverness in working out a plot such as Dickens only, among modern novelists, could keep seriously going. There is something enjoyable in the plausible fluency with which the tale maintains its air of mystery."—Scotsman.

NEW "GREENBACK" NOVELS.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.ALLANSON'S LITTLE WOMAN.
By EASTWOOD KIDSON.

"A story which can be enjoyed by every lover of wholesome fiction. The book is well put together and is a welcome relief from the novels of the hysterical school of writers."—Publishers' Circular.

THE THIRTEENTH BRYDAIN.By MARGARET MOULE,
Author of "Wingrove's Ways," "Dick's Wife,"
"Miss Maidment," &c.

"The story is very cleverly told. The manner in which the course came to pass is very finely worked out by the gifted authoress. The characters are so splendidly presented as to become very real persons to the reader. It has been so with all this lady's books, but her best qualities and gifts as a writer are more fully shown in this, her latest work."—Western Daily Mercury.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
At all Libraries and of the Booksellers.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA, including CEYLON and BURMAH. Published under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Edited by W. T. BLANFORD. Medium 8vo, with numerous woodcuts.

HYMENOPTERA. Vol. I. WASPS AND BEES. By Lieut.-Col. C. T. BINGHAM. Price 1s. with Four Coloured Plates. MAMMALIA. 1. W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S. 1 vol. complete, price 1s. FISHES. By F. DAY, C.I.E., LL.D. 2 vols., price 1s. each. BIRDS. By EDGAR W. OTTER, F.R.S. Vol. I. price 1s. Vol. II. 15s. Vol. III. by W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S. price 15s. REPTILIA AND BATRACHIA. By G. A. BOULENGER. 1 vol. complete, price 1s. MOTHS. By Sir G. F. HAMMOND, Bart. 4 vols., price 1s. each.

London: TAYLOR & FRANCIS, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co. Bombay: THACKER & Co., Ltd. Berlin: R. FRIEDLANDER & SOHN, Charlottenstrasse, 11.

Post 8vo, strongly bound, price 7s.
CAREY'S "GRADUS AD PARNASSUM," with the English Meanings. Revised, Corrected, and Augmented by a Member of the University of Cambridge.
 London: Published by the STATIONERS' COMPANY, Stationers' Hall, Ludgate Hill.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO
GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.
 N.B.—Two or Three Friends may
UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,
and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.
 Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
 at BARTON ARCADE MANCHESTER.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW BOOKS

A NEW WORK ON THE SULTAN AND THE TURKS.
The SULTAN and his SUBJECTS

By RICHARD DAVEY. With Frontispieces, Maps, and Plans. 3 vols., demy 8vo, 24s. [Just ready.]
 The Daily News says:—"Mr. Davey's learned, most interesting, and finely impartial book gives us minute pictures of Palace life."

The Daily Chronicle says:—"Mr. Davey's book is not a mere treatise on the present Eastern crisis. It deals with the past and the far-off past as well as the present. It deserves not only to be read, but also to find a permanent place on the bookshelf."

The St. James's Gazette says:—"An excellent book...
 In the two handsome volumes you may find all that it is important to know about Modern Turkey and its way, with much valuable and interesting information as to their historical development. Mr. Davey writes in an easy and pleasant style, and his book seems to give us a very faithful, just, and yet by no means entirely unfavourable view of the politics and persons of the Ottoman Empire."

NEW BOOK BY W. S. LILLY.
ESSAYS and SPEECHES. By

W. S. LILLY, Author of "Ancient Religion and Modern Thought," "A Century of Revolution," &c. Demy 8vo, 12s. [Ready.]

The Scotsman says:—"The different subjects of his essays all take on a fresh and very interesting colour from the light so able a thinker casts upon them: and the book, as a whole, is of a profound interest to the intellectual readers of all shades of opinion or belief."

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "LORD EDWARD FITZGERALD."
WHITE MAGIC: a Novel. By

M. McD. BODKIN, Q.C., Author of "Lord Edward Fitzgerald: an Historical Romance." Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Bodkin has written a novel of indubitable vigour, rarely dull, full of hairbreadth escapes by flood and field, crammed with enthralling incidents from cover to cover."

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

EDITED BY W. L. COURTNEY.

A STUDY IN TURKISH REFORM. By A TURKISH PATRIOT.
 UNPUBLISHED LETTERS from J. S. MILL to PRO-FESSOR NICHOL. By PROFESSOR W. KNIGHT.

THE TWENTIETH ITALIAN PARLIAMENT. By OUIDA.
 PROFESSOR WILLIAM WALLACE. By J. H. MUIRHEAD.

"EPIC and ROMANCE." By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.
 THE ISLAND OF SAKHALIN. By HARRY DE WINDT.

DEGREES FOR WOMEN. By J. R. TANNER.
 THE WRONG WAY with the NAVY. By WILLIAM LAIRD CLOWES.

THE IDEA OF COMEDY and PINERO'S NEW PLAY.
 By W. L. COURTNEY.

RUSSIA on the BOSPHORUS. By CAPTAIN GAMBIER, R.N.
 MADAME BARTET. By YETTA BLAZE DE BURY.

THE CASE against GREECE. By DIPLOMATICUS.
 CRETE and the CRETANS. By E. J. DILLON.

CHAPMAN'S MAGAZINE

EDITED BY OSWALD CRAWFORD.

CONTENTS FOR MAY.

VIOLET HUNT. UNKIND, UNKIND! (Serial.)
 ALAN OSCAR. THE GUIDING VOICE.

DOUGLAS SLADEN. A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.
 FRANCES E. HUNTLEY. UNTO THE SHORE OF NOTHING.

HAROLD CHILD. THE DEATH CHAIR.
 LADY ARABELLA ROMILLY. LADY CYPRIAN.

EDWARD FITZGERALD. THE MYSTERY OF THE SAHIB'S GOODS.

HUME NISBET. BACK IN TEN MINUTES.
 WICKHAM FLOWER. "VEXILLA REGIS."

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED, LONDON.

Price 3d., by post 2d.; yearly subscription (including Supplements), 2s. 6d.

THE LITERARY GUIDE:

A Rationalist Review.

Devoted mainly to Books and Publications which deal with Religion, Philosophy, Science, and Ethics from a Rationalist standpoint.

No. 11, MAY, 1897, CONTAINS:

AGNOSTICISM in the BROAD CHURCH.

PAST FINDING OUT.

RANDOM REFLECTIONS on HEBREW PROBLEMS.

GREEK FOLK-LORE and HISTORICAL THEORY.

CHRISTIAN RATIONALISM.

SCHOPENHAUER'S ESSAYS in ETHICS and POLITICS.

EGYPT'S INFLUENCE on CHRISTIANITY.

RANDOM JOTTINGS.

SIGNS and WARNINGS (gleaned from the Religious Press).

CHATS about BOOKS.—VI. With Mr. Thomas Whittaker.

GERMAN CRITICS at WORK.

RATIONALISM in the MAGAZINES.

THE QUARTERLY and MONTHLY REVIEWS.

* Nos. 2 to 11 are still in stock, post free 2s.

London: Watts & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

E P P S'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

NEARLY READY.—Price to Subscribers, 12s. net, payable in advance.

A SUPPLEMENTARY VOLUME

TO

"THE OXFORD CHAUCER"

Edited by PROFESSOR SKEAT.

Demy 8vo, pp. lxxxiv. + 608, uniform in all respects with the Library Edition of Chaucer's Works: in Six Volumes, 1894.

CHAUCERIAN AND OTHER PIECES.

EDITED FROM NUMEROUS MANUSCRIPTS

BY THE

REV. WALTER W. SKEAT,

Lit.D., D.C.L., LL.D., Ph.D.,

Elrington and Brewarth Professor of Anglo-Saxon and Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge.

This Selection includes all the most important among the numerous pieces in prose and verse which have been appended to Chaucer's Works in various editions, including those of Thynne, Stowe, Speght, and Tyrwhitt. Nearly every piece reprinted now appears in an improved form; and in several cases
 MSS. not previously examined have been collated, and have proved to be the best. The NOTES are nearly all new.

* The Subscription List will be closed before the publication of the Work, when the price will be advanced to Eighteen Shillings.

CONTENTS.

INTRODUCTION.

1. THOMAS USK: THE TESTAMENT OF LOVE.

BOOK I.: PROLOGUE and CHAPTERS I.-X.

BOOK II.: CHAPTERS I.-XIV.

BOOK III.: CHAPTERS I.-IX.

2. THE PLOWMANS TALE.

3. JACK UPLAND.

4. JOHN GOWER: THE PRAISE OF PEACE.

5. THOMAS HOCCKLEVE: THE LETTER OF CUPID.

6. THE SAME: TO THE KINGS MOST NOBLE GRACE
TO THE LORDS and KNIGHTS OF the GARTER.

7. HENRY SCOGAN: A MORAL BALADE.

8. JOHN LYDGATE: THE COMPLAINT OF the BLACK
KNIGHT; or, The Complaint of a Lover's Life.

9. THE SAME: THE FLOUR OF CURTESYE.

10. THE SAME: A BALADE; In Commendation of our Lady.

11. THE SAME: TO MY SOVERAIN LADY.

12. THE SAME: BALLAD of GOOD COUNSEL.

13. THE SAME: BEWARE OF DOUBLENESS.

14. THE SAME: A BALADE; Warning Men to Beware of Deceitful Women.

15. THE SAME: THREE SAYINGS.

16. SIR RICHARD BOS: LA BELLE DAME sans MERCI.

17. ROBERT HENRYSON: THE TESTAMENT OF GRESSEID.18. THE CUCKOO and the NIGHTINGALE; or, The Book of Cupid, God of Love. (By CLARVOWE.)

19. AN ENVOY to ALISON.

20. THE FLOWER and the LEAF. (By A LADY.)

21. THE ASSEMBLY of LADIES. (By the same.)

22. A GOODLY BALADE. (By JOHN LYDGATE.)

23. GO FORTH, KING. (By JOHN LYDGATE.)

24. THE COURT OF LOVE.

25. A VIRELAI.

26. PROSPERITY. (By JOHN WALTON.)

27. LEAULTE VAULT RICHESSE.

28. SAYINGS PRINTED by CAXTON.

29. BALADE in PRAISE OF CHAUCER.

NOTES to the FOREGOING PIECES.

GLOSSARIAL INDEX.

INDEX of NAMES.

INDEX to some SUBJECTS EXPLAINED in the NOTES.

FULL PROSPECTUS POST FREE.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLarendon Press
 Warehouse, Amen Corner, E.C.

THIS DAY, 400 pp., Crown 8vo, price 7s. 6d., cloth.

A HANDBOOK of ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Originally Compiled by AUSTIN DOBSON.

NEW EDITION, REVISED, WITH NEW CHAPTERS, AND EXTENDED TO THE PRESENT TIME.

By W. HALL GRIFFIN, B.A.,

Professor of English Language and Literature at Queen's College, London.

"For truth of criticism it is about the best book of the kind."—Westminster Review."An excellent handbook of English literature."—Athenæum.

LONDON: CROSBY LOCKWOOD & SON, 7, STATIONERS' HALL COURT, E.C.

THE WARWICK LIBRARY of ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Under the General Editorship of Prof. C. H. HERFORD, Litt.D.

Crown 8vo Volumes, in figured cloth, cut edges, or plain cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. each.

NEW VOLUME, JUST PUBLISHED.

ENGLISH LYRIC POETRY, 1500—1700. With an Introduction

by FREDERICK IYVES CARPENTER, M.A., Lecturer in English Literature in Chicago University.

PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED.

ENGLISH PASTORALS. With an Introduction by E. K. CHAMBERS, B.A.ENGLISH LITERARY CRITICISM. With an Introduction by C. E. VAUGHAN, M.A.ENGLISH ESSAYS. With an Introduction by J. H. LOBBAN, M.A.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, 50, OLD BAILEY.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

WILL BE PUBLISHED SHORTLY.

THE NORWICH SCHOOL of PAINTING.

A Series of Autotype Reproductions of Works by JOHN SELL COTMAN, OLD CROME, STARK, LADBROOKE, BRIGHT, MIDDLETON, DANIELL, LEMAN, LOUND, &c. Forty Autotype Plates, mounted on grey boards, in portfolio. Price Ten Guineas net.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON.

This important Series of over Four Hundred Permanent Carbon Reproductions of the chief Pictures in this magnificent collection includes representative selections from the Italian, Flemish, Dutch, Spanish, French, and English Schools. By the aid of the most recent improvements in Photographic Science, absolutely faithful and Permanent Copies have been secured, on a scale which adequately represents the Original Paintings. These are printed in rich brown pigments, on specially prepared paper, size by inches, and are sold at a uniform price of TWELVE SHILLINGS EACH.

G. F. WATTS, R.A.,

SIR E. BURNE-JONES,

D. G. ROSSETTI.

An Extensive Selection of the Works of these Masters at prices ranging from Three Shillings and Sixpence to Three Guineas.

Full particulars of Autotype Permanent Reproductions from the Old and Modern Masters sent post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,ART REPRODUCERS.

HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of

HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,

the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHURE now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS., Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c., &c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Office 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE and FREE REVIEW: a Monthly Magazine. Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."

CONTENTS OF THE MAY NUMBER: Bentley and Anthony Collins—Roden Noel—Tougenieff—The Downfall of Olive Schreiner—Marie Corelli and her Public—Moral Instruction without Theology—The Social Purity Hallucination—Current Pseudo-Philosophy—Blumland by Night—William Blake and Modern Problems—The Social Evil and the Moral Law—Periodicals—New Books.

PSEUDO-PHILOSOPHY at the END of the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By HUGH MORTIMER CECIL. I. AN IRRATIONALIST TRIO (KIDD, DRUMMOND, BALFOUR). 10s. net.

A vigorous Refutation of the Works of the Three Irrationalists.

THE SAXON and the CELT. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON. 8s. net.

CONTENTS: I. The Question of Race. 1. The Present Irish Trouble. 2. English and Irish. 3. French and Germans. 4. The Problem of Race Origins. 5. The Naming of Celts, Gauls and Teutons. 6. "Celtic" and "Tentonic" History. 7. The Ethic of Race Instinct. II. The Lessons of Irish History. 1. The Causation of the Past. 2. The Verdict of Europe. III. Hill Burton on the Scottish Celts. IV. J. R. Green on Celts and Teutons. V. The Duke of Argyll on Irish History. VI. Mr. Goldwin Smith's Polemic. VII. Mr. Froude on Ireland. VIII. Mr. Balfour on Irish Civilisation. Epilogue: A Programme for Ireland.

Will be published in April.—2s. 6d. net.

THE BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:

an Anatomy of the Disease and a Theory of Curative Treatment. By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

CONTENTS: 1. What is Respectability? 2. The Pathology of the Disease. 3. Ladies and Gentlemen. 4. Specific Symptoms of the Malady in Women. 5. Respectability and Morals. 6. Cultured Gentility. 7. Plutocracy. 8. Villadom. 9. The Tyranny of Respectability. 10. Respectable Civilisation and After. 11. Conclusion.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,

16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

L O N D O N L I B R A R Y,

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, the Very Rev. the DEAN of LLANDAFF, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq., Sir HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B.

TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 170,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year: Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room Open from 10 to Half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS'
New Books and New Editions.

THIRD EDITION, NOW READY.

LIFE of VICE-ADMIRAL SIRGEORGE TRYON, K.C.B. By Rear-Admiral C. C. PENROSE FITZGERALD. With 2 Portraits and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 21s. "Admiral Fitzgerald has discharged his very difficult task with no less skill than discretion."—Times.

THIS DAY IS PUBLISHED.

PREHISTORIC PROBLEMS. By

ROBERT MUNRO, M.A., M.D., F.R.S.E., Secretary of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland; Author of "The Lake Dwellings of Europe," "Rambles and Studies in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Dalmatia," &c. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

WILD TRAITS in TAME ANIMALS

Being Some Familiar Studies in Evolution. By LOUIS ROBINSON, M.D. With Illustrations by Stephen J. Dadd. In 1 vol., 8vo. [Shortly.]

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE ETHICS of JOHN STUART

MILL. By CHARLES DOUGLAS, M.A., D.Sc., Lecturer in Moral Philosophy, and Assistant to the Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, Author of "John Stuart Mill: a Study of his Philosophy." Post 8vo, 6s. net.

COUNTY HISTORIES of SCOTLAND.

NOW READY.

MORAY and NAIRN. By Charles

RAMPINI, LL.D., Sheriff-Substitute of these Counties. With 3 Maps and Plan. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

PERIODS OF EUROPEAN LITERATURE.

Edited by Professor SAINTSBURY.

THE FLOURISHING of ROMANCE

and the RISE of ALLEGORY (Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries). By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in Edinburgh University. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE LATER RENAISSANCE. By

DAVID HANNAY. In 1 vol., crown 8vo. [In the press.]

NEW FICTION AT ALL LIBRARIES.

SECOND EDITION.

A SPOTLESS REPUTATION. By

DOROTHEA GERARD (MADAME LONGARD DE LONGGARD), Author of "Lady Baby," "The Wrong Man," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"An exceedingly brilliant study, the work of a writer rich in knowledge of varied modes of life and thoughts."—Black and White.A STORY of THE COMMUNE.*THE KNIGHT'S TALE. By

F. EMILY PHILLIPS, Author of "The Education of Antonia." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

AN IRISH ROMANCE.A PRINCE of TYRONE. By

CHARLOTTE FENNEL and J. P. O'CALLAGHAN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

TENTH EDITION.

HILDA STRAFFORD and THE

REMITTANCE MAN. Two Californian Stories. By

BEATRICE HARRADEN, Author of "Ships that Pass in the Night," "In Varying Moods." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Its charm is of the subtle and delicate order which cannot possibly be described."—Graphic.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AUDREY CRAVEN. By May Sin-

CLAIR. Crown 8vo, 6s.

POPULAR EDITION of BURTON'S "SCOTLAND."

THIS WEEK, VOL. III. OF

THE HISTORY of SCOTLAND from

AGRICOLA'S INVASION to the EXTINCTION of the last JACOBITE REBELLION. By JOHN HILL BURTON, D.C.L., Historiographer-Royal for Scotland in 8 Monthly Volumes. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

CHEAP RE-ISSUE.

ANCIENT CLASSICS for ENGLISH READERS

Edited by Rev. W. LUCAS COLLINS.

In Shilling Volumes, bound in limp cloth.

Two New Volumes, now ready.

VIRGIL. By the Editor.HORACE. By Sir Theodore Martin, K.C.B.BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 979.—MAY, 1897.—21. 61.

TIS SIXTY YEARS SINCE—THE QUEEN'S OWN GUIDES.—EARLY VICTORIAN FICTION.—THE PRISONS OF SIBERIA, by J. Y. SIMON.—DARIEL: A ROMANCE OF SURREY, by R. D. BLACKMORE.—AN OLD MALMON-POACHING STORY, by GILFRIED W. HARTNEY.—THE BUSTED BLUE DOLL, by ZACK.—THE NEWSPAPER PRESS: HALF A CENTURY'S SURVEY, by FREDERICK GREENWOOD.—MR. JOWETT AND OXFORD LIBERALISM.—"THE SENATE AND THE FIELD."

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Dedicated by permission to Her Majesty the Queen.

Now ready, Part I., price 6d., of

THE QUEEN'S EMPIRE,

a Pictorial Record, in which the Modes of Government, National Institutions, Forms of Worship, Methods of Travel, Sports, Recreations, Occupations, and Home-Life of the Inhabitants of the British Empire will be faithfully and vividly portrayed by means of a large number of which have been made specially for this work.

ARTISTIC REPRODUCTIONS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC VIEWS,

* So great has been the demand for copies of THE QUEEN'S EMPIRE that the immense edition prepared of PART I. has already been exhausted; but the part having been reprinted, copies can now be obtained at all booksellers' and the railway bookstalls.

Part I., ready May 3, price 1s.

ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1897.

To be completed in 5 Parts, 1s. each, or in 1 vol., handomely bound in cloth, 7s. 6d.

"ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES" forms the most perfect representation of the Academy ever placed within reach of the public.

Not only is the best work of the year in Painting and Sculpture represented in the pages of this unique Fine Art Work, but the scale upon which the pictures are produced, and the manner in which they are rendered, give an idea of the originals such as can be gained from no other source.

The MAY Part of THE MAGAZINE OF ART

Now ready, price 1s. 4d.,

Forms the FIRST of a NEW VOLUME, and contains:—

- "THE CAROL." By Mrs. ALMA-TADEMA. Rembrandt Engraving Company.
- "A STUDY." By Sir E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A.
- THE STUDIES OF SIR EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A. By THE EDITOR. With 9 Illustrations.
- THE WALLACE COLLECTION: the French and English Pictures. By M. H. SPILMANN. With 7 Illustrations.
- THE ROMANCE OF ART: the Migrations of Venus and Apollo. By LEADER SCOTT.
- KEDDLETON HALL. By the Right Hon. GEORGE CURZON, M.P. With 8 Illustrations by J. Falleylove, R.I.
- INDUSTRIAL ART at the CHAMP DE MARS SALON of 1897. By HENRI FRANTZ. With 11 Illustrations.
- SIR J. C. ROBINSON'S COLLECTION of WATER-COLOURS. With 3 Illustrations.
- THE ART MOVEMENT: "Wall Decoration." By ALMA VALANCE. With 5 Illustrations "Art in Italy." By HELEN ZIMMERMAN. With 4 Illustrations.
- NOTES and QUERIES. With 7 Illustrations.
- NEW COMPETITION: Announcement.
- THE CHRONICLE of ART: MAY. (Including "THE ROYAL ACADEMY, 1897.") With 10 Illustrations.
- NOTES on the POSTER COMPETITION. With 18 Illustrations.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED,
LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S SELECTED LIST.

"FROM PAUPER TO PREMIER."

LIFE OF SIR HENRY PARKES. By CHARLES E. LYNE, formerly Editor of the "Sydney Morning Herald," &c. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Lyne has told the story of the remarkable career of a remarkable man in such a painstaking and concise manner that it cannot fail to attract.... The book has a clear and distinctive value. Furthermore, its preparation shows much care and literary skill."

"THE PARLIAMENT OF DISRAELI AND GLADSTONE"

THE INNER LIFE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS. Selected from the Writings of WILLIAM WHITE with a Prefatory Note by his Son, and an Introduction by JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. 2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. [Next week] The late Mr. William White was, for many years door-keeper of the House of Commons, and in this capacity gained a unique knowledge of the Parliamentary life of his day. He witnessed the early skirmishes between Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone, and sketched many a portrait, none the less vivid for being un-scientific, for the "Illustrated Times," from whose pages these extracts are mainly derived. From them it will be gathered that Mr. White was the pioneer of the modern "descriptive reporting" which obtains so largely now-a-days.

TWELVE BAD WOMEN. Edited by ARTHUR VINCENT. A Companion Volume to "Twelve Bad Men." Illustrated. Cloth, 16s.

The volume is made up as follows:—I. Alice Perrers (the rapacious paramour of Edward III.)—II. Alice Arden (Shakespeare's chosen type of a bad woman)—III. Mary Frith ("Moll Cutpurse")—IV. The Countess of Somerset (Sir Thomas Overbury's murderer)—V. Barbara, Duchess of Cleveland—VI. Mary Young ("Jenny Diver")—VII. Teresa Constantia Phillips (Walpole's "Coo Phillips")—VIII. Miss Chudleigh—IX. Mrs. Browning (the cruellest of women)—X. Elizabeth Canning (impostor)—XI. Mary Bateman ("The Yorkshire Witch")—XII. Mary Anne Clarke (the baleful genius of "the brave old Duke of York").

BICYCLING IN SPAIN.

SKETCHES 'A WHEEL in FIN DE SIECLE IBERIA. By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN, Authors of "Algerian Memories." 30 Illustrations and Large Map, cloth, 6s.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "NAME THIS CHILD."
A GREAT LIE. By Wilfrid Hugh CHESON. Cloth, 6s. [Next week]

THE BURDEN OF LIFE. Essays by the late J. HAIN FRISWELL, Author of "The Gentle Life." Edited, with a Memoir, by his Daughter. Cloth, 3s. 6d. New Saturday.—"Written in a tone and style which is charming."

A NEW STORY BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.
A NOBLE HAUL (The New Volume of "Little Novels"). Paper, 6d.; cloth, 1s. Punch.—"As one of the excellent series of 'Little Novels' 'A Noble Haul' is a little novel worth several ordinary big ones. It is a stirring story, admirably told, and in the smallest compass possible—quite a pocket compass. For rail, road, or trip by sea, strongly recommended."

A NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.

CRAIKTREES: a Story of Yorkshire COUNTRY LIFE. By WATSON DYKE. Cloth, 6s.

BY THE AMERICAN CONSUL AT ATHENS.

APHROESSA, and Other Poems. By GEORGE HORTON, Author of "Constantine." Cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE QUEEN'S REIGN FOR CHILDREN.

By W. CLARKE HALL, Author of "The Law Relating to Children." Portrait. With Introduction by BENJAMIN WAUGH. Cloth, 2s. 6d. No volume of child-life of this nation has ever been written which contains so thrilling, so incredible a story as this, which briefly relates what the Queen's reign has done for children. The conditions in which children were living at the beginning of her Majesty's reign in mines, in brickfields, on canals, &c., are here briefly summarised from authentic documents. The struggle in Parliament on these children's behalf, the defeats and victories, are glanced at, and some practical political suggestions are made in reference to a still better future for children.

A NEW EDITION OF OLIVE SCHREINER'S STORIES,
DREAM LIFE and REAL LIFE. Paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth, 2s.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED, BY SAME AUTHOR.

TROOPER PETER HALKET of MASHONALAND. With Frontispiece, cloth, 6s.

THE GRÆCO-TURKISH WAR.

THE BALKANS. By W.

Read { MILLER, M.A.
TURKEY. By Stanley Lane-POOLE.
With Illustrations and Map, cloth, 6s. each.

FOURTH EDITION.

Revised, Enlarged, and brought up to date.

SOUTH AFRICA. By Geo. McCall THEAL, Author of "The Portuguese in South Africa," &c. Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 6s. [Next week] "A thoroughly workmanlike and readable volume." Daily Telegraph, on First Edition.

NEW EDITION.

INMATES OF MY HOUSE and GARDEN. By Mrs. BRIGHTWEN. Many Illustrations. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

LONDON:

T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVEL BY CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

THE PILGRIMAGE of the BEN BERAH. By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Miss Yonge's great literary power is too well recognised to call for a word from us in its praise. Her masterly descriptions of the country through which the wandering band travelled are given with a faithfulness and beauty which attract and hold the reader's attention."

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS.
New Volumes.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.

"Peacock" Edition, gilt sides, back, and edges, 5s.

PARENTS' ASSISTANT; or, Stories for Children. By MARIA EDGEWORTH. Illustrated by CHRIS. HAMMOND. With an Introduction by ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE.

Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

RELIGIOUS TEACHING in SECONDARY SCHOOLS. Suggestions to Teachers and Parents for Lessons on the Old and New Testaments, Early Church History, Christian Evidences, &c. By Rev. G. C. BELL, M.A., Master of Marlborough College.

CHRISTIAN WORLD.—"The hints are the outcome of the ripe experience of one who has beaten out his views on the anvil of practice."

SECOND EDITION, REVISED. NOW READY.

THE THEORY of INTERNATIONAL TRADE, with SOME of its APPLICATIONS to ECONOMIC POLICY. By Professor C. F. BASTABLE, M.A., LL.D., Author of "Public Finance," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION. A Commentary on its Nature and Growth. By JESSE MACY, M.A., Professor of Political Science in Iowa College.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Characterised all through by that careful accuracy, that broad and comprehensive treatment, which always marks the true scholar and thinker. An admirable, lucid, and excellent work."

CLASSICAL SERIES.—New Volumes.

THUCYDIDES. Book VI. Edited by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A., Trinity College, Oxford, &c. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY CLASSICS.—New Volumes.

P. VERGILI MARONIS GEORGICON LIBER IV. Edited for the Use of Schools with Vocabulary, by T. E. PAGE, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, Assistant Master at Charterhouse. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d.

MAY NUMBER. Price 1s.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

TWO NEW NOVELS COMMENCE in this NUMBER.

1. THE HOUSE by the HOWFF. By W. L. WARRON. Chapters I.—IV.
2. ON THE THEORY and PRACTICE of LOCAL COLOUR. By W. P. JAMES.
3. RAYMOND LULLY. By H. C. MACDOWALL.
4. SUNDAY OBSERVANCE.
5. NELL: a Biographical Fragment.
6. A BRITISH PRISONER in AMERICA. By A. G. BRADLEY.
7. PHILOMÈLE.
8. A CHAPTER of ACCIDENTS. By Mrs. FRASER. Chapters I.—IV.

MAY NUMBER NOW READY.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d.

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles:

- CRETE, the ISLAND of DISCORD. By A. REINERT of ATHENS.
- THE ROYAL FAMILY of GREECE. By B. I. WHEELER.
- THE WITHDRAWAL of the FRENCH from MEXICO. A Chapter of Secret History. By Lieut.-Gen. JOSE M. SCHOFIELD.
- THE DAYS of JEANNE D'ARC.—II. By M. H. CATHERWOOD.

Illustrated. Price 1s.

ST. NICHOLAS MAGAZINE

For MAY

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles:

- THE BIG BOOBOO and the LITTLE BOOBOO. By GERTRUDE SMITH.
- THE KING'S HIGHWAY. By R. F. BUNNEN.
- A WHITE RED SQUIRREL. By EMILY G. HUNT, M.D.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
The Treasure of the Humble	465
A Good Old English Family	466
The Secret Rose	467
Jean François Millet... ..	467
Man's Place in Nature	468
Prof. Freeman's Travels	468
With the Dutch in the East	469
A Historical Geography of the British Colonies	470
The Literature of Music	470
FROM CROWDED SHELVES	471
FICTION:
Patience Sparhawk and Her Times—Magnhild—Dust—A Prince of Tyrone—The Pilgrimage of the
Ben Beriah	473
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books	473
New Books Received... ..	474
NOTES AND NEWS	474
MR. GEORGE MOORE OF STVENSON	476
MR. KIPLING'S BEGINNINGS	476
HENRY V. AT STRATFORD-ON AVON	477
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXV., ANDREW MARVELL	478
THE BOOK MARKET	478
THE NEW GALLERY	479
DRAMA	480
MUSIC	480
CORRESPONDENCE	481

REVIEWS.

THE TREASURE OF THE HUMBLE.

The Treasure of the Humble. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alfred Sutro. With Introduction by A. B. Walkley. (George Allen.)

BY this volume of essays M. Maeterlinck, poet, mystic, and barrister, should enter his kingdom. That he lingered on the road was due to his discoverer and frantic adorer, M. Octave Mirabeau. "La Princesse Maleine" is a remarkable play, but it was unkind of the amiable and distinguished French critic to prepare English readers for a perusal by the statement that it was "more tragic than 'Macbeth,' more extraordinary than 'Hamlet,' more beautiful than both combined." The sponsor for The Treasure of the Humble is Mr. A. B. Walkley. His introduction is compact and ingenious, but Mr. Walkley is not a mystic.

"M. Maeterlinck began," says Mr. Walkley, "by visualising and synthesising his ideas of life; here you shall find him trying to analyse these ideas and consumed with anxiety to tell us the truth that is in him. Reversing the course prescribed by Mr. Squeers for his pupils, M. Maeterlinck, having cleaned w-i-n-d-e-r, winder, now goes and spells it."

The Treasure of the Humble, which has been delicately translated from the French by Mr. Alfred Sutro, consists of ten short essays. Under such titles as "The Awakening of the Soul," "Mystic Morality," "The Invisible Goodness," "The Inner Beauty," &c., M. Maeterlinck gives voice to his philosophy. Again and again he proclaims with eager insistence that the discoveries to be made—that have been made—in the spiritual world are as many and as momentous as those that have been wrested from the physical universe:

"There are in man many regions more fertile, more profound, and more interesting than those of his reason or intelligence. . . . We are in the hands of strange powers, whose intentions we are on the eve of divining."

This modest little volume is indeed a cup of cold water for the parched who have sought for peace in the din of theological warfare and have found it not. M. Maeterlinck is neither destructive nor constructive. He chastises nobody. He bludgeons none. Defiance never flames in his forehead. He hazards no attempt at reconciliation between science and religion. He urges no creed. In his pages there is no hint of dogma. A few names whisper through them, but they are mainly poets and seers. He but describes the ways, the moods, the aspirations of his soul in its desert journey through this life, and the desert blossoms as he goes. His eyes are clear: his heart is fearless. God is with the world. All is well. He takes it for granted that the great problems have been solved by the introspective mystics—by Plotinus, for example, "who of all intellects known to me draws the nearest to the divine." M. Maeterlinck has been called a decadent. Rather should he be styled a heroic optimist. His belief in mankind almost transcends his vocabulary. How can one ever express "the thing that is piteously flapping its wings at the back of our throat and craving for utterance"? His pages are radiant with the conviction that

"a spiritual epoch is upon us. Certain it is that there passes not a day but the soul adds to its ever-widening domain. It is now clearly making a mighty effort. Its manifestations are everywhere, and they are strangely urgent, pressing, imperious even, as though the order had been given, and no time must be lost."

M. Maeterlinck's ministry is to the lowly and humble of heart. The arrogant, the robust, the very sure need him not. It is no new thing that he comes to tell. He but expresses in rhythmic, vibrant language the ancient command to obey the divinity within, and to put it into correspondence with the infinite.

"It is only by the communications we have with the infinite that we are to be distinguished from each other. . . . It lies within our power to increase those communications. . . . In everything that happens is there light, and the greatness of the greatest of men has but consisted in that they had trained their eyes to be open to every ray of this light."

The mysticism of the ages has descended upon him. There is no trail of the proselytiser. "He does but adumbrate and whisper, knowing that there are who will understand."

In those pages there is but one hint of that religion founded ages ago, upon the discovery and practice of those occult powers which now "we are on the eve of divining." Perhaps, however, the "we" applies only to the Occident. If M. Maeterlinck's optimism sometimes leads him into super-subtleties whither the ordinary man cannot follow, the ordinary man can at least appreciate such wise words as those on the subject of emotional moments. After stating that every infinite thought beautifies our lives, M. Maeterlinck proceeds:

"But we must not deceive ourselves. To every man there come noble thoughts that pass across his heart like great white birds. Alas! they do not count; they are strangers whom we are surprised to see, whom we dismiss with importunate gesture. Their time is too short to touch our life. Our soul will not become earnest and deep-searching, as is the soul of the angels, for that we have, for one fleeting instant, beheld the universe in the shadow of death or eternity, in the radiance of joy or the flames of beauty and love. We have all known moments such as these—moments that have but left worthless ashes behind. These things must be habitual with us; it is of no avail that they should come by chance. We must learn to live in a beauty, an earnestness, that shall become part of ourselves."

The Treasure of the Humble must be approached in the spirit which prompted the writing of it. Who can but be grateful to an author whose sole aim has been to express the beauty that he feels within him and sees about him. To differ from him, to protest against some of his deductions, is but to provoke a calm, compassionate smile which might be interpreted: "I know that those things are—I have felt them." Yet who will follow this young adept to the point of such a deduction from his philosophy as this: "Of the dead alone should portraits be painted, for it is only they who are truly themselves, and who, for one instant, stand revealed as they are"? The dead are not themselves. We like to think them beautiful, and for a few hours we make them so. But there is no beauty in that from which the best has gone. There is no beauty in a withered flower or in an empty house. Again, who is on his side in such a remark as this about those predestined to early death:

"Others there are who linger for a moment, who look at us with an eager smile, and seem to be on the point of confessing that they know all: and then, towards their twentieth year, they leave us, hurriedly, muffling their footsteps, as though they had just discovered that they had chosen the wrong dwelling-place, and had been about to pass their lives among men whom they did not know."

This is sheer sentimentality. The following passages are on quite a different level:

"There are some who dare assert that we can learn to be happy, that as we become better so do we meet men of loftier mind; that a man who is good attracts with irresistible force events as good as he, and that in a beautiful soul the saddest fortune is transformed into beauty."

"And, further, we know that the dead do not die. We know now that it is not in our churches that they are to be found, but in the houses, the habits of us all. That there is not a gesture, a thought, a sin, a tear, an atom of acquired consciousness that is lost in the depths of the earth; and that at the most insignificant of our acts our ancestors rise—not in their tombs, where they move not, but in ourselves, where they always live."

M. Maeterlinck has no power of detachment. He reads himself into the heart of the world. Envy and contempt are foreign to him. He calls us all to the heights. Confident that the souls of his fellow mortals are as responsive and subtle as his own, can one wonder that he is on tip-toe with expectation for that time "when our souls will know of each other without the intermediary of the senses"?

His veneration for the age in which we live is touching. To him the world is not very evil, nor are the times waxing late. On the contrary, something surprisingly new and beautiful is in store for the children of men, psychic gifts that were hidden from our ancestors. He believes that "in the work-a-day lives of the very humblest of men spiritual phenomena manifest themselves—mysterious, direct workings, that bring soul nearer to soul; and of all of this we can find no record in former times. And the reason must surely be that these things were not so clearly evident then."

We do not oppose, we would not care to oppose, rather do we welcome the notion that the number of men and women conscious of psychic powers, striving for that equal balance of the spiritual and physical that makes the perfect man, is larger to-day than it has been during any epoch. But to say, as M. Maeterlinck does, in the face of the great harvest of spiritual victories recorded in the sacred and secular writings of all countries—to say that in past ages such experiences had escaped the notice of sages, and had been passed over in silence, can be regarded only as the enthusiasm of an enthusiast. No period of history has had a monopoly of personal and intimate revelation, and no period has been without the public profession of spiritual achievements. Have there not always been men and women whose hearts burned within them when He has walked with them by the way?

But if M. Maeterlinck's judgment of the past suffers from his enthusiasm for the present, that does not lessen the beauty of these chapters. Particularly would we recommend the essays on "The Deeper Life," "The Inner Beauty," and that "On Women." In the last named M. Maeterlinck applies his philosophy. If he gives to all women gifts which others would only ascribe to the few, what of that? Do we not all accept the few, and reject the many? And even if his experience is not ours, there before us is the white road winding between the hills to the country beyond, which we would cross but for the chains about our limbs. Nevertheless the new country is there.

"It would seem that women are more largely swayed by destiny than ourselves. They submit to its decrees with far more simplicity; nor is there sincerity in the resistance they offer. They are still nearer to God, and yield themselves with less reserve to the pure workings of the mystery. . . . The woman never forgets the path that leads to the centre of her being. . . . It is as though her soul were ever within call; for by day and night is she prepared to give answer to the loftiest appeals from another soul; and the ransom of the poorest is indistinguishable from the ransom of a queen. . . . There are still the divine emotions of the first days: and the sources of their being lie, deeper far than ours, in all that was illimitable."

The Treasure of the Humble is for the illumination of unprofitable hours. That power it has. The paths of some whose way was obscure before it will make plain, and themselves glad.

A GOOD OLD ENGLISH FAMILY.

The Stapletons of Yorkshire. By H. E. Chetwynd-Stapleton. (Longmans.)

MR. CHETWYND-STAPLETON has given us an interesting and, on the whole, a distinctly workmanlike contribution to genealogical literature. He has traced the story of an ancient and honourable house that for half a dozen centuries played a worthy part in the annals of our land. Stapletons stood at Cressy, at Auray, at Falkirk, possibly at Poitiers, and, though the name is not in the muster-roll, probably at Agincourt. They fell before the Scot at Bannockburn, they "prosecuted the faetha" with interest on Flodden Field and Pinkie Hill; yet in turn it was a Stapleton who led the second line of the Highland army at Culloden. In the various civil wars they fought in sundry fields from Boroughbridge to Towton Moor, and the kin was represented at the first battle of Newbury and on both sides at Edgehill. In official employment, too, we find them: here it was a judge, here a sheriff, there an escheator. In scholarship they provided Juvenal with a translator; in religion they supplied Cromwell with a chaplain.

The backbone of the book is furnished by the records of the family, and this is supplemented by just so much of general history as is needed to render the narrative connected and intelligible. The wise discretion with which the latter element has been kept in hand and strictly subordinated to the main purpose deserves recognition. The author has nowhere succumbed to temptation, and become "chatty" or discursive. He means business, and to business he confines himself throughout. A work of this class, with its heterogeneous mass of details, and its multitude of side-lights that vividly illustrate personal and domestic life from mediæval to modern times, is a valuable adjunct to formal history. Mr. Chetwynd-Stapleton has been careful duly to state the references without which such a book would be valueless, and in most cases where it was requisite these have been to original authorities. Sometimes, however, we are unnecessarily referred to second-hand sources. To object to the latter when they are such as Stubbs or Eyton would, of course, be more than hypercritical; but when we are sent to Hume or to Miss Strickland it becomes quite another thing. Indeed, herein lies the writer's weak point: in the case of modern historians he seems now and then not quite to know where to go. In dealing with the Stuart period, for example, he does not appear to have consulted Mr. Gardiner's works at all. Still, if for some occult reason he was obliged to cite in preference Green or Guizot, a glance at p. 154 of the first volume of Mr. Gardiner's Great Civil War will show him that it was a little hard on the first-named to misquote him in the matter of Hampden, as he has done on p. 264. And thereby hang other tales. We were under the impression, for instance, that the objectionable and unscholarly practice of dubbing all Englishmen who inhabited this island before the Norman Conquest as "Saxons" had gone out of fashion—at any rate, on this side of the Irish Sea; but in these pages we are confronted by "Saxon times," "Saxon villages in Yorkshire," "The Saxons of Northumbria," and ghosts of similar bêtises, which we hoped were not only dead and buried, but laid to rest for ever. And while we are indulging our unpleasant humour we may as well deliver all our soul at once and have done with it. Surely it was hardly worth while to print on pp. 35 and 36 an extremely loose paraphrase by Blaauw of a passage from Le Siège de Karlaerok, the resemblance of which to the original is of the faintest. Surely for "Princess," on p. 29, we should read "Lady," which was the style for daughters of the sovereign till the reign of Henry VIII., and lingered on at least as late as that of James I. Surely, in the absence of any note or explanation touching the use of the word "baronet" prior to 1611, the general reader will be sorely puzzled at seeing "barrinet" in an epitaph of the time of Edward VI. (p. 156).

The beginning of the thirteenth century is the usual term beyond which it becomes extremely difficult to authenticate descent. Roughly speaking, some of our most important aids suddenly fail us about the final years of John's reign, and the first years of Henry III.; for we then reach the earliest limits of organised armory, of definite fixity of hereditary surnames, of the inquisitiones post mortem, of the rolls of arms. And so it is here. Working upwards, the Stapleton pedigree virtually stops at 1208, though there is a strong presumption that it can be carried one generation further back. The Irish branch of the family derive their stock from a Sir John Stapleton, who, it is claimed, was one of the "adventurers" that went over with Strongbow. The evidence adduced is a statement in a Baronetage, but the name does not occur in Regan, nor in Giraldus, nor, so far as our memory serves us, in any other contemporary chronicler. Pages 67 and 307 (line 6 of the pedigree) incidentally help to establish a point of some importance, which it is strange should have escaped notice. The Sir Nicholas Stapleton there treated of is in the Fitz-Williams Roll of Arms, to which Sir Harris Nicolas assigned the approximate date 1337—1350. As Sir Nicholas died in 1343 the estimate is narrowed by nearly one half, to somewhere between 1337 and 1344. We may, perhaps, be allowed also to call the author's attention to one "Thomas de Stapleton, miles," who was a conservator of the border-truce of 1449 (Leges Marchiarum, edited by William [Nicholson], Bishop of Carlisle, 1747, p. 25); and to the quaint description of Sir Miles in the Chronicle of Geoffrey le Baker of Swinbrook, under the year 1356 (p. 139 of Sir E. Maunde Thompson's edition). The reference for the knighting of Sir Richard Stapleton at the accession of Mary Tudor, which is omitted, is MS. Coll. of Arms, i. 7, f. 74. There is an ugly story, by the way, about Sandys, the first Protestant Archbishop of York. It is fairly told, and looks as though it were proved. The illustrations in the volume are by the author, and the only one that is not of interest is that of the Stapleton chantry at North Morton, the sole discernible feature of which is an array of such toys and gew-gaws as usually adorn the east end of Anglican churches of the ritualistic persuasion. Nevertheless, when all is said, there remains a tribute of gratitude to be paid to Mr. Chetwynd-Stapleton for producing an excellent, if not an absolutely perfect, piece of work, and, with Pope, we may fairly allow that "applause, in spite of trivial faults, is due."

THE SECRET ROSE.

The Secret Rose. By W. B. Yeats. With Illustrations by S. B. Yeats. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

It is a hard case when the one right word for a critic to use is a word that has been so hackneyed, so bandied about in vague characterisation, that it has become rightly suspect and almost even tabooed. Yet hackneyed or not, there is only one word which describes the quality of Mr. Yeats's stories, and that is glamour—the glamour of the Celt. His tales have a good deal of talk about magic in them, more, in fact, than is to everybody's taste, for not everybody can be brought to take spirit-raising seriously; but on every page in the book there is proof given of a magic to which all lovers of literature must be submissive—the natural magic of style. Here is no artifice of haziness, no mist of words; rather, the extraordinary thing about these stories is the distinctness with which they bring present to the senses whatever is related. Take, for instance, a few words from the first one, "The Binding of the Hair," which tells of Queen Deetira and the bard Aodh's (Hugh's) last song, upon whose prelude there broke in the alarm for battle.

"Then he took down from a pillar his shield of wicker and hide, and his bronze helmet and sword, and passed among the crowd that went shouting through the wide door; and there was no one left in the room except the queen and her women and the foolish king, who slept on, with his head against a pillar."

How that conjures up the sense of desolation and vastness in the hall that a moment before had been crowded; one seems to feel the noise of feet dying away. It is all distinct, but with the distinctness of a dream; and Mr. Yeats's utterance is, like Aodh's, "dream-heavy." The thing is done partly by a singular felicity of comparison, as in this phrase: "A very old man, whose face was almost as fleshless as the foot of a bird"; but chiefly by the distinctness of the artist's own vision. Yet this constant appeal to the eye is never allowed to predominate or to mask the central thought which each study conveys, as, for instance, "The Heart of the Spring," which sets out the aspiration of the alchemist and life's ironic commentary upon it. Dreamy as the stories are, they are not fantastic; their characters act with human coherency. Mr. Yeats is fond of the supernatural: in "The Curse of the Fires and of the Shadows" he has introduced it for his own pleasure since in the tradition it was no one of the Shee who led the five Cromwellians to their fatal gallop over the precipice, but a simple peasant. Yet we like him best when he does not stir outside of the human pale. "The Crucifixion of the Outcast" is a grim tale of the way in which respectable folk dealt with the strolling gleeman when respectability had full power to make itself respected; we suspect an apologue. Anyhow, this is one of the only two stories in the book touched with the humour that made Celtic Twilight so delightful. The other is by far the best of them all, the tale or series of tales relating to the adventures of Owen Hanrahan the Red, last of the Gaelic singers in Ireland. Here is a splendid touch. The poet whose power over women had been not less than his passion for them sees a girl crying, and offers help:

"My father and my mother and my brothers," she went on, "are marrying me to old Paddy Doe because of the hundred acres he rents under the mountain, and I would have you put him into a rhyme as you put old Peter Kilmartin in the days when you were young, that sorrow may be over him, rising up and lying down."

"I will put him into a little song that shall bring shame and sorrow over him; but how many years has he, for I would put them into a song?"

"Oh, he has years upon years—he is as old as you are, Owen Hanrahan."

"As old as me," said Hanrahan, in a broken voice. "There are twenty years between him and me if there is a day. An evil hour has come for Owen Hanrahan when a colleen with a cheek like the blossom of May thinks him an old man. Colleen, colleen, an arrow is in my heart."

Beautiful as is the "Vision of Owen Hanrahan" with its fine symbolism, there is nothing in it worth that. But beautiful it is, a new and genuine inspiration from the old mythology of the Gael. The old gods are no more dead for Mr. Yeats than were Pan and Apollo for Milton. "When one looks into the darkness," he says in his preface, there is always something there." Most of us look very little into the dark; and we are inclined to retort that those who look into the dark see nothing but fancies. Yet such a book as this makes one ponder whether the light of common day does not blind us to many starry presences. For all that we have no patience with the last and longest story, "Rosa Alchemica," which is totally distinct from the rest and resembles the recital of an opium-dream. Like everything else in the book, however, it is beautifully written—in long, slow, undulating sentences, easy and sinuous in their progress as the motion of a serpent.

The illustrations are admirable. There are not many points of likeness between Mr. Yeats and Mr. Kipling; but each has a father who draws beautiful pictures for his son's books. Print and paper leave nothing to be desired; but it was a pity to use ridged not smooth material for the binding, as it impairs the effect of Miss Gyles's intricate symbolic design for the cover—a model of decorative work.

MILLET.

Jean François Millet; his Life and Letters
By Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Henry Ady).
(Swan Sonnenschein & Co.)

It is difficult for those who love Millet and his work to have too much of him. Every new thing we hear, every new touch we see, confirms what we know, adds something to the completeness of the picture we have formed of him in our minds. This picture has really been drawn by the artist himself in that powerful fragment of biography and those numerous letters of his. In these the outlines of his life and character, the broad, simple illumination of his soul, stand out grandly like one of his own crayons. The proportion, the expression, the humble but sublime truth, are all there, and can be altered by no addition to our knowledge, for they are the impress of the man himself, as of a foot in the sand. This picture of him as drawn by himself in words is but a reflection of the personality we divine from his designs, for never were the man and the artist more identical; and as he was in himself so did he appear to others. To Sensier, who knew him all his life, to M. Piedganel, and other more or less casual visitors, he appeared essentially the same grave grand being, worthy of all love and admiration, almost of worship, so possessed was he by a noble purpose, so heroic and constant in its pursuit.

Since the appearance of the Life by Sensier and Mantz, a number of interesting memorials of Millet have been published in various quarters, and many valuable critical papers have been written, and it is quite time that all these, or the essence of them, should be gathered together in one work. Mrs. Ady has done her best to make her book complete as far as facts are concerned, and has also gleaned on her own account from "members of his family and personal friends," so that from a biographical point of view her work may be regarded as nearly final. It is a pity that in her preface she did not state distinctly what additions she has made to the already published material; but they do not seem to be of any great importance. The credit, and it is no little credit, that is due to her work, is that she has arranged and presented her material so as to produce a fuller and truer picture of the great painter-poet than has been done before, and has shown us that his life, if not "gay" in the ordinary sense, was full of deep happiness, and that his constant and sometimes terrible struggles with poverty, the long neglect of his genius and the ridicule and disappointment which he had to endure, never shook his confidence in himself and the truth of his principles. His life was a long battle, but he was never without a small but solid band of friends, and his domestic peace was invaded only by such sickness and death as are common to all humanity. His life was perhaps shortened by his sufferings, but he at least lived long enough to win his battle. If we should call no man happy, neither should we call any man unhappy until the end of life, when the ounces of sweet can be weighed against the pounds of sour.

Are there many, one wonders, who would now dispute Millet's claim to be a great artist? It does not much matter what we call such a man or what faults we may find in his work. We may admit that he was not a great colourist, we may allow that his handling was often rough, and compare him to his disadvantage with other great masters in this or that quality, but he yet remains one of them—as alone and supreme in his way as Michel-Angelo or Rembrandt in theirs. Nor are those defects to which we refer any other than the defects of his qualities—necessary factors of that unique and powerful personality which alone could have produced "The Sower" and "The Angelus." There is, perhaps, no artist whose work, be it only a rough study of a shepherdess, suffers more from the slightest alteration. Of all the many excellent engravings from his pictures or drawings we know scarcely one which does not let out the life of it, except those few wood-engravings which were cut by his brother from lines drawn by himself; and there is not one of the highly finished etchings from the Angelus which does not polish away half its grandeur and solemnity. The spirit of his art is engrained in his touch.

But this is scarcely the occasion to speak of Millet's art. As Mrs. Ady reminds us, he has been well praised—was well praised even before he became famous; and she herself has praised him well also:

"The range of art," she says in her concluding words, "is for ever widened by this man's genius. Never again can we look on those hewers of wood and drawers of water, never again can we see the sower scattering his seed, or the gleaners stooping to gather the ripened corn, without recalling the majestic forms of Millet's types. His place with the immortals is sure. His fame rests on secure foundations, and his work, modern as it is to the core, has more of the true Greek spirit than any other of our age. His pictures of seed-time and harvest, of morning and evening will rank with the great art of all time—with the frieze of the Parthenon and with the frescoes of Michel-Angelo."

Prophecy is always dangerous, and a day may come when neither Millet nor Michel-Angelo will appeal to mortals, but this day is, it may be hoped, far distant, and, at any rate, we may be glad that we have not seen it; and that there are still some of us who view the expression of great ideas as the noblest employment of art, and can feel the grandeur of the human form and the eloquent beauty of its movements, whether they are carved by Pheidias or drawn by Millet.

PHILOSOPHY v. SCIENCE.

Man's Place in Nature, and other Essays. By Andrew Seth. (Blackwood.)

WITH the somewhat important exception of the second part of "The New Psychology and Automatism," which is now printed for the first time, all the papers comprised in this volume have already appeared either in Blackwood, The Contemporary, or The Philosophical Review. They are almost exclusively of a critical character, dealing with some of the chief contributions to philosophical studies that have been published during the last six years—that is, since the author's appointment to the chair of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh, in 1891. Although the book thus lacks formal unity, its heterogeneous contents acquire a certain consistency from the uniform metaphysical spirit which animates them, which, as might be expected from the author's official position, is itself a faithful reflex of the traditions of the Scottish School of Philosophy. Hence uncompromising antagonism to the new views of the universe, of man and of ethics suggested by evolutionary doctrines, is conspicuous on every page, and the student of philosophy is not startled when he reads that

"man as the subject of duty, and the heir of immortal hopes, is restored by Kant to that central position in the universe from which, as a merely physical being, Copernicus had degraded him" (p. 32).

Here is the true note of the orthodox metaphysician. Man "degraded" by the progress of science, which, for the Ptolemaic and Biblical geocentric, substitutes the rational heliocentric solar system of Copernicus! It will readily be allowed that Prof. Seth has at least the courage of his opinions, although he is fain to admit that this venerable "anthropocentric" view of things must to a certain extent "remain a conviction rather than a demonstration." But then it becomes all the more difficult to appreciate the courage with which philosophy—speculation—which leads only to "convictions" is made the arbiter of science which claims to "demonstrate." Indeed, this de haut en bas view of the rôle of philosophy in its relation to the scientific method is apt to become slightly irritating, as when we are told that "it is the most indefensible function of philosophy to act as critic of the sciences. The philosopher has to examine the conceptions which each science accepts without criticism; he has to point out the limits or conditions within which the conception or theory holds true. In other words, he has to restrain the ardour of the specialist who would build upon his results a philosophic theory of the universe," and so forth.

To build up a theory of the universe is about the best thing aimed at by the specialist, though it is the common ambition of all philosophic systems. The respective rôles are here reversed, and it is forgotten that philosophy is and always must be essentially polemical. It starts with some cut-and-dry theory which has to be maintained deductively against all rival theories; hence, like the French Revolution, it "devours its own children." Science, on the contrary, being indifferent to any theory, seeks only the truth mainly by the inductive method, rejects foregone conclusions, continually verifies its facts, and thus gradually builds up a system by the study not of the self, but of the environment of which the self is the outcome. This is why old Friar Bacon dared to assert, in the days of prepotent dogmatism, that observation was the "domina scientiarum omnium, et finis totius speculationis."

We are told, indeed, that the criticism of past philosophies "should not be purely negative," and that past systems may become "so many stepping-stones on which we rise to fuller and clearer insight." But the naturalist, who is here severely handled, may well retort that the pursuit of these metaphysical studies has thrown the author himself back upon Aristotle's theory of final causes and consequent teleology, which is restored to all its pristine honours, and vehemently defended against Spencerian and Darwinian views of development. In a true philosophy the first point is "the necessity of a teleological view of the universe," a view which, with Trendelenburg, is here made directly antithetical to the mechanical standpoint. Philosophical truth "lies altogether with the teleological point of view. Any system which abandons this point of view lapses thereby from philosophy to science" (p. 57). In a word, the doctrine that all change is conditioned by natural causes is regarded as gross materialism, while the presumptuous interpretation of such change in the light of the Divine Will is held up as the highest wisdom. Yet the history of philosophic thought makes it evident enough that this "lapse" from science to metaphysics, this arrest of human progress for nearly two thousand years, was largely brought about by Aristotle's disastrous discovery of final causes.

It is right to say that Prof. Seth treats all his opponents with marked courtesy and fairness. Their views are fully stated in as clear, if not in quite as vigorous, language as his attempted refutations. Hence the reader will here find a pleasant exposition of the general line of argument, and of the strong and weak points in Huxley's famous Romanes lecture on "Evolution and Ethics"; in Münsterberg's Willenshandlung, which is an analysis of the act of will (unconscious will) from the mechanical standpoint; in Mr. F. H. Bradley's Appearance and Reality, which constitutes a new and instructive theory of the Absolute; and in Mr. Balfour's Foundations of Belief, which is here studied in connexion with his previous work, a Defence of Philosophic Doubt (1879).

Prof. Seth should supply an index, if a second edition of these essays be called for.

PROF. FREEMAN'S TRAVELS.

Sketches of Travel in Normandy and Maine. By Edward A. Freeman. With a Preface by W. H. Hutton. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE late Prof. Freeman was an indefatigable traveller. An indefatigable writer also, he was in the habit, while his impressions were still fresh, of working them up into contributions for the Saturday Review in the sixties and in the nineties for the Guardian. Two or three volumes of these sketches have already been published. Those contained in the present volume date from three journeys undertaken in connexion with his Norman Conquest and William Rufus, and with a projected work on Henry the First, for with Freeman travel was always an essential part of historical study.

"Beyond doubt the finished historian must be a traveller; he must see with his own eyes the true look of a wide land; he must see, too, with his eyes the very spots where great events happened; he must mark the lie of a city, and take in, so far as a non-technical eye can, all that is special about a battle-field."

Just as we find him "stepping out Sicily" for himself, so we find him in Normandy and Maine curious of every nook and corner, every fragment of ruined wall or filled-in ditch which has the remotest historical bearing upon his great subject. He follows the traces of the Conqueror from Falaise, where "Arletta's pretty feet twinkling in the brook made her the mother of William the Bastard," to Mantes, where, on that fatal day, William "did a rueful thing, and more ruefully it him befel"; he haunts the abbey of "the kindly, gossiping, rambling old monk," Ordericus Vitalis, the "tenellus exsul" from England at Saint-Evroul; he studies the battle of Tinchebray on the spot with a copy of the Abbé Dumaine's history in three volumes; he makes his pilgrimage to La Lande-Patray, as he himself confesses, with the purpose of getting "a better understanding of a single sentence of the Roman de Rou." And all this he does with a robust interest and an avidity for knowledge which may well be the despair of many a younger scholar.

Well, this is one kind of travel; and if one had Freeman's knowledge, Freeman's method is admirably calculated to turn a holiday trip into a liberal education. But then we are not all specialists upon the eleventh century, and for those of us who are not the companionship of the professor's book will prove somewhat exacting and severe. He was not in the least a pedant by nature; he had far too much humour for that, and too much humanity; but in this book at least he is a little uncompromising in his assumption that the erudition of his readers is more or less on a level with his own. His enormous and minute knowledge of architecture, for instance, is bewildering to the less expert, who have perhaps forgotten, if they ever knew, what a "discontinuous impost" is, and who are hardly helped to realise Quereville by a comparison with "the little church of Montmajour, near Arles." Moreover, there is a class of travellers—to which we frankly confess ourselves to belong—who, when they go abroad, prefer, on the whole, to forget even what scanty pretensions to scholarship they may have, to put off the intellectual man, and to surrender themselves for the time to visual impressions and to the education, no less real but less deliberate, of a new atmosphere. To such the notion of attacking Tinchebray with three volumes of the Abbé Dumaine would be repellent; the memory of the white-ankled Arletta is less to them than the vision of a peasant hoeing his potatoes in sabots and a blue blouse; they are content to glean what history and antiquities they can with the aid of an uninstructed eye and a Baedeker's guide-book, and for the rest to wander among vineyards and queer courtyards, to attend mass, to sit in cafés, and to catch the savour of an unfamiliar, an alien life. Such will find little to their taste in Prof. Freeman, racy and vigorous as his way of writing is. For foreign life, indeed, as life, he seems to have cared but little, rejoicing in Normandy partly because it was so thoroughly English, glad of hedges to the fields, and of "cider" instead of thin wine, and of anything in the shape of a meal which reminded him of beef-steak. Whether you care for the book as a guide or not, it recalls to those who knew Freeman a most genial and inspiring personality, a fine example both as man and as student. It is introduced by a somewhat unnecessary preface from Mr. W. H. Hutton, and is illustrated by drawings of Freeman's own, in which one fears that perspective must have been sacrificed to accuracy of architectural detail.

BALI, LOMBOCK, AND THE SASSAKS.

With the Dutch in the East: An Outline of the Military Operations in Lombok, 1894. By Capt. W. Cool. Translated from the Dutch by E. J. Taylor. (Luzac.)

Lombok would have few claims to attention were its importance estimated by its size. It forms but a small link in the long chain of volcanic lands, which sweep round from Sumatra through Java to Timor. But for students of the distribution of organic forms on the globe it has become a sort of classic land, ever since Mr. A. R. Wallace drew his famous parting-line between the Indo-Malayan and Austro-Malayan biological regions through the narrow strait separating it from Bali. To folklorists and students of primitive religions it had always presented many attractive features, and these attractions are likely to be increased since the island has been brought under the direct administration of Holland by the war of 1894. How this important change has been brought about is fully related in the present volume, an English translation of which would, however, scarcely be justified but for the copious ethnological data with which the author has fortunately relieved his somewhat tedious account of the events preceding and accompanying the military operations, by which an end was at last put to the oppressive rule of the Balinese Hindu section over the far more numerous Mohammedan Sassak aborigines.

To understand the peculiar interest attaching to the social and religious relations in Bali and Lombok, for in this respect the two islands are inseparable, it should be remembered that Hinduism, at one time dominant throughout the greater part of the Eastern Archipelago, was gradually driven out either by a revival of the never extinct primitive heathendom, or by the spread of Islam, everywhere except in Bali. Here a strange fusion of Brahminical and Buddhist forms, further leavened by the original nature-worship, not only held its ground, but was even powerful enough to encroach upon the Mohammedan domain already established among the Sassaks of Lombok, probably over three hundred years ago. Since the close of the seventeenth century the Hindu Balinese have been politically and socially dominant in this island, and have even extended their power at times eastwards to Sumbawa. The consequence is that, while Islam reigns supreme in Java, formerly the great stronghold of Hinduism, the three western members of the Lesser Sundanese group present the strange and instructive spectacle of religious communities living in the closest contact, yet professing every form of belief from the grossest anthropomorphism to the purest monotheism. It is the same with the cultures, and general social conditions which show an almost unbroken transition from the savagery of Sumbawa to the relative degrees of refinement reached by the natives of Lombok and, especially, of Bali. Here, however, owing to the unfavourable political relations, a retrograde movement is perceptible in the crumbling temples, grass-grown highways, and neglected homesteads. But in all cases it is patent enough that

"just as Hinduism has only touched the outer surface of their religion, it has failed to penetrate into their social institutions, which, like their gods, originate from the time when Polynesian heathendom was all powerful" (p. 139).

Folklorists will be much interested in the local traditions here recorded on the way these foreign gods took possession of the Lesser Sundanese Islands, after their expulsion from Java by the Mussulman invaders in the fifteenth century. It appears that the Hindu deities were greatly incensed at the introduction of the Koran, and in order to avoid contact with the "foreign devils" moved eastwards with the intention of setting up their throne in Bali. But Bali already possessed its own gods, the wicked Rakshasas, who fiercely resented the intrusion, but who were ultimately annihilated all but the still reigning Mraya Dawana. Then the new thrones had to be erected on heights, as in Java; but at that time there were no mountains in Bali, which was a very flat country, and to meet the difficulty the four hills at the eastern extremity of Java had to be transferred to their new dominion. The Gunong-Agong, highest of the four, was set down in the east and became the Olympus of Bali, while the other three were placed in the west, south, and north, and assigned to the different gods according to their respective ranks. And thus were at once explained the local theogony and the present physical features of the island.

For the further peregrinations of the Hindu pantheon to Lombok and their struggles with the Mohammedan Sassaks the reader must be referred to the work under notice. Here he will also find a detailed account of the now happily terminated misrule of the Balinese dynasty, and how the lately deposed raja

"reigned as an autocratic despot, sucking out the very life-blood of his [Mussulman] subjects, living in splendour and dissipation bought at the cost of so much hardship and injustice, and . . . becoming more brutal and barbarous year by year" (p. 143).

The author is somewhat puzzled to reconcile these misdeeds with the mild precepts of the Hindu religion; but it need scarcely be remarked that Lombeck is not the only place where religious theory and practice are at variance.

Despite one or two solecisms, Mr. Taylor's version deserves a word of recognition, and the general equipment of the book is creditable to the Amsterdam press, although some of the numerous illustrations by Herr G. B. Hooyer leave something to be desired from the artistic standpoint. There is a good index, but a poor map of Lombeck, not even drawn to scale.

HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY.

A Historical Geography of the British Colonies.

By C. P. Lucas, B.A., of Balliol College and the Colonial Office. Vol. IV.: South and East Africa. In two separate parts: I. Historical; II. Geographical. (Clarendon Press.)

AMONG the innumerable swarm of books and pamphlets on South Africa which give each other the lie more or less direct on every bookstall, it is a pleasure to come upon a work of solid historical value, full of sound and luminous political reflection, and based upon accurate knowledge. Mr. Lucas has already proved by his earlier volumes that he can make even geography readable. But in this book the geography is railed off into a second volume, and people will be inclined to read only the first, which recounts the history of South Africa since white men set foot there. Its value is twofold. First, it narrates clearly and concisely the actual events of South Africa's history, which have been few, and its constitutional changes, which have been many. It traces out the steps by which there grew up round the Dutch trading outpost a population of farmers who rather assimilated themselves to the native life than brought in European ways: it tells how the Cape passed to England and became a real colony; it narrates the different extensions of the border and the wars they involved; the advances and the retrogressions of the English flag, and the progressive emancipation of the colony from home control. Each step in the progress by which the different constituent parts of South Africa have reached their present status is clearly recorded. But, secondly, the work has an interest rarer and greater than that of a mere historical record, however lucidly written. Mr. Lucas has a singular power of seeing two sides of a question. So with a skilful hand he analyses the moral difficulty which is at the root of the South African tangle. Are the British and Dutch races hopelessly and irrevocably hostile? that is practically the question which everybody, including the Parliamentary committee, is trying to answer. Mr. Lucas contributes to the solution a historical study of the Boers. No one could praise more eloquently the race from which they spring; but the Boers are Dutchmen with a difference, Dutchmen, as he says, "run wild." He shows clearly how this race, tenacious of the old, suspicious of the new, and doggedly stubborn against compulsion, has been in South Africa secluded from the course of events, unaffected by the ferment of ideas, a century behind Europe in its beliefs. In upon it breaks European civilisation, with its virtues and vices of the newest type, humanitarian and speculative; and the Boers set up their bristles in stubborn antagonism. Once to realise how natural it is for the Boers to be what they are is to see the necessity of patience. But in the meantime the Boers are not on our intellectual level, and one moral is plain to Mr. Lucas. The course of our African policy has been vacillation. Savages will never understand that the power which does not chastise aggression may be restrained by another motive than fear, and in this matter the Boers are not very different from Zulus. Whatever is done in Africa, there must be no more undoing, no more going back. Mr. Lucas's book is salutary reading, alike for the people who are impatient with a state that still grants monopolies and limits naturalisation, and for those who believe in the universal efficacy of a soft answer—even to kicks. And no one can read it without admiring a style that is weighty without ever being ponderous, and often rises to eloquence, but never sinks into rhetoric.

THE LITERATURE OF MUSIC.

"THE BOOK-LOVER'S LIBRARY."—The Literature of Music. By J. E. Matthew. (Elliot Stock.)

THE author of this little book felt at first doubtful whether he could treat so large a subject in so small a space. His task certainly was by no means an easy one, and the work of compression has been cleverly managed. The arrangements, too, are good. There are chapters on the literature of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, but there is no special chapter on that of the nineteenth. Some works on music of the present century are, however, noticed under various headings: histories under "Histories of Music," dictionaries under "Dictionaries of Music," and so on; still many remain unnoticed, such as Day's "Harmony," or Berlioz' Mémoires, &c. Mr. Matthew in his preface mentions topics which it has been necessary to pass by entirely; and this statement one must accept as an explanation of any omissions. He, however, deserves praise for this first attempt at a work on the literature of music.

The chapter on early printed works is excellent; in addition to naming books, our author manages to give an outline of their contents. In mentioning the Micrologus of Ornithoparcus he quotes an amusing sentence from the translation of that work by the eminent lutenist John Dowland. It runs thus: "The English doe carroll; the French sing; the Spaniards weepe; the Italians which dwell about the coasts of Janua (Genoa?) caper with their voyces; the others barke; but the Germanes (which I am ashamed to utter) doe howle like wolves." In the following chapter he speaks of the El Melopeo of Pedro Cerone as a work "among the scarcest in musical literature. He mentions one copy formerly in the possession of the late Mr. John Bishop, of Cheltenham, and another "lying before the writer as he pens this notice." We would also add that there is a copy in the library of the late Rev. Sir F. Arthur Gore Ouseley, at St. Michael's College, Tenbury. In the chapter "Histories of Music—Biography," it is stated that the materials collected by J. N. Forkel for a third volume of his Allgemeine Geschichte für Musik were offered, after the author's death in 1818, to Choron and to Fêtes. Dr. Hugo Riemann in his Musik-Lexikon—a work, by the way, not alluded to in any part of Mr. Matthew's book—states that they were handed over to the publisher Schwickert. In noticing Dr. Langhan's Geschichte der Musik our writer suggests that an English translation would be a boon to many students, and this statement we cordially endorse.

Reference is made to the catalogue of MS. music in the British Museum drawn up by Mr. T. Oliphant; and we are told that the proposal to print a catalogue of all the music in the British Museum down to the year 1800 "appears to be in abeyance." Regret, too, is expressed that the time of the "accomplished gentlemen" who preside over the music should be mainly occupied in "cataloguing the last set of waltzes or the vulgar inanities of the music-hall—no doubt a sad necessity, but surely a task within the powers of an intelligent lad." We doubt whether our author is quite correctly informed as to the manner in which these "gentlemen" spend the greater part of their time. Mr. Matthews's suggestion that an intelligent lad should undertake the task might be useful to music-hall artistes, but such occupation would be scarce likely to improve the artistic tastes of the youth. The catalogue of the library of the richest nation in the world is decidedly capable of improvement, as all who have to consult its pages are well aware; and if the music catalogue were only as good as that of the books musicians would be thankful.

In the best regulated books mistakes will occur; and in view of a second edition we will mention one or two which have attracted our notice in reading. Mr. R. A. Streatfeild's name is spelt Streatfield. Sir George Grove, again, is made responsible for the article "Schumann" in the Dictionary of Music and Musicians; that article, however, was written by Dr. Philipp Spitta. Complaint, by the way, is made of the want of proportion in the length of articles in this Dictionary, and the editor is pointed out as the chief offender. Schumann once described Schubert's lengths as "heavenly"; and surely musicians who have read and profited by the articles "Beethoven," "Schubert," and "Mendelssohn" must feel that their lengths are more than atoned for by their great value and interest. There are times when criticism, however just, seems out of place.

Among catalogues of compositions the Verzeichniss des musikalischen Nachlasses des verstorbenen Capellmeisters C. P. E. Bach (published at Hamburg in 1790) might have been mentioned. We are told "that no printed thematic catalogue exists of the works of Haydn." No complete catalogue, certainly, has been issued; yet C. F. Pohl in his second volume of his Life of Haydn gave a thematic catalogue up to the period when Haydn first went to London. The death of the author unfortunately prevented the completion of that work.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Majolica. By C. Drury E. Fortnum. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

THIS is a book to which all lovers of the many beautiful wares which are comprehended in its title have been long looking forward. Fifteen years have passed since Mr. Fortnum wrote his well-known descriptive catalogue of the collection of majolica in the South Kensington Museum; and the present volume is sufficient witness that his interest in the subject has not slackened in the interval. Though mainly concerned with the wares of Italy, it traces the history of glazed and painted pottery from its origin in Egypt, Babylonia, and Persia, to its later developments in Damascus and Rhodes, in Sicily and Spain, and it even glances at the famous porcelain of the Medici, although that most interesting and beautiful fabric hardly comes within the title of the book. There is scarcely any branch of art which has been more carefully studied, or on which more light has been thrown by researches in recent years. The discoveries of Mr. Petrie in the Fayoum, Mr. Wallis at Fostat, and M. Dieulafoy at Susa, are only a few instances in which excavation has made important additions to existing knowledge of ancient Oriental ceramics; and with regard to more modern and European "majolica," the names of those who have laboured in the field are almost legion. Mr. Fortnum has not only kept himself au courant with the literature of his subject, but he has also maintained his position as a connoisseur and an authority. There are few men who could match either his knowledge or his taste; few experts competent even to review this splendid volume. Here we can only call attention to its importance, and the admirable manner in which it has been produced. We only wish that all the illustrations had been coloured, like the frontispiece.

The Outgoing Turk. By H. C. Thomson. (William Heinemann.)

MR. THOMSON'S title is somewhat misleading, though he is careful to explain in the preface that "Turk" is used in the sense of "Osmanli official." Moreover, the book has to do not with the provinces from which the Turkish officials are going, but with those from which they have gone, for it is in reality an account of recent travel in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which are now administered by Austria—the Turkish officials having gone bag and baggage. Mr. Thomson does justice to the great work which Austria, through Herr von Kallay, has done in Bosnia, where the Moslems number about half the population, and where it would consequently have been impossible to erect an autonomous state. What Austria has accomplished can only be realised by those who remember what the province was in 1878, and Mr. Thomson's travels and inquiries show very clearly how beneficent the seventeen or eighteen years of firm rule have been. The book is very interesting and informing so far as it relates to Bosnia and Herzegovina, but the last few chapters, which deal with the present situation in the Balkans, are not quite so happy. Of the provinces now occupied by Austria the author writes with knowledge, but he does not appear to have much personal experience of Albania and Macedonia, and his speculations on the policies of England, Austria, and Russia with relation to the matters which are now agitating the peninsula are not so valuable as his remarks in the earlier and more important of his chapters. Incidentally, Mr. Thomson's account of Austrian administration in Bosnia will in many places provide a clue to the future of the Turkish empire, and of the destiny of the yet unappropriated portions when the inevitable crash occurs.

Household Economics; a Course of Lectures in the School of Economics of the University of Wisconsin. By Helen Campbell. (Putnam's Sons.)

PREMISING that there is nothing facetious about Household Economics, why as we read it do we smile against our will? Perhaps because it is so deadly serious; also it begins so very much at the beginning. "What is a house?" asks Mrs. Helen Campbell in chap. ii.; and then we have quotations from Mariana in the Moated Grange, Poe's House of Usher, The House of the Seven Gables, and "a little book by E. Gardner, of Springfield, Mass.," entitled The House that Jill Built, to illustrate the relation of the House to human life. Mrs. Helen Campbell is a sort of domestic Drummond, bent upon showing that the House is not out of date in an age of Science. Thus we have the sub-headings: "Organic Structure of the House with its Evolution," "The Kitchen and Derivatives," "Relation of Differentiation and Specialisation in Building to the Same Processes in Social Evolution," "The Rudimentary Shop." But that she may not seem altogether to have parted company with the old wisdom, the chapter on "Cleaning and its Processes" begins: "Cleanliness is next to godliness." A certain professorial pomposity apart, these lectures are really a useful and interesting series of instructions upon decoration, furnishing, cooking, cleaning, and the great servant question. Also, on behalf of her sex, Mrs. Campbell demands Emancipation in general, but not from the duty of ordering dinner.

Picturesque Burma Past and Present. By Mrs. Ernest Hart. (J. M. Dent.)

A TOUR through Burma in the spring of 1895, Mrs. Hart in her preface tells us, was the origin of this handsome volume. The writer seems to have made excellent use of her opportunities. She saw everything and found out all about it; then she came home and wrote it down. The title she has selected does her work injustice to this extent: that she has by no means suffered herself to be confined within the limits of "picturesque" description. She has learned much of the people's mind, both as it expresses itself in their social order and as it is exemplified in their history. As an observer of social phenomena, and especially of the progress of European reforms and conventions, she shows a mind admirably balanced between sentiment and common sense. She cannot but regret the impending disappearance of the gay insouciance which "would rather share than hold, and saw in content something holier than successful strife"; nevertheless, she has faith that "to be passed under the rule of the English, to be freed from tyranny, to be taught good government is a happy fate for Burma." Her account of the emancipated condition of the Burmese women is of importance. A large number of photographs are reproduced; there are maps, and a good index.

St. Mark's Indebtedness to St. Matthew. By F. P. Badham, M.A. (Fisher Unwin.)

WE quoted with approval some weeks ago Dr. Salmon's expressed opinion that the question of the inter-relations of the Synoptists had its roots deep down in the science of Biblical criticism at large, and that nothing final would be accomplished in the matter of reconstructing the text of the New Testament until those relations should have been determined. It is with pleasure, therefore, that we find Mr. Badham resolutely devoting himself, in the little book before us, to an exhaustive inquiry into one branch of the subject—the question of the measure in which the Second Gospel is derived from the First. In spite of the number of critics who maintain the superiority of St. Mark as an original document, a number which still grows, Mr. Badham is very strongly assured that the contradictory proposition is nearer to fact; and for his opinion he marshals sixteen chapters full of arguments, the cumulative force of which, if not final, is very grave. His reasons, it is hardly necessary to say, do not all of them appear for the first time, but it is interesting to note how the writer treats the hard-worked argument in graphic touches so abundant in the book.

"Consider [he writes] the frequently trivial character of the details. . . . With the phenomena of the Apocryphal Gospels before us it ought surely to be reckoned a sign of decadence that our Second Evangelist dilates so exuberantly on the Gadarene's ferocity and the epileptic's paroxysm. . . . We have little more reason to assume that our author was independent than to infer from the ordinary uncanonical details of a sacred picture that the artist had exceptional sources of information."

Mr. Badham has a clear head and a good critical instinct. The later eschatology of St. Mark, the un-Judaic character of his narrative, the glosses and inflation, two passages in which St. Matthew's narrative appears in a corrected form in St. Mark, are a few of the heads under which the subject is handled. The author's style is singularly concise and lucid.

FICTION.

Patience Sparhawk and Her Times. By Gertrude Atherton. (John Lane.)

DURING these two or three years certain social sketches published in Vanity Fair over the signature of Mrs. Atherton have indicated the settlement in our midst of an American writer of much promise. Now comes the novel. It cannot be denied that, upon the whole, the promise is fulfilled. In one of its many aspects the book invites, and indeed deserves, ridicule. It is ridiculous as the embodiment of Mrs. Atherton's philosophical proposition about the women of America. These dames and damsels may really be struggling to be free from the conventions which keep society decent and girlhood charming; but we cannot believe that they will ever, as a class, settle down into the humourless hetairism in which practically all the characters of this book spend the mid period of the romance. Mrs. Atherton's philosophy of the American woman need not, however, trouble us long. It springs from an excess of zeal, and may be overlooked. The story itself is fresh and arresting. Patience Sparhawk is at school when we make her acquaintance. Her father is dead, and her mother is given to drink and wantoning; and, young as she is, Patience, who has a sensitive soul, is bitterly at issue with the world. Dreary this state of affairs undoubtedly is; but it is treated with extraordinary skill. So keenly sympathetic is Mrs. Atherton's study of the strange rural life in America, that we follow her for many chapters with a very unusual interest. Her perceptions are acute, and her reflections are extraordinarily well phrased. Nor does the work fall off when, having tried to kill her mother, Patience leaves home for the great city. There she is taken charge of by two maiden relations, whose evangelical activities George Eliot herself could scarce have depicted with finer art. Meanwhile, Patience has been developing. Her Spanish nature has blossomed into a critical, reticent hauteur, and she has become beautiful. There ends Mrs. Atherton's essay in real literature. The love-making and the wedlocks which follow will not bear examination. The book reveals an unusual perspicacity as regards women; but Mrs. Atherton's men are not good. With the exception of the two editors under whose joint auspices Patience becomes a "newspaper woman," the male characters in the book are unnatural. Finally, being suspected of having poisoned her husband, Patience is condemned to death. Thereupon the novelist finds her proper pace again, and the pace is rapid. Times without record the same situation has been made use of by sensational writers; but we should be surprised to learn that it has ever been more effectively treated than it is in this novel. The narrative flies before our eyes as fast as the special train which is bearing the reprieve, and a new lover, to the gaol in which the heroine is about to be "electrocuted." It is not literature of a high kind; but, such as it is, it is brilliant.

Magnhild and Dust. By Björnsterne Björnson. Translated from the Norwegian. (Heinemann.)

"Magnhild," says Mr. Edmund Gosse in a note prefixed to the present translation, "was originally published in Copenhagen in October, 1877." The importance of this remark will, we think, strike anyone who now reads the story for the first time. It is written with all Björnson's well-known ability. It is vivid. It is impressive in a way. But it is all ancient history now. A few years ago the Norwegian wife who could not get on with her husband and the Norwegian husband who did not understand his wife were, to many people, very interesting figures. But those years are past. What we may call the Scandinavian fever has to a great extent abated. Those uncomfortable households of grotesque people, all nerves and malaise and egotism, have become at least familiar, if not actually tiresome. Therefore, though we are quite willing to believe, on the authority of Mr. Gosse, that Magnhild "produced a violent impression in Scandinavia" in 1877, we doubt if its publication in English twenty years later is likely to move anybody very much one way or the other. Magnhild is a victim to that morbid egotism to which the women of Norwegian novels are usually a prey. She has the customary inability to accept the hard facts of life and make the best of them. She lives among the usual throng of monsters, mental or physical, who are sketched with Björnson's painful and perhaps inartistic minuteness. The actions of the various characters in the story are generally preposterous if not maniacal, and altogether the effect which it produces is one of unrelieved gloom and depression. We would not for a moment be understood to underestimate the cleverness with which it is written, nor do we assert that it is untrue to life—in Norway. Other places other manners. But we do venture to maintain that it is not very agreeable reading. The sombre dead-level of squalour and horror with which it deals would be apt to get on one's nerves, and the feckless, shiftless, slatternly Magnhild is, we hope, a character more likely to excite impatience than sympathy in the breast of the healthy British maiden. Probably it would be better if she did not read about her at all. We admit, then, the cleverness of the book, perhaps even its utility—in 1877 (it was conceived, we imagine, in the missionary spirit); but we question whether, in this year of grace, it was worth translating. Dust, the other story in the volume, is also gloomy, but not quite so revolting. The translation is very satisfactory.

A Prince of Tyrone. By Charlotte Fennell and J. P. O'Callaghan. (Blackwood.)

AN Irish historical novel of real merit has at last appeared. A Prince of Tyrone is a notable book, and the joint authors of it are the more to be congratulated because, while they have produced a story that will delight mere novel-readers, they have, on the whole, adhered with praiseworthy fidelity to the historical events which are the basis of their fiction. The novel contains little that is not set forth in the chapter on Shane O'Neill in the scholarly little manual which, meeting, as it does, a want long felt by men and women, is—with, perhaps, unintentional humour—published in Mr. Unwin's Children's Study. Only in one important point do the writers of the novel diverge from the historian: Neil Gray was not the villain which the romancists make him. With the strong tide in favour of historical fiction which has recently set in, A Prince of Tyrone should run into a second edition; and it is to be hoped that when it does certain defects will be removed. This should be the easier that most of them are of a verbal nature. Such Anglo-Irish phrasing as "her offence" for her cause of offence will perplex the Saxon, in whose language the book purports to be written, and such pleonastic wording as "a decided air of culture," "a thorough man of the world," is as little to be admired as this wonderful sentence: "How it had failed in achieving its purpose ever remained one of those mysteries of chance that are never solved." The writers are too fond of quotations, and have not mastered the treatment of the quotation-mark, which they use with painful honesty (vide pp. 94, 110, 142, 359). Loose syntax marks pp. 120 and 172; and while hearty thanks will be, doubtless by many, accorded to the story-tellers that they have resisted the temptation to cast their Elizabethan tale in would-be Elizabethan English, they will not be lauded for making a prince of Tyrone say: "this bother"; for writing of his "'ways' with women"; for writing "to where," "very contented," "between three," "you had not used to be," and "kneeling on" (for "still kneeling"). These are inelegancies marring an otherwise excellent work. Similarly the grammar in places wants mending. There is here only space to give the figures of pages. Let the writers turn to pp. 5, 33, 46, 94, 232, 239.

The Pilgrimage of the Ben Beriah. By Charlotte M. Yonge. (Macmillan & Co.)

MISS YONGE in this book employs her familiar method, but not on the familiar lines. It is a story of the Israelites' wanderings in the Wilderness, and her object is apparently to make her readers realise the Biblical narrative by narrating it afresh from an individual point of view. She tells the fortunes of a single family of the tribe of Ephraim. Miss Yonge's unit of construction is always the family not the individual, and this family closely resembles a good many others which have inhabited her placid pages. There is the sceptical man, the rebellious young woman, the virtuous mother, and the admirable father. There are the usual marriages and the usual subsequent grandchildren. Add to these ingredients a highly rationalistic account of the crossing of the Red Sea and the result is a trifle incongruous. Miss Yonge has written such really excellent novels that we rather regret to see her employing her talents on what could be at best only a tour de force.

SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1897.

No. 1304, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom.	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow in due course.]

THE BIBLE: ITS MEANING AND SUPREMACY. DEAN FARRAR'S new book, The Bible: its Meaning and Supremacy, may probably be regarded as his final and most comprehensive exposition of the views of Divine truth which he has endeavoured to enforce in a series of works extending over nearly thirty years. The earliest of his theological works was Seekers after God, published in 1869. This was followed in 1871 by a volume of Hulsean Lectures, The Witness of History to Christ. In 1874 appeared what perhaps should now no longer be regarded as Dean Farrar's magnum opus, the Life of Christ. Its success is one of the commonplaces of latter-day publishing. Twelve editions were called for within a year of its publication. In 1877 appeared In the Days of My Youth, marking the close of Dean Farrar's head-mastership of Marlborough College. The companion Life of St. Paul appeared in 1879. A year after Dean, then Canon, Farrar startled the Church, but rejoiced many both within and without its pale, by the attack which he made on the doctrine of eternal damnation in his bold work, Eternal Hope. The Early Days of Christianity, in two portly volumes, followed in 1882. Since then Dean Farrar's pen has been still at work. Perhaps his Life of Christ in Art has been the least successful of his works. His published sermons are many. To-day he treats of the meaning and supremacy of the Book of which all his works prove him to have been at least a close and reverent student. The volume before us is a large post octavo of rather more than three hundred pages. It contains twenty-three chapters and an Introduction. The chapter headings are usually complete and expressive propositions, thus: "The Bible is not one Homogeneous Book, but a gradually collected Canon"; "The 'Allegorical Method' of Exegesis Untenable"; "The Bible is not Homogeneous in its Morality"; "Dangerous Results of the 'Supernatural Dictation' Theory"; "Supremacy of the Bible"; "The Bible and Individual Souls," &c.

ST. PAUL,
BY A NOVELIST.

MR. BARING-GOULD's writings require a good deal of sorting out. Three classes of books he has produced, and all in abundance; these being works of fiction, folk-lore, and theology. In his latest work Mr. Gould unites the extremes of his abilities in an effort to treat of the life of St. Paul in the spirit of the novelist. His, however, is not the only novelist's pen which is now being drawn to Biblical subjects, others which we need not name being under the same strong attraction. In approaching his present task Mr. Baring-Gould makes his aim very clear.

"The line I have adopted is that of a man of the world, of a novelist with some experience of life and some acquaintance with the springs of conduct that actuate mankind. . . . I treat the great Apostle as a man. I put aside detail unnecessary to my purpose—archæological, epigraphical, historical, geographical. My book is not, therefore, a Life of St. Paul, if incidents and accidents make up a man's life, but a study of his mind, the formation of his opinions, their modification under new conditions, and the direction taken by his work, under pressure of various kinds, and from different sides. . . . From the point of view I have elected, I am bound to consider Paul mainly from the human side. I do not deny the other, the spiritual side (God forbid it!); but I think that this latter has been unduly studied to the neglect of the human aspect. A biography that does not take both into account must be a limping and incomplete production."

"THE FOUNTAINS OF OXUS."

MR. GEORGE CURZON has reprinted the papers on the Pamirs and the Source of the Oxus which he contributed last year to the Geographical Journal. Here are the opening sentences:

"There is a passage in a now too-little-read book by a famous author that depicts the very curiosity whereby I was led in the autumn of 1894 to make the geographical researches which this essay will attempt to record. In his Anatomy of Melancholy the ingenious Burton, summarising the problems of natural history or physical geography which he would fain have solved, speaks thus: 'I would examine the Caspian Sea, and see where and how it exonerates itself after it hath taken in Volga, Iaxeres, Oxus, and those great rivers. I would find out with Trajan the fountains of Danubius, of Ganges, and of Oxus.' To myself, also, the Oxus, that great parent stream of humanity, which has equally impressed the imagination of Greek and Arab, of Chinese and Tartar, and which, from a period of over three thousand years ago, has successfully figured in the literature of the Sanskrit Puranas, the Alexandrian historians, and the Arab geographers, had always similarly appealed. Descending from the hidden 'Roof of the World,' its waters tell of forgotten peoples, and whisper secrets of unknown lands. They are believed to have rocked the cradle of our race. Long the legendary watermark between Iran and Turan, they have furrowed a deep channel in the destinies and character of mankind."

The book is accompanied by a map and illustrations.

MR. DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY has published either one, two, or three novels in every year from 1880 to 1896 inclusive, and his novel A Rogue's Conscience, just issued, brings up to the present moment a record of work in which quality and quantity have not been divorced. The rogue generally makes a good hero, even if he is a bad man. The story opens with these quiet, appetising sentences:

"Mr. James Mortimer and Mr. Alexander Ross were hiding from justice. This was a condition of things to which Mr. Mortimer had grown accustomed, but Mr. Ross had never until now felt what it was to be personally inquired after by the police."

. . . Love in Old Clothes, and Other Stories, by H. C. Bunner, comes to us from America, where it has enjoyed much popularity. The story which gives its title to the volume is certainly quaintly conceived. It is a modern love-story (to be precise, it is enacted in the year 1883) told in archaic language, thus:

"Because a man have a Hatt with a Brimme to it like y^e Poope-Decke of a Steam-Shippe, and breeches lyke y^e Case of an umbrella, and have loste money on Hindoo, he is not therefore in y^e beste Societie."

The author reverts to modern English, or rather American, in the six other stories which go to make up the volume. . . . A new novel, with Nihilism in it, is A Russian Wild Flower, by E. A. Brayley-Hodgetts, who in his book of travel, In the Track of the Russian Famine, has already shown his acquaintance with the Czar's dominions.

IN THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE OTHER BOOKS. Scottish Union Question Mr. G. W. T. Omond (whose Life of Fletcher of Saltoun was recently added to the "Famous Scots" series) has described those attempts to unite the kingdoms of England and Scotland which were made before the final Act of Union in 1707. The story of these efforts, says Mr. Omond, is one "of mutual confidence and common aspirations at the Reformation and the Revolution, but more frequently of jealousies, recriminations, and misunderstandings, most of which are now happily removed." . . . The excellent "Cathedral" series of George Bell & Son progresses rapidly, Rochester and Oxford having now received their respective volumes. . . . English Lyric Poetry, 1500—1700, is an anthology by an American scholar, Dr. Frederic Ives Carpenter, lecturer on English literature at the University of Chicago, who is introduced to English readers by Prof. Herford. Dr. Carpenter has already written, says Prof. Herford, "a comprehensive investigation of the poetic speech of the Elizabethans"—Metaphor and Simile in the Minor Elizabethan Drama. Dr. Carpenter's Introduction is quite a considerable essay, filling sixty-five pages. "Vernon Lee's" contributions to philosophical and æsthetic criticism have been many since, in 1880, she published Studies of the Eighteenth Century in Italy. From her busy pen there now comes a dainty little book with the title Limbo and Other Essays. The other papers in the volume include among their titles: "In Praise of Old Houses," "Tuscan Midsummer Magic," "About Leisure," &c. . . . The late Mr. David J. Smithson's Elocution and the Dramatic Art is reissued in a revised form by Messrs. George Bell & Sons. Mr. Charles Reeve Taylor, who edits the work, repeats his predecessor's warning that "Elocution cannot be taught without a master; and, however humble the abilities of the teacher may be, the pupil who is diligent will be sure to learn something." The bulk of the book consists of selections suitable for delivery and practice.

MESSRS. DOWNEY & Co.'s NEW EDITIONS. sumptuous, but limited, edition of the novels of Charles Lever is continued in Charles O'Malley, the Irish Dragoon. The two volumes of this re-issue of Lever's masterpiece are embellished with twenty-two etchings from the plates of "Phiz." A Bibliographical Note reminds us that Charles O'Malley appeared originally as a serial contribution to the Dublin University Magazine, commencing in the issue for March, 1840, and ending in that of December, 1841. It was then reissued in those undated monthly parts in paper covers which are still so prized by book collectors. . . . The "Gads-hill" edition of the works of Charles Dickens gives us Nicholas Nickleby, with the original illustrations. Mr. Lang writes that

"on November 19, 1837, Dickens, who had not nearly finished Oliver Twist, entered into an agreement with Messrs. Chapman & Hall 'to write a new work, the title whereof shall be determined by him, of a similar character and of the same extent as' Pickwick. The book ran from April, 1838, to October, 1839."

. . . Messrs. Macmillan add to their "Standard Novels" a welcome reprint of Maria Edgeworth's The Parents' Assistant; or, Stories for Children, illustrated by Miss Chris. Hammond. Mrs. Richmond Ritchie contributes an Introduction, in which she recalls her own delight, as a child, in these tales. . . . The late Sir Stevenson Arthur Blackwood's life may be said to have been a dual one. He was known to the general British public, and to publics beyond the seas, as the Secretary of the Post Office; to his family, friends, and a more limited public he was known as an earnest Christian, a social worker, and a preacher of some power. Both aspects of his career are set forth in great fulness in Some Records of the Life of Stevenson Arthur Blackwood, of which a "popular edition" has just been issued by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

ON THE USE OF SCIENCE TO CHRISTIANS. By Emma Marie Caillard. James Nisbet & Co. 1s. 6d.
THE EUCCHARISTIC MANUALS OF JOHN AND CHARLES WESLEY. Edited by Rev. W. E. Dutton. John Hodges.

THE DIES IREM. Part I.: THE HYMN. By Rev. C. F. S. Warton. Skeffington & Son. 8s.
THE BIBLE: ITS MEANING AND SUPREMACY. By F. W. Farrar, D.D. Longmans & Co. 15s.
SOME LESSONS OF THE REVISED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By the Right Rev. Brooks Foss Westcott, D.D. Hodder & Stoughton. 8s.
THE INCARNATION. By E. N. Gifford, D.D. Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.
THE MODERN READER'S BIBLE: JEREMIAH. Edited by Richard G. Moulton, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.

HISTORY.

BELL'S CATHEDRAL SERIES: THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH OF ROCHESTER. By G. H. Palmer, B.A. And THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH OF OXFORD. By Rev. Percy Dearmer, M.A.
THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE SCOTTISH UNION QUESTION. G. W. T. Omond. Oliphant, Anderson & Fetter.

POETRY.

THE ANNALS OF ENGLAND IN VERSE AND RHYME. By George Norman Hexter. Chapman & Hall. 3s. 6d.
DEPARTMENTAL DIVING. Ninth edition. By Rudyard Kipling. W. Thacker & Co.
RUBY BLITHE, AND OTHER POEMS. By William J. Tate. Digby, Long & Co.
ENGLISH LYRIC POETRY. With an Introduction by Frederic Ives Carpenter. Blackie & Son, Ltd.

FICTION.

THE DREAMS OF DANIA. By Frederick Langbridge, James Bowden. 3s. 6d.
A ROGUE'S CONSCIENCE. By David Christie Murray. Downey & Co. 3s. 6d.
OUT OF HER SMOUD. By Henry Ochiltree. A. & C. Black.
WITHOUT ISSUE. By Henry Crosswell. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.
HIS COUSIN THE WALLABY, AND THREE OTHER AUSTRALIAN STORIES. By Arthur Forbes. George Robertson & Co.
A MINION OF THE MOON. By T. W. Speight. Chatto & Windus.
LOVE IN OLD CLOATHES, AND OTHER STORIES. By H. C. Bunner. Downey & Co. 5s.
THE PARENT'S ASSISTANT. New Edition. By Maria Edgeworth. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.
THE PINK TULIP. By Caroline Stanley. The Roxburghe Press. 3s. 6d.
A RUSSIAN WILD FLOWER. By E. A. Brayley Hodgetts. John Macquenn.
JOHN ARMISTEAD'S REVENGE. By P. Hay Hunter. Oliphant, Anderson, & Fetter. 3s. 6d.
THE GREAT JADELL DIAMOND. By J. L. Owen. The Roxburghe Press. 3s. 6d.

NATURAL HISTORY.

BIRDS OF OUR ISLANDS. By F. A. Fulcher. Andrew Melrose. 3s. 6d.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THE PANIERS AND THE SOURCE OF THE OXUS. By the Right Hon. George N. Curzon, M.P. Edward Stanford. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL.

HERODOTUS: BOOK III. Edited by John Thompson, M.A., and R. J. Hayes, M.A. W. B. Clive. 4s. 6d.
THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND: CALENDAR FOR 1897. Longmans & Co.
VIRGIL: GEORGE IV. By T. E. Page, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 1s. 6d.
THUCYDIDES: BOOK VI. Edited by E. C. Marchant, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.
A HANDBOOK OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Originally compiled by Austin Dobson. New edition, revised by W. Hall Griffin, B.A. Crosby, Lockwood & Son.

MISCELLANEOUS.

GLIMPSES OF OUR EMPIRE. By Robinson Souttar, M.A. Hodder & Stoughton. 1s. 6d.
BOX-MOTS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. Edited by Walter Jarrold. J. M. Dent & Co.
THE COMPLETE CYCLIST. By A. C. Pemberton and Others. Edited by B. Fletcher Robinson. A. D. Innes & Co. 6s.
THE WHITE SLAVES OF ENGLAND. By Robert Harborough Sherard. Illustrated by Harold Piffard. James Bowden. 2s. 6d.
FADS OF AN OLD PHYSICIAN. By George S. Keith, M.D. A. & C. Black.
DOMESTIC SERVICE IN THE UNITED STATES. By Lucy Maynard Salmon. Macmillan & Co. 7s. 6d.
A TREATISE ON ROCKS, ROCK-WEATHERING, AND SOILS. By George P. Merrill. Macmillan & Co.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. HENRY FROWDE will publish shortly the second part of the Yattendon Hymnal, containing fifty hymns, with English words for singing in churches, edited by Mr. Robert Bridges. This hymnal is being printed with the quaint music types of Peter Walpergen, and the fine Roman and italic of Bishop Fell, at the Oxford University Press, and issued in royal quarto and (limited) folio editions. Mr. Bridge's home is at Yattendon.

THIS year being the centenary of the death of Edmund Burke, a series of commemorative meetings is to be held in Belfast under the auspices of the Belfast Library and Society for Promoting Knowledge. On Tuesday, May 4, under the presidency of the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava, an address will be delivered by the Archbishop of Armagh upon "Burke as Orator and Writer." On Thursday, May 6, D. G. Barkley, Esq., LL.D., will preside, and a lecture, entitled "Burke as Statesman and Political Thinker," will be given by His Honour Judge Webb, Q.C. On the third and concluding evening, Saturday, May 8, the Rev. J. J. Nesbitt, M.A., will give a series of readings from the writings of Edmund Burke.

To those who are awaiting with eagerness the appearance of Mrs. Meynell's promised anthology of the best poems in the English language, which Mr. Grant Richards will publish under the title The Flower of the Mind, the Autolycus article in Wednesday's Pall Mall Gazette should be particularly interesting, for in it, week by week, Mrs. Meynell is appraising the merits of certain poets whose work she has latterly assayed. Last week she wrote of Gray's Elegy, this week Cowley was examined.

It may be as well to correct two rumours that have been in circulation during the past week. The Queen has not caused a memoir of Prince Henry of Battenburg to be written for private circulation, and Mr. Kipling has not gone to the seat of war to represent the Times.

THE Westminster Gazette announces that it has made arrangements with Mr. Stephen Crane for special letters describing the war. Mr. Crane is with the Greek army.

In the current number of the University Magazine two popular women novelists come in for hard treatment in articles entitled respectively, "Marie Corelli and her Public" and "The Downfall of Olive Schreiner."

THE Dome being concerned with architecture, literature, painting, and music, offers in its first number matter touching all four subjects. Painting and the allied arts come off with greatest honour, and architecture with least. The page of the Dome is too small for justice to be done to its artists. The literature is fair. We quote the following Song of Brotherhood by Mr. James Snedborough:

"Once in the tender moonlight
I wakened out of sleep:
Unclouded was all heaven,
And foamless all the deep.
"I saw them through the window,
The homely sea and sky:
We seemed such friends that moment,
Such brothers, God and I."

The Dome is announced to appear quarterly.

ANOTHER new periodical is The Genealogical Magazine, which begins with the May number. It is described as a journal of family history, heraldry, and pedigrees, and from the character of the queries printed at the end of the number it would seem likely to be of value as well as interest. The notes under the heading of "By the Way" are bright and timely. Among the articles is one describing Governor Bradford's Log of the Mayflower. Mr. Elliot Stock is the publisher of The Genealogical Magazine.

MESSRS. GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, will publish next week a book by Mr. Edwin A. Pratt, entitled Pioneer Women in Victoria's Reign, being short histories of great movements. He sketches the work done by Miss Harriet Martineau and Miss Jennie Boucherett towards securing suitable "Employment for Women"; by Miss Rye and Mrs. Chisholm in the cause of "Emigration"; by Miss Buss in aid of "The Higher Education of Women"; by Drs. Elizabeth Blackwell, Garrett Anderson, and Sophia Jex Blake as "Pioneer Women Doctors"; by Miss Nightingale and others in promoting skilled "Nursing"; by Miss L. Twining for securing "Poor Law Reform"; and by Miss Mary Carpenter, Lady Kinnaird, Mrs. Nassau Senior, and many others, towards alleviating the lot of the friendless, the helpless, the blind, and the deserving poor throughout the country.

THE Critic introduces us to the nearest approach to the immortal Marjorie Fleming that Chicago can produce. This is Myra Bradwell Helmer, a novelist of seven years of age, whose short stories have been published and sold for a charity. In her preface to the collection Myra says: "I talked it and mamma wrote it down for me just as I talked it." In one story the child tells how typhoid fever broke out among the fairies. When the fairy doctor came he told the fairy godmother all about "microbes and germs, and told her to boil the water." The fairy godmother was not inclined to take as law and gospel all that the doctor said, and asked if "a hair was a sidewalk for a microbe." To this the doctor evasively replied, "Oh, no! They are much smaller." This was too much for the fairy godmother, who wanted to know "if the germ had the fever why didn't the fever, which killed little boys and girls, kill the germ. And if the germ didn't have the fever, how could it give the fever; how could a thing give a thing it didn't have." The fairy doctor, taking refuge in evasion, answered, "Nobody knows but God."

WITH the June number the magazine Belgravia will be enlarged and improved. Nowadays a magazine for which a shilling is asked must be enlarged and improved to an extraordinary extent if it is to come triumphantly out of the struggle for life. A new cover has been designed for Belgravia, and among its forthcoming features will be an article descriptive of London hospital work for sixty years.

MYRA BRADWELL HELMER is also a poetess. In one place she sings:

"The flower that bends down to the earth
Will soon go back to God,
But never again will it return
The same as it was plod."

In a footnote the child explains that "this poem which came in my head quick and sudden doesn't make sense, because the word plod, which rhymes so nicely with God, doesn't mean what I want it to." This is quaint, but we cannot agree with the Critic that Marjorie Fleming is equalled.

WITH its current issue the Lark of San Francisco ceases. No more shall we be bidden "Hark, hark, the lark at the Golden Gate."

ONE hardly looks to the Quarterly Review for any record of the Queen's preferences in literature, but none the less in the new number a few of Her Majesty's favourite authors are mentioned. The poets are Shakespeare, Scott, Tennyson and Adelaide Ann Proctor; the novelists, Jane Austen, Charlotte Brontë, George Eliot, Mrs. Craik, Mrs. Oliphant and Edna Lyall. In German Her Majesty reads with most pleasure Goethe, Heine, and Schiller; and in French, Racine, Corneille, and Lamartine.

THE last week has seen the appearance of two new poems by Mr. Rudyard Kipling, one written to explain a picture of a vampire exhibited in the New Gallery by the poet's cousin, Mr. Philip Burne-Jones. The other was "Our Lady of the Snow," a poetical commentary on the New Canadian Tariff, printed in the Times on Tuesday. Neither effort strikes us as clear, yet each has the air of meaning a great deal. In "Our Lady of the Snow" the swing of the lines and their obvious patriotic intent are most tantalising; they make an appeal which the brain vainly tries to transmit to the heart. "The Vampire" is worse, with its maddening lilt and its hidden meaning. If Mr. Kipling were mischievously inclined he might flood us with haunting lines which no one understood and no one dared pronounce meaninglessly.

THREE is probably always room for a new handbook to London, provided it be good. That which Messrs. Darlington & Co. are now preparing promises to be particularly good. The authors are E. C. Cook and E. T. Cook, M.A., the latter being editor of the Daily News and the author of an excellent Handbook to the National Gallery. His contributions to the forthcoming volume are chapters on the British Museum, the National Gallery, the National Portrait Gallery, and the South Kensington Museum. The new handbook will be illustrated by maps, plans, and pictures.

FACT and fiction are eternally at one another's heels. Now it is fact which is the forerunner, now fiction gets ahead. The other day an explosion occurred on the Underground Railway, at Aldersgate Station, which is attributed to foul play. This happened only a very little while after the appearance of Mr. Coulson Kernahan's Captain Shannon, a prominent incident of which is the destruction of Blackfriars Station by a dynamite bomb left in one of the railway carriages.

MR. JOSEPH PENNELL will contribute an article on "Bull Fighting and Bull Fighters" to the May number of Cosmopolis. Mr. Karl Blind will write on "Walter von der Vogelweide"; and, in the German section, M. A. Brandl will pronounce on Mr. Thomas Hardy and Mr. Rudyard Kipling. Mr. Kipling's story, "Slaves of the Lamp," comes to a conclusion in this number.

MR. HINKSON has in hand a romance of the Irish Rebellion of 1798, the centenary of which is to be extensively kept in Ireland and America. It is founded on a little-known contemporary diary of a prisoner, and will be published under the title of The Green Cockade.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co. write to us as follows: "We notice in your issue of last week that our volume of reproductions of Mr. Hyde's illustrations to Milton's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso is stated to be scarce. This is not the case: we have copies left of both it and Mr. Garnett's Imaged World at the service of the many just admirers of Mr. Hyde's work."

MR. BARRY PAIN is writing for the English Illustrated Magazine a series of twelve romantic papers around and about the personality of Robin Hood.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK, who has already published interesting facsimile reprints of the first editions of The Compleat Angler, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Herbert's Temple, and other classics, is now adding The Christian Year to the list. Keble's work dates from 1827. To this reprint the Bishop of Rochester will prefix an introduction.

THE date fixed for the Women Writers' Dinner this year is June 14. Mrs. F. A. Steel and Miss E. F. Montrésor have been added to the committee.

THE "Man of Kent," writing in the British Weekly, comments on the present position of the Speaker as a political organ, and states that a movement is on foot to start "a Liberal Spectator" at a moderate price. "A moderate price" we take to mean threepence.

THE ONLOOKER.

MR. GEORGE MOORE ON STEVENSON.

THE publication by Mr. W. B. Yeats of a little book called The Secret Rose has given occasion to Mr. George Moore to issue a pontifical depreciation of Stevenson in the columns of the Daily Chronicle—a depreciation which naturally possesses a sort of vicarious importance by reason of the vogue which that paper necessarily gives to it. Therefore it deserves an answer; not because it is either well-conceived or strongly written, but because it happened to be written there.

The first lesson of Mr. Yeats's book, cries Mr. Moore, is that "Stevenson is not the only man who ever lived who wrote English prose," and than that "there could hardly be whispered at the present time a more welcome truth." Since it is clear that no human being in his senses has ever claimed, in that redundant phrase, that Stevenson "is the only man who ever lived who wrote English prose," and equally clear, therefore, that this truth is neither welcome nor unwelcome, one may wonder a little why Mr. Moore should choose this particular occasion to air his views upon a subject about which he is, of course, at liberty to hold whatever views he pleases. But, as Mr. Moore says, "we all have our way of doing things"—and this is Mr. Moore's way.

The depreciation falls into two divisions: a particular comparison, unfavourable to Stevenson's work, with Mr. Yeats's book, and a general whistling down the wind of Stevenson's capacity for thought, invention, and even true style. Mr. Moore satisfies himself on the first point by a quotation from The Secret Rose, of which this forms part:

"It was one of those warm, beautiful nights, when everything seems carved of precious stones. The woods of the Sleuth Hound away to the south looked as though cut out of green beryl, and the waters that mirrored them shone like opal. The roses he was gathering were like glowing rubies, and the lilies had the dull lustre of pearl. Everything had taken upon itself the look of something imperishable, except a glow-worm, whose faint flame burnt on steadily among the shadows, moving hither and thither, the only thing that seemed alive, the only thing that seemed perishable as mortal hope."

"There are many summer nights in Stevenson's writing," comments Mr. Moore; "do you know one as fluid, as boundless, as brilliant, or so silent? . . . By the side of this beautiful prose, subtle, wistful as the moon shining upon mist, does not Stevenson's vision seem dry, hard, prosaic?"

That is the challenge. Now be it far from me to dispraise the workmanship which created Mr. Yeats's "fluid" summer night—in a perfectly artificial way it is pretty and delicate. True, it suggests no particular fact of nature or imagination; you talk in this kind of prose about nights when everything seems carved out of jewels as a kind of matter of course; you deal with opals and amethysts and rubies and roses because these are the world's possessions you like to talk about. Such remote comparisons of everyday things, not to realities, not to suggestions of realities, but to some commodity of high market value were justified, or ever Mr. Yeats wrote thus, in the collected works of Solomon. It is a well-known trick, which deftly done is rather pleasant, and which is done by Mr. Yeats very deftly indeed, as deftly as Mr. Strudwick has done it in painting; but to depreciate Stevenson as "dry and prosaic" because he used no such trick, because when he wrote of summer nights he thought of summer nights and not of precious stones, is as wise as to prefer vinegar in a gold cup to rare wine in a customary wine-glass. The roses were like glowing rubies—were they? And the lily had the dull lustre of pearl? And the waters shone like opal? And I suppose you would liken the morning twilight to turquoises, and the dawn to a tiara of diamonds, and so forth, and so forth. It is almost unfair to pitch a high Stevensonian phrase into rivalry with this pretty filagree, but let it be done for once and then be left. Stevenson also wrote of a summer night which happened in the Cevennes pine-woods; he too described the morning twilight, but, alas! without the aid of the jewel-case; he called it the "blue light which is the mother of the dawn." That may not be fluid or as wistful as the moon shining on mist, but it is—well, it is art.

Mr. Moore's views upon Stevenson's style are interesting chiefly by reason of the revelation they give of Mr. Moore's views upon style of any kind. To him style appears not so much as the necessary and unique expression of a definite thought, so that thought and style are in a sense one, but as the deliberate clothing of something which one supposes that Mr. Moore supposes to be a thought without words. Stevenson's style, he says in effect, is mere trickwork. He thinks a thought and he takes the dictionary and proceeds to clothe the thought in rare garments. This is the Stevensonian invention, and Mr. Moore discovered it one day, about ten years ago, when he was reading a story—"I forget which, but it does not matter," and "I was struck by the unexpectedness of every epithet"—and suddenly Mr. Moore saw that he could easily substitute an "ordinary" epithet for every "extraordinary" epithet. It came in a flash, in this way. In a passionate phrase Stevenson had described a man stopping a clock with "interjected finger," the flight of the word is intensely significant, as most men can see; but Mr. Moore saw that "inserted finger" might have been written by somebody not Stevenson, and, behold, the great discovery was made! All Stevenson, says Mr. Moore, is in that "interjected finger." I have stated Mr. Moore's case, in my own way—as he would say. The mere statement should suffice.

The rest of this singular attack does not call for any reply, chiefly because Mr. Moore is clearly without more than the vaguest knowledge of what Stevenson really wrote. "Great literature cannot be composed from narratives of perilous adventures," says this reviewer. It is an odd assertion, seeing that Mr. Moore appeals to the "ancient writers" in justification of his view, and I need not insult him by reminding him of any ancient writer save Homer—but let that pass. The discussion ceases when you remember that Stevenson by no means confined himself to "narratives of perilous adventures." Has Mr. Moore never read An Inland Voyage, Travels with a Donkey, Virginibus Puerisque, Familiar Studies of Men and Books, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, The Child's Garden of Verses, Underwoods, or Ballads? to name but these, which are none of them composed from narratives of perilous adventures. With that the bottom falls clean out of Mr. Moore's case. It is useless to pursue the controversy, for there is none. I claim no rank, no excellence, no supremacy for Mr. Moore's Stevenson. He is a fantasy, the creature of an imperfect dream. The real Stevenson who wrote is not here under discussion; he needs no championing.

VERNON BLACKBURN.

MR. KIPLING'S BEGINNINGS.*

MR. KIPLING's earliest volume of verse, Departmental Ditties, was from the first good reading; but now, in the light of the fuller knowledge that we have of the range of his genius and the development of his philosophy, it becomes peculiarly interesting, although less, perhaps, for the verses themselves (since the workmanship is often crude) than as an indication of how their author's mind was shaping. For if it were the habit of critics to prophesy (which it is not), a sagacious reviewer, on the appearance of Departmental Ditties years ago, might have based upon the promise of that book and the tendencies it displayed a fairly accurate forecast of the nature of Mr. Kipling's performances in the future. Critics are, however, frequently wise men, and wise men leave vaticination alone; or (like the present writer) predict only after the event. This new edition of the Departmental Ditties, the ninth, offers opportunity of a search for beginnings.

The child (or, in this case, the youth) is very noticeably the father of the man. The man is younger—that is all: his eyes are less tolerant, his cynicism is more obvious, he is nearer his models (the author of the Bab Ballads, for example); but there is the same instinct for the biting word, the same joy in swinging metre, the same exultation in brute strength and brute callousness, the same vigilance for life's ironies: all are here, though in lesser degree. Let us see how the young writer was anticipating his maturer work. In "The Galley Slave," for instance, can one not find the bed-plates of "The Finest Story in the World"?

"Oh gallant was our galley from her carved steering-wheel
To her figure-head of silver and her beak of hammered steel;
The leg-bar chafed the ankle, and we gasped for cooler air,
But no galley on the water with our galley could compare!"

* Departmental Ditties. By Rudyard Kipling. Ninth edition. Illustrated by Dudley Cleave. (W. Thacker & Co.)

"Our bulkheads bulged with cotton and our masts were stepped in gold—
We ran a mighty merchandise of niggers in the hold;
The white foam spun behind us, and the black shark swam below,
As we gripped the kicking sweep-head and we made that galley go."

In "Arithmetic on the Frontier" there is the kernel of more than one Kipling story:

"A scrimmage in a Border Station—
A canter down some dark defile—
Two thousand pounds of education
Drops to ten-rupee jezail—
The Crammer's boast, the Squadron's pride,
Shot like a rabbit in a ride!"

And the "General Summary," but with different treatment and application, might be said, without undue stretching, to be the forerunner of "King Romance" in The Seven Seas:

"Who shall doubt the secret hid Under Cheops' pyramid
Was that the contractor did
Cheops out of several millions?
Or that Joseph's sudden rise
To Comptroller of Supplies
Was a fraud of monstrous size
On King Pharaoh's swart Civilians?"

There is a hint of the beautiful musical envoy to the Barack-Room Ballads in "In Spring Time" and "Christmas in India."

"Through the pines the gusts are booming, o'er the brown fields blowing chill,
From the furrow of the ploughshare streams
the fragrance of the loam,
And the hawk nests on the cliffside and the jackdaw in the hill,
And my heart is back in England 'mid the sights and sounds of Home."

The man who wrote "The Ballad of Fisher's Boarding-House" would obviously one day go on to write something as strong as "The Rhyme of the Three Whalers":

"'Twas Fultah Fisher's boarding-house,
Where sailor-men reside,
And there were men of all the ports
From Mississipp to Clyde,
And regally they spat and smoked
And fearsomely they lied.

"They lied about the purple sea
That gave them scanty bread,
They lied about the earth beneath,
The heavens overhead.
For they had looked too often on Black rum when that was red."

And so on, down to the killing of Hans—

"Thus slew they Hans, the blue-eyed Dane,
Bull-throated, bare of arm,
But Anne of Austria looted first
The maid Ultruda's charm—
The little silver crucifix
That keeps a man from harm."

"Divided Destinies" gives us a glimpse of the Jungle books; and the core of "At the End of the Passage" is in "La Nuit Blanche," that wonderful description of the delirium of fever:

"Then a Face came blind and weeping,
And It couldn't wipe Its eyes,
And It muttered I was keeping
Back the moonlight from the skies;
So I patted It for pity,
But It whistled shrill with wrath,
And a huge black Devil City
Poured its peoples on my path.

"So I flew with steps uncertain
On a thousand-year-long race,
But the bellying of the curtain
Kept me always in one place;
While the tumult rose and maddened
To the roar of earth on fire,
Ere it ebbed and sank and saddened
To a whisper tense as wire."

What one does not find in Departmental Ditties is the patriotism, the military note, and the love of the sea which distinguish the later writings. The philosophy of life is there, little changed; and the mode of treatment is almost the same as in the more recent books, except that it is less sure.

One curious circumstance is brought to light by this re-perusal of Departmental Ditties, and that is the similarity between the tone of Mr. Kipling's maxims in imitation of Hafiz and Col. John Hay's distiches. The American's distiches are now well known; here are some of the Anglo-Indian's cynicisms:

"The temper of chums, the love of your wife,
and a new piano's tune—
Which of the three will you trust at the end of an Indian June?"

Again,

"If She grow suddenly gracious—reflect. Is it all for thee?
The black buck is stalked through the bullock,
and Man through jealousy."

Again,

"Seek not the favour of women. So shall you find it indeed.
Does not the boar break cover just when you're lighting a weed?"

Now and again Mr. Kipling, in this, his earliest effort, reached high-water mark. He has, for instance, tried other variants of "The Story of Uriah," but in the departmental ditty which bears that title—a mere matter of thirty-two lines—he fixes the standard. Nor can we see how "The Ballad of Fisher's Boarding House," "Pagett, M.P.," or "La Nuit Blanche" could be bettered, while "Pink Dominoes" is in a manner which the author has not attempted since. We would also pick out the "General Survey," "Arithmetic on the Frontier," "A Code of Morals," and (inexplicable though it be) "What Happened." Much of the book is, it is true, second rate and cheap, but there are a few pieces which we should like to see collected with Mr. Kipling's later work. Some day, perhaps, he will overhaul the three volumes in which his poetry is stored and make from them certain selections having each an individual character.

"HENRY V." AT STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

It is somewhat painful and surprising to find that the Shakespeare Memorial performances attract little attention in London. Playgoers profess to regret that during 1896 only five of Shakespeare's plays were presented to them, yet neglect the opportunity of seeing twice that number excellently performed within a fortnight. Moreover, the newspapers that can find a column for an account of a paltry musical farce at a second-rate West-End theatre, or two columns of report and pretended criticism concerning the Lyceum production of the translation of a third-rate French piece, almost ignore the Stratford performances. Now so far as nine of the ten plays that formed the Benson répertoire are concerned it is needless to say much, seeing Mr. Benson's able method of staging them, and the high qualities of the acting in them, are well-known to students of the drama. The "Henry V." deserves discussion, since it is the novelty of this festival.

Moreover, "Henry V." is quite a novelty to most of us. No doubt it was presented in gorgeous spectacular fashion at Drury Lane in 1879, which, however, is now so far back in stage history as to be but little later than the beginning of the famous Irving management at the Lyceum. It is not very difficult to see why the play has been thus neglected; but Mr. Benson very nearly, perhaps quite, succeeds in showing that the neglect has been ill-founded, and that such remarks as "It is the least dramatic of the series," and that "It is a magnificent monologue," are beyond the truth. We may not assert that "Henry V." takes a high rank as drama among Shakespeare's work; yet it has far stronger acting qualities than have been ascribed to it. Those who were so fortunate as to be present at the "first night" at Stratford, and also the birthday performance, have had an interesting opportunity of seeing how much can be done with such a play by adroit yet respectful handling. A dexterous change in order of the scenes, and one or two bold cuts, rendered a piece which seemed to fade away in the middle of the fourth act really interesting, and even dramatic to the end of the fifth.

The complaint made against the play has always been that it is a purely one-part work—this might have been an attraction to some actor-managers. Mr. Benson, in making the sacrifices of text without which Shakespearean drama cannot be given to the feeble playgoers of our days, has taken pains to do so rather at the cost of the King's part than that of the minor characters; consequently these, and many of them are admirable examples of Shakespeare's character drawing, stand out vividly; nevertheless, Mr. Benson, by his force and skill, makes the King appear a splendid heroic figure among them. It is curious to see how wise selection and arrangement make the dramatist's idea of contrast between the English and French so striking. Perhaps one should not say English, since it is noteworthy that in this play, in which Shakespeare has adopted a national tone somewhat prophetically, we have the English, Irish, Scotch, and Welsh fighting side by side. To heighten this contrast, one daring, and possibly unjustifiable, step has been taken. In the French camp-scene a song and dance have been introduced, emphasising the idea hinted in the chorus concerning the revelling of the French over-night, and there follow in sharp comparison scenes to show the pious, and one may add, business-like, preparation of the little British army. For sake of this the song and dance are perhaps pardonable, though since it has been necessary, on account of time, to omit the famous choruses one is indisposed to assent to any interpolation. As it stands the play shows a real dramatic growth of interest, one might almost say plot, down to the end of the fourth act, when, after Montjoy's admission of defeat, the curtain comes down on a picturesque procession of priests and monks with cross and banner coming with holy chaunt across the battlefield among the victorious warriors. It was before this on the first night that came the well-known scene between Pistol and the French prisoner, and the episode of William's discovery of his glove in Fluellen's hat; but on the second night they were taken out and put at the beginning of the fifth act, and the effect was a great gain in strength, the play moving forward powerfully to the end of the fourth act and re-awakening in the fifth, to round the stories of the minor characters, and end in the quaint and amusing courtship scene.

The play lends itself remarkably to scenic display, which is well, since nowadays the public will not accept the descriptions of the chorus as compensation for the "Four or five most vile and ragged fools, Right ill-dispos'd in brawl ridiculous."

Mr. Benson, with a skill quite marvelous considering the size of the stage, has contrived some very effective pictures, adopting for the battle-scene the device of a single tableau and using no "alarms and excursions." There are so many characters of importance in the piece that the ordinary Benson company has been increased for the occasion, and owing to this there was in one or two scenes some lack of homogeneity in the acting. Taken, however, as a whole, the performance was exceedingly good. Mr. Benson's Henry was a rather quiet, dignified presentation, which in its effect seemed out of proportion to the means adopted, and one can but assume that it is the actor's sincerity and fine art which made him stand out vividly as a true king among men. We can hardly discuss in detail the long cast, but it would be unjust to ignore the richly humorous Fluellen of Mr. Weir, the powerful Williams of Mr. Swete, the vivid Pistol of Mr. Asche, and Mr. Nicholson's clever Nym; while the admirable acting of Miss Alice Denzil as Mistress Quickly and the charming Katherine of Mrs. Benson must be named.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXV.—ANDREW MARVELL.

ANDREW MARVELL was a gentleman who wrote with ease; and though the body of his poetical work is of the most slender, his place among the amateur poets, or poets whose primary idea in singing is to please themselves or their friends, is with the highest. He is remarkable chiefly for distinction of intellect; remarkable incidentally in being almost the last poet, until Crabbe and Cowper came, to look at nature for himself. After Marvell the artificial period set in like a frost, and held the fields and lawns with an iron grasp. Marvell's little handful of out-of-door poems—"Upon Appleton House," "The Garden," "Upon the Hill and Grove at Billborow," "The Bermudas"—are as felicitous and debonair as anything in the language. In the presence of yew hedges and box-wood walks, the spreading hands of cedars and the fragrance of roses, the plashings of the fountain and the silent reminder of the sundial, he was sensitive and impressionable to his fingertips: in a garden after his own heart he could annihilate "all that's made to a green thought in a green shade." Later in life he fell a victim to the snare of politics, but once he could ask:

"Unhappy! shall we never more
That sweet militia restore,
When gardens only had their tow'rs,
And all the garrisons were flow'rs,
When roses only arms might bear,
And men did rosie garlands wear?
Tulips, in several colours barr'd,
Were then the Switzers of our guard;
The gardiner had the souldier's place,
And his more gentle forts did trace;
The nursery of all things green
Was then the only magazine."

Once, in "The Garden," Marvell could write:

"Fair Quiet, I have found thee here,
And Innocence, thy sister dear!
Mistaken long, I sought you then
In busy companies of men.
Your sacred plants, if here below,
Only among these plants will grow;
Society is all but rude
To this delicious solitude."

And again:

"Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
Or at some fruit-tree's mossy root,
Casting the body's vest aside,
My soul into the boughs does glide:
There like a bird it sits and sings."

It is sad to think that such a divine loafer as the poet of "The Garden"—

"The nectarine and curious peach
Into my hands themselves do reach;
Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
Insnar'd with flow'rs, I fall on grass"— should ever have succumbed to faction. But so it was. For the bulk of his later work Marvell courted only the satirical muse. His "Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland" is a magnificent exception. No such serious poem was ever handicapped by so abrupt and undignified a metre or came out of the ordeal so triumphantly. The stanzas referring to Charles I. are well known:

"He nothing common did or mean
Upon that memorable scene,
But with his keener eye
The axe's edge did try."

"Nor called the gods, with vulgar spite,
To vindicate his helpless right;
But bowed his comely head
Down, as upon a bed."

Of Marvell's frankly satirical manner these lines from "The Loyal Scot" are a good example:

"What ethic river is this wondrous Tweed,
Whose one bank virtue, t'other vice does breed?
Or what new perpendicular does rise
Up from her streams continued to the skies,
That between us the common air should bar,
And split the influence of every star—"

although his best-known effort is the rather too heavy-handed squib entitled "The Character of Holland." In a more familiar style is the letter to the learned Dr. Wittie, on the completion of his translation of Popular Errors, which shows that Marvell's allegiance to the weed in later life was not less sound than his love of flowers in younger days. He begins:

"Our books in growing ranks so numerous be That scarce one cuttle fish swims in the sea,"

by which he means that they all have been captured for ink; and continues, of the multitude of books:

"Sturdier they rise from printing-press's blows.
The more 'tis pressed this Hydra bulkier grows."

Can acornite or plant else known to men
Expel this cacœthes of the pen?
Ind only on our sorrows taking pity
Provides an antidote, dear Dr. Wittie.
Tobacco, useful poison, Ind bestows,
Which more than hellebore drives out our woes."

Marvell, who acted as Milton's secretary, was one of the few of the poet's contemporaries conscious of the sublimity of Paradise Lost. As the years pass on it is likely that the appreciation of his own poetry will increase rather than lessen.

THE BOOK MARKET.

THE BOOK AND THE BARROW.

IT was the sight of a very presentable copy of Evelyn's Diary that checked my progress down the Farringdon-road the other afternoon. But for that I should have nothing to record beyond the fact that it rained in that prosaic and normally noisy thoroughfare. Yet even rain and mud and noise are mitigated here by the straggling ramshackle book market which lines the pavement between Farringdon-road Station and the Clerkenwell-road. The man must be very dull, or very anxious, who can pass these six or eight open bookstalls without stopping at one of them. For here, side by side, are life and literature. Here is the "daily tragedy" of which Maeterlinck is just now the spokesman, and here is the treasure of the humble and the harassed. I bought the Evelyn at a comforting price; and then, half in the shelter of a tarpaulin roof, half outside it, I talked in mildly inquisitive fashion.

"Yes, sir," he said, "you might have seen me here three or four years ago, seeing I've been here with hardly a miss every day for nineteen years."

"Nine—teen —!"

"Yes, sir; I'm the veteran of the lot. They call me The Veteran. I was the first man to sell books on the pavement, though, to be sure, I began by selling chestnuts."

"And for all these years you have been able to sell books here for a living?"

"Yes, sir; and not such a bad living either, as things go, and as things change. But look at the competition now"—and my friend stepped back a pace and jer'd his thumb expressively toward the Meat

ANDREW MARVELL

From the Picture in the National Portrait Gallery

Market and toward Clerkenwell. 'Why, sir,' he continued, 'I have to be humble now. A man comes here and picks up this book and reads it for half-an-hour. Ten years ago I should have stopped that sort of thing. But now I say: 'Nice book that, sir. Will it be in your line to-day?' And he'll answer, 'I don't know yet; I'm looking at it.' And he'll read it ten minutes longer and then he'll say: 'A shillin'!' as if he were astonished at the price. And perhaps I take tenpence; perhaps I don't—just depends."

"Do you obtain regular customers here?"

"Oh, dear, yes, sir; plenty. You see I'm well known, and I learned long ago what to buy. Now, take theology—that's what I'm famous for, though I do believe in the Miscellaneous. Still, I lean to theology, and so do a lot of people that come here."

"But will you tell me that you have a good sale for such books as these: Nolan on the Prophecies, Toplady's Works, Horne's Introduction to the Scriptures in six volumes, and Law's Serious Call?"

"Yes, sir, I have. Why, it's no uncommon thing for a dozen of Mr. Spurgeon's students to be round here together looking for books; and as for ministers, we have scores of them. Why, sir, when we were threatened to be cleared away by the Holborn Board of Works the ministers took our part. They said it was a grand thing for the working man to see books in the street."

"Just so. Well, now, if it is a fair question, where do you buy your books?"

"Chancery-lane, sir."

"What, in the Chancery-lane sale-rooms?"

"Certainly, sir," said my friend with a touch of pride. "These dozen years I've bought my books there, and many's the time I've stood bidding behind Quaritch."

"And this is?"

"A shilling, sir; and thank you."

BOOKSELLING CHAT.

INTEREST in the sale of the Ashburnham library increases as the event draws near. The sale, which will be opened on June 25, is expected to last eight days, and among the items to be offered is the first printed edition of the Bible, for which the Earl gave £3,400. The Caxton books include a first edition of the Canterbury Tales and a fine copy of Boethius' De Consolatione Philosophie. The Wynkyn de Worde books are also a striking lot.

MESSRS. KARSLAKE & CO., of Charing Cross-road, though second-hand booksellers, have had the enterprise to publish an attractive album of early portraits and portrait-groups of the Queen and Royal Family. Most of the reproductions are from fine proof impressions of engravings by Cousins and other early Victorian engravers. The album, which is sold at a shilling, is a suitable contribution to the literary output of this year of Jubilee.

THE eleven Carlyle letters sold at Sotheby's on Tuesday realised £35 5s. Of these, one sold for £4 18s. This was the letter containing references to Frederick the Great; another letter, relating to the proofs of Carlyle's Cromwell, went for £4 14s. A third letter, addressed to Mrs. Montagu, and dealing with the pension to Burns's sister, fetched £3.

A LARGE London bookseller remarked the other day that his stock of leather-bound books and "sets" of standard authors had been much depleted at Easter. He was replenishing it for American and South African customers. In answer to a few inquiries he enlarged on the magnificent purchases frequently made by rich South Africans in London. A wealthy diamond merchant will order a hundred pounds' worth of leather-bound sets on sight, and with very little regard to literary choice. One customer buys books to that amount every year, but sells them at handsome profits in South Africa, where the sight of a really beautifully bound and printed book fresh from London opens purses easily.

THE same bookseller finds his Jewish customers very eager for leather-bound books and "sets"; and he added the interesting information that they are all attracted by the same books. As they frequently come into his shop a dozen together, the difficulty is to supply them all with Dickens, Macaulay, or Charlotte Brontë. For these are the authors they love. Chambers's Encyclopædia is in large and constant demand among Jewish customers. A book which they all buy, sooner or later, is Mr. Arthur William A'Beckett's The Comic History of England. Why? It amuses them; and little Jewish boys ripen to it every day.

THE NEW GALLERY.

SUMMER EXHIBITION.

To say that this exhibition is unequal is to use a most insufficient word. Certain spaces of the line are devoted, with all state and honour, to work that would hardly pass into the Royal Academy; and again there are a greater number, in proportion, of beautiful and salient things than there are at any Academy, or at any other Gallery, including the New English Art Club. Mr. Sargent is represented by two portraits, in which the vitality of his eye and hand is at the flood. The lamplight portrait of "Mrs. George Batten, Singing," has an extraordinary spirit; the change and flicker of life are on the closed eyelids, the singing mouth, and the whole face lightly strained and mobile. This is but a head and bust. The full-length of "Mrs. George Swinton," in white satin, seems to flash light on our eyes, and yet the first thing we see by that illumination is simplicity—simply painted soft hair, simple gleams of white, simple jewels, a face almost severely simple in the painting, and, as usual, somewhat abruptly lighted, and the simple pale colours of the chair, unhelped by shadow in the delicate concave and texture of the plain, hollow, silken back. One difference between this shining work and something fine, but not so masterly, is that the greater achievement does not at all take you by surprise by its emphasis, whereas the lesser is sometimes overwhelming. There are two or three good and even brilliant pictures in the New Gallery that have such lights and such salience—such execution—as seem to insist too much even upon the technical artistic quality; yet what they so boast of is less than the technical quality of Mr. Sargent, where the triumph so outruns comparison and makes no noise. Among the most conspicuous best pictures (and we shall have space for few but these) is a landscape—"Blue and Silver and Gold"—by Mr. Leslie Thomson, which has a tranquil if not thrilling charm of harmony; on the nude figures of bathing nymphs under an eastern sky, the light is warm from an actual or recent sunset; the moon is hidden from us, like the sun, but has gathered enough light to silver the cloud and the waters; the pine-trees to the right are beautiful in drawing and feeling. Mr. Fred Hall also paints evening light in his "Drinking Pool"; nothing could be finer than the cattle—in movement, action, life, surface, and form; and there is a charming passage in the more distant landscape, where the moon is beginning to rise, but this light that challenges bright-blue shadows gives us the impression of light as it were turned high, as nature's sunset does not look. This kind of fragrantcy is not chargeable against Mr. Edward Stott, who suggests light gently in his "Village Inn" and "Summer Idyll": purely beautiful is the colour of a white horse with twilight on the cool and tender white, whilst the inn window shines close by. Mr. Moffat Lindner's "Storm Cloud, Christchurch Harbour," seems finer in the landscape than in the cloud, which has no glory, whether of form, flight, or illumination. It is a subtle and very slight tone of illumination that makes the beauty of "In South Tyrol," by Mr. Adrian Stokes, as it lies, just perceptible, on the shoulders of snow. But this distinguished painter has this year somewhat withdrawn from the reach of our criticism. We hasten to confess that in the rocks and snow slopes he has studied his search has been for rather secret beauties of tone and colour that we too should have sought in order to know the whole of his success.

Mr. Arthur Tomson's "Summit" is a beautiful little landscape with trees finely drawn. Signor Costa has two of his most delicate works, which are certainly none the less welcome for being like so many from his hand in the past. "The First Dawn of 1897 on the Shore of the Tyrrhene Sea" has a wintry sweetness and purity as well as the classic elegance of all the shapes and lines he traces. There is a slender silver-work about some of the landscape of the South—distant mountains with the long journey of the fine outline of a range, calm waters and slight vegetation—that is made for the clear chasing of such a hand. "An Autumn Moonrise on the Pisan Mountains" is no less characteristic. Mr. Arnold Priestman has, as usual with him, a noble and grave view of nature in his "Evening"; the wind-flattened and serried trees and the scud flying soft and low have the touches of lovely art and feeling. Mr. Alfred Withers, too, has done well in the green shadow of the wood beyond his "Poppy Field." Mrs. M. R. Corbet imitates Signor Costa closely and with no small success in her "Blossoms and Dead Leaves"—a charming mingling of sere pale brown and the freshness of flowering trees. Mr. Arnesby Brown has painted his calves in "Above the Bay" with a full and most accomplished touch. From Mr. Wetherbee we expect something that shall charm us in glimpses, corners, little remote lights, and whites illumined in the distance; and it is far to the right and in a fleeting passage of hill-tops that we find the greatest beauty of "With Pipe and Tabor." In "An Idyll of Spring" Mr. Alfred East has aimed at an almost indescribable delicacy of blossom and branch; he has painted the sprinkled spring, so studied in reference to the light that the sprinklings are pale against pallor—not scattered in minute darks against brightness; the huge but dainty task has been achieved with extraordinary skill, but not perhaps with perfect charm. With a word of warm admiration for Mr. Allan, Mr. Hale, Mr. Arthur Lemon, for Lord Carlisle (the light in his walls has splendour), for Mr. Hartley, and for Mr. Alfred Parsons we must leave the landscapes.

Whether Sir Edward Burne Jones has already exhibited his "Pilgrim of Love" we know not, but it is as long familiar as though it had been the one, only, and sufficient Burne Jones of twenty years. With an inflexible resolution to know nothing of the painter's symbolism, we are free to question at any rate the brambles and the birds. The figures are full of grace; but the brambles grow strangely in arches and wheels, and the flock of birds are somewhat in a mob. Birds that are not symbolic have, as may be seen against any sky, a perfect order in their flight, a common direction of all their winking wings; they curve together upon such an impulse as a quill pen writes a double-curving line with.

Mr. Watts exhibits "Paris on Ida," which shows the shepherd awaiting the goddesses, each about to alight on the mountain, wrapped in an upright cloud. The idea is perhaps due to Tennyson, who makes Here "withdraw into her golden cloud," and it is peculiarly lovely—lovelier in Mr. Watts's vision of their arrival. The clouds are soft columns of gentle scud; one of them is opening, and, from just beyond the picture, sheds golden lights on the figure of Paris on his knees. Mr. Watts has also a very tenderly and delicately painted portrait. And one of the portraits of the year is the brilliant picture of Miss Kitson by Mr. H. S. Tuke. Mr. La Thangue does not forsake the dappled sun and shadow of his often painted orchard; in "An Autumn Morning" his work is as solid as ever, and as full of nature. Mr. Waterhouse also does beautifully what he has very often done before. The fine plum-colour of "Mariana in the South" is in delicate contrast with the blues of the marble pavement that leads away to a narrow glimpse of sunshine. The great length of the leg to the knee and the shortness from the knee to the heel seem to need explaining. Mr. Collier Smithers has painted an exceedingly good picture in "A la Petite Chinoise"; Mr. Arthur Melville a clever, but rather grotesque portrait; and finally (the Balcony must be left out altogether) Mrs. Swynnerton more than one vigorous work full of life and spirit; and Mrs. Alma Tadema a little picture worthy of a fine Dutch master of the past.

A. M.

DRAMA.

WITH the exception of the opening of Her Majesty's Theatre, which happened too late for discussion in this article, there is nothing of any particular importance to record of the theatre. But a few pieces have been produced in which a remark or so of interest may be made, and I am becoming a little fearful lest a habit of silence may grow upon me, and the readers of the ACADEMY may think that I neglect to scout, as it were, for their amusement.

So I will begin with "Dr. Johnson, an Episode in One Act," by Mr. Leo Trevor, which is being played in front of "The Queen's Proctor," at the Strand. It is a pretty little play, the scheme of it being that Mrs. Boswell, enraged by her husband's devotion to the Doctor and neglect of herself, flirts with her cousin, Captain Alan McKenzie, of the Royal Regiment of Foot, and is on the point of eloping with him when the Doctor intervenes, and by assuring Mrs. Boswell of her husband's real affection for her, and by appealing to the better instincts of the Captain, carries the day in favour of morals and happiness ever after. The Johnsonian diction is cleverly and consistently used, and the whole thing, except for an occasional exaggeration, is plausible and sympathetic. One can imagine that the Doctor, with his good heart and his enthusiasm for morals, would have enjoyed himself immensely in the part assigned to him. He is very fairly represented. But "poor Bozzy" is not: he is represented traditionally. Now the view that Boswell—one of the greatest artists in biography who ever lived, a man of culture and knowledge of the world—was a combination of ass and toady is extremely silly, even for a popular view. It is known (he said it himself) that he often deliberately played the part of a butt to draw the Doctor out, thinking that nobody would be so foolish as to count him a fool therefore, in the face of his work: an opinion in which he was mistaken, as we know. But I do not blame Mr. Trevor for his Boswell: the true Boswell would be incredible to his audience.

Mr. Bouchier played Dr. Johnson very creditably indeed. He was cleverly made up, carried himself appropriately, and spoke his ponderous sentences naturally. I think he made a mistake in adopting a childishly eager manner in his quarrel with the Captain, but that was his only slip. Mr. Fred Thorne played the traditional Boswell with amazing skill, and Mr. Weir and Miss Crowe did what was necessary with the wife and the Captain.

I was agreeably surprised in "The French Maid," produced on Saturday at Terry's Theatre. As I listened to the expected, but nevertheless trying, flow of customary inanity, suddenly a couple of lines (in a song), which were distinctly witty, fell upon my ears. I referred to the book of lyrics and found that my ears were not mistaken. Mr. Basil Hood, the writer of the book, has a very pretty gift of imitation. The song in question, a duet between two twins, might have been written by Tom Hood. Another song, "It's ever my endeavour," for a comic admiral, was Mr. Gilbert, by no means at his worst. A third song, for an amorous sailor, in which a fresh name for his beloved comes in every verse, was very funny. If Mr. Basil Hood would turn out a book of lyrics all of this quality, it would be one of the best of recent years. That is poor praise, let me say it would be a very good book. But he must invent a better plot than that of "My French Maid," which was almost unusually feeble. The music was not good, I thought, but it did not destroy the songs, and the piece was capably played by a capable and hard-working company. Therefore, if you care for this kind of thing at all, "The French Maid" is a thing to see.

BUT more use might be made of the acting talent in it. Mr. Eric Lewis's humour always appeals to me, and there should be more of it. Miss Kate Cutler is a very exceptionally delightful exponent of musical comedy—having grace and finish as well as archness and good looks and a pretty voice—and there was not nearly enough of her. Mr. Herbert Standing might be given more to do. Of the others, I must mention Mr. Clancy and Mr. Murray King, who were funny, and Mr. Joseph Wilson, who was very funny, and Mr. Richard Green, whose patriotism and manly emotion generally you could have cut with a knife.

I INTENDED to write about another piece I went to see, but I cannot praise it honestly, and no useful lesson, on the other hand, is taught by its defects. So of the Drama let so much have been said.

G. S. S.

MUSIC.

MR. MANNS'S BENEFIT CONCERT.

ANOTHER Palace season is over and gone, and Mr. Manns has shown that he has still plenty of energy and enthusiasm to continue the concerts, if only the public will properly support him. So much orchestral music, and of the best, is now to be heard in London proper that the journey to Sydenham becomes less and less of a necessity; but Sydenham itself and the immediate neighbourhood ought surely to take increasing interest in the undertaking. Messrs. Richter and Mottl may be special interpreters of Wagner, yet one can scarcely hear finer renderings of the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and other modern symphonies than those given under the direction of Mr. Manns.

The programme last Saturday afternoon was a long one—too long indeed, but allowance must be made for a "benefit." It opened with a novelty, a dramatic overture, entitled "Mistral," by Mr. Herbert Bunting. There is some clever writing in it, though the subject-matter is of unequal merit. As a whole the music may not make a strong impression, and yet it gives promise of better things in the future.

Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto was played by Maud MacCarthy, a young violinist who has already given two or three concerts in London. She is not yet in her teens, and, of course, does not play on a full-sized instrument. So far, therefore, as tone was concerned, there was something lacking; but her intonation was faultless, her technique splendid, and her reading of the work free from all affectation. The Finale was given with extraordinary dash and brilliancy. She is altogether a wonderful child, and, health and strength permitting, will become an artist of the very first rank. She was received, as was natural, with great enthusiasm. Prodiges, however clever, are, as a rule, unsatisfactory, but Maud MacCarthy is an exception; she is not a made, but a born artist. Someone in the audience was heard to say that it was a pity she should have chosen a work so familiar, and one which has so often been performed by great violinists. With that remark I can by no means agree. The little lady is already a great, if not fully developed, violinist, and there was no feeling of effort about her pure playing.

Mme. Burmeister-Peterson gave a clever and spirited rendering of Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Melodies with orchestra, dedicated to Dr. Hans von Bülow. The opening theme has character and breadth, afterwards spoilt by tinselly treatment; and in like manner the "Vivace" theme, after its first delivery, is not improved. The showy piece, however, is effective in its way.

Mme. Albani sang "Ardon Gl' Incensi" from Donizetti's "Lucia," and, later on, the "Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan." It would be difficult to imagine two pieces offering greater contrast, and it says much for the vocalist that she distinguished herself in both; in the former, the Flute obligato part was well played by Mr. Fransella. The general public goes to concerts for enjoyment rather than for instruction; yet some of the audience must have reflected on the extraordinary change which has come over dramatic music during the present century; and they may probably have felt thankful that they did not live in the so-called palmy days of Italian opera. In this year, by the way, occurs the centenary of Donizetti's birth; popular, however, as the Italian composer once was, I doubt whether, apart from the City of Bergamo, in which he was born, much notice will be taken of the event.

The other vocalist was Mr. Andrew Black, who sang songs by Wagner, Lassen, and Raff, though scarcely in his best form. The programme included Brahms's "Song of Destiny," one of the master's most inspired works. The music is wonderfully tender and earnest; though small in compass, it is a great composition. Brahms was here and there dry: intellect sometimes outweighed inspiration; in the "Song of Destiny" the skilful hand of the composer was throughout guided by strong emotion. A Viennese critic has justly described the work as an echo of the "German Requiem"; the idea which is there presented in a Christian form being here given in a classical one. The Crystal Palace Choir sang with care and intelligence.

I have still to speak of Schumann's Symphony in D minor and Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3, which were given by Mr. Manns in his best manner. The Symphony may not, indeed, be Schumann's greatest, and yet it is full of interesting music. In the analysis "G" speaks of an "obstinate monotony of iteration" in the first movement, and to a certain extent the same may be said of the Finale. When, however, the Symphony receives a magnificent interpretation, as on the present occasion, it is always welcome. Schumann intended the whole work to be played without break; he described it on the original score as "in one piece" ("in einem Satze"). Mr. Manns, after the last chord of the Allegro, found some of the audience unwilling to conform to, or possibly ignorant of, the composer's excellent intentions—for there was an attempt at applause—but he went straight on. The "Leonora" came at the end of the programme, and it was admirably performed. To this overture Wagner's "Meistersinger," perhaps, comes nearest, if the two be considered as absolute music. As introduction to the work which follows, Wagner's is superior, for it is an epitome, as it were, of the opera; Beethoven's "Leonora" dwarfs "Fidelio," however great the latter may be.

J. S. S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE LITERATURE OF SPORT."

London, April 22.

I have only just returned from abroad and seen Mr. Baillie Grohman's letter on the above subject, in which he has devoted some of his valuable time to criticising The Poetry of Sport and my articles on "Old Sporting Prints." As to Mr. Grohman's qualifications to deal with these subjects I know nothing, but if he treats other works as carefully as he has treated mine he must certainly be a very painstaking critic.

To avoid taking up more of your space than is necessary, I will deal with his statements as briefly as possible. He mentions that I have evidently no idea that Turberville's hunting book was taken from the French, although in Sporting Prints, No. 2, September, 1895, pp. 221-3, I devoted over two pages to the subject. Not only had I the French work before me at the time of writing, but I was also aware of the fact, which probably he does not know, that many of the French wood-cuts were bought by Turberville's publishers and, after being defaced and altered, were used for the English edition. At the same time, though Turberville did copy from La Venerie de Jacques du Fouilloux, 1560-61, and other foreign writers, much of what he wrote was taken from his own experience, and it was with this part of his writing I have invariably dealt. Mr. Grohman then goes on to say that if I had been acquainted with these facts I should not have spoken of hunting the wolf and the bear in England during this period. I certainly should not, and I never did; the only time I mentioned these animals is in a quotation from Turberville: "Together," he says, speaking of beasts of chase, "with three not in use with us in England—the wolf, the bear and the reindeer." I am next accused of saying that the huntsmen of old did not trouble about their hounds changing scent, though more than ten pages of my work is devoted to showing how careful they were to avoid a change. I simply stated that if game was plentiful in those very early days, when nets and cross-bows were used, it is doubtful if the huntsman troubled much about a change; and I still think it is very doubtful.

We next come to my article on battue hunting, which "sport" he says never existed. As this is a bare statement, for which he gives not the slightest authority, and as anyone who chooses can verify the facts for themselves, I will save your space and not give a column of references. But it is quite another thing when he goes on to speak of the "famous German artist Ridinger" (who, by the by, was not a German). He says that the engravings chosen by me were picked quite at random. He may know, but I was under the impression that I spent days of work in selecting these prints, that not one was chosen without careful thought, and I feel certain I am as well acquainted as he is with the full list of about thirteen hundred works said, probably in many instances quite erroneously, to have been executed by Ridinger.

Now we come to the statement that seventeen writers, whom Mr. Grohman could name, have written about Ridinger. I fancy I could name twenty, all but two of whom (who give very little detail of his life) were copyists. If, however, everything is known, and always has been known, about Ridinger, how comes it that Thienemann, whose work was published in 1856, had to dispute about the very important fact as to whether this great artist was ever a huntsman or not? My belief is, and has been for some time, that Thienemann was wrong and that Blumenbach and other contemporary writers were more likely to be correct. But Mr. Baillie Grohman seems to prefer to accept the opinion of modern writers without taking the trouble to test their accuracy; perhaps that is why he finds the German so easy. If he will consult the earlier works he may discover the reason for the difficulties in the German text. It would almost seem that though he can name seventeen writers who have written about Ridinger he has only read one—namely, Thienemann. He certainly quotes from no other.

It would also interest me to know where I have ever mentioned my knowledge or want of knowledge of German. I had, however, better let this pass, as my critic has certainly got the better of me here. He has discovered a most obvious printer's error (he calls it three mistakes, although if he knows anything of printing he must see in a moment how they occurred). This error, together, I am sorry to say, with a few others, was found out about six months ago, too late to alter in the first edition.

By why should Mr. Grohman give me this cruel stab in his last paragraph? "Mr. Peek, from beginning to end, never tires of calling himself a student." I believe I have mentioned the word once, and only once; and this is the sentence in which it occurs: "This work (the technical part) I must hand over to others, specialists and various schools of art, or students of some particular subject. My work is but that of a diggor up and collector of buried or scattered riches connected with sport." I had always intended to leave such students as Mr. Grohman to accomplish the more difficult task of writing on this subject from a student's point of view; that is to say, if they felt disposed to give the time and trouble required for such an undertaking.

HEDLEY PEEK.

A. & C. BLACK'S LIST.

HANDBOOK to CHRISTIAN and ECCLESIASTICAL ROME. By H. M. and M. A. R. T. Part I., THE CHRISTIAN MONUMENTS. Illustrated with 23 Cuts and Plans. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

NAPLES in the NINETIES: a Sequel to Naples in 1888. By E. NEVILLE ROLFE, B.A., H.B.M. Consul at Naples. With numerous Illustrations. Square crown 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

FADS of an OLD PHYSICIAN. By Dr. GEORGE S. KEITH, Author of "Plea for a Simpler Life," to which this is a companion volume. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

FERRETS: their Management in Health and Disease, with Remarks on their Legal Status. By NICHOLAS EVERITT. With numerous Illustrations. Small crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

A DOZEN WAYS of LOVE. By Miss L. DOUGALL, Author of "Beggars All." Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

OUT of her SHROUD. By Henry OCHILTREE, Author of "Redburn." Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

LONDON: A. & C. BLACK, SOHO SQUARE.

A PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT

Of unique interest is given with each issue of "THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:—

1896.
BEN JONSON	November 14
JOHN KEATS	" 21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING	" 28
TOM HOOD	December 5
THOMAS GRAY	" 12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON	" 19
SIR WALTER SCOTT	" 26
1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON	January 2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY	" 9
LEIGH HUNT	" 16
LORD MACAULAY	" 23
ROBERT SOUTHEY	" 30
S. T. COLERIDGE	February 6
CHARLES LAMB	" 13
MICHAEL DRAYTON	" 20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR	" 27
SAMUEL PEPYS	March 6
EDMUND WALLER	" 13
WILKIE COLLINS	" 20
JOHN MILTON	" 27
WILLIAM COWPER	April 3
CHARLES DARWIN	" 10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON	" 17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW	" 24

To-day's Issue.
ANDREW MARVELL

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

ON WEDNESDAY NEXT, 8vo, 14s.

HISTORY OF INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT.

Vol. I. Containing a History of the Evolution of Greek and Hindoo Thought, of Græco-Roman Paganism, of Judaism, and of Christianity down to the Closing of the Schools of Athens by Justinian 529 A.D.

By JOHN BEATTIE CROZIER, Author of "Civilisation and Progress."

. In the present volume, the second of the series, of which "Civilisation and Progress" was the introductory, the author has kept two main objects steadily in view. The first is, to apply the Law of Evolution to the whole field of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development with the same thoroughgoingness with which it has been applied by Darwin, Huxley, and Spencer, to the Physical World. The second is, to make, if possible, such and every portion of a work written (as was inevitable from the nature of the subjects treated of) for scholars and specialists of the different departments intelligible without effort to the great bulk of general readers.

NEW BOOK BY DEAN FARRAR.

8vo, 15s.

THE BIBLE: its Meaning and Supremacy.

By F. W. FARRAR, D.D., F.R.S., Dean of Canterbury.

CONTRIBUTIONS to the SCIENCE of MYTHOLOGY. By the Right Hon. Professor F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M., Member of the French Institute. 2 vols., 8vo, 32s.

"There can be no two opinions about the value of the book itself as a permanent contribution to science. The work has many claims to be regarded as the keystone and completion of the arch which its author, by the honoured labour of a long life, has thrown across the gulf of ignorance and prejudice that lies between man's desire and a knowledge of the truth."—Scotsman.

"We are grateful for the graceful scholarship, the massive learning, and valuable phonetics of these two volumes."—Guardian.

THE LIFE and TIMES of THOMAS WAKLEY. By S. Squire

SPRIGGE, M.B. Cantab. With 2 Portraits. 8vo, 18s.

[On Wednesday next.]

. Thomas Wakley was Member of Parliament for Finsbury after the passage of the great Reform Bill, and played a prominent part in the politics of the day, but it is as founder of the Lancet and as Coroner for Middlesex that he is best remembered. His efforts in the cause of medical reform, though eventually successful, led at the first to his expulsion from the metropolitan hospitals and the buildings of the College of Surgeons, while his attacks upon professional abuses of all sorts involved him in numerous actions at law. As coroner he was responsible for the abolition of flogging in the Army, and as journalist he exposed such notorious quacks as Chabert, John St. John Long, and the O'Keys. This book is a hitherto unwritten chapter in the social history of the nineteenth century, as it is a description of the development of the medical profession between the years 1820 and 1880.

HARVARD HISTORICAL STUDIES.

NOMINATIONS for ELECTIVE OFFICE in the UNITED STATES. By FREDERICK W. DALLINGER, A.M., Member of the Massachusetts Senate. 8vo, 7s. 6d.

PAPERS and NOTES on the GENESIS and MATRIX of the DIAMOND. By the late HENRY CARVILL LEWIS, M.A., F.G.S., Professor of Mineralogy in the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, Professor of Geology in Haverford College, U.S.A. Edited from his unpublished MSS. by Professor T. G. BONNEY, D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S., &c. 8vo, 7s. 6d.

LECTURES in the LYCEUM; or, Aristotle's Ethics for English

READERS. Edited by ST. GEORGE STOCK. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

CROMWELL'S PLACE in HISTORY. Founded on Six Lectures delivered at Oxford. By S. R. GARDINER, D.C.L., Ford's Lecturer, 1896. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

[On Wednesday next.]

A WOMAN'S PART in a REVOLUTION. By Mrs. John Hays

HAMMOND. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"A vivacious account of the stirring events in Johannesburg in which she was nearly concerned."—Standard.

"A good many people have exercised their pens over the South African trouble. No one has done so in a more entertaining manner than Mrs. Hays Hammond."—Westminster Gazette.

NEW BOOK BY MR. S. LEVETT YEATS.

A GALAHAD of the CREEKS, and other Stories. By S. Levett

YEATS, Author of "The Honour of Savelli." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It would be difficult to say whether the literary grace, the loftiness and purity of tone, or the inherent interest of the story constitutes the most admirable characteristic of this charming work. In every respect the book is worthy of high praise."—Aberdeen Daily Free Press.

"There is plenty of dash about Mr. Levett Yeats's manner of telling a spirited story."—Academy.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

No. 175. MAY, 1897. 8vo, 6d.

THE CHEVALIER D'AURIAU. Chaps. 11-13. By S. LEVETT YEATS, Author of "The Honour of Savelli."

RURAL PROSPERITY. By Sir EDMUND VERNEX, Bart.

THE BALLAD of the LITTLE BLACK HOUND. By Mrs. CLEMENT SHORTER.

LOOKING ROUND. By A. K. H. B.

SUMMARY PROCEDURE. By HENRY MARTLEY.

THE NEW CURE for SNAKE-BITES. By Mrs. PRACY FRANKLAND.

THE FIGHTING TEMERAIRE. By HENRY NEWBOLT.

AT the SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., LONDON, NEW YORK, AND BOMBAY.

WHAT THE EDITORS SAY.

Caw's Safety Fountain Pen.

Caw's Stylographic Pen.

THE WESTMINSTER BUDGET.

A USEFUL COMPANION FOR THE WRITING DESK.

"Everybody agrees with Lord Lytton's king-cardinal that 'the pen is mightier than the sword.' As in other matters in this our day, it goes without saying that there are pens and pens. We are not confined to the reed, the stick, or the goose-quill for writing purposes. The Americans have changed all that. To-day the greatest dunce in facts knows that our cousins across the sea have their almost perpetual ink-well pen within itself, known as the Fountain pen, and also that smaller arrangement for the pocket, the Stylograph. Both are progressive inventions. When these items for writers first came into service there were little faults in their construction that made the user cry out, 'Bother this pen!' But those little irregularities are almost, if not quite, past history. And in many points the Caw Pen Company has been the magician. Caw's Safety Fountain and Stylograph pens have, because of their special points, a repute beyond most of their neighbours on the market. One of the little benefits of the Caw pens is that the pen is always in a well of ink, so that it never gets dry, and from this it follows that there is always a supply of the necessary fluid when the pen is in use, and further the pen never gets choked up; but the great feature of these Caw Safety Pens is the hitherto non-existent advantage that the pen need not be carried in a horizontal position, but can lie in the waistcoat pocket, or be held upside down, without possibility of leakage of ink. Then the 'Hexagon' stylo-pen, as its name infers, is not made as round as a rolling-pin, but is a bevelled plinth, and from this cause it has the happy quality of keeping on the spot where you put it down; hence the pen does not skate off your desk as if it were marble. The cost of the pens varies, of course, according to size and finish. You can invest in Caw's pens in any amount from 5s. up to 30s., and any one of them is a boon in writing. But they will give you all details in regard to each and every one at your stationer's, at the stores, or at the village chemist's shop. The British depôt is 46, Holborn Viaduct. M.P.'s and busy business men, make a note of Caw's pens. There may be a mine of wealth buried in the suggestion."

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Pencil.

TRUTH.

"The latest Yankee notion in lead pencils: the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

THE EVENING NEWS AND POST (London).

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the 'Blaisdell Paper Pencil.' Penknives, blackened thumbs, and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

BLACK AND WHITE.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

THE LADY.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the 'Blaisdell' variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

A SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL.

"Has the death-day of the cedar pencil arrived? It may be so. At any rate, the 'Blaisdell' self-sharpening paper pencil is an innovation. Your pencil is never pointless—surely a boon to all busy people, be they writers, printers' readers, or warehouse folks; or others, a part of whose business it is to set their mark on this or that item or article."

MORNING LEADER (London).

"The ordinary blacklead pencil in its wooden case if of good quality does not promise much scope to the inventive genius thirsting to discover a real improvement, but a clever American firm have a design in lead pencils that deserves popularity for its ingenuity. The lead is as usual, but round it is wound a thin strip of paper to the ordinary pencil thickness, and slightly notched at intervals, so that a small portion can be removed at a time as the lead wears down, producing an ever-sharpened pencil, always in working order. The new device is known as the 'Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Paper Pencil.'"

THE QUEEN.

"In these hurrying days any invention that tends to economise time and labour is a universal boon, and such a one is the 'Blaisdell' paper pencil, which is winning golden opinions in America, and is now coming into use on this side the Atlantic. What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening! and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated. The 'Blaisdell' pencils are made in various colours."

The BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL is

Manufactured in 5 degrees of Graphite, viz.: HB, H, B, HH, BB, price 2d. each.

5 varieties of Colours: Blue, Red, Green, Yellow, Soft Black ... " 3d. "

Shape, size, and use exactly the same as a cedar pencil;

BUT,

It is covered with paper—not wood! Its point is always perfect—no chips, no dust. It does not waste in re-sharpening—the only wear is the wear of the lead in writing.

SAVES TIME, TROUBLE, AND MONEY.

If not found at any Stationers, a Set of 3 Black and 2 Coloured Pencils will be sent Post Free to any address in the United Kingdom for 1s., by THE BLAISDELL PENCIL COMPANY, Limited, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

DOMESDAY-BOOK and BEYOND. Three Essays in the Early History of England. By F. W.

MAITLAND, LL.D., Downing Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Royal 8vo, 15s.
Athenæum.—"The advent of a new book from the pen of Professor Maitland is always an event of importance in the world of law and history... There are points, no doubt, in the author's conclusions which are open to some question, and in a few—a very few—cases he may possibly be mistaken; but it is at least safe to say that Domesday students owe him a real debt of gratitude for his perfect and scrupulous candour."

THE HISTORY of ENGLISH LAW BEFORE the TIME of EDWARD I. By Sir Frederick

POLLOCK, Bart., M.A., LL.D., Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law; and FREDERIC WILLIAM MAITLAND, LL.D., Downing Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. 2 vols., royal 8vo, 40s.
Spectator.—"It is, perhaps, not too much to say that no more important contribution than this has been made to legal literature in this century. As a whole, we have nothing but gratitude to express for a work which goes far to redeem that neglect of its history which has too long been the scandal of English law."

THE LIFE and MIRACLES of ST. WILLIAM of NORWICH. By Thomas of Monmouth. Now

First Edited from the Unique Manuscript, with an Introduction, Translation, and Notes, by AUGUSTUS JESSOPP, D.D., Honorary Canon of Norwich, and M. R. JAMES, Litt.D., Fellow and Senior Dean of King's College, Cambridge. Royal 8vo, buckram, with Map and 5 Colotype Plates, 18s.
Times.—"It has been very carefully and skilfully edited, with an introduction, translation, and notes, by Dr. Jessopp and Dr. James. The names of these scholars are a sure guarantee for the adequate treatment of the several questions critical, historical, hagiological, and evidential, connected with the subject-matter of the narrative; while the nature of the legend itself, involving nothing less than the primary origin of the hideous myth of Jewish ritual murder, invests it with profound interest and importance."

THE FOUNDATIONS of GEOMETRY. By the Hon. B. Russell, B.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Demy 8vo. [Nearly ready.]

A TREATISE on ABEL'S THEOREM. By H. F. Baker, M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, University Lecturer in Mathematics. Royal 8vo. [Nearly ready.]

AN ELEMENTARY OLD ENGLISH GRAMMAR. (Early West Saxon.) By A. J. Wyatt, M.A., late Scholar Christ's College, Cambridge; External Examiner in English to Victoria University. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. [Immediately.]

TWO NEW WORKS ON EDUCATIONAL SCIENCE.

CHAPTERS on the AIMS and PRACTICE of TEACHING. Edited by Frederic Spencer, M.A., Phil. Doc., Professor of the French Language and Literature in the University College of North Wales, formerly Chief Master on the Modern Side in the Leys School, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 6s.
Times.—"The essays are vigorous and suggestive, and display a command of the theory and practice of education which should secure the attention of all who are interested in educational progress and reform."

VITTORINO DA FELTRE and other HUMANIST EDUCATORS: Essays and Versions. An Introduction to the History of Classical Education. By W. H. WOODWARD, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford; Lecturer on Education in Victoria University. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Times.—"THE FIRST MODERN SCHOOLMASTER.—Mr. Woodward has drawn a most engaging portrait of this great teacher—his aims, his methods, his rare personal qualities, and his disinterested devotion to high educational ideals..... We can warmly commend the whole monograph as at once singularly attractive and full of instruction."

A SELECTION of PASSAGES of UNPOINTED HEBREW. from Genesis, Isaiah, and the Psalms. By W. H. BENNETT, M.A. Lond. and Camb., sometime Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, Professor of Old Testament Literature, &c., Hackney College and New College, London. Crown 8vo, 1s.

TEXTS AND STUDIES.—CONTRIBUTIONS TO BIBLICAL AND PATRISTIC LITERATURE.

Edited by J. ARMITAGE ROBINSON, D.D., Norrisian Professor of Divinity.

Vol. V., No. 1.—APOCRYPHA ANECDOTA. Second Series. By M. R. James, Litt.D., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE CAMBRIDGE GREEK TESTAMENT FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

General Editor—J. ARMITAGE ROBINSON, D.D., Norrisian Professor of Divinity.

THE EPISTLE to the PHILIPPIANS. Edited by Rev. H. C. G. Moule, D.D., Principal of Ridley Hall, Cambridge. 2s. 6d.

CAMBRIDGE GEOGRAPHICAL SERIES.

General Editor—F. H. H. GUILDFORD, late Lecturer in Geography in the University of Cambridge.

A HISTORY of ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY. By the Rev. H. F. Tozer, M.A., Honorary Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. Crown 8vo, with 10 Maps, 1's. 6d. [Immediately.]

CAMBRIDGE NATURAL SCIENCE MANUALS.—BIOLOGICAL SERIES.

General Editor: A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Christ's College.

A MANUAL and DICTIONARY of the FLOWERING PLANTS and FERNS. By J. C. Willis, M.A., Director of the Royal Botanic Gardens, Ceylon. Crown 8vo, 2 vols., 10s. 6d. Bookman.—"One of the most useful books existing for students of Botany..... The student who has this book and the chances which Kew, or even one of the smaller gardens, affords him, will make a steady and really scientific progress."

THE VERTEBRATE SKELETON. By S. H. Reynolds, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 12s. 6d. [Immediately.]

THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORICAL SERIES.

General Editor—G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, Professor of History in the University of Edinburgh.

A HISTORY of the AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES, from their Foundation to the Year 1893. By E. JENKS, M.A., Reader in English Law in the University of Oxford, formerly Dean of the Faculty of Law in Melbourne University. With Maps. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

PITT PRESS SERIES.—New Volume.

SUBJECT for LONDON UNIVERSITY B.A. EXAM, and for CAMBRIDGE HIGHER LOCAL EXAM., 1898.

BACON'S ESSAYS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Alfred S. West, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge; Fellow of University College, London. Cloth, 3s. 6d.; half-parchment, gilt top, 5s. Speaker.—"We congratulate Mr. West on this admirable, and in every sense satisfactory, edition of one of the greatest of English classics."

London: C. J. CLAY & SONS, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane.

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1305.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1897.

PRICE 3d.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied
promptly to order.
Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.
LATEST CATALOGUES:—
No. 31 BEATICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1443 lots.)
.. 32, 34 MISCELLANEOUS (763, 723 lots.)
.. 33, PHILOSOPHY. (840 lots.)

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
Catalogues of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
Catalogues on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, BOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
Catalogues post free on application.

BOOKS, a CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND.
(1) Pertaining to Annuities, Finance, and Political Economy in general, post free; (2) General Literature, two Shillings.
C. HANNAK, 382, Goswell Road, London, E.C.
Libraries Purchased.

T. H. WOHLER BEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
Catalogues on application.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE
LIBRARIES.—The MAY CATALOGUE of Valuable NEW and SECOND-HAND WORKS, offered at prices greatly reduced, is
Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H.
SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 114, for March), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street, Liverpool.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 28 West 3rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS.—
Catalogues sent on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.
Telegrams: MOWSILL, LONDON. [Established 1819.]

TO AUTHORS.—Messrs. DIGBY, LONG & CO.
(Publishers of "The Author's Manual" 3s. 6d. net, eighth
edition) INVITE AUTHORS to FORWARD their MSS. (Fiction,
Travel, Poetry, &c.) suitable for Volumes for prompt consideration.—
Address 18, Boulevard Street, Fleet Street, London.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING and PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.,
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast
folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 6511. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)
Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

CURIOS.—Splendid Collection of Old JAPANESE CURIOSITIES, Inro, Ivory Carvings, Embroideries, Netsukes, Kakemonoes, Sword-guards, Tobacco-boxes, &c., to EX-CHANGE for good Pictures.—Sheppey Villa, 7, Rumsey Road, Bristol, S.W.

TYPE-WRITING neatly, accurately, and ex-
pediently executed. Scientific MSS. a specialty.—Miss
MARTIN, 19, Beaumont Street, Portland Place, W.

THE SECOND INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY CONFERENCE, 1897.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart, M.P., F.R.S.
Hon. Treasurer—
HENRY R. TEDDER, Esq.
Hon. Secretary—
J. Y. W. MAC ALISTER, Esq.,
20, Hanover Square, W.

The Conference will be held (by the kind permission of the Right
Hon. the Lord Mayor and Corporation) in the COUNCIL CHAMBER,
GUILDHALL, LONDON, on JULY 13, 14, 15, and 16, 1897, and will be attended by the representatives of the principal libraries throughout the world. Papers will be read on appropriate subjects, and some time will be devoted to open Discussions. All persons interested in the extension of the library movement or in the management of libraries are cordially invited to join the Conference. The Lord Mayor has invited the members of the Conference to a Conversation in the Mansion House on the evening of July 13.
An Exhibition of Library Appliances will be an important feature of the Conference. Intending exhibitors should communicate with
the Hon. Secretary of the Exhibition Committee, Thomas Mason, Esq., 115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. The Subscription, One Guinea, entitles Members to receive the Transactions and other Publications gratis, and to attend all meetings and social gatherings. Applications for Membership should be sent at once to the Hon. Secretary.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East, S.W.
126th EXHIBITION OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6d.
SIR FREDERICK H. HENKNER, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

The ANNIVERSARY MEETING will be held (by permission of the Senate) in the HALL of the UNIVERSITY of LONDON, BUR-LINGTON GARDENS, W., on MONDAY, May 17th, at 2.30 p.m.
Sir CLEMENT R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S., President, in the Chair.

During the Meeting the Council and Officers will be elected for the ensuing year, the Annual Report of the Council will be read, the President will give his Address, and the Gold Medals and other Awards of the Society will be presented.
The ANNUAL DINNER of the Society will be held on the evening of the Anniversary Meeting, at the HOTEL METROPOLE, Whitehall Rooms, Whitehall Place, at 7.30 p.m. Dinner charge, 51 s.
Friends of Fellows are admissible to the Dinner.

MCGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL, CANADA.

CHAIR OF ZOOLOGY.
The Governors of McGill University are prepared to give APPLI-CATIONS for Appointment to the newly founded PRINCIPALSHIP of ZOOLOGY. Salary, 2,500 Dols. per annum. Candidates from
Great Britain are requested to forward applications, with any testimonials and references they may desire to submit, on or before
15th June, addressed, "PRINCIPAL," Office of the High Commissioner
for Canada, 17, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

FACULTY OF SCIENCE.

RESEARCH SCHOLARSHIPS
(Founded by the late T. AUBREY BOWEN, Esq., of Melbourne, Australia).

The object of these SCHOLARSHIPS is to encourage higher work and research in Scientific Professional Engineering, and in Chemical and Metallurgical Science.

APPLICATIONS, supported by details of educational training, and references to former teachers and others, should be sent in to the Registrar on or before the 1st of June, 1897. The Awards will be made in September next, and the Scholarships will be tenable during the Session 1897-98.

- (a) TWO BOWEN SCHOLARSHIPS in ENGINEERING, of the value of £100 each.
- (b) ONE BOWEN SCHOLARSHIP in METALLURGY, of the value of £100.
- (c) THREE PRIESTLEY SCHOLARSHIPS in CHEMISTRY, of the value of £100 each.

Further particulars may be obtained on application to the REGISTRAR.

EDUCATIONAL.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.

1897.—EXAMINATION, July 6th, 7th. One of £80, two of
£50, and Minor Scholarships of £15 to £30. Candidates to be under 16 years of age.
For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—AN EXAMINA- TION will be held in July next to fill up not less than FIVE RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS, and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the HEAD MASTER, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI- LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.

The last, most complete and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-
Instruction.
Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.
Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 2 dols. 50 cents.
American. 10s. 6d. English. Post free.
Prospectus with opinions of EDUCATORS, SCIENTIFIC, PROFESSIONAL,
and BUSINESS MEN all over the world free.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 19, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
NOT SOLD ELSEWHERE. 200 REGENT STREET, LONDON

SALES BY AUCTION.

THE OLD MASTERS.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & CO. will
SELL by AUCTION, at AMSTERDAM, on TUESDAY
JUNE 1, 1897, the very important Cabinets of OLD PICTURES of
G. DE CLERQ, Esq., and of Mrs. JENTINK-PARRET, containing exceedingly fine specimens by Avercamp, Asselyn, Bakhuizen, Berckhuyde, Berghem, van Beyeren, F. Bol, J. Both, Velvet-Breughel, Pieter Claess, Coddé, Decker, Ducl, van Everdingen, Fyt, Hackaert (2 pieces), D. Hals, Heda, de Heem, B. van der Helst (magnificent composition of four figures—life size), Hondaeoeter, Honthorst, Koninck, Lieveens, Maes, van der Meer, van der Meulen, J. M. Molenaar (3 pieces), Aert van der Neer (3 pieces), G. Neyts, A. Palamedes (3 pieces), Pynacker (3 pieces), G. de Ring, J. Ruissdael, S. Ruyssdael, H. Sautleven, Slingslandt, Jan Steen (3 pieces), Stoop (2 pieces), van Steenk, Terborch, A. van de Velde, W. van de Velde, Jun. (capital battle-scene of the English and Dutch fleets), van de Venne (5 pieces), Verboom, Vinckboons, S. de Vlieger, Mart de Vos, R. van Vries, Walscappelle, van de Werf, Weenix, &c.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & CO. will
SELL by AUCTION, on the SAME DAY, the beautiful
Collection of OLD DRAWINGS, the Cabinet of W. F. FIEK, Esq.
Please apply for the Illustrated Catalogues at the Office Doelenstraat 10, Amsterdam.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1897. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

WANTED, BOOKPLATES of Bozman, Walker,
Giles, Beverley, Cabot, Pace; also any Old Specimens. Very best prices will be paid.—Moores, 5, Trelawn Road, Leyton, Essex.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

WILL BE PUBLISHED SHORTLY. THE NORWICH SCHOOL of PAINTING.

A Series of Autotype Reproductions of Works by JOHN SELL
COTMAN, OLD CROME, STARK, LADBROOKE, BRIGHT
MIDDLETON, DANIEL LEMAN, LOUND, &c. Forty Auto type Plates, mounted on grey boards, in portfolio. Price Ten Guineas net.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON.

This important Series of over Four Hundred Permanent Carbon
Reproductions of the chief Pictures in this magnificent collection includes representative selections from the Italian, Flemish, Dutch, Spanish, French, and English Schools. By the aid of the most recent improvements in Photographic Science, absolute faithful and Permanent Copies have been secured, on a scale which adequately represents the Original Paintings. These are printed in rich brown pigments, on specially prepared paper, at 18 by 15 inches, and are sold at a uniform price of TWELVE
SHILLINGS EACH.

G. F. WATTS, R.A.,
SIR E. BURNE-JONES,
D. G. ROSSETTI.

An Extensive Selection of the Works of these Masters at prices ranging from Three Shillings and Sixpence to Three Guineas.

Full particulars of Autotype Permanent Reproductions from the Old and Modern Masters sent post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,

ART REPRODUCERS,
HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of HERR HANSTENGL, of Munich,
the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY, now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Process as in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their
Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Bo ok
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.
Offices 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

JARROLD & SONS' LIST

NOW READY, crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.
A SHORT POPULAR HISTORY OF CRETE.

By J. H. FRIESE, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge; Author of a Revised Translation of "Livy," Books I., II., III., and IV., and a Translation, with Notes, of Homer's "Iliad," Books XXII. and XXIII.
With Introduction by P. W. CLAYDEN.
Maps of Crete and Seat of War.

MAURUS JÓKAI'S NEW NOVEL.
THE GREEN BOOK;
Or, Freedom Under the Snow.

By the Author of "Black Diamonds," "Pretty Michal,"
"Midst the Wild Carpathians."

With Engraved Portrait of Author, 6s. [Fifth Edition.]
"Altogether a great book and worth all the novels of native growth we are likely to see this season."—Full Mail Gazette.
"In its panoramic width of outlook, its inexhaustible fertility of invention and barbaric splendour of colouring, Maurus Jókai's great novel challenges comparison with Tolstol's 'War and Peace.' There is a succession of brilliant tableaux. To read this remarkable book is like witnessing a magnificent Oriental pageant. It is of enthralling interest and takes rank with the great novels of the century."—Spectator.
"The author has given us a group of striking personalities, of every one of whom it is not too much to say that it is brilliantly drawn and vividly presented. From every point of view 'The Green Book' is a book to be read. It is a work of fine art."—Daily Chronicle.
Mr. Courtenay says in the Daily Telegraph: "It is truly an astounding book. In force and fire and prodigal variety he reminds one of the elder Dumas."

HIS DOUBLE SELF;
Or, the Transformation of Keith Winstanley.

By E. COURTIS,
Author of "Dr. Malochi," "Queen or Bondswoman," "Lamar the Witch," &c.
Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"The tale is not without a certain cleverness in working out a plot such as Dickens only, among modern novelists, could keep seriously going. There is something enjoyable in the plausible fluency with which the tale maintains its air of mystery."—Scotsman.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
And of all Booksellers.

A. & C. BLACK'S LIST.

HANDBOOK to CHRISTIAN and ECCLIASTICAL ROME. By H. M. and M. A. R. T.
Part I., THE CHRISTIAN MONUMENTS. Illustrated with 23 Cuts and Plans. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

NAPLES in the NINETIES: a Sequel to Naples in 1888. By E. NEVILLE ROLFE, B.A., H.B.M. Consul at Naples. With numerous Illustrations.
Square crown 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

FADS of an OLD PHYSICIAN. By Dr. GEORGE S. KEITH, Author of "Plea for a Simpler Life," to which this is a companion volume.
Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

FERRETS: their Management in Health and Disease, with Remarks on their Legal Status. By NICHOLAS EVERITT. With numerous
Illustrations. Small crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

A DOZEN WAYS of LOVE. By Miss
L. DOUGALL, Author of "Beggars All." Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

OUT of her SHROUD. By Henry OCHILTREE, Author of "Bedburn." Crown 8vo,
cloth, price 6s.

LONDON: A. & C. BLACK, SOHO SQUARE.

SERVICE & PATON'S NEW BOOKS

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE BRONTËS:

FACT AND FICTION.

By A. M. MacKAY, B.A.

Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

LIST OF CONTENTS.

PART I. FRESH LIGHT ON BRONTË BIOGRAPHY.
The Brontë Family Group—The Religious Views of the Novelists—Charlotte Brontë's Secret.

PART II. A CROP OF BRONTË MYTHS.
The Alleged Originals of "Wuthering Heights"—The Irish Uncles and Aunts of the Novelists—The Reviewer and the Avenger—The Asserted Irish Origin of the Brontë Novels—Prunty v. Brontë—"The Brontës in Ireland" and the Critics.

NEW ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF
THE ROMANCES OF
NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

With Introductions by MONCURE D. CONWAY, L.H.D.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, antique deckle-edged paper,
Printed by T. & A. Constable, of Edinburgh.

Price 3s. 6d. net.

FIRST VOLUME NOW READY.

THE SCARLET LETTER.

Illustrated by F. H. TOWNSEND.

It is universally acknowledged that Nathaniel Hawthorne is the greatest writer that America, and one of the greatest that any country, has produced. In spite of this fact, no adequate edition of his works has been published either here or in America; and it is with this in view that the present edition is being issued.

"A lovely edition."—British Weekly.

SERVICE & PATON, 5, HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE and
FREE REVIEW: a Monthly Magazine. Edited by
"DEMOCRITUS."

CONTENTS OF THE MAY NUMBER: Bentley and Anthony
Collins—Roden Noel—Tourgenieff—The Downfall of Olive
Schreiner—Marie Corelli and her Public—Moral Instruction
without Theology—The Social Purity Hallucination—
Current Pseudo-Philosophy—Slumland by Night—William
Blake and Modern Problems—The Social Evil and the Moral Law—Periodicals—New Books.

PSEUDO-PHILOSOPHY at the END
of the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By HUGH
MORTIMER CECIL. 1. AN IRRATIONALIST TRIO
(KIDD, DRUMMOND, BALFOUR). 10s. net.

A vigorous Refutation of the Works of the Three Irrationalists.

THE SAXON and the CELT. By
JOHN M. ROBERTSON. 8s. net.

CONTENTS: I. The Question of Race. 1. The Present
Irish Trouble. 2. English and Irish. 3. French and Germans. 4. The Problem of Race Origins. 5. The Naming of Celts, Gauls and Teutons. 6. "Celtic" and "Teutonic"
History. 7. The Ethic of Race Instinct. II. The Lessons of Irish History. 1. The Causation of the Past. 2. The Verdict of Europe. III. Hill Burton on the Scottish Celts.
IV. J. R. Green on Celts and Teutons. V. The Duke of Argyll on Irish History. VI. Mr. Goldwin Smith's Polemic.
VII. Mr. Froude on Ireland. VIII. Mr. Balfour on Irish
Civilisation. Epilogue: A Programme for Ireland.

Will be published in April.—2s. 6d. net.

THE BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:
an Anatomy of the Disease and a Theory of Curative
Treatment. By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

CONTENTS: 1. What is Respectability? 2. The Pathology
of the Disease. 3. Ladies and Gentlemen. 4. Specific Symptoms of the Malady in Women. 5. Respectability and Morals. 6. Cultured Gentility. 7. Plutocracy. 8. Villa-
dom. 9. The Tyranny of Respectability. 10. Respectable
Civilisation and After. 11. Conclusion.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,
16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S
NEW BOOKS.CONAN DOYLE'S
NEW NOVEL.

ON MAY 14th.

With 12 Full-page Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

UNCLE BERNAC:

A Memory of the Empire.

BY

A. CONAN DOYLE,

Author of "The White Company,"
"Rodney Stone," &c.

New Volume by Mrs. Oliphant.

Ready this day, with a Preface entitled "On the Ebb Tide,"
Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE WAYS of LIFE. Two Stories:
1. Mr. SANDFORD. 2. THE WONDERFUL HISTORY
of Mr. ROBERT DALYELL. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

New Novel by Alexander Innes Shand.

Ready this day, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LADY GRANGE. By Alexander
INNES SHAND, Author of "Kilcarr: a Novel,"
"Half a Century; or, Changes in Men and Marners," &c.

THE REVIVAL of LEARNING. By
the late JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Immediately.]

* This is Volume II. of a NEW and CHEAPER EDITION
of "THE RENAISSANCE in ITALY," in 7 vols., large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. each. The remaining volumes will be published at intervals.

FROM GRAVE to GAY: being Essays
and Studies concerned with Certain Subjects of Serious Interest, with the Puritans, with Literature, and with the Humours of Life, now for the first time Collected and Arranged. By J. ST. LOE STRACHEY. Crown
8vo, 6s.

"Undeniably clever, well-informed, brightly written, and in many ways interesting."—Times.
"Mr. Strachey writes admirably; he has a great fund of knowledge, and a great power of illustration; he often throws a novel light upon those matters of common concern which get overlooked just because they are 'everybody's business'; and sometimes, as in his article upon the 'Horrors of Astronomy,' his analysis of popular consciousness is really masterly."—Guardian.

COLLECTED CONTRIBUTIONS ON DIGESTION and DIET. With an Appendix on the Opium Habit in India. By Sir WILLIAM ROBERTS,
M.D., F.R.S. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 5s.

"A book which, primarily intended for medical men, may be read and understood by any intelligent person, and the perusal of which may be calculated to do an immense deal of good."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON in the Illustrated London News.

New Volumes of Smith, Elder & Co.'s
Popular 2s. 6d. Series.

Crown 8vo, limp red cloth, 2s. 6d. each.

THE MARTYRED FOOL. By D.
CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Rainbow Gold,"
"Joseph's Coat," &c.

GRANIA: the Story of an Island. By the Hon. EMILY LAWLESS, Author of "Hurriah,"
"With Essex in Ireland," &c.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO.,
15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

VOLUME II., NOW READY.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH POETRY.

By J. COURTHOPE, C.B., M.A., D.Litt., Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. Vol. II. THE RENAISSANCE and the REFORMATION; Influence of the Court and the Universities. 8vo, 10s. net.

BY REV. FREDERIC RENDALL.

THE ACTS of the APOSTLES in GREEK and ENGLISH.

With Notes. By Rev. FREDERIC RENDALL, M.A., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Assistant Master of Harrow School. Crown 8vo, 9s.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.

READINGS ON THE PURGATORIO OF DANTE, chiefly based on the Commentary of Benvenuto Da Imola. By the Honourable WILLIAM WARREN VERNON, M.A., Accademico Correspondente della Crusca and Cavaliere di S. Maurizio e Lazzaro in Italy. With an Introduction by the late Very Rev. DEAN of ST. PAUL'S. In 2 vols., crown 8vo, 24s.

BY SIR ARCHIBALD GEIKIE.

ANCIENT VOLCANOES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

By Sir ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, F.R.S., &c. With 7 Maps and numerous Illustrations, 2 vols., super-royal 8vo, 36s. net.

TIMES.—"An exhaustive treatise, which may be supplemented by the researches of the future, but which can hardly be superseded. To geologists it is unnecessary to commend it; to all who are interested in the checkered career of this earth of ours it will be found to abound with interest."

SECOND EDITION, REVISED, NOW READY.

THE THEORY OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE, with SOME of its APPLICATIONS to ECONOMIC POLICY. By Professor C. F. BASTABLE, M.A., LL.D., Author of "Public Finance," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS. New Volume.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.
"Peacock" Edition, gilt sides, back, and edges, 5s.

PARENTS' ASSISTANT; Or, Stories for Children. By MARIA EDGEWORTH. Illustrated by CHRIS. HAMMOND. With an Introduction by ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE.

THE MODERN READER'S BIBLE.

New Volume. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by RICHARD G. MOULTON, M.A. (Camb.). The Text is that of the Revised Version. It is used by special permission of the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge.

JEREMIAH.

CLASSICAL SERIES.—New Volumes.

THE FIRST PHILIPPIC AND THE OLYNTHIACS OF DEMOSTHENES.

With Introduction and Critical and Explanatory Notes, by JOHN EDWIN SANDYS, Litt.D., &c. Fcap. 8vo, 6s.

The TROADES of EURIPIDES.

With Revised Text and Notes, by ROBERT YELVERTON TYRRELL, Litt.D., Fellow of Trinity College, &c. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

In demy 8vo, cloth, price 8s. 6d.

THE HOUSE of CROMWELL.

A Genealogical History of the Family and Descendants of the Protector. By JAMES WAYLEN, sometime Secretary to Thomas Carlyle.

A New Edition, Revised by JOHN GABRIEL CROMWELL, M.A., Oxon., Hon. Canon of Durham.

In demy 8vo, cloth, price 8s. 6d.; Large-Paper Copies, £2 2s. each.

NATURAL HISTORY in SHAKESPEARE'S TIMES.

Being a Compendium of the Natural History of the Animals, Plants, Minerals, &c., mentioned by Shakespeare, and illustrated by facsimiles of the Woodcuts in an early edition of the "Hortus Sanitatis." Compiled and Edited by H. W. SEAGER, M.B., &c.

"Mr. Seager's compilation affords an interesting insight into the condition of natural science three centuries ago." Pall Mall Gazette.

"A quaint idea cleverly carried out. The quotations are admirable. This volume should be an acceptable addition to our bookshelves."—Public Opinion.

NEW TRANSLATION OF BOETHIUS.

In fcap. 8vo, cloth, tastefully printed and bound, price 4s. 6d.; with a Portrait of the Father of Boethius.

THE CONSOLATION of PHILOSOPHY.

A new rendering into English Prose and Verse from the Latin of Boethius. By H. R. JAMES, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford.

In crown 4to, cloth, gilt edges, price 6s.

HUGO OF AVENDON.

A Drama in Four Acts. By E. L. M.

"The work reads well, and should be enjoyed by those who patronise the drama without leaving their own firesides."—Scotsman.

"There is good material in the play, and the climax is skilfully planned."—Dundee Advertiser.

In fcap. 8vo, tastefully printed in antique type, and bound in cloth, price 6s.; 60 Large-Paper Copies, £1 1s. each.

IN PRAISE of MUSIC.

An Anthology. Prepared by CHARLES SAYLE, M.A.

"In Praise of Music" presents a series of extracts selected with considerable care from the greatest and most appreciative writers on the subject during the centuries.

NEW VOLUME OF THE "BOOK-LOVER'S LIBRARY."

Cloth, price 4s. 6d.; Roxburghe, half-morocco, 7s. 6d.; Large Paper, £1 1s. net.

THE NOVELS of CHARLES DICKENS.

A BIBLIOGRAPHY AND SKETCH.

By FREDERIC G. KITTON,

Author of "Charles Dickens by Pen and Pencil," &c.
With a Portrait which has not been published before.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In fcap. 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

JENNIFRED, and other VERSES.

By SEPTIMUS G. GREEN.

"The title poem is finely, even richly, coloured, and is suggestive of the romantic period in which its scenes are set. Mr. Green infuses considerable vigour into his lines." Dundee Advertiser.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

THE HUIA'S HOMELAND,

And other Verses. By ROSLYN.

"These poems are welcome in that they evince a genuine love of national beauty and a poetic perception of its effect. They are beautifully coloured, and bring home to the reader a sense of what constitutes the charm of New Zealand." Dundee Advertiser.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW,
LONDON, E.C.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S NEW BOOKS.

NOTICE.—Prof. KARL PEARSON'S New and Important Work, entitled The CHANCES of DEATH, and other Studies in Evolution, will be ready on WEDNESDAY NEXT at all Libraries and Booksellers, with Illustrations, 2 vols., demy 8vo, 25s. net.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

THE SPORTSMAN'S LIBRARY.

Edited by Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P.
VOL. III. NOW READY.

THE SPORTSMAN IN IRELAND.

By A COSMOPOLITE.

Illustrated by 6 Coloured Plates and numerous other Illustrations by P. Chenevix Trench. Large 8vo, handsomely bound, 15s.; also a limited Large-Paper Edition, with Plates on Japanese vellum, £2 2s. net.

VOLUMES ALREADY ISSUED.

Vol. I. THE LIFE of a FOX and the DIARY of a HUNTSMAN. By THOMAS SMITH.

Vol. II. A SPORTING TOUR through the NORTHERN PARTS of ENGLAND and GREAT PART of the HIGHLANDS of SCOTLAND. By Col. T. THORNTON, of Thornville Royal.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "WILD SPAIN."

WILD NORWAY. With Chapters on the Swedish Highlands, Spitzbergen, and Denmark. By ABEL CHAPMAN, Author of "Wild Spain," &c. Fully illustrated by the Author and Charles Whymper. Demy 8vo, 16s.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL'S NEW BOOK.

MEMORIES of the MONTHS. By Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P., Editor of "The Sportsman's Library," &c. With Photogravure Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready on Monday.]

OLD ENGLISH GLASSES. An

Account of Glass Drinking-Vessels in England from Early Times to the End of the Eighteenth Century, with Notices of Continental Glasses during the same Period. By ALBERT HARTSHORNE, Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. With nearly 70 Full-Page Lithographic Plates and over 400 smaller Illustrations. Super-royal 4to, £3 3s. net.

This magnificent and unique work is dedicated by special permission to Her Majesty the Queen. A full Prospectus can be had on application. [Nearly ready.]

A SUNSHINE TRIP: Glimpses of the Orient. Extracts from Letters written by MARGARET BOTTOLE. With Portrait. Handsomely bound, 4s. 6d.

THE TREATMENT of NATURE in DANTE'S "DIVINA COMMEDIA." By L. OSCAR KUHN, Professor in Wesleyan University, U.S.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

THIRD EDITION, with Portrait.

BENJAMIN JOWETT, Master of Balliol. A Personal Memoir. By the Hon. LIONEL TOLLEMACHE, Author of "Safe Studies," &c. Third Edition, with Portrait. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

TIMES.—"Although Mr. Lionel Tollemache is not among the authors who are read by a very wide circle, there are a certain number of readers, and those not the worst judges, who regard him as one of the most stimulating writers of the day, especially in the sketch-portraits of the people who have influenced him. His essay on Mark Pattison is not likely to be forgotten by any Oxford man, or, indeed, by any student of modern letters who has chanced to read it, and it is safe to foretell that the same will be the case with the 'Personal Memoir' in which he has enshrined his recollections of the late Master of Balliol."

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 37, Bedford Street.
New York: 70, Fifth Avenue.

J. M. DENT & CO.

BY MRS. ERNEST HART.

PICTURESQUE BURMA.

Past and Present. By Mrs. ERNEST HART. Illustrated with about 10 Photogravures and about 70 to 80 Reproductions from Original Photographs and Drawings, Maps, &c. Royal 8vo, 21s. net.

The TIMES says: "This handsome volume deals exhaustively with the past history and the social life of the Burmese, touching also upon their resources and probable future, and giving as well a vivid series of travel sketches, supplemented by a large number of beautiful photographs, reproduced with great care and excellent effect."

The PALL MALL says: "The most useful and interesting description of Burma that has yet appeared.... Besides its interesting matter, Mrs. Hart's book contains three excellent things in a book of travel—good maps, fine illustrations, and a careful index."

DAILY TELEGRAPH says: "As a thorough-going account of one of the newest and most important additions to the British Empire Mrs. Ernest Hart's 'Picturesque Burma' may be warmly commended."

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF
"CAPTAIN JACOBUS."

The MASTER BEGGARS:

a Story of the Wars of the Beggars. By L. COPE CORNFORD. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"Compared with the general run of historical novels, 'The Master Beggars' shines as a triumph."
Pall Mall Gazette.

TALES OF THE ISLES OF GREECE

Sketches of Modern Greek Life. By ARGYRIS EPHTALIOTIS. Translated from Modern Greek by W. H. D. ROUSE. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

T. P. O'CONNOR in the WEEKLY SUN: "The book of the week." May it stir many hearts to the prayer that before many years no Christian man or woman on the face of the earth will live under a ruler where such atrocities are possible."

JOAN SEATON.

By MARY BEAUMONT, Author of "A Ringby Lase." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH says: "It is a noble and moving story. When once the spell of the book is on the reader it becomes impossible to lay it down."

QUO VADIS.

A Narrative of Rome in the Time of Nero. By HENRYK SIENKIEWICZ. Translated from the Polish by JEREMIAH CURTIN. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

DAILY CHRONICLE:—"This is emphatically a great book. We do not merely read, we live through the scenes which are conjured up before us."

Mr. EDWARD GOSSE concludes his article on Henryk Sienkiewicz in the April number of the CONTEMPORARY REVIEW by saying: "If Sienkiewicz does not ruin the impression he has made in these books by an effort to excel in all other branches of fiction, if he is true to his curious virile gift for rendering the movements and phenomena of savage warfare, he ought to secure a place only just below Scott and Dumas among the active and creative writers of masculine romance."

READY ON MAY 12.

THE FIRST CROSSING OF SPITSBERGEN

By Sir WILLIAM MARTIN CONWAY, M.A., F.S.A., F.R.G.S. With Contributions by J. W. GREGORY, D.Sc., A. TREVOR-BATTYE, and E. J. GARWOOD. Together with Coloured, Full-Page, and Text Illustrations by H. E. Conway, and 2 Maps. Medium 8vo, 30s. net.

ALDINE HOUSE, E.C.;
AND 67, ST. JAMES'S STREET, S.W.

NANSEN'S FARTHEST NORTH.

NANSEN'S FARTHEST NORTH.

"A masterpiece of story-telling."—Times.
"A book for everybody who loves a story of romance and adventure."—Westminster Gazette.

NANSEN'S FARTHEST NORTH.

"The genius of a Deceit could scarcely contrive a more absorbing story than we have in the second volume of the book."—Spectator.

NANSEN'S GREAT BOOK may be obtained at every Bookstall, at every Bookshop, at every Library in England, in Scotland, in Ireland, in Wales.

NANSEN'S GREAT BOOK contains over 100 Full-page Illustrations, a large number of Text Illustrations, 16 Coloured Plates, 2 Photogravure Plates, and an Etched Portrait.

Now First Issued in Book Form.

AN ESSAY ON COMEDY and the COMIC SPIRIT. By GEORGE MEREDITH. 5s. net.

"May without hesitation be put down as one of the subtlest, wittyest, and most humorous pieces of criticism in the English language."
Mr. WILLIAM ANGER, in the Westminster Gazette.

THE CRISIS IN THE EAST.—READ

The NATION'S AWAKENING. By Spenser WILKINSON. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. Second Edition.

"The book points out the way that leads to the solution of the problems arising in the present and near future in the spirit of a truly national character."—Deutsche Rundschau.

ENGLISH ILLUSTRATION, 1857-1870. By

GLEESON WHITE. With Photogravures and over 100 Illustrations. 2s. 2s. net.
"Mr. Gleeson White has done his work well."—Daily News.

THE CHRONICLE OF VILLANI. A Book for Dante Students. Translated by ROSE E. SELFE. Edited by the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Perhaps no one book is so important to the student of Dante as the chronicle of his contemporary Villani."—Athenaeum.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. Edited

by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. With Frontispieces, 6 vols., fcap. 8vo, cloth, paper label, or gilt extra, 2s. net per vol.; also half-morocco, 3s. net per vol. Sold in Sets only.
"Far and away the best Boswell, I should say, for the ordinary book-lover now on the market."—Illustrated London News.

WHITMAN: a Study. By John Burroughs.

12mo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.
"Of all the books which have been published on Whitman this is the best."—Daily Chronicle.

THE LOVE OF AN OBSOLETE WOMAN.

Told by HERSELF. 2s. 6d.

CONSTABLES REPRINT OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

"This is one of the most charming editions of the Waverley Novels that we know, as well as one of the cheapest in the market."
Glasgow Herald.

ENGLISH SCHOOLS, 1546-1548. By A. F.

LEACH, M.A., F.S.A., late Fellow of All Souls', Oxford, Assistant Charity Commissioner. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.
"A very remarkable contribution to the history of secondary education in England, not less novel in its conclusions than important in the documentary evidence adduced to sustain them."—The Times.

THE AMAZING MARRIAGE. By George

MEREDITH. Fourth Edition. 6s.
"A masterpiece."—Daily News.

MADGE O' THE POOL. By William Sharp.

Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.
Excellent."—Athenaeum.

SISTER JANE. A New Book by "Uncle

REMUS." 6s.
"Of all Mr. Harris's recent stories 'Sister Jane' is the best."
Academy.

"A charming book. A most engaging book."—Daily Chronicle.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE. By Sir Charles

DILKE and SPENSER WILKINSON. New and Revised Edition. 2s. 6d.

"A very suggestive and vitally important little work."
Pall Mall Gazette.

ANGELA'S LOVER. By Dorothea Gerard.

Paper, 1s.; cloth extra, 2s.

A WRITER OF FICTION: a Novel. By

CLIVE HOLLAND, Author of "My Japanese Wife." Cloth extra, 2s. 6d.

"A striking story."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE KNOWLEDGE OF LIFE. By H. J.

HAROLD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Harold has set himself up as a breaker of many of the social images which most of us worship as blindly and devoutly as the Hindoo worship their gods, and no one who reads his arguments without prejudice can deny that he has common sense and justice on his side."—Daily Mail.

HIS MAJESTY'S GREATEST SUBJECT:

a Novel. By S. S. THORBURN, L.C.S. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"A very romantic and entertaining story."—Scotsman.

THE PREACHING OF ISLAM. By T. W.

ARNOLD, B.A. With 2 Maps. Demy 8vo, 12s.

"One of the most elaborate and careful accounts of the spread of Mahomedanism that we remember to have seen in any language."
Times.

THE POPULAR RELIGION and FOLK-LORE OF NORTHERN INDIA. By WILLIAM

CROOKE. With numerous Full-Page Plates. 21s. net.

"The book is in every respect an admirable one."—Times.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., Westminster.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS'

New and Forthcoming Works.

THIS DAY IS PUBLISHED.

PREHISTORIC PROBLEMS. By

ROBERT MUNRO, M.A., M.D., F.R.S.E., Secretary of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland; Author of "The Lake Dwellings of Europe," "Rambles and Studies in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Dalmatia," &c. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

IMMEDIATELY WILL BE PUBLISHED.

OLD MEMORIES. By General Sir

HUGH GOUGH, G.C.B., V.C. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo.

THE WOODLAND LIFE. By

EDWARD THOMAS. With a Frontispiece. Square 8vo. [Shortly.]

PERIODS OF EUROPEAN LIFE & CUSTOMS

Edited by Professor SAINTSBURY.

THE FLOURISHING OF ROMANCE

and the RISE OF ALLEGORY (Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries). By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in Edinburgh University. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE ETHICS OF JOHN STUART

MILL. By CHARLES DOUGLAS, M.A., D.Sc., Lecturer in Moral Philosophy, and Assistant to the Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, Author of "John Stuart Mill: a Study of his Philosophy." Post 8vo, 6s. net.

A NEW VOLUME OF THE

COUNTY HISTORIES OF SCOTLAND.

MORAY and NAIRN. By Charles

RAMPINI, LL.D., Sheriff-Substitute of these Counties. With 3 Maps and Plan. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

MAN'S PLACE in the COSMOS, and other Essays. By ANDREW SETH, LL.D., Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in Edinburgh University, Author of "Scottish Philosophy," "Hegelianism and Personality." Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

CHEAPER EDITION

IRAS: a Mystery. By Theo. Douglas,

Author of "A Bride-Elect." Crown 8vo, in specially designed paper cover by Womrath, price 1s. 6d.

NEW POPULAR EDITION.

EOTHEN. By A. W. Kinglake.

With a Biographical Sketch and Portrait of the Author. In illustrated paper cover, 408 pp., price 1s. net.

POPULAR EDITION OF BURTON'S "SCOTLAND."

THE HISTORY OF SCOTLAND FROM

AGRICOLA'S INVASION TO THE EXTINCTION OF the last JACOBITE REBELLION. By JOHN HILL BURTON, D.C.L., Historiographer-Royal for Scotland. In 8 Monthly Volumes. Price 3s. 6d. each. [Vols. I., II., and III. ready.]

CHEAP RE-ISSUE.

ANCIENT CLASSICS FOR ENGLISH READERS

Edited by Rev. W. LUCAS COLLINS.

In Shilling Volumes, bound in limp cloth.

Now ready.

HOMER.—ILLIAD. By the Editor.

HOMER.—ODYSSEY. By the Same.

HERODOTUS. By G. O. Swayne.

CÆSAR. By Anthony Trollope.

VIRGIL. By the Editor.

HORACE. By Sir Theodore Martin, K.C.B.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,

EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
The Rebellion in Rhodesia	489
Some Anthologies	490
"Sous l'Aigle"	491
Horace in English	492
A Romance of History	492
Four Shakespeare Books	493
Fletcher of Saltoun	493
FROM CROWDED SHELVES	494
FICTION:
Under Love's Rule—Captain Shannon—The Happy Hypocrite—Scarlet and Steel—A Dozen Ways of Love—The Knight's Tale—Did He Deserve It?—Essentially Human	495
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books	497
New Books Received... ..	498
NOTES AND NEWS	498
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXVI., ROBERT BROWNING	499
PARIS LETTER	500
THE BOOK MARKET	501
ART	502
DRAMA	503
MUSIC	504
SCIENCE	504
CORRESPONDENCE	505
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED	505

REVIEWS.

THE REBELLION IN RHODESIA.

The Matabele Campaign, 1896; being a Narrative of the Campaign in Suppressing the Native Rising in Matabeleland and Mashonaland. By Colonel R. S. S. Baden-Powell. (Methuen & Co.)

THIS roughly written narrative, made up from jottings from diaries and letters to friends at home, presents a singularly vivid picture of the campaign which broke the back of the rebellion in Rhodesia. The difficulties of the campaign almost give it a place apart in military history. Imagine a country equal in size to Italy, France, and Spain put together, a land without railways, without roads, and robbed of its usual means of transport by the ravages of the rinderpest, and held by 30,000 warlike natives. The distances alone were enough to strike despair into the hearts of the rescuing forces. Supplies sent to Bulawayo from Cape Town had to travel 1,487 miles, of which the last 587 were through the deep sand of the bullock tracks; while the distance to Salisbury from Cape Town was no less than 2,050 miles. When the first massacres were committed in Matabeleland, the nearest places from which relief could come were Salisbury, in Mashonaland, three hundred miles to the north; and Mafeking, nearly six hundred miles to the south. Both places did their duty nobly; and it will give the reader some idea of the transport difficulties which had to be overcome if we mention that it takes a month for a mule-waggon to get from Mafeking to Bulawayo. The enormous distances over which troops had to be marched and supplies hurried would have mattered comparatively little if the country had not been deprived at the same stroke of its ordinary means of locomotion and its main food supply. Such entries as these tell the completeness of the calamity:

"Every mile now began to show the grisly, stinking signs of rinderpest. Dead oxen varied occasionally with dead mules—the variety did not affect the smell—that remained the same. Occasionally we passed a waggon abandoned owing to the loss of animals. . . . Reached Pala at midnight. Here were collected some two hundred waggons, stopped by loss of all their oxen from rinderpest. Three thousand two hundred beasts dead at this one place. . . . Rinderpest is very much in evidence round the fort, and oxen lie dead literally in troops, long regular lines of carcasses lying together."

The presence of much putrefying animal matter in the immediate neighbourhood of human habitations was another source of danger, and so the unfortunate settlers found themselves threatened, not only with famine and war, but with plague as well. One of a party of scouts riding out from Bulawayo upon horses worn out with the constant work, writes thus:

"On passing dead horses and cattle we used to draw in a long breath, and endeavour to spur up a trot that would carry us out of range before we were again compelled to breathe or 'bust'; but our horses used, generally, to land us in the middle of the stink, and then pull up. You would see a man get black in the face trying to hold his breath, and at last have to burst out and refill his lungs with the very richest of the odour."

Happily the splendid climate of Matabeleland—the air is likened to "draughts of fresh spring water"—prevented the worst consequences, and, in fact, the troops were troubled with very little disease.

The rinderpest, besides making the movements of the troops extremely slow, effectually prevented reinforcements being sent to the tiny force of 5,000 men which successfully held, and reconquered, a country 750,000 miles in extent. More troops were at the Cape and might have been sent to the front, but the authorities at Bulawayo, even in their distress for want of men, soon had to protest against any more being sent, for the simple reason that it would have been impossible to feed them. There was no reserve of food in the country, its live stock had perished, and there was that fatal stretch of nearly six hundred miles of sandy road to Mafeking. Owing to this difficulty of transport, prices, specially at Salisbury, became almost prohibitive. Eggs touched 47s. a dozen; ducks were £3 a couple; flour was £7 10s. per 100 lbs.; fresh mutton was 4s. 6d. per lb.; even liquor became a luxury, and Colonel Baden-Powell pathetically relates that a whisky and soda cost three shillings.

At the time when our author reached the scene of action the worst of the massacres in Matabeleland were over, and those in Mashonaland had not yet taken place. Around Bulawayo some 200 settlers—men, women, and children—had been killed in cold blood; but it is probable that these murders at isolated homesteads were the means of averting a far wider calamity. If the Matabele had been less impatient to get to work, and Bulawayo had not been thoroughly aroused to the danger of the news of these attacks upon lonely farms, it is probable that the savages would have "rushed" the town, and that the English would have been exterminated. As it was, fugitives from the outlying districts reached Bulawayo, and in a very little while the place was ready to hold its own. In view of what has been said about the ferocity with which the subsequent operations were carried out, it is of interest to have the opinion of an officer in the Imperial service. In one entry he says: "They expect no quarter, because, as they admit themselves, they have gone beyond their own etiquette of war, and have killed our women and children." This passage would lead us to suppose that no quarter was given, but prisoners were certainly taken frequently, and treated with the utmost humanity; and the terms of surrender ultimately arranged caused a great outcry on account of their clemency. Still it is probable that much of the fighting was to the death, and that resistance on either side ceased only with life. Our author says:

"I did not at the time fully realise the extraordinary bloodthirsty rage of some of our men when they got hand to hand with the Kafirs, but I not only understood it, but felt it to the full myself later on, when I, too, saw those English girls lying horribly mutilated, and the little white children with the life smashed and beaten out of them by laughing black fiends, who knew no mercy."

Another time, after speaking of the butchering of the little children of a certain missionary living in the neighbourhood of Salisbury, Colonel Baden-Powell says:

"It is a far cry from Mashonaland to England, and distance lessens the sharpness of the sympathy, but to the men on the spot—men with an especially strong, manly, and chivalrous spirit in them, as is the case in this land of pioneers—to them such cases as these appeal in a manner which cannot be realised in dear, drowsy, after-lunch Old England. A man here does not mind carrying his own life in his hand—he likes it, and takes an attack upon himself as a good bit of sport; but touch a woman or a child, and he is in a blind fury in a moment; and then he is gently advised to be mild and offer clemency to the poor benighted heathen, who is a brother after all. Yes! And though Woman is his first care, and can command his last drop of blood in her defence, Woman is the first to assail him on his return with venom-pointed pen, for his brutality."

With which parting reference to Mrs. Schreiner's book our author leaves his defence of the manhood of South Africa to the judgment of the reader.

While the picture here presented of the general features and conditions of the campaign are singularly graphic, the accounts of the successive forays into which it was broken are, perhaps necessarily, a little confused. In the later stages of the war, which alone are here recorded, the operations were mainly directed against the mountain strongholds into which the enemy had gradually been driven. There was little room in such fighting for strategy or tactics. Much depended upon efficient scouting, and our author himself played many an adventurous part in going out alone to spy the land and to determine the exact position of the hostile impis. A special feature of the struggle was its danger to those who led. To attack an enemy hidden in caves and sheltered behind stockades constantly meant a murderous fire aimed at the foremost man of the storming party. Thus, after the successful assault in the Matopos on the Fourth of August, in which Major Kershaw lost his life, out of a total of twenty killed and wounded fifteen were officers or non-commissioned officers. The book abounds in picturesque incidents illustrating the chances of battle. On one occasion Colonel Baden-Powell saw a Kaffir in the open with a Martini-Henri drop on his knee and then take steady aim at him. The Colonel rode hard at his assailant, who fired at the distance of ten paces and missed;

"then he jumped up and turned to run, but he had not gone two paces when he cringed as if someone had slapped him on the back, then his head dropped and his heels flew up, and he fell smack upon his face, shot by one of our men behind me."

Occasionally, also, we get glimpses that throw curious sidelights upon certain phases of South African life. Thus in the little township of Massi Kessi, on the Portuguese frontier, we read that out of fifteen houses twelve are drinking bars. It should be added that while in the Portuguese territory no restrictions are placed upon the sale of liquor, in Rhodesia it is not allowed to be sold to coloured men.

Of Mr. Cecil Rhodes we learn comparatively little, as our author was on the sick list at the time of the famous negotiations in the Matopo Hills. The two travelled home, however, together from Beira, and Colonel Baden-Powell had abundant opportunities for judging of the significance of the receptions which were tendered to the ex-Premier wherever the steamer touched. Of the great demonstration at Port Elizabeth we read "the genuineness of the feeling towards Rhodes was unmistakable and impressive. It was not a gust of got-up welcome, but a spontaneous burst of enthusiasm, in a place that formerly was distinctly hostile to him." And upon the endurance of that feeling depends a long chapter in the future story of South Africa.

SOME ANTHOLOGIES.

English Sonnets. Edited by A. T. Quiller Couch. (Chapman & Hall.)

A Book of Scottish Poetry. Selected and Arranged by M. B. Synge. (Edward Arnold.)

The Silver Cross. By Helen Douglas. (George Bell & Sons.)

ANTHOLOGIES like most other things, have not escaped a certain scorn at the hands of modern men of letters. But that scorn betrays in its possessor a lack of sympathy, or a lack of understanding, or a lack of both. Not all people—no, and not many people—have "the holy poets" at their elbow, or time to turn to them. The anthologist comes with his samples; for some readers they must suffice, and others they will lead on to a larger commerce; in either case profitably enough. And of all anthologies of poetry a sonnet anthology seems the most legitimate, since each sonnet is a finished and separate entity. Mr. Quiller Couch, therefore, had one of the easiest, as well as one of the pleasantest, tasks incident to the Diamond Library editorships when he took in hand this task of selection. Within the limits of about two hundred pages he has brought together the most familiar examples of the art that England borrowed from Italy, and then made her very own. Tobacco and the sonnet came companions to our shores, and whether Raleigh or Wyatt was the greater importer we need not inquire; both imports have come to stay, though under varying conditions. While tobacco, for instance, will grow in Ireland (the Saxon permitting) you shall seek in vain for a single great sonnet by an Irishman. In England, on the other hand, where no tobacco grows, the sonnet has taken root and become a native. Not exotic flowers, therefore, go to make up this anthology. It is all English of the English from Shakespeare, by way of Wordsworth, to Mrs. Browning. What the sonnet did and does for individual poets has been greatly recorded; "with this key Shakespeare unlocked his heart," "a glow-worm lamp it cheered mild Spenser," in Milton's hand "the Thing became a trumpet"—and you know what it was to Wordsworth by the capital T he put to "Thing." From the masters Mr. Couch quotes the masterpieces; and, if we add that we could have done with more from their anointed hands, and with fewer from the mere midnight-oil mechanists, we are but saying the obvious thing that occurs to readers of nearly all anthologies; for readers have never had to face the editorial difficulty of reconciling the claims of what may be called historical and biographical literature with those of literature nakedly regarded for its own sake. Men like William Mason and Thomas Warton were constitutionally unfitted to write sonnets; but the anthologist may very well say that he quotes them as makers of literary history—that they are interesting as failures even. From Leigh Hunt, from Felicia Hemans, from William Stanley Roscoe, we could consent to part and meet no more on this "scanty plot of ground"; even from Joseph Blanco White, "the one-sonnet man," seeing that the fine idea of his "Night and Death" is a twice-derived one, and that the workmanship of his re-expression of it is not in any way memorable. Who would not wish for a meeting with Charles Lamb anywhere? Still, it had better have been anywhere but here. The Chillon sonnet of Byron (the date of whose death is set down as 1859) is redeemed by its last line, in which "the noble poet" makes one of his few approaches to nobility of feeling and style. Preferences start to light in the reader's mind as he turns the pages—he has meetings with the superfluous, and he sighs for the absent. That is inevitable; and the foreknowledge of it is the difficulty of even the sonnet anthologist. But that very clash and stirring and exchange of appreciations makes us the anthologist's debtors; while from numbers of readers he will have the gratitude due to an introducer of hitherto hidden treasure. "Scanty" the sonnet's "plot of ground" may be; but it is on the very height of Parnassus, and has common property in all the mountain's spiced and heavenly airs.

THE Book of Scottish Poetry is an attempt to do very popularly what other anthologies have done with more limitations for Scottish verse. It is by no means so coherent in purpose as Mr. Lang's collection of Scottish ballads; but, then, on the other hand, it is a book which can be left about. "These poems," says M. B. Synge, "are arranged very carefully for children from the best Scottish poets," and there is no doubt that the "great care" is clamoured for in the case of a minstrelsy that has license other than poetical as one of its notes. A line or two below this allusion to "the best Scottish poets" acknowledgment is made "for leave to republish several of the late Mr. Charles Mackay's poems." Not thus, indeed, do we spell "the best Scottish poets." Equally remarkable in another way is the inclusion, in that Scottish galley, of Wordsworth, Whittier, and Mrs. Hemans. We see, too, that the compiler assigns unknown authorship to "Annie Laurie." That fecund verse-bearer, "Anonymous," has already too provokingly large a literary family to tolerate any gratuitous additions to the list.

THERE are now enough hymns that are poems too to make an anthology; but it is not in search of these that the editor of The Silver Cross has set out. She has brought together some two hundred hymns of the ordinary type, expressing with such advantage as is given by metre and rhyme, but with the unilluminated vocabulary of prose, and rather common prose at that, the truths which, strange to say, never stale, and are never destroyed, in the telling. The compiler's choice has in this case gone to "poems and hymns," to quote her own words, specially applicable to "the sick and suffering." Mrs. Browning, "half angel and half bird," and Miss Rossetti, the modern priestess who has celebrated in song the nuptials of immortal longing and of mortal pain, are the two poets supremely fit for such a collection; but they are here scantily quoted. When we do come on them, after the unlighted darkness of their neighbours' territory, we think of Mr. Stevenson emerging from arid shadow to sunny landscape in his journey "across the plains." "It was like meeting your wife"—oh, memorable line! Cardinal Newman is quoted by Helen Douglas, but not as we should insist on quoting him in such a collection, by those verses, for instance, written after the death of Hurrell Froude, in which occur lines with an impulse quite unusual with him—

"Dearest, he longs to speak and I to know;
And yet we both refrain."

The compiler has perhaps chosen some of her specimens in deference to the men who furnish them—their personal excellence, their ecclesiastical weight, and so forth. But poetry is no respecter of persons. Were it otherwise, we might expect much to follow from the punctilious acknowledgments of the preface to "their Graces the Archbishops of York and Armagh: The (the capital T is all her own) Right Revs. the Bishops of Exeter and Salisbury: Charles Lawrence Ford, Esq."—and all the rest. "The Right Rev. the Bishop of St. Andrews" contributes an Introduction to the collection of Helen Douglas, who, by the way, does not allow us a titular precision we should prefer in our allusions to herself; for we are left in tantalising ignorance as to whether she is Mrs. or Miss.

"SOUS L'AIGLE."

Memoirs of Baron Lejeune. Translated by Mrs. Arthur Bell. With an Introduction by Major-General Maurice, C.B. (Longmans.)

As in life the shadow of the great Emperor fell across more than half of Europe, so after his death does his memory dominate our literature, drama, and art. Poet and painter, novelist and chronicler, alike fall under the spell of his powerful personality. Whether we look upon him as a hero, titan-esque and irresistible, the scourge of God and the man of Destiny, or whether we regard him as the half-masked charlatan and the fool of Fortune, the fascination of the life story of the first Napoleon remains. Nil erat, Nil erit, as a savage anagram in the letters of his name quaintly maintains; but between the alpha and omega of his life lay years of struggle, of conquest, and of empire. Whether we judge him from the soldierly narrative of a Ségur or the blatant libels of a Barras, the man himself remains an enigma, sphinx-like, unriddled. With all the mass of histories, memoirs, and reminiscences already published that cast their flickering light on the figure of the great Emperor, it seems at first sight almost supererogatory to translate yet another volume of memoirs on the Napoleonic era. Yet the narrative of Lejeune has a distinctive quality which the records of no other chroniclers possess. Others have given us the portrait of Napoleon as a politician, as a strategist, as a social power; but Lejeune gives us his picture as an artist limned it. Brilliant and dashing soldier as Lejeune undoubtedly was, he was in the first place an artist, though, for all we know, he may never have drawn brush across canvas. The business of an artist, so Ruskin tells us, is "to see, to think, perhaps, sometimes when he has nothing better to do." Lejeune was usually too busy to think, but he never failed "to see," and he saw with the eye of an artist. Amid all the adventures and dangers of a soldier's career he never lost this wonderful gift. Whether sent to lead a brigade into the heart of a doubtful struggle, or despatched alone on some delicate diplomatic mission, his faculty for seeing never deserted him. While leading a charge the moonlight mirrored of a cuirassier's breast-plate might strike his eye, or the fantastic pose of the limbs of some fallen grenadier. These impressions remained indelible, and his Memoirs are, therefore, a panorama of vivid personal impression, drawn from life and developed with care.

Lejeune had rare opportunities for the exercise of his talents. Attached for the greater part of his active service to the staff of Prince Berthier, who was never far from the Emperor's side, Lejeune, though he afterwards acted as aide-de-camp to Marshals

Oudinot and Davout, bore his part in almost every great battle from Valmy to Leipzig. Napoleon often made use of him. His unerring eye discerned the talent of the young aide-de-camp. "Faites-moi voir" was the Emperor's behest; and the order sent his staff flying from Corunna to Moscow, from Naples to Stralsund. They had to see for the Emperor, to give him every detail of things as they were in Spain, Italy, Germany, or Russia as though he had seen it himself. Lejeune with his artistic instinct educated his military training into the proper groove and was invaluable. On many occasions he was bidden to serve as the Emperor's eye in almost every country of Europe. To keep his chief in touch with his vast empire he was bidden to watch the course of the awful siege of Saragossa; to view the gorgeous ceremonial of the proxy marriage at Vienna; to hoodwink the gallant nobles of Poland. An accomplished linguist and a brilliant courtier, quick-witted and scrupulous only in his obedience to the Emperor, Lejeune was eminently fitted for missions which required nerve and brain. Nor was he less useful on the field of battle, when, to execute the Emperor's orders, his aides-de-camp spent days in the saddle and held their lives in their hand. Chivalrous and daring, rejoicing with all the enthusiasm of his keen artistic temperament in all the pomp and circumstance of glorious war, gifted with a cool brain and a ready hand, Lejeune was the beau idéal of the gallant soldier who carried the Napoleonic eagles round the Western world. Not even Brigadier Gerard himself could tell more moving tales of hair-breadth escapes, and of perils on field and flood. Death or captivity often seemed the only issue. On one occasion he fell into the hands of the savage Spanish guerillas. The rope was already fitted round his neck, and only a chance alarm, at which the ruffians took fright, saved him from swinging as another of those ghastly French acorns on a Spanish oak. Escaping this fate, he was dragged half naked over hill and dale until he was delivered into the safe keeping of an English officer. Shipped to England as a prisoner of war, he soon won his way into the good graces of his guards, and eluded them. Hiding on the coast, he all but fell a victim to the knife of a ghoulish smuggler, who made a profession of cutting the throats of French prisoners whose escape he was bribed to assist. But in time, a few months after his first mishap, our friend the enemy turned up again at the Court of St. Cloud, not a whit the worse for his adventures, to libel us for the Emperor's edification. Sent, on another occasion, with a handful of cavalry to reconnoitre the enemy's position round Pesth, he was able to boast that he was the only French officer who, sword in hand, had seen the Hungarian capital. In almost all the great battles of the Napoleonic wars, when the Emperor commanded in person, Lejeune was in the thick of the struggle. He saw the sun rise over Austerlitz, and the merciful night close in over the shambles at the bridge over the Beresina. And these great scenes, described with the breath of perspective and the glowing colours of a true artist, have an indiscribable charm. Others have narrated them with greater accuracy and more historical truth, but no picture is more impressive and more instinct with life and movement than these wonderful word-paintings by Lejeune. His view, indeed, is, often enough, distorted, historically, by the enthusiasm which inspired all who fell under the spell of Napoleon's personality. Until the disasters and horrors of the retreat from Moscow startled him into looking ugly facts in the face, the Emperor's star was always in the ascendant. Until he felt the prick of the Cossack lances goading the headlong flight of the Grand Army, Lejeune had never acknowledged defeat. He talks bravely enough at Corunna of sweeping the "miserable remnant of the English army into the sea"; but he forgets to mention how often Sir John Moore's little force had defeated the army of Marshal Soult. No one reading his magnificent account of the battle of Aspern—where, sent to order the retreat of Lannes' corps, he found the Marshal standing with a pitiful handful of officers and men amid the piled-up dead of his army—would realise that Archduke Charles had defeated the French army, and had been within an ace of annihilating it. There is something almost pathetic in the haste with which Lejeune slurs over his mention of the battle of the nations at Leipzig, although he dwells on every little successful skirmish which marked the retreat of his corps to Mainz. Unfortunately our chronicler was not present at Waterloo. It would have been interesting to hear how Napoleon had thrashed Wellington and wiped out Blücher.

It is not, however, for their history that we read these Memoirs: their value and their charm lie in the vivacity and force of their author's style. Of all the magnificent scenes he gives us, perhaps his description of the second siege of Saragossa is the finest. Patriotism and rage animated the besieged, devotion to their Emperor inspired the assailants. It was war to the knife; and it was fought out to the bitter end. Every house was a fortress and every room had to be taken at the cost of a murderous hand-to-hand struggle. There was "death at the glimpse of a finger from over the breadth of a street." The Poles fought on the roofs of the churches; the engineers, mining and counter-mined, groped for their foes in the bowels of the earth. Lejeune's account of the storming of the nunneries and the convent of St. Francis, where men fought in the dim light, streaming in from the storied windows, round the high altar, and amid the coffins of the dead, or barricaded behind piles of priceless books, while the very gargoyles of the roof ran blood, is a passage which the reader will never be able to forget. For though a soldier and injured to war's alarms, Lejeune had the eye of Verestchagin for its horrors. Even in the hour of victory he, ever and again, stays to count the price of "glory." The memory of the sight of the narrow street at Ebersdorf, when the artillery dashed through the village over the bodies of their wounded comrades; of the writhing mass of humanity crowding the bridges of Lobau—the sole means of retreat from the victorious enemy —which the rising waters of the Danube were slowly carrying away; of the ice on the lakes of Austerlitz breaking under the weight of the fugitives, haunts him as he describes these scenes. The hardships and terrors of the retreat from Moscow have been depicted often enough, but never do they strike the reader with the same vivid force as they do when reading the graphic and pitiful narrative of Lejeune's experiences. To him the saddest blow of all was the glimpse he caught of a sleigh galloping contre d terre out of Wilna. The Emperor had deserted the army; it was the beginning of the end. Disheartened and worn out by the horrors of the retreat, the aide-de-camp, too, left his post and rode in hot haste for Paris. The stern rebuke with which the chief received him seemed to him undeserved. After all, he pleads, he had only followed the Emperor's example. He could not, apparently, see that important as the presence of its little Caporal was to the morale of the army, the situation in Paris demanded the presence of the Emperor. Napoleon had a divided duty; his subordinates had not. As the storm which within a few months was to crush the eagles, under which he had served so well and faithfully for many a long and eventful year, is gathering round the Emperor he idolised, we take leave of our hero. And we part company with regret. It remains only to be said that Mrs. Bell's excellent translation and General Maurice's judicious introduction are worthy of all praise.

HORACE IN ENGLISH.

Horace. A new Literal Prose Translation by A. Hamilton Bryce, LL.D. (G. Bell & Sons.)

MESSRS. GEORGE BELL & SONS have for some few years been addressing themselves to the task of substituting renderings by competent scholars for the translations which made the name of Bohn something of a reproach. Mr. Coleridge's Apollonius Rhodius set, we think, the fashion for the new series, and it would be difficult to find a more excellent prose rendering of Sophocles than that furnished by the same translator. We may say at once that the volume before us, a translation of Horace by Dr. Bryce, formerly headmaster of the Edinburgh Collegiate School, is a careful and scholarly work, which, though useful enough as a crib, and full of suggestion to the candidate for "Moderations," may be read with some satisfaction by the general reader whose Latin is decrepit enough to require a crutch. It may, however, be doubted whether a thoroughly satisfactory translation of Horace ever has been or ever will be made. Certainly the perfume of the Odes at least evaporates when they are decanted into English prose. We would not roundly assert that English prose can never express classical poetry, especially when we have so admirable an example as the Odyssey of Butcher and Lang ready to our hands. But then Messrs. Butcher and Lang were fortunate in having before them in the English Bible a ready-made prose style which could correspond in large measure with the Greek epic. The translator who attempts to do Horace into English prose has no such model, and consequently the rendering even of so skilled a scholar as Dr. Bryce is simply the examination exercise of the first-class man at his best. Moreover, the Odes, turned into prose, stand self-convicted as the most commonplace stuff in the world of literature. As Prof. Conington points out in the preface to his verse translation, they "strike a reader who comes back to them after reading other books as distinguished by a simplicity, monotony, and almost poverty of sentiment, and as depending for the charm of their external form, not so much on novel and ingenious images as on musical words aptly chosen and aptly combined."

Take, for example, half a dozen words almost at random:

"Eheu fugaces, Postume, Postume Labuntur anni!"

Words which generations have regarded as the supreme expression of regret for passing youth. We do not know that anyone could put them into better prose than Dr. Bryce has done: "Alas! alas! dear Postumus, the fleeting years are speeding quickly by." But what a disillusion is there! Nothing remains but that tritest of commonplaces, that time flies! And we find that the whole pathos of the passage lies in the repetition of "Postume." Still it would be unfair to Dr. Bryce to complain that he has failed to do what we hold to be impossible, and we hasten to add that his translation abounds in happy turns of expression and in well-chosen equivalents—as, for example, in the Ode just quoted: "winsome wife" for "placens uxor." Turning, too, to one well-known crux after another, we find that the translator has surmounted the difficulty with grace. In one case, however, Dr. Bryce has, in our opinion, followed evil counsel. The stanza is a famous one; it has given headaches to generations of schoolboys, and much pedantic ink has been shed in its cause by contending scholars—

"Immunis aram si tetigit manus
Non sumptuosa blandior hostia
Mollivit aversos Penates
Farre pio et saliente mica."

Dr. Bryce translates thus: "If your hand without a gift has touched the altar, it has appeased th' offended gods with pious offering of meal and crackling salt, and could not please them more by costly victim." With the latter portion of this sentence, which is Mr. Long's rendering, we have no quarrel. But to translate immunis "without a gift"—a meaning which has authority—makes sad nonsense of the passage; for the hand that gives meal and salt is certainly not "without a gift." Though immunis seems to be used nowhere else in the sense of "innocent" without a genitive of explanation, we think it is quite likely that Horace—who is economical of words—used it here in that sense. Translate "if the hand be pure which touches the altar," and the passage has an excellent meaning and moral.

We have left ourselves no space in which to point out the many excellences in Dr.

Bryce's rendering of the Satires, the Epistles, and the Ars Poetica. Here he has material which can, unlike the Odes, be turned into prose without losing all its charm, and he has acquitted himself well. The usual designation of "Bohn's Classical Series" is the desk of the schoolboy or the undergraduate, and to these Dr. Bryce's Horace may be commended as supplying a model to which their translations should approximate.

A ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

The Flight of the King: being a Full, True, and Particular Account of the Miraculous Escape of His Most Sacred Majesty King Charles II. after the Battle of Worcester.
By Allan Fea. (John Lane.)

FORTUNE has favoured Mr. Fea with an admirable subject and, within certain limitations, he has made good use of it. No writer in search of a romantic theme can ever hope to better the thrilling story of Charles II.'s wanderings in the forty days which elapsed between the "crowning mercy" of Worcester, on September 3, 1651, and his arrival at Fécamp, a fugitive all tattered and torn, almost destitute of money and sadly in need of a clean shirt. The tale is of the very essence of romance, and it is strange indeed that, amid the crowd of "historical novelists" of the new school, not one, so far as we know, has attempted to make anything of it. Harrison Ainsworth, it is true, in his elderly and more jejune days, worked these adventures into a tolerable if stilted tale; but the new school, who have bettered all their masters save Sir Walter, have not been attracted to this fascinating Odyssey. Perhaps Mr. Fea's handsome and lavishly illustrated volume may help to repair this curious neglect. This is the more desirable in that Mr. Fea, while lucid and interesting, is distinctly lacking in literary feeling. We have no quarrel with his style; but it is somewhat unduly "pedestrian," as Southey used to say, and he fails to throw any glamour over his subject. This is, to some extent, because the limitations of his scheme have robbed him of the space which he needed for the proper development of his narrative. Nearly one-half of his book is taken up by reprints of Restoration tracts, describing, necessarily with a good many inaccuracies and omissions, the perils of the King's escapes. He has consequently been compelled to compress a connected story of Charles's adventures, accounts of visits to the houses in which he was concealed, and much interesting matter regarding the persons and families who concealed him, into a space utterly inadequate to so extensive a plan. Add to this that there are some hundred and twenty illustrations, most of them very satisfactory, and it will be seen that Mr. Fea handicapped himself from the start.

Notwithstanding these drawbacks, he has unquestionably produced an attractive and, indeed, a charming book, which forms an excellent supplement to and continuation of The Boscobel Tracts, which were compiled nearly seventy years ago by the father of the author of Tom Brown. He appears to have gone over the whole of the ground traversed by the King, and to have visited all the roof-trees under which he was hidden by loyal people like the Penderels of Boscobel and the Whitgreaves of Moseley, none of whom seem to have hesitated a moment about accepting the terrific risks of the position. These places and incidents are described carefully and, in the main, correctly, although it is clear that here and there Mr. Fea has tripped through depending too closely upon printed statements of no authority. As an account of the present condition of the houses and families which contributed to Charles's safety the book is likely to be a useful volume of reference; and although the reprinted tracts to which we have referred occupy a great deal of room, we can hardly wish them away, since each one illustrates in very vivid fashion, and with a delicious archaism of language, successive stages of the journey which, beginning by rousing Richard Baxter from his bed at Kidderminster, ended safely with Charles's embarkation upon Capt. Tattersall's brig at Shoreham. Vast quantities of fugitive matter have been printed upon this subject, and Mr. Fea deserves thanks for having focussed them in his book, where they can be readily referred to.

Attractive, however, as the volume is to the general reader, we fear it will not commend itself so extensively to the genealogist. Mr. Fea is not strong in matters of pedigree, as he exemplifies in his treatment of Dame Joan Penderel of Boscobel. If there be one genealogical fact better ascertained than another, it is that this stout old lady was the mother of the five brothers who had more to do than anybody else with securing the King's safety. Yet Mr. Fea, in the teeth of all the evidence, and on the strength of an inaccurate and roughly compiled Restoration pamphlet, makes her the wife of her own son, William. The truth is, that her husband, as well as her son, was a William Penderel; and, indeed, Mr. Fea gives away his whole case when he points out that the portrait which he reproduces of "Jane Penderel" (an entirely mythical personage) is that of the mother of the brothers. Now, the artist painted upon that portrait the words "Dame Penderel, 1662," and it is therefore clear that she and the Dame Penderel, who was buried seven years later, are the same person—unless Mr. Fea is prepared to argue that Charles II. dignified two ladies, living at the same time and within half a mile of each other, with the title of "Dame." The confusion seems to have arisen from the similarity of the names Jane and Joan, added to there being a father and son with identical Christian names. Mr. Fea is mistaken in saying that Edmund Penderel, the son of the historic miller of Whiteladies, was the godson of Catherine of Braganza. It was Edmund's son Richard upon whom that mark of royal favour was conferred. In his account of the present representation of the line of Humphrey Penderel he confuses another son with his father, and there never was any such person as "the late Humphrey Penderel, Esq.," to whom he refers on p. 59. Errors of this kind may not affect the enjoyment of the book by the general reader; but they sensibly diminish its value as a serious contribution to family history.

FOUR SHAKESPEARE BOOKS.

The Tempest. Edited by F. S. Boas. "Warwick Shakespeare." (Blackie.)

Cymbeline. Edited by A. J. Wyatt. "Warwick Shakespeare." (Blackie.)

King Richard II. Edited by C. H. Gibson. ("Arnold's School Shakespeare.")

The Noble Kinsmen. Edited by C. H. Herford, Ph.D. "Temple Dramatists." (Dent.)

THE "Warwick" Shakespeare is one of the most desirable of annotated editions for advanced students. It is also excellently adapted for the general reader who, though emancipated from the burden of examinations, still desires to be kept in touch with the latest results of scholarship upon the plays. Mr. Boas's "Tempest" is one of the most satisfactory numbers of the series. The editor has recently made his mark with a volume of larger scope upon Shakespeare, and here, as there, he shows considerable powers of delicate analysis and helpful criticism. His introduction to the "Tempest" is a very subtle and sympathetic piece of work, and admirably written to boot. The notes and similar apparatus are very accurate and sufficiently full. Mr. Boas keeps a judicious balance throughout between the respective claims of scholarship and of literary criticism proper. In most of his conclusions as to matter of fact he carries us with him. We think, however, that he speaks too favourably of Dr. Garnett's theory that the play was written for the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth and the Elector Palatine in 1613. The parallel between the supposed drowning of Ferdinand and the death, not by drowning, of Prince Henry is too far-fetched. "Cymbeline," in the same series, is also an elaborate and careful edition; but Mr. Wyatt has not the same unerring instinct in dealing with doubtful points as Mr. Boas. His conceptions of the nature of evidence make us open our eyes from time to time. It is true, for instance, that the plot of "Cymbeline" is partly taken from a novel in Boccaccio's Decamerone, and that a passage in the "Winter's Tale" is taken from the same source; but to infer from this that "Cymbeline" preceded the "Winter's Tale" by no long interval is, to say the least of it, hazardous. Mr. Wyatt's literary touch is rather heavy, and, although a set of questions may be a useful appendage to such an edition as this, they should be placed by themselves and not interspersed among the notes. They are particularly irritating to those who are not "getting-up" the play.

Mr. Gibson's "Richard II." aims at younger readers; but it also is excellent of its kind. The introductory matter is a good deal fuller than that of many other volumes of the series, and the historical section deserves especial praise. Mr. Gibson does not seem to have quite appreciated the evidence by which Prof. Hales and others have shown that Shakespeare's play was probably the exolata tragedia acted before the Essex insurrection in 1601; or the argument as to the date of the play to be drawn from the fact that the borrowings from it in Daniel's Civil Wars only appear in the second of two editions of that poem, both printed in 1595. The first note given is unfortunate enough to refer to a stage-direction which is not to be found in the text; and it cannot be correct to say that Shakespeare was a member of the Lord Chamberlain's Company in 1593, for that company only began to be in 1594.

Prof. Herford's excellent edition of "The Noble Kinsmen" is a welcome item in the interesting series of which it forms a part; and the more so because the play is not, like "Pericles," found in most of the ordinary Shakespeares. Yet the verdict of most competent readers would surely be to the effect that it is not only the better piece of the two, but also incomparably the more Shakespearean. On this vexed question of authorship Prof. Herford has something to say in his brief—all too brief—introduction. In our opinion he shows himself unduly sceptical. It is the design and motive of the play rather than the verbal style which make him hesitate to ascribe the non-Fletcher scenes to Shakespeare. But his scruples have not really much foundation. Shakespeare never, he says, "exploits the love relations of the gentle and the lowly born." "Exploits" is a question-begging word: but surely the love relations of the gentle and the comparatively or apparently lowly born form important motives both in "Hamlet" and in the "Winter's Tale." And this were a strained reason at best for rejecting the very plain evidence, not only of the style of many of the scenes, but also of the title-page of the quarto of 1634:

"The more proclaiming
Our suit shall be neglected: when her arms,
Able to lock Jove from a synod, shall
By warranting moonlight corset thee. O, when Her twinning cherries shall their sweetness fall
Upon thy tasteful lips, what wilt thou think
Of rotten kings or blubber'd queens? what care
For what thou feel'st not, what thou feel'st being able To make Mars spurn his drum? O, if thou couch
But one night with her, every hour in't will Take hostage of thee for a hundred, and Thou shalt remember nothing more than what
That banquet bids thee to."

Who, if not Shakespeare, wrote like this? "Massinger, perhaps," suggests Prof. Herford—"the classical allusions are in his vein." Massinger, quotha!

FLETCHER OF SALTOUN.

Fletcher of Saltoun. By G. W. T. Omond. "Famous Scots" Series. (Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

FLETCHER OF SALTOUN is one of those men who have had the fortune to be saved from the wreckage of time by an epigram. A good epigram, indeed, is your best of balsams to preserve and mellow the perfume of a reputation. As Shirley has it—

"Only the sayings of the witty Grow sweet and blossom in the city."

But in sober earnest one would rather be inclined to claim for Fletcher of Saltoun that a chance phrase thrown out in a pamphlet has obscured the memory of many notable and strenuous deeds on behalf of liberty and civic virtue. It is in the Dialogue on the Right Regulation of Government that he says:

"I knew a very wise man so much of Sir Christopher's sentiment that he believed that if a man were permitted to make all the ballads he need not care who should make the laws of a nation."

Fletcher's lifetime was passed in the making, or perhaps more strictly in resisting the making, of laws; yet one fears that the popular imagination, helped by the associations of the name, adumbrates him as an unknown poet who sometime and somewhere devoted himself to the making of ballads now forgotten. To dispel such ignorance, and to restore to his proper place in history a most original and stimulating personality, is the object of Mr. Omond's volume. Nor can it be considered superfluous, for no set biography of the ingenious writer and fervid patriot has appeared since the publication of the Earl of Buchan's Essays on Fletcher of Saltoun and the Poet Thomson, in 1792. It is curious, however, to observe that a Life of Fletcher was at one time planned, but never executed, by no less a writer than Rousseau.

Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun was a laird of Haddingtonshire. He received his early training in history and political philosophy from the future historian Burnet. After a period of travel he returned to Scotland a confirmed Whig, with Republican tendencies. He vigorously opposed the governments of Lauderdale and of the Duke of York in the Estates of 1678 and 1681, and found it expedient to live abroad. He was outlawed for participation in the Whig plot and alleged participation in the Rye House plot. Then he joined the ill-fated expedition of Monmouth, but left the force at Lyme Regis, owing to a quarrel with another leader, in which he pistolled his man. For some time he travelled in Spain, and fought the Turks in Hungary. The accession of William III. brought him back to Scotland. He plunged into politics, and played a prominent part in the first and last free Scottish Parliament of 1690 to 1707. The question with which that Parliament had to deal closely resembled the Irish question of Home Rule in our day. Fletcher led a party which was vehemently opposed alike to the English domination and to the Royal prerogative. The refusal of England to assist the Scottish settlers on the Isthmus of Darien exasperated the country, and gave strength to Fletcher's elbow. He fought with passion and genius—first, for Scotland's right to disregard the English nomination of a successor to Queen Anne; secondly, against the Union; and, thirdly, against the abolition of the separate Scottish parliament. Fortunately, or unfortunately, for his country he failed in every case. Holyrood was closed, and Fletcher shook off the dust of an ungrateful land, and lived in England or abroad until his death in 1716. He was a man of fine parts, but unstable, and what would nowadays be called a political faddist.

"His schemes," says a shrewd observer, "had but very little credit, because he himself was often for changing them; though in other respects a very worthy man. It used to be said of him that it would be easy to hang him by his own schemes of government; for if they had taken place he would have been the first man that would have attempted an alteration."

And he laboured under a chronic inability to keep his temper. The brawl which deprived Monmouth of his two ablest lieutenants has been referred to. There is a lurid story of his drowning the skipper of a night-scoot for whiffing tobacco in his face. During the Union debates his hand was always on his sword, and the House had frequently to suspend its grave deliberations in order to swear Fletcher and some equally impetuous adversary to keep the peace. Oldmixon calls him "hot, positive, obstinate, opinionative," and Swift "a most arrogant, conceited pedant"; a more unbiassed criticism may well recognise an accomplished gentleman and a true, if visionary, patriot. In person he is described as "a little man, and had a brown periwig, of a lean face, pock-marked," and again as a "low, thin man of brown complexion, full of fire, with a stern, sour look." His reputation for oratory in "the most elegant Scots" was considerable, but of this posterity has not the materials to judge. As a writer, he stands out in a period during which Scottish letters had sunk to a low ebb. He was a master of the political pamphlet, simple, lucid, pointed. Eloquence and irony were at his command. His earlier Discourses on Militias and on The Offices of Scotland are full of enlightened, but Utopian, proposals, paradoxically conceived and ingeniously maintained. But it is in the imaginary dialogue on the Right Regulation of Government that his humour and his shrewd insight are at their best. As Mr. Omond very well points out, this admirable piece of writing, composed long before Addison appeared on the scene, has all the distinction, the polish, and the gaiety of a Tatler or a Spectator. Mr. Omond deserves to be congratulated on a book which throws light not only upon a most remarkable personality, but also upon the inner workings of politics during an interesting and critical period of Scottish history.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The Confessions of St. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo. Edited by Alexander Smellie, M.A. "Books for the Heart" Series. (Andrew Melrose.)

WE rejoice to see this famous book in a convenient and accessible form, and in an English dress which loses little by comparison with the fifth-century Latin of the original. It is a human document from the value of which a millennium and a half is unable to detract; rather there are few ascetical works, ancient or modern, more proper to correct the spirit of an age only half conscious of the progress it has made towards materialism. It is "a letter written to God," full of self-upbraiding, of humble tenderness, of a sweet unction. The Saint writhes in self-contempt, is overwhelmed with wonder, flashes with exultation, weeps with desire. He had pursued learning and attained to excellence in rhetoric, but it was vanity; he had mourned over the fabled sorrows of Dido, had rejoiced in the charm of the noblest literature, had studied Aristotle and Plato and had understood them unaided, but this also was vanity and vexation of spirit. "O Truth, Truth, thou knowest how the inmost marrow of my soul longeth after thee!" But "I had my back to the Light and my face to the things enlightened; whence my face itself was not enlightened." After a tempestuous, baffled search in the troubled seas of heresies and false philosophies, he won to the light itself. "I was tossed about by every wind," he writes, "but yet I was steered by Thee, though very secretly." With knowledge he put on strength for the great renunciation which they must make who aspire to the ecclesiastical state. One by one even the lawful joys of the senses are laid aside too. Yet to the end, while his heart pours out its treasures at the feet of the "Mighty Lover," the theme of self-accusal recurs and recurs again.

"Too late loved I Thee, O Thou Beauty of ancient days, yet ever new! too late I loved Thee! And, behold, Thou wert within, and I abroad; and there I sought for Thee, deformed as I was, running after those beauties which Thou hadst made. Thou wast with me, but I was not with Thee. Things held me far from Thee which, unless they were in Thee, were not at all. Thou calledst and didst cry aloud, and didst pierce my deafness. Thou didst flash and shine forth, and didst dispel my blindness. Thou didst send forth Thy fragrance, and I drew in my breath and panted for Thee. I tasted, and still I hunger and thirst. Thou touchedst me and I burned for Thy peace."

It is by introspection, by heart-searching, that God is found; not in phials or in fossils: they all tell us this, and none with a sweeter voice of sure conviction than the Saint of Hippo.

* * *
Flowering Plants and Ferns. By J. C. Willis, M.A. (Cambridge University Press.)

THIS book consists of two distinct parts, each constituting a separate volume. The two parts are of very different merit. The second is the valuable portion of the work. It is an alphabetical guide to botany, giving in a brief and thoroughly practical way the chief facts about the plants of the whole world. All the natural orders are included, and to each British genus, as well as to all the most noteworthy foreign genera, a separate article is given. Not only the scientific features, but also the commercial and practical attributes of the plants are well treated. To do this in a book comfortably fitting into the pocket was not easy, and Mr. Willis has carried out his plan with skill and judgment. The book will be useful to many classes of persons who require the greatest quantity of in formation compressed into the smallest possible form. The traveller, for example, who has space in his luggage for only one book on botany will probably find no work so well suited to his purpose as Mr. Willis's vol. ii. The book is also intended to serve as a guide-book to Kew Gardens and to the other chief botanic gardens of Great Britain, thus fulfilling a useful object. But since, to a person knowing no botany, the concise descriptions in vol. ii. need explanation, an introductory volume was added. Here Mr. Willis is not so fortunate. In order to illustrate principles and to stimulate his reader by showing him how interesting the philosophical study of plants can be, he has been led to introduce a great deal of theoretical and, indeed, speculative matter. Throughout these earlier pages we feel that Mr. Willis's treatment is inadequate, and that he has as yet neither the precision of thought nor the width of experience which the task required. Mr. Willis has lately been very properly chosen to direct the Royal Botanic Gardens, Ceylon. When he has seen ten years' service in that important post he will probably be surprised to find how easily he answered most of the hard questions of biology in 1896.

The Order of the Coif. By Alexander Pulling. Cheap Edition. (William Clowes & Son.)

THE hope expressed by the publishers that this new and cheaper edition of Mr. Alexander Pulling's learned work may attract the general reader seems rather a bold one. Still, general readers, seeing the title of the book, will ask, What on earth is the Order of the Coif? and the curiosity of some will perhaps be satisfied only with Serjeant Pulling's exhaustive answer to the question. The coif, or head-covering of the Serjeant of the Law, is still traceable. Visitors to the Law Courts must have noticed that the wigs of some of the judges and a few leading members of the Bar are surmounted by a small disc of black silk edged with white. The man who thinks he knows things will point this disc out as "the coif." It is not the coif; but it is an interesting survival of the coif. The real coif was a close-fitting head covering, rather like a Knight Templar's cap, and was the distinctive and honourable badge of Serjeants of the Law from the moment of their "creation." The exact appearance of the coif may often be seen on the tombs of departed judges and serjeants, who are often represented kneeling in their robes and wearing this white, close-fitting covering. Later, it became customary to wear a small black cap over the coif. This is seen in portraits of Lord Coke. A black and white effect thus became associated with this head-dress; and when in the eighteenth century the fashion of wearing powdered wigs was adopted in the courts, the perquiers preserved the memory both of coif and cap by fixing a little black and white disc on the top of the wig. The wearers of the coif have formed a distinct and honourable Order from the earliest days of English history.

"The Brothers of the Coif," says Mr. Pulling—

"devoted to the profession of the law, bound by a solemn oath to give counsel and legal aid to the King's people—were for ages to be found at their ancient rendezvous in St. Paul's Cathedral, the Parvis, or their allotted pillars there, wearing their distinctive costume, the robe and the coif, ever ready to receive those who sought their assistance, to give counsel pur son donant to the rich, gratis to the poor suitor, and to aid when called on in the judicial business of the King's courts."

It is needless to say that Mr. Pulling quotes Chaucer's gracious description of a man of this type. Mr. Pulling traces the history of the Order, its privileges, badges, and costumes, down to the present day. The virtue and strength of the Order seem to have passed gradually into other institutions. But it is a mistake to suppose that the Order of the Coif is dead—it is only moribund. The Serjeants of the Law are no longer a society; and they do not increase in number. "As matters now stand," says Mr. Pulling, "there is small inducement to apply for the coif." Mr. Pulling would like to see the glories of the Order revived—not a likely event. But if Mr. Pulling's book fails as a plea for resuscitation, it is a worthy epitaph.

Gods and their Makers. By Laurence Housman. (John Lane.)

THE kernel of Mr. Housman's charming fable is contained in these stanzas from the poem which he prints by way of epilogue. The poet conceives of man, at the end of the world, arraigning God:

"Why hast Thou plagued us so long,
And bent us with bridle and bit?
We were the doers of wrong,
But Thou wast the shaper of it.
Our graves were dumb mouths set asunder,
Our dead were dumb mouths shut fast:
O, Thou, whose yoke we were under,
Give answer at last!"

"Laughed the usurper and said:
'Though ye were ignorant of me,
Gotten of the quick and the dead,
Doubtless my fathers were ye.
A blight from the night of your morrow
Through each new heaven and new earth,
I stand in the gates of your sorrow
At the door of your birth.'"

Peeti, the fascinating little savage who acts as the central figure of Mr. Housman's allegory, expresses the same thought more simply when he says of the very fractious and exorbitant deities which were furnished to him and his fellows by the Priest's College: "Our gods are but the evil that is in us." An allegory is always capable of bearing more than one construction, and mayhap we have not read Mr. Housman aright; but if we have, this book is a very whole-hearted attack upon every system of theology. Other readers may, however, find a different meaning, and certainly no one whose sympathies are at all alert can fail to be attracted by the story, so tenderly told, of Peeti and Aystah and their remote pagan community—remote, and yet, as the satirist sees us, so near! Mr. Housman follows the example of Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Kipling in supplying his own chapter-headings. Some of them are so good as to lead us to hope he is projecting a volume of grotesque verse.

FICTION.

Under Love's Rule. By M. E. Braddon. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

WE do not grudge Miss Braddon her vogue, for we think that on the whole she deserves it. Her plots are of the most commonplace kind, but she works them out with much vigour and skill. The ordinary devourer of circulating-library fiction demands one thing alone—the quality of orderly narrative—and unless the more recondite literary virtues are seasoned with this, he is apt to reject the whole in disgust. But Miss Braddon has other claims on the affection of her readers. Her work is inspired with an amiable moral sentiment, and her tragedies are, in general, pleasantly rounded off with a happy ending. Above all, she writes of fine society with an assured air, and delights her admirers with feminine talk on the details of luxury. To the serious side of a great art—the adequate conception of character, the profound and moving tale of human feeling, even the minor accomplishment of an English style—she has never given much thought. But she knows her own business, and makes no claims to unmarketable virtues. In this book we have the story of the three small children of a fashionable mother, who, from extraordinary unpleasantness, are educated into decency by the ministrations of an aunt; so that when the inevitable crash comes, and the father shoots himself, they are able to take up the burden with the requisite patience. The boys are mere caricatures, the brusqueness and slang of the eldest being as crudely exaggerated as the solemn precocity of the second. But the details of smart life are satisfactory for those who like them, and the story moves with spirit to its close.

Captain Shannon. By Coulson Kernahan. (Ward, Lock & Co.)

OF all forms of fiction none is so dependent for its success upon the seriousness of the author as is the detective story. If the reader for one instant suspects that the author is not in earnest, he may as well pitch the book into the fire forthwith for all the satisfaction it will give him. A detective story should be approached by its author with hardly less solemnity than marriage. It is Mr. Kernahan's ignorance or contempt of this fact that makes Captain Shannon a failure. He writes admirably; he has a swinging narrative style; his invention is fecund; his belief in himself is persistent; but none the less the book is futile. It is incorrigibly jaunty, and we are never permitted to lose sight of the fact that Mr. Kernahan likes writing it. In frequent discursions (discursions in a detective story!) he gives us opinions of his own on all kinds of irrelevant matters, and once he even goes so far as to stop the story to tell us that it has no woman in it! Art, especially the art of Gaboriau, is a most serious affair than this. Pruned of impetuous growths, the tale would be a fairly good one, for Captain Shannon is a dynamitard of unusual imagination and daring. As it is, it can convince no one.

The Happy Hypocrite. By Max Beerbohm. (John Lane.)

THE material of Mr. Beerbohm's "Fairy tale for tired men," as he calls it, is better than the execution. He has hit upon a charming idea. He takes a roué, a man-about-town of the flexible Georgian period, Lord George Hell by name (who is "thirty-five, and a great grief to his parents"), and shows him through the influence of the girl he loves and marries led back to simplicity and virtue. This, the reader will say, is old enough. True; but Mr. Beerbohm does more. His Lordship, when first he asks little Jenny to be his wife, is told that she can marry no man that has not the face of a saint. Lord George Hell's features being quite the reverse, he seeks a mask-maker, and procures the mask of a saint in which to court his lady. In this mask he wins her, and sunned upon by her pure rays he grows hourly less and less remote from the character whom he is impersonating. And then, one day, when the mask is torn from him, his face is found to have become like unto it. A prettier idea one could not wish. According to his lights Mr. Beerbohm has worked it out well, but we are often doubtful as to the propriety of his treatment. He alternates extreme sophistication with extreme artlessness almost too pointedly, and he seems never quite to have made up his mind as to what kind of audience he is addressing. When the professional Laugher becomes Sentimentalist, we must be pardoned if we are mystified. Even so witty a writer as Mr. Beerbohm can be too bizarre: to make Jenny, the wife, only sixteen is monstrous. None the less we are grateful for The Happy Hypocrite, and hope that the rest of the Bodley Booklets, a series which it inaugurates, will be as amusing.

Scarlet and Steel. By E. Livingstone Prescott. (Hutchinson & Co.)

IT is a far cry from the Tommy Atkins of Mr. Rudyard Kipling to the dejected Cuirassier of Mr. Livingstone Prescott. This is a story half of barrack life and half of prison life, and it is written with a purpose. Sholto Mauleverer, who has been brought up as a gentleman, is dispossessed of his inheritance by a hated cousin, and, in his extremity, enlists. He suffers many hardships, and the climax arrives when the cousin becomes his captain. Goaded beyond endurance, he assaults an officer and is sent to prison. There the treatment is continued by another old enemy, who is now a warder, and by whose machinations he is brought into disgrace, flogged, and subjected to other humiliations which are not usually mentioned in novels. Mr. Prescott's object in presenting what is, of course, an extreme case is no doubt the same as Charles Reade's was, and he makes the same mistake of going too far. A captain may be harsh, or a warder may be unsympathetic, or a prisoner may be susceptible; but that a soldier should be pursued from first to last by the malignity of his two bitterest personal enemies, in whose power fortune has placed him, is as nearly a mathematical impossibility as the holding of a hand of trumps. Mr. Prescott assures us that he has been at pains to make sure of his facts; but in drawing up a system it is necessary to consider the nine hundred and ninety-nine cases in preference to the thousandth. There is no harm in writing novels about the odd case, but it is unsafe to argue from it.

A Dozen Ways of Love. By L. Dougall. (A. & C. Black.)

THESE tales are unequal, as a collection of short stories is apt to be. Perhaps Miss Dougall's reputation would not have suffered if she had not insisted on making up the "dozen" for the purposes of a pretty title. The best of the stories is certainly the first, "Young Love," a pathetic little sketch of an old lady whose memory has gone, save for one unrecorded incident of her youth. If Miss Dougall had been able to maintain the high level of sentiment which she reaches in this effort, the book would merit unreserved praise. Reservation is perhaps least needed in the case of "Hath not a Jew Eyes?" a brief tragedy of a barber and his customer. Miss Dougall's liking for the mysterious has full play in a weird fantasy entitled "The Soul of a Man." Other items in the volume are slight: some trivial, some extravagant. The story of the woman who murdered her husband as a measure of domestic economy, and who maintained to her dying day that "I've sins on my soul, but the drowning of O'Brien, as far as I know right from wrong, isn't one of them," is curious as an exercise of the imagination. "A Freak of Cupid," which is the longest of the tales, leaves the impression that Miss Dougall understands pathos better than humour.

The Knight's Tale. By F. Emily Phillips. (W. Blackwood & Sons.)

THE author of The Knight's Tale has either copied or chanced on some of the faults which we are willing to forgive Mr. George Meredith. She gives us a book in which much has to be guessed that most other ladies would have set down plainly; which takes much for granted that the easy-going reader may not be willing to grant. It is, nevertheless, a picturesque and vivacious story; and the somewhat vague and scrappy plot gathers itself together now and then into powerful situations. Paris behind barricades, as it displays itself to the betrothed of "Lindsay, the Communist," is the theme. But the book is far removed from the historical novel. It is mainly a study of feminine character in extremity. The heroine is introduced concisely. "Louis was conscious of the idea that she was proud. What he did say to himself was, 'Her name is Veronica.'" They became engaged in due course, and some years later they were married—in presence of the general, the bridegroom bound and under sentence of immediate execution. It is not necessary to tell the rest of the story. Nor would it be fair, for the terse and vivid style is a very essential quality of The Knight's Tale.

Did He Deserve It? By Mrs. J. H. Riddell. (Downey & Co.)

DID he deserve it? Well, we should rather doubt it, for Mr. John Moucell in the story is an unlovely example of the unsuccessful journalist. The victim of an early and foolish marriage, he supports a family of nine in South Lambeth by miscellaneous Press work. Out of jealousy he writes a bitter review of a friend's book, which kills the friend and shakes for ever his own daughter's faith in her father. But in spite of such devious courses his affairs take a turn for the better, his daughter marries happily, his family do him credit, and he becomes partner in a publishing business, and husband of a rich widow. The book attracts by its quality of straightforward narrative and its superabundance of "shop." Mrs. Riddell gives us the "shop" of the literary trade: but it matters little whether the stuff be religious, fashionable, political, or journalistic, it will always have its admirers. Yet in spite of this the book is in parts almost good. The small "Apostle" with his marvellous language is farcical, but amusing; and such minor people as Mr. Clinton Jones and Mr. Blackshaw are drawn with a faint touch of epigram. The character of Mr. Moucell, too, is conceived with an attempt at subtlety and completeness somewhat rare in this class of fiction. The plot, to be sure, and most of the people have the wearily familiar flavour of ineptitude; but there is just this hint of better things to deserve chronicle.

Essentially Human. By Annie Thomas. (F. V. White & Co.)

Essentially Human is none of your new-fangled problem novels. Its characters are from the pigeon-holes of a veteran caterer for the bookstalls, and their ungrammatical language has also made its appearance before. The plot is slight to thinness; it runs, not smoothly, to an uninteresting marriage. You meet the heroine, Helen Charmouth, at a presentation tea—fancy a modern heroine being presented!—and learn that she is the new society beauty. Her father, Sir Robert Charmouth, would marry her to the purchaser of his family estate in Norfolk; but Helen has fallen in love with a young, but successful, playwright. The playwright is also not modern enough to enjoy revealing the fact that he is the son of a well-to-do and retired tradesman in a neighbouring county town. Consequently, the revelation is deferred, and when it is made becomes a barrier. Helen is banished to the abode of an aunt, who does beadwork and harries her servants; although it need hardly be said that in the end love triumphs once more over prejudice. Comic relief is supplied by a painted and incredible widow of forty, who tries to cut out Miss Charmouth in her playwright's affections, and by a greedy and equally incredible enfant terrible. Of the other characters it is, perhaps, enough to say that there must have been a good deal of water in the ink with which they were drawn.

SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1897.

No. 1305, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow in due course.]

MR. S. R. GARDINER'S historical writings are not, as a whole, made up in easily purchasable quantities, but this cannot be said of Cromwell's Place in History, which is a slim volume founded on six lectures delivered in the University of Oxford. An interesting circumstance is that Mr. Gardiner had delivered the lectures without notes and without thought of their publication. For their reproduction as a book he had to rely mainly on the notes of two students of Lady Margaret Hall, Miss L. Verney and Miss Gunter. The object of the lectures was, says Mr. Gardiner, "not to deal with the biography of Cromwell, but to estimate his relation to the political and ecclesiastical movements of his time—to show how he was influenced by them and influenced them in turn."

THE ENGLISH STAGE. We have now the promised translation in book form of M. Augustin Filon's articles on the Victorian drama which appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes. The translation has been done by Mr. Frederic Whyte, and Mr. Henry Arthur Jones supplies a lengthy Introduction. Mr. Jones takes a less optimistic view of the present state of the English drama than his author, a circumstance explained, perhaps, by the fact that he surveys it at a later date. Thus M. Filon writes unhesitatingly:

"There is an English drama. The demand for it has been felt and the supply is forthcoming. Or, rather, it has come. It is a strenuous youngster, determined to keep alive, bearing up pluckily, if with trouble, against all the maladies of childhood, against the dangers of evil influences—the brutal roughness of some, and the undue tenderness of others.

So it seemed to Mr. Jones himself a few years ago, but he now writes:

"After considerable advances . . . the movement became obscured and burlesqued, and finally the British public fell into what Macaulay calls one of its periodical panics of morality. In that panic the English drama disappeared for the time, and at the moment of writing it does not exist. There are many excellent entertainments at our different theatres, and most of them are deservedly successful. But in the very height of this theatrical season there is not a single London theatre that is giving a play which so much as pretends to picture our modern English life—I might almost say that pretends to picture human life at all."

TWELVE BAD WOMEN.

THE Twelve Bad Men of Mr. Thomas Seccombe is followed by Twelve Bad Women, edited by Mr. Arthur Vincent, who thinks "it was fitting that the one book should be followed by the second." The Lives in this volume, which are written by eight writers, are those of Alice Perrers, the favourite of Edward III.; Alice Arden, the sixteenth century murderess; Moll Cutpurse, "thief and receiver"; Frances Howard, Countess of Somerset; Barbara Villiers, Duchess of Cleveland; Jenny Diver, "pickpocket"; Teresia Constantia Phillips, adventuress and blackmailer; Elizabeth Brownrigg, "cruelty personified"; Elizabeth Canning, impostor; Elizabeth Chudleigh, Duchess of Kingston; Mary Bateman, "the Yorkshire witch"; and Mary Anne Clarke, "courtesan."

OTHER BOOKS.

IN The Old Dramatists: Conjectural Readings, Mr. K. Deighton supplies a series of guesses at textual truth in passages taken from the plays of Marston, Beaumont and Fletcher, Peele, Marlowe, Dekker, and other Elizabethan dramatists, Shakespeare excepted. Most of these readings have already been printed for private circulation, and in giving them greater publicity Mr. Deighton expresses the hope that they will at least be "recognised as the outcome of patient industry, and of considerable familiarity with the language and thought of the old dramatists." . . . In Praise of Music is a music-lover's enchiridion and in method it avowedly follows the Book-lover's Enchiridion of Mr. Alexander Ireland. The book, which is charmingly printed and bound, is, we believe, the first collection of its particular kind. . . . Lectures in the Lyceum is an edition of Aristotle's Ethics for English readers. Mr. St. George Stock, the editor, explains that its aim is to appeal "beyond a merely academic audience to the wider circle of English and American readers who may care to know something of the philosophy of Aristotle." . . . Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons' series of County Histories of Scotland is continued in A History of Moray and Nairn. Mr. Charles Rampini, who has written this volume, explains that he has treated the Province, the Bishopric, the Earldom, &c., as separate subjects in order to secure "a more sharply defined picture of their nature, progress, and influence than if he had employed the more ordinary narrative form." . . . The elegant series of shilling books on English Cathedrals which Messrs. Isbister & Co. are publishing makes rapid progress. Canterbury, Norwich, Salisbury, and Gloucester are now added. . . . The Life and Times of Thomas Wakley is an extended record of the lifework of the founder of the Lancet, written by his eldest son and grandson. It was a happy idea to print on the title-page a part of the conversation between Mr. Chichely and Mr. Sprague concerning Wakley in Middlemarch: "But Wakley is right, sometimes," the doctor added judiciously; "I could mention one or two points in which Wakley is right." Two portraits of Thomas Wakley are given.

FICTION.

False Gods, by Mrs. Albert S. Bradshaw, was originally entitled "A House of Cards," but, as has happened in many other cases, the author was apprised at the last moment that the title had been used; hence the present title. . . . This is the year for which Mr. William Le Queux foretold the invasion of England in his The Great War in England in 1897, published five years ago. A third of the year has gone, and so far nothing more fearsome has befallen us than a new warlike romance by Mr. Le Queux himself—warlike, Arabian, and passionate. . . . Jinny Blake is Miss Hannah Lynch's latest essay in fiction; its prevailing mood is to be inferred from the verse of Browning which the author places on her title-page:

"I must bury sorrow
Out of sight,
Must a little weep, love
(Foolish me),
And so fall asleep, love,
Loved by thee."

Browning also furnishes a fly-leaf quotation for Paul's Stepmother, and One other Story, by Lady Troubridge:

"On earth the broken arcs
In heaven the perfect round."

. . . Ill-gotten Gold, a novel by W. G. Tarbet, is "a story of a great wrong and a great revenge"; but the table of contents is not enlightening, being after this pattern: Chapter I., page 1; and so on for twenty-one chapters. . . . As we Sow, by Christopher Hare, is a "West Country Drama" beginning: "'Do'ee look, Jem! Who be that a - goin' down leane? Caant 'ee see un droo the hedge?' 'Ay, sure 'nough, I beant no fool. 'Tis Varmer Yeatman on's grey mare.'" . . . Ripple and Flood, by James Prior, gives us Nottinghamshire dialect: "A can swim raight across the Trent an' back. An' a can dive, an' a can float. If yer was drownin' a could save yer to land like fun." . . . In Craketrees, by Watson Dyke, we achieve the breadth and harshness of the North Country: "Oh, ay; thar'd be a rare to-do if Rob was absent frae the Fair. Ye doesn't ken his power, lassie; but, then, thou's lived awa down in the flatter parts o' the world, in that place o' yourn at the Bell's; and it taks all t' knowledge and t' spirit out of a girl when she gangs to place down the dale."

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

THEOLOGICAL.

THE LIVES OF THE SAINTS. By Rev. S. Baring-Gould, M.A. Vol. II. John O. Nimmo. 5s.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES IN GREEK AND ENGLISH. With Notes by Rev. Frederic Rendall, M.A. Macmillan & Co.

HISTORY.

ROBERT THE WISE AND HIS HEIRS, 1272-1352. By St. Clair Baddeley. William Heinemann.

THE QUEEN'S REIGN FOR CHILDREN. By W. Clarke Hall. T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d.

CROMWELL'S PLACE IN HISTORY. By Samuel Rawson Gardiner. Longmans, Green & Co. 3s. 6d.

GLOUCESTER CATHEDRAL. By the Very Rev. H. D. M. Spence, D.D. SALISBURY CATHEDRAL. By the Very Rev. G. D. Boyle, M.A. NORWICH CATHEDRAL. By the Very Rev. Dean Lefroy. CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL. By the Very Rev. W. H. Fremantle. Iabister & Co.

THE COUNTY HISTORIES OF SCOTLAND: A HISTORY OF MORAY AND NAIEN. By Charles Rampini, LL.D. William Blackwood & Sons. 7s. 6d.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIVES OF TWELVE BAD WOMEN. Edited by Arthur Vincent. T. Fisher Unwin. 16s.

THE STORY OF THE CHEVALIER BAYARD. By Edith Walford. Sampson Low. 1s. 6d.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS WAKLEY. By S. Squire Sprigge. Longmans, Green & Co. 18s.

POETRY.

APHRODISA: A LEGEND OF ARGOLIS, AND OTHER POEMS. By George Horton. T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.

SAUL, AND OTHER POEMS. Vol. II. By Paul John. Mowbray & Co.

DRAMA AND BELLES LETTRES.

LETTERS, SENTENCES, AND MAXIMS. By Lord Chesterfield. With St. Beuve's Critical Essay. Sampson Low.

THE ENGLISH STAGE. By Augustin Filon. Translated by Frederic Whyte. With an Introduction by Henry A. Jones.

READINGS ON THE PURGATORIO OF DANTE. Chiefly based on the Commentary of Benvenuto da Imola. By the Hon. W. Warren Vernon, M.A. Second Edition, revised and enlarged. Macmillan & Co. 24s.

IN PRAISE OF MUSIC: AN ANTHOLOGY. Prepared by Charles Saylor. Elliot Stock.

THE CONSOLATION OF BONTIUS Translated into English Prose and Verse by H. R. James, M.A. Elliot Stock.

THE OLD DRAMATISTS: CONJECTURAL READINGS. By K. Deighton. Archibald Constable & Co. 3s. 6d.

ETHICS.

LECTURES IN THE LYCEUM; OR, ARISTOTLE'S ETHICS FOR ENGLISH READERS. Edited by St. George Stock. Longmans, Green & Co.

FICTION.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE. By J. H. Swingle. Digby, Long & Co. 3s. 6d.

ONLY A FLIRT. By Mrs. Robert Jocelyn. F. V. White & Co. 6s.

THE CHRONICLES OF MICHAEL DANEVITCH. By Dick Donovan. Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.

CASTLE MEADOW: A STORY OF NORWICH A HUNDRED YEARS AGO. By Emma Marshall. Seeley & Co.

FALSE GODS. By Mrs. Albert S. Bradshaw. Henry & Co. 6s.

CRACKETTES. By Watson Dyke. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

ILL-GOTTEN GOLD. By W. G. Tarbet. Cassell & Co.

HIS EXCELLENCY. By Emile Zola. Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.

PAUL'S STEPMOTHER. By Lady Troubridge. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

OUR WILLS AND FATES. By Katherine Wild. Osgood, McIlvaine & Co. 6s.

RIPPLE AND FLOOD. By James Prior. Hutchinson & Co. 6s.

A FULL CONFESSION. By F. C. Phillips. Archibald Constable. 1s.

THE EYE OF ISRAEL. By William Le Queux. F. V. White & Co. 6s.

THE PRIME MINISTER OF WÜRTTEMBERG. By Eller. William Andrews & Co. 3s. 6d.

THE FAULT OF ONE. By Effie Adelaide Rowlands. Kegan Paul. 6s.

AS WE SOW. By Christopher Hare. Osgood, McIlvaine & Co. 3s. 6d.

THE PLATTEAU STORY, AND OTHERS. By H. G. Wells. Methuen & Co. 6s.

FATE AND A HEART. By Faber Vance. Ward & Downey. 1s. 6d.

JIMMY BLAKE. By Hannah Lynch. J. M. Dent & Co. 6s.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IN proposing the toast of "The Army, Navy, and the Reserve Forces," at the Royal Academy banquet, the President, Sir E. J. Poynter, indulged incidentally in a little piece of family log-rolling. In the course of his speech he remarked that Tommy Atkins had now found his chronicler and poet. This allusion to Mr. Rudyard Kipling, who was present, and is, as everyone knows, Sir Edward Poynter's nephew by marriage, was received with cheers.

MR. ALFRED AUSTIN, who replied for Literature, began less felicitously than he ended. The beginning of his speech was a plea for "poor, houseless, unorganised, unincorporated, unrecognised literature, literature with no roof, no table of its own"—representing an attitude which an official Laureate is not the best person to take up, and being also somewhat inappropriate at an entertainment where literature has regularly occupied an honoured place for many years. Had Mr. Austin's remarks been made at the first Academy banquet at which the toast of Literature was proposed they would have been fitting enough.

CONTINUING, the Poet Laureate made some excellent remarks concerning the connexion of literature and art. After touching upon the sonnets of Michael Angelo, the speculations of Leonardo da Vinci, and the lectures of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he said: "Painters were the first to feel the magic of the poetry of Keats, the first to discover and proclaim the interpenetrating charm and finished felicity of Tennyson. And were any one to assert that, thanks to a certain keen but disinterested sympathy, artists are the soundest and surest judges of the higher literature of their time, I should not be tempted to contradict him. There is thus a tie, there subsists a bond of kinship, between literature and art, compared with which this, your annual communion with principalities and powers, however natural and pleasing, seems fortuitous and transitory. That is why I beg of you never to leave literature uninvited or undistinguished at your hospitable board."

MR. STEPHEN CRANE's first war letter to the Westminster Gazette was not particularly good, not noticeably better than much anonymous descriptive work, but included in it was a sketch of a British midshipmite which is very well worth remembering:

"Down in the launch, however, there was a middy who was a joy. He was smaller than a sparrow, but—my soul—how bright and Napoleonic and forcible he was! He was as busy as a hive of bees. He had no time for poses and genuflections and other amusements. Once, indeed, he looked up from his business to the deck of the ship, and this infant had a stern, quick glance, a man's eye. It was like hearing a canary bird swear, to watch this tot put a speaking-tube to his mouth. He was so small that a life-sized portrait of him could be painted on a sovereign, this warrior. She would be a fool of a mother who would trust him in a pantry where there were tarts, and his big sister can box his ears for some years to come; but of course there is no more fiery-hearted scoundrel in the fleet of the Powers than this babe. . . . If another child of the Cumperdown should steal this child's knife he might go to a corner and perhaps almost shed tears, but no hoary admiral can dream of the wild slaughter and Hades on the bosom of the sea that agitate this babe's breast. He is a damned villain. And yet may the God of Battle that sits above the smoke watch over this damned villain and all bright, bold, little damned villains like him!"

This is good work and good sentiment.

It is carrying the intimacy even of that form of journalism known as a Literary Letter too far when the personal appearance of a new author can be brought before the reader only by comparison with that of an older craftsman. The personal appearance of an author is, to begin with, of the highest unimportance, and, in the second place, to extol one man's face (and hair) at the expense of another's is not good manners. The London correspondent of the New York Critic usually shows so much taste, that it is surprising to find him despatching across three thousand miles of Atlantic the intelligence that a certain young novelist, whose second book has been well reviewed, is of "striking appearance—a sort of manly edition of Mr. —." The hiatus is ours. America can hardly desire to know this, and Mr. — is in no need of sneers.

THE annual meeting of the members of the Royal Institution of Great Britain was held on Saturday afternoon at the house of the Institution in Albemarle-street, Sir James Crichton-Browne, treasurer and vice-president, presiding. The annual report of the Committee of Visitors for the year 1896, testifying to the continued prosperity and efficient management of the Institution, was read and adopted. Fifty-eight new members were elected in 1896. Sixty-four lectures and nineteen evening discourses were delivered. The books and pamphlets presented in 1896 amounted to about 274 volumes, making, with 621 volumes (including periodicals bound) purchased by the managers, a total of 895 volumes added to the library in the year.

To Miss Clementina Black's recent novel, An Agitator, was prefixed a statement setting forth that no character in the book was drawn from life or intended to be a portrait. All authors who deal with modern life would do well to imitate such caution: a piece of counsel which an American novelist, Mrs. Edith Tupper Sessions, would readily endorse. Mrs. Sessions wrote a story called The Artist's Christmas, in which an artist figured who had painted a picture of General Lee's surrender at Appomattox. This picture was described by the authoress as "a mere daub," and the artist was said to have had a lean and hungry look. Soon after the story appeared a Col. Battersby arose, affirming that it was he whom Mrs. Sessions maliciously described, and claiming damages. The case was tried, Mrs. Sessions denied the charge, and Col. Battersby won 1,882 dollars 16 cents by way of redress.

ROBERT BROWNING

From a Photograph by H. H. Hay Cameron

By the death of Mrs. G. Linnæus Banks the older school of novelists loses a member who in her day won a large measure of popularity. Among her novels The Manchester Man—published first in 1876, and recently in an édition de luxe—Woovers and Winners, and Bondslaves—which appeared as lately as 1893—are perhaps the best known. The late John Bright was a strong admirer of Mrs. Banks's writings. She died at the age of seventy-six.

MR. JOHN LANE's readiness to turn the laugh on himself (and his authors) is very cheering. First he gives the book and then the parody of it, with charming impartiality. Mr. Grant Allen's British Barbarians, for example, was followed by Mr. Traill's travesty; the Yellow Book bards were merrily chaffed in The Battle of the Bays; and now, we learn, Mr. Le Gallienne's Quest of the Golden Girl is to be clinched by a Quest of the Gilt-edged Girl, also proceeding from the Bodley Head.

In the course of an agreeable essay on the Theory and Practice of Local Colour in Macmillan's Magazine, Mr. W. P. James mentions the extreme case of an ingenious novelist who deducted from his income-tax assessment the travelling expenses incurred in procuring the local colour for his new novel.

MR. JAMES's opinion is that local colour crammed for the occasion is worth very little. His conclusion is contained in these words: "Given genius and the poetic imagination the true school, and, so far as I can see, the only true school for that intimate and accurate local colour which the times demand is the instinctive observation of youth and adolescence, the unconscious or half unconscious absorption of impression during the early formative years. Compare, for example, the Scotch novels with Ivanhoe or The Talisman; compare George Eliot's English Midlands with the Florence of her Romola; compare Hawthorne's New England with the Rome of his Transformation; compare Mr. Kipling's India with his London."

THE near approach of the Jubilee is having its effect on the publishing season, authors and publishers being unwilling to launch books until the celebration and its distractions are over. The postponements that are being made will therefore extend to the autumn season, which, in consequence, is likely to be an exceptionally busy one. At the same time it must not be supposed that there is any noticeable falling off in the arrivals of new books. Our own table declares the contrary to be the case. On it, in the last few days, more than twenty new novels have accumulated, while the supply of other literature is in no way slackening, although the bulk is not of a very interesting character.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has been provoked by the Pall Mall Gazette into writing a statement concerning the inception and authorship of the Handbooks which bear his name, and this he has published in the form of a tiny pamphlet, entitled The Origin and History of Murray's Handbook for Travellers. The writer in the Pall Mall gave to Mr. Baedeker the credit of inventing this class of work; hence Mr. Murray's unanswerable claim to have originated it himself. "Having," he says, "from my early youth been possessed by an ardent desire to travel, my very indulgent father acceded to my request, on condition that I should prepare myself by mastering the language of the country I was to travel in. Accordingly in 1829, having brushed up my German, I first set foot on the Continent at Rotterdam. At that time such a thing as a Guide-book for Germany, France, or Spain did not exist. The only Guides deserving the name were: Ebel, for Switzerland; Boyce, for Belgium; and Mrs. Starke for Italy."

A few notes supplied by a friend helped Mr. Murray through Holland, but in Hamburg he was lost for want of them: it was this that started him in his career as a Guide-book compiler. His father invented the term Handbook. The scheme being thus begun with Holland, Murray's handbooks have been appearing steadily until this day. Mr. Murray was the sole author of several, "but, as the series proceeded," he says, "I was fortunate enough to secure such able colleagues as Richard Ford for Spain, Sir Gardner Wilkinson for Egypt, Sir Francis Palgrave for North Italy, Dr. Porter for Palestine, Sir George Bowen for Greece, Sir Lambert Playfair for Algiers and the Mediterranean, Mr. George Dennis for Sicily, &c."

BAEDEKER's series of Guides began in 1839, and Mr. Murray winds up his statement with the clinching remark that "although Messrs. Baedeker have brought out some eighteen different guide-books, every one of them has been preceded and anticipated by a Murray's Handbook for that particular country."

THE statement we published last week to the effect that "the Queen had not caused a memoir of Prince Henry of Battenberg to be written for private circulation" was incorrect. Such a memoir has not only been written but printed, and Her Majesty has presented copies to certain favoured recipients.

MR. JEROME K. JEROME's new book, Sketches in Lavender: Blue and Green, a collection of short stories, will be published early this month by Messrs. Longmans.

A SPECIAL edition of the Oxford Press Diamond Jubilee Bible, to be known as the Queen's Commemoration Bible, will contain the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund Shilling Stamp. A corresponding edition of the Prayer-book—the Queen's Commemoration Prayer-book—is also promised, including the stamp, various illustrations, and the form of prayer and thanksgiving to be used on Accession Sunday. Mr. Henry Frowde and Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall & Co. will jointly issue the two volumes, the prices of which will cover the cost of the stamp.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXVI.—ROBERT BROWNING.

BROWNING is the most hotly disputed of all indisputable poets. Such a critic as Mr. Henley will not hear of his being a poet at all; neither would such a critic as Mr. Coventry Patmore. The reason of both was the same: Browning's extreme disregard of recognised poetic form and conventions. He would, even in the midst of his most poetical poems, introduce passages of unquestionable rhymed prose; he could never proceed for long without exhibiting flagrant roughness and unmetricalness in metre. Consequently, such critics said that he lacked the most primary requisite of a singer—he could not sing. In our opinion, there are two distinct things to be separated in metre—ruggedness and roughness. Metre may be rugged and yet musical. Metre, in fact, may aim at two different things—melody and harmony. In this it corresponds to music. There is the Italian school of music, characterised by melody; there is the German school of music, characterised by harmony. Melody must be smooth, harmony admits of ruggedness. The same is the case with poetry. Swinburne is a conspicuous melodist, and is always smooth. Milton is a conspicuous harmonist, and is often rugged in detail. Coleridge stands between the two, being a harmonist whose harmonies are always melodious. So, too, are Milton's on the whole, in spite of their ruggedness in detail. But Shakespeare, in his greatest blank verse, that of his latest period, is rugged in the very nature of his harmonies. They roll with the grandeur of mountain boulders, only to be understood by a large and masculine ear. It is not so with Browning. There are in him no harmonies moving on so colossal a scale, that the individual frictions play only the part of the frictions in a male, as compared with a female voice. It is not ruggedness; it is veritable roughness, like the roughness of a harsh male voice. We must allow, therefore, that he lacks something of the quality of a singer. Yet it sometimes happens that a singer with a rough voice commands attention in despite of its roughness. And so, we think, it is with Browning. Donne is another example. Criticism has come round to the recognition of Donne, in spite of the roughest utterance ever employed by a poet of like gifts. Upon this precedent we rest our recognition of Browning as a poet. He went out of his way to be rough, apparently for roughness' sake, and without any large scale of harmonies to justify it. But his intrinsic qualities, far more than in the case of Donne, make him a poet in the teeth of this defect of execution: such is our opinion. Fineness of manner has often carried off smallness of matter. And, though to a rarer extent, we think that fineness of matter may sometimes carry off defect of manner.

Of the fineness of matter in Browning we can see no doubt. It is true that it is not invariably strictly poetical: there are whole pieces, like the famous monologue of Bishop Blougram, which can no more be called poetry than a soliloquy of Iago or Richard III. His was, in fact, a dramatic mind, though a dramatic mind of peculiar character. His special invention was the dramatic lyric. Even in his lyrics he was Robert Browning the "maker of plays," and he felt it and virtually said it. He has given us plays, and they are plays of a unique kind, coming under no previous precedent. His concern is not with action, but with the motives which lead to action, and the way in which those motives are unconsciously influenced by the varying play of circumstance. He is a verse-Meredith, indeed, so far as there can be affinity between two separate individualities. His plays turn virtually upon a single situation, which puts all the characters in a position of doubt. Their minds veer and shift under the intricate side-winds of circumstance; and at last they work out to a decision which is only half their own. With that solving of the situation the drama ends; and it is the exhibition of these intricate inward processes, conditioned by outward events and the interaction of the characters on each other, which constitutes the play. Naturally Browning has to adopt a new convention for an object so new and characteristically modern. He finds it in a daring extension of the principle of the soliloquy. The soliloquy is itself a convention, by which the characters are permitted to think aloud in solitude, after a fashion very rare in real life. But Browning's characters think aloud under all circumstances. A dialogue between two lovers, in a given difficult situation, is with him a matter in which both not only think, but feel aloud to each other, as never two lovers did or could. Yet their language is so skilfully managed, it is given so much of the form of colloquy, that we are deceived while we read into overlooking the intrinsic impossibility of the thing. Having once won from us that involuntary concession, he is able to do what he pleases, and to keep our interest on the stretch throughout a play in which nothing happens till the very last; in which we are throughout interested in the problem of what is going to happen. Needless to say such a drama is for the closet, not the stage. We can hardly conceive a Browning play being a stage success with any ordinary audience.

The dramatic lyrics, which seem to us Browning's finest contributions to poetry, are really such plays treated in brief, through the mouth of one of the people concerned. Always there is a similar problem involved, and always it is upon the working out of that problem that Browning fixes his interest. Consequently, in them, as in the dramas, pure poetry is left to come as an accident; it is not the object of the lyric. Yet there are few qualities of pure poetry which Browning is not capable of displaying as occasion arises. Music even comes, when the course of the feeling leads him into a train of pure beauty. Imagination is his at command. Take, for example, the passage in Colombe's Birthday, where he illustrates the thesis that lost confidence is never renewed in noble natures.

"Twist off the crab's claw, wait a smarting-while,

And something grows and grows and gets to be
A mimic of the lost joint, just so like
As keeps in mind, it never, never will Replace its predecessor! Crabs do that:
But lop the lion's foot, and——"

It is perfect, and the work of a poet undeniable. Then, for an example of emotion fused with imagination, look at such a thing as the passage where a lover hears his Spanish mistress name to him the flowers in her garden:

"Flower, you Spaniard, look that you grow not, Stay as you are, and be loved for ever!"

His power of word-painting (abhorred but unreplaceable epithet!) partakes of his characteristic roughness, yet it is all his own and vivid:

"The rose-flesh mushroom, undivulged
Last evening—nay, in to-day's first dew
Yon sudden coral nipple bulged,
While a freaked, fawn-coloured, flaky crew
Of toad-stools peep indulged."

Then consider his occasional, but (when he exerts it) Elizabethan power of ardent fancy. This, for instance:

"Most like the centre-spike of gold
Which burns deep in the blue-bell's womb,
What time, with ardours manifold,
The bee goes singing to her groom,
Drunken and overbold."

The Dramatic Lyrics, and Men and Women, seem to our mind the most characteristically valuable of this virile poet's contributions to English literature. Though his whole occupation is with problems of the inner nature, and problems, moreover (as a previous critic has noted), less deep than devious, yet his sane and impartial voice, sometimes, in them, trembles with a pathos all the more effective because it is so sudden, restrained, and brief. For instance, that most deeply tender conclusion of Two in the Campagna:

"Only I discern
Infinite pathos, and the pain
Of finite hearts that yearn."

He has a strange power, indeed, of distilling the moral of a coolly argued poem into a single poignant drop at the last. Sometimes, too, he accomplishes that imaginative feat of the greatest poets—the animating of external objects with human passion. So it is in A Serenade at the Villa:

"Earth turned in her sleep with pain,
Sultrily suspired for proof.

Oh, how dusk your villa was,
Windows fast and obdurate!
How the garden grudged me grass
Where I stood—the iron gate
Ground its teeth to let me pass!"

This is of the very breath of the elder poets. Then, too, the forbearing, regretful, most masculine tenderness which he can express towards women—the tenderness which can alone find utterance from supreme strength pitifully considerate of weakness, pardoning the wrong towards itself, through wise and sweet insight into the weakness and incapacity of the wronger:

"But for loving—why, you would not, sweet,
Though we prayed you,
Paid you, brayed you
In a mortar—for you could not, sweet!"

As to Browning's "message" much has been written, and many blasphemies. There are some who will have nothing of "messages" in poetry; who ask with Tennyson:

"Oh, to what uses shall we put
The wild-weed flower that simply blows.
And is there any moral shut
Within the bosom of the rose?"

Others answer that the dandelion makes excellent salad, and that the poets of the world have found morals shut within the bosom of the rose. It is a deep controversy which is not for decision here; but, setting it aside, we are unable to find that Browning had, or thought himself to have, any message. There are incidental utterances of wisdom in him, as in all but the slenderest poets; but, for the most part, he was essentially a questioner, who speculated upon things, and was content to answer: "That men do; what it all means, and what is the issue of the play, I shall find out when my part in it is played." It is very strange that modern criticism should have fathered sermons upon the man, next to Shakespeare, who was most disinterested in his outlook upon life, and most remote from preaching them. To summarise Browning would tax any critic. Some of his points we have indicated; many we have had necessarily to leave unconsidered. He was insufficiently an artist; but he was a strong, sane, cheerful, curious poetic onlooker upon life: great we unhesitatingly think, lacking few qualities of the greatest poets but the instinct to be orderly in his greatness.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

IN one of his delightful critical essays M. Jules Lemaitre greets Mme. Alphonse Daudet as the sole impressionist artist among women writers. From so delicate and charming a pen as hers something more agreeably original and personal than her extremely commonplace Notes sur Londres might have been expected. Prettily written, yes; but slighter than travelling impressions ought to be. True, it is a difficult task to write freely or justly of a people whose hospitality you have partaken of, and in this case those behind the scenes are perfectly aware that the Daudets were anything but satisfied with their visit to London, so that these notes are relatively insignificant as an imperfect statement; and between the lines we read Mme. Daudet's amiable desire to suppress all hint of discontent. There is a certain half-evaporated fragrance about the style suitably set in a pretty affectation of binding and dainty print, which completes the feminine attractiveness of the little volume, quaintly suggestive of boudoir rather than library. One never loses the impression that these elegantly trivial pages have been written by a superlatively well-dressed Parisian, and through the charmed smile one feels the suppressed irony, and wishes it had penetrated to the surface, and lent vigour or wit to this somewhat tame criticism of an alien nation. The touch is too light, too fugitive. When we find Mr. Meredith introduced to French readers as an English Mallarmé it is time to protest, however charming the critic may be. Mr. Meredith's English may be difficult, but it is English; while Mallarmé's tongue is a Chinese of his own invention, which even he may be defied to translate into French.

One remark of Mme. Daudet's deserves quotation for its veracity:

"I do not see here what we call the blue-stocking woman using an art as a deliberate originality, making of it a means of effect or seduction or the satisfaction of vanity. These women [authors] have the air of action, of workers, and nearly all maintain their own interests in newspapers and reviews with remarkable good sense and practical view. I do not see amongst them those protégées of directors—those half-actresses, half-authors—who bring feminine letters into disrepute with us. All remain women, and very feminine, and, after an hour spent with them [writing of their club], as in a big class at recreation—yes, the same gaiety, the same cordial grace—I return to my hotel edified by the English-woman."

It is not often a French writer condescends to compose an austere and Puritan novel on the old-fashioned English lines; yet this is what M. René Bazin, a very pleasant contributor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, has just done. His story, Du Tout son Âme, might have been written for the Young Person. It is a grave and touching tale, in which the art of dressmaking and the river Loire play important and profoundly studied parts. M. Bazin manages his scenery with consummate art, and is an obvious student of George Eliot. It is rare to find a provincial French town painted in fiction with such scrupulous fidelity as he paints the town of Nantes. The method is entirely English: a little prolonged, somewhat excessive in detail and dialogue, but sincere, honest, and noble work, with a high appreciation of humble virtue and an unwavering sympathy for the poor and weak. It is a realistic novel of the sober and elevated order, French homage to George Eliot, who, indeed, is even quoted in the dressmakers' room by one of the stitchers, and may be warmly recommended to English readers.

Of quite another order is the eternally adorable Gyp's new book, Joies d'Amour. Not that Joies d'Amour is a book to adore or even to give particular thanks for; but we read it, and remember past favours in the dull hours of life. Sad to whisper even, but Gyp, from excessive repetition, is beginning to lose her sparkle. Just as perverse and facile as ever, but less witty, less unconsciously immoral, less delightfully wicked. It is a Gyp growing old, but not perhaps noticeably wise: a Gyp who is getting tired of repeating herself and is conscious of doing it less well, and consequently begins to yawn in our disappointed faces. All the same, a bright and pleasant, an audacious Gyp, who is ever welcome if not ever fresh and new.

It is fitting that France should contribute to modern literature an exhaustive study of the poetry of Heine, since his own land, in resentment of France's claim, refuses him immortality in stone or bronze. M. Jules Legros, of the University of Bordeaux, has published a weighty volume on the life and work of the unfortunate poet. It is a sympathetic and a learned study—somewhat over-learned perhaps. Criticism of work so subtle and elusive, so penetrative and profound, of such exquisite fragrance and melody, would gain enormously by more spontaneity and less pedantry. The ordinary reader prefers to dwell on the wave and rhythm of Heine's verse, on its significance and beauty, and does not want to be forced to consider the number of w's that may be contained in a given number of lines. But pedantry is the mainstay of criticism. If the learned professor did not dwell upon these little matters that call for strong spectacles, how, in the name of science, could he convince the frivolous student of the unfathomableness of his knowledge? Still, this book of Prof. Legros is important, and one that a Frenchman should have written.

H. L.

NEW BOOKS.

Du Tout son Âme. René Bazin.

Joies d'Amour. Gyp.

Henri Heine. Jules Legros.

THE BOOK MARKET.

BOOKSELLING IN SUBURBIA.

LAST Saturday evening the Electric-avenue in Brixton was a pleasant sight. The sunshine poured down between the glazed roofs which cover the pavements; it reddened the red house walls that towered above the glass; and you were conscious of an ampler sky and a wider gaiety out there on the broad asphalt. The Avenue was packed with shoppers, the shops gleamed and beckoned, money had been earned and was now being spent; it was all very human and happy. A bookshop was half hidden by its own tressles and outside shelves, piled as these were with books and periodicals. Hundreds of cheap cloth-bound books lay prone before me or rose in front of me, gilt-lettered and decent to the eye, all priced 5d. I edged my way into the fingering crowd, and took up a book here and there. The gloved hands of the daughters of Brixton travelled with mine along the shelves as I selected volumes for a momentary inspection. People nudged and hustled, others kept filing into the shop, and somewhere in the heat and crush coins were clinking almost continuously as they fell from the hand. Taking up Fenimore Cooper's Pathfinder I mused, "Can Cooper sell?" and a woman almost took it out of my hand and used it as a pointer as she ran her eyes along the shelves. Then she passed into the shop clutching the Pathfinder. I picked up a novel—it was Dumas's Louise de la Vallière—and followed her. To the youth I said: "You seem to be doing rather well with these books; how many can you sell here in a week?"

"About four thousand, six."

"No, no; in a week?"

"Yes, sir, four thousand."

"I will see the proprietor," I said, and I did.

"Is it true that you are selling four thousand 5d. novels a week in this shop?"

"That is about the figure. We shall sell eight or nine hundred to-day alone."

"How many different novels are you supplying at this price?"

"About two hundred and sixty, and fresh ones are, of course, being added to the series."

"Tell me, will you, where these novels come from, and how it is possible to sell them in cloth covers at 5d.?"

"Well, they are turned out by a publisher in the East End who has for a long time been supplying drapers with cheap books to sell at 9d. a volume. This 5d. line is a new thing. I was only offered it six weeks ago, and I have already sold, or ordered, about seventeen thousand copies. Of course, the books are printed from stereotypes bought up from publishers. As for the binding, it is certainly wonderful, and would be impossible but for a new machine, which is capable of binding 1,200 volumes in an hour. I may tell you that thirty thousand of these novels are turned out weekly."

"But, as a bookseller and a bookman, you will admit that the type and paper leave a great deal to be desired."

"That is so. Still they are not so bad, and the moral of the thing is that people want inexpensive books and, if supplied with them, will buy them in amazing quantities."

"Your customers prefer a 5d. cloth-bound book printed from stereotypes to a 4d. paper-covered book turned out in first-rate style?"

"Yes; you see a cloth-bound book looks better on shelf and table. They think it well worth the extra penny. Understand me; I am with you in deploring the small print and indifferent paper. But here the books are. They are all popular; and they go like water."

"You say they are all popular. But do you mean to say that Jane Austen is popular? I see you have three of her novels."

"She sells well."

"And is the Book of Snobs popular?"

"Well, we sell that because we sell Thackeray's other books."

"And what kind of books are Boulah, by Evans Wilson, and The Mills of the Gods, by Mrs. Twells, and Barbara's Warning, by Mrs. Houston, and The Vale of Cedars, by Grace Aguilar?"

"Oh, they are rather goody-goody; but they are excellent stories, and sell all day and every day."

"Along with The Heart of Midlothian and Pelham, and Barry Lyndon and Wuthering Heights, and the Vicar of Wakefield, and Burns's and Byron's Poems, and Shakespeare's Plays?"

"Yes, they all sell."

"But Shakespeare at 5d. is execrable."

"Yes; but the 5d. edition sells better editions—Bliss's new two and eightpenny edition for instance."

"Do you sell many six-shilling novels?"

"Not many. But I can safely give a first order for fifty copies of every new story by Marie Corelli; and the books of Crockett, Barrie, Ian Maclaren, and Hall Caine go well as presents."

"As presents?"

"Yes, they seem to be always bought as presents."

"And your belief is that for their own reading people want cheaper books?"

"I am sure of it; and cheaper books would pay publishers and authors much better. The demand for cheap novels, of which the copyright has expired, is extraordinary; and why should not new books command a vastly larger public? I would like to see ordinary six-shilling novels by good authors published at two shillings, to sell net at eightpence. The sales would be enormous, and I believe most profitable to all concerned."

"I see that you do a large trade in weekly papers and the magazines. Can you give me any figures?"

"Well, we sell immense quantities of domestic papers. For instance, we sell 250 copies of Home Chat a week; 175 copies of Our Home; 125 copies each of The Happy Home, Home Notes, and The Woman's Life; and of Weldon's dressmaking papers we sell 1,200 copies a week. We often sell 300 of these on Saturday night."

"And the magazines?"

"The Strand tops the list; we get through fifty dozen of each number, and twenty dozen of the Windsor."

"And the novelettes?"

"The Family Herald Supplement is by far the most popular; we take two hundred copies weekly, and sell out."

"And the people who buy these papers are the people who buy these books?"

"That is so."

"Now, what about serious, 'improving' literature?"

"We don't keep it. The Free Library supplies that. People come in here with solid literature from the Library under their arms and buy the Sketch and The Three Musketeers. The Library, by the way, does not cut into us. I consider it does us good by maintaining the appetite for reading."

"And what is the secret of your own success?"

"I know what my customers want, and I provide them with that."

Emerging from the Avenue I stood watching that wonderful crowd. 'Buses and trams passed continually up and down the road, bicycle bells tinkled, colour and gilt lettering flashed in the sun, and the crowds of shoppers massed differently every moment. To the left, Brixton-hill began to climb through its own greenery to Streatham. I could fancy myself in a pleasant sea-side town, and thought that Acre-lane would be the way to the pier. Here and there a spire caught the golden light, and I knew that the caretakers were at work preparing for big congregations on the morrow. An immense suburban life revealed itself to me; and in the long ride back to Inner London I felt I knew more about life and less about literature than I had supposed.

A R T.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

LORD LEIGHTON was wont to say that he had no more power than a constitutional monarch; but he certainly had persuasion, influence, and purpose enough to cause the welcoming of young work with some young authority about it, and to bring some mitigation into the inevitable mismanagement of "the line." The same Academicians use their rights now as they used them then, the same obscure impulses prompt the Selecting Committee and the hangers. But when Lord Leighton lived the work of Mr. Furse was on the line, and it is now half way or more up the wall; Mr. Olsson's, Mr. Leslie Thomson's, and Miss Anna Nordgren's works were treated with respect; it is only this year and last year that we hear of the rejection of Mr. Tuke's. There has been, in short, no year within memory that has shown so much chance-medley injustice as we have to protest against in almost every room this year. And yet some confusion there must be; nor is the New Gallery (which has no membership) free of it. The Academy is an annual market, and our way, in London as in Paris, is to provoke the painting of many thousands of pictures year by year for such a market. We all know that a market is a medley. It would, moreover, be a waste of experience to expect a beautiful wall. Surely the last thing that a reasonable artist would wish to paint is a wall hung close with pictures. Yet to hear current complaints as to the ugliness of the views to be had at the Royal Academy you might suppose that the critics had never before this year recollected themselves within these many coloured rooms and rendered to themselves an account of their own impressions. Why should 1897 have to answer for all the years gone by? Those yet to come will not be without their own share of offences.

It is not so much the critical mind as the public mind and the popular that has some cause of disappointment this season. There is no picture of the year—nothing like "The Doctor," and "The Doctor" continues to be remembered with longing and regret—nothing to make an idol of. But the student of art and the lover of art should hardly complain of a year that has given them the two portraits of Mr. Sargent. They are, both of them, the work of a great master. In the "Mrs. Carl Meyer and her Children" the faces are painted with a somewhat less sudden simplicity than is usual with him, but no tampering with freshness, and no wavering of power follow the softer touches; for never was construction stronger, light purer, life keener, unity more absolute, or execution franker than in this astonishing work. There is not an inch of sameness in the whole surface of that pink dress, but neither is there an inch of detail; light plays on it everywhere with a literally indescribable variety, and especially there are hollows where the colour warms with reflection, but unity and simplicity reign and triumph. The child's portrait, "The Hon. Laura Lister," is surely one of the most beautiful portraits of children ever painted. To the tender colours of the face Mr. Sargent has given every fresh charm, and the painting of the black frock and of the brilliant white cap and sleeves is masterly. At another summit of success stands Mr. Adrian Stokes's work "Mountain Mist." The beauties of this picture are of so quiet a quality as to escape careless eyes, but they are altogether noble and distinguished. When has distant snow softly shone upon by the sun, ever before been painted with such loveliness of surface and light? The tenderness and severity of the work, the distance, the radiance, place this among the finest of mountain pictures: the sky is all atmosphere. It is difficult by the way, to place the little space of valley in the lower right corner; all else is simple, but this looks blank.

The admirers of Mr. Abbey's work last year have their faith at once stimulated and shocked by his "Hamlet." The colour is a splendour; of some of the figures it may be said that they stand; but if you took up Hamlet by his head, his legs would not stand but hang; he has no body; his eyes are not "riveted" on the King's face, for they impotently do not reach so high nor so far back. Mr. Abbey protests too much, and too intemperately against the tiresome convention of eyes dark with colour and bright with a sparkle by giving his faces white eyes and then effacing them. The loathly Ophelia has a cataract in each, but there is something not less than superb in the massing and the shining of the various white wherewith she is clad. It is a most uncourtly thing to place Hamlet with his back to the King and Queen.

Mr. Waterhouse has for two or three years—with his "St. Cecilia," his "Lady of Shalott," his "Pandora," and others—given the Academy its chief beauty. This year "Hylas and the Nymphs" is much spoiled by the sameness of the faces. This peculiarly modern lack of the variety of nature was observable also in the "St. Cecilia," and artists who are inclined to it should look at Filippino Lippi and the Flemings. A picture that marks the year (with Mr. Sargent's and Mr. Stokes's) is "The Mother," by Mr. Clausen, an interior lighted with a blue morning light in which the mother's candle goes out. Under the dim morning window is a child's bed. Not only for light and colour, but for action is this little picture admirable. Mr. H. S. Tuke is always distinguished; and his large canvas, "Beside Green Waters," has all his wonted beauties of design, tone, and colour. It is a most genuine "open-air," invested with day, brilliant in tone, though brilliance will hardly be attributed to it at the first glance; it is enough, however, to look away at the majority of paintings in the room to get a perception of the height of daylight in Mr. Tuke's; then the figures are beautifully drawn and poised; they have hold of the ground. In the rocky background, studied in flat and simple light, some intended effect seems to have escaped the painter. In Mr. Stanhope Forbes's "Christmas Eve" it is very late daylight that shines against an early moon, misty with flying scud, and still half effaced the lamps of a village street—the bluish last daylight of a soft west-wind winter day. Mr. Forbes has painted the profile of the street houses, the light side of a village house, the brass of the big instruments of the “waits,” a barrow of golden oranges, and the dimly dressed figures of the people, in all the truth of this daylight, and with a real beauty of values and of surface. Nothing more absolutely and artistically natural has been produced by this most able hand.

There are some interesting seas. Mr. Somerscales, in “The Last Fight of the Revenge,” seems somewhat to have exaggerated his own manner, his own colour, his own surface, and the massiness of his own waters (though Byron’s coined words were seldom fine, “massy” is good for waters heavy with depth). But his picture is full of talent. Mr. Herbert Draper, in “Calypso’s Isle,” is also massy; he admits no sky, and to his deep sea he gives at once illumination and a dark colour, and achieves much beauty. Mr. Olsson (badly hung and too near Mr. Draper) gives to all his water a too insistent blue, and the very foam is blue; his sea is opaque, yet there is magnificence of effect, and the little figures of syrens shine where they sit in the light of sunset—“singing as they shine,” as Addison would say. As Mr. Olsson has made his foam as blue as the wave, so he has made his flesh as red as his hair. Mr. Brangwyn’s “Venice” seems—one can say no more—to be worthy of a better place than the hangers have given it. One is just aware of most unusual colour, emphasis, and fire. In search of airy skies (a number of good landscapes must be kept for next week) one comes with pleasure upon Mr. Frank Dean’s, in “The Calm of a Summer Evening”; here are depths and distances of air, clouds that kindle softly and have sky beyond, and great unity and sweetness of atmosphere. Mr. La Thangue is at his best in “Travelling Harvesters,” in which the sunset light gives charm to what is all but too emphatic and rude in his admirable work. Elsewhere this year he is even dull, for all his enterprise. Mr. Arnesby Brown has a charming picture, “Herald of Night.” The drawing and movement of his cattle are as fine as is the beautiful painting of their surface; they move with the impulse and weight at once, that may be studied in their kind.

A. M.

DRAMA.

IT is a very salient quality of Dr. Ibsen’s plays that they never mean the same thing to two people. In “John Gabriel Borkman,” for example, Mr. Walkley has found another “King Lear,” a tragedy of deserted old age, while M. Emile Faguet thinks it a play of opposing egoisms simply, and the critics of certain papers see nothing in it but depression and gloom. For my share, it seems to me to be two tragedies in one, and two tragedies which do not harmonise dramatically with one another. Mrs. Borkman and her sister Ella and Erhart her son are not exceptional people. The two women are normal enough, following a normal instinct of monopoly in their desire for the boy’s love, which each, on different grounds, thinks due to her alone; and the boy himself, so far as the play takes him, is an ordinary boy with an ordinary thirst for life. And then these ordinary people contrive between them a tragedy of common life—a tragedy simple, natural, inevitable, commonplace, and withal unspeakably profound. But then there is John Gabriel Borkman, not an ordinary man: an exceptional man with an exceptional history. It is true that in a sense he is a type of self-deceivers. But there is more in him than this. M. Faguet sees in him just a self-deceiver with a greed of wealth. With deference, I think he is a great deal more. He is a veritable Napoleon in his way, a man who is lust of power made flesh, and who will sacrifice for it all else under heaven. This concentrated passion of power has many examples in history, but as society is levelled up and levelled down you find the examples growing fewer. Napoleon was a monster, John Gabriel Borkman is a monster, not less portentous because he dealt in vulgar stocks and shares and not in armies. I am convinced that Dr. Ibsen did not intend a figure of comedy merely, in the sense that Tartuffe is one. He is accustomed to work out his issues on (materially) a small scale; I think he meant Borkman to be as dignified a figure of greatness missed as if he had made him the potential lord of an unrealised empire. Be that as it may, Borkman is not of common life; men of that concentrated ambition are not found everywhere, and of those that exist but few, happily, spend five years in prison. So Borkman’s tragedy of wasted gifts and purpose is exceptional, and being that I do not think it harmonises with the other tragedy of the play. To have made so much of this point may be a confession of weakness: I am conscious that I have little else to say. I may give my opinion for what it is worth, that “John Gabriel Borkman” is one of the greatest—of the most humanly interesting and most dramatic—of Dr. Ibsen’s plays, and my experience, that from beginning to end I was held by it; and that is all of the play as a whole, except that Mr. Archer’s translation of it is admirable.

But I may mention a minor point or so. The idea of Foldal, the humble and ruined retainer of the ruined great man, and of the friendship between him and Borkman, which rests on their pretending to believe in one another, is a vein of pure comedy. But to my mind it is almost spoiled by the bareness with which they recognise it, and especially by the recognition being put into the mouth of the fool Foldal. In another matter I champion Dr. Ibsen against the world. He has been accused of gratuitous and offensive “cynicism” in Mrs. Wilton’s explanation of taking the girl Frida with her and Erhart to the South. In the teeth of Mr. Bernard Shaw, who sees in this merely the remark which any experienced woman of the world would make, I maintain that Mrs. Wilton jests: she accepted ironically and exaggerated the bad opinion Mrs. Borkman had of her morals.

The acting was extremely good. I have seen Miss Robins, indeed, in parts I thought more agreeable to her style, but in her great scene with Borkman she was excellent. Miss Genéviève Ward may have exaggerated a point here and there, but then she never slurred one. Mr. Vernon’s Borkman was almost perfect; he was dignified (as I contend he was right in being) even when Borkman’s vanity was absurd. Both he and Miss Ward impressed me throughout by their quiet possession of the stage and their clear and telling articulation. Since I saw Mrs. Tree in “A Woman of No Importance” I have always expected much of her in a part of comedy: she plays Mrs. Wilton, the human and possibly reprehensible lady, with a very skilful pointedness and a most delightful gaiety. Mr. Welch was the foolish Foldal to the life, and Miss Barton as Frida and Miss Caldwell as the Maid were natural and adequate. Mr. Martin Harvey had in Erhart the hardest part, in one respect, in the piece: its comedy of bathos was so pronounced. He was a trifle too robust and boisterous, but came out of the ordeal as very few young actors would have contrived.

THE opening night of Her Majesty’s Theatre was a great affair. The applause as this or that distinguished person came in gave one a pleasant feeling of being in popular company. The Post-Laureate’s lines, if not exactly poetry, were well intended, and were spoken very gracefully by Mrs. Tree. Then came the National Anthem, and my loyalty was pointed and glorified by the fact that a critic near me kept his seat. But I confess that Mr. Parker’s play, “The Seats of the Mighty,” failed to sustain my emotions. I enjoyed reading the novel: it combined the interest of romance with the interest of extremely clever and successful characterisation. But because I admire Mr. Parker’s work in fiction, I must be all the more on my guard against unduly praising his play. It seemed to me that the romance was resolved into something like melodrama, and, except in the “curtains” of the second and third acts, not good melodrama, and that the character of Doltaire, which in the book was brilliantly, and withal naturally, complicated, was merely wobbly in the play. Alixe, again, a great success of maidenly courage and grit in the book, was much of a lay figure. Mr. Tree made the most of Doltaire: he is good at delivering a speech, and good at little turns of humour, but neither quality had a proper chance in Doltaire. Mrs. Tree’s part of Mme. Cournal, though a slighter, had really better opportunities, and she made the very most of them. Of the rest of the cast, which included such excellent players as Mr. Lewis Waller, Mr. Murray Carson, Mr. Lionel Brough, and Miss Kate Rorke, I can say only that they filled unexacting parts very well; but I must single out Mr. Brookfield for his Louis XV., which was a rarity in stage kings in that it suggested a king. On the whole, I think Mr. Tree would have been better advised in starting his new theatre either with a distinctively modern play or with Shakespeare, and I hope to see Mr. Parker to better advantage as a dramatist. The theatre itself is an excellent achievement, imposing and in very pleasant taste, and the curtain, imitating the Gobelin Dido tapestry, is (apart from associations one has with some others) the "best in London."

G. S. S.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

LAST Saturday afternoon the programme of the orchestral concert at the Queen's Hall was devoted in large measure to the music of Grieg. Mr. Wood has, indeed, drawn up a series of programmes in which one composer is almost exclusively represented. The previous week, for instance, Brahms was selected; his recent death naturally explained, if it did not altogether justify, such a course. As a rule, it is undeniably better to aim at variety. Bach and Beethoven are exceptions; they do not produce monotony. And yet either of these masters, if he be listened to with becoming attention, may easily prove exhausting. Grieg in large quantities is, to my mind, eminently unsatisfactory. As with Chopin, so with him, daintiness of conception, delicacy of treatment, and dexterity in the art of colouring are the prevailing characteristics. There is much to please the fancy, to attract the ear, yet not enough to engage the intellect for any length of time. The interesting overture "In Autumn" was well given, and so, too, were the Norwegian Dances (Op. 35), cleverly transcribed for orchestra by Herr Hans Sitt. This, I presume, was done with the composer's sanction. Some passages sounded well; nevertheless, I much prefer these delicate, characteristic pieces in their original duet form. Miss Adela Verne gave a vigorous and intelligent rendering of Grieg's Piano-forte Concerto in A minor; but the music for its due effect demands a freer, more romantic reading.

The novelty of the afternoon was a Symphony, No. 1, in B minor (Op. 4), by Anton S. Arensky, named by Mr. E. F. Jacques in the programme-book, and justly too, as "one of the most gifted of the younger generation of Russian musicians." This work was not only written fourteen years ago, but at the time the composer was only twenty-one years of age. The music is of great promise; it is full of life, vigour, and colour. The thematic material may not be all of equal merit; some of it—as, for instance, the slow introduction and the second theme of the first, also of the second movement—has much charm and character; the rest, although never absolutely commonplace, is less attractive. The workmanship throughout is decidedly clever, and the orchestration effective, though at times noisy. Of the four movements I prefer—at any rate after a first hearing—the melodious Andante, and the quaint Scherzo in 5-4 time with its dainty little Trio. The work as a whole is somewhat long, and it certainly was not well placed in the programme. This Arensky first Symphony is in B minor; Tchaikowsky's last was in the same key. Moreover, Arensky's first movement is entitled Allegro patetico; the other work is named Pathetic Symphony. These facts are curious; the earlier work must have been known to Tchaikowsky. The performance under Mr. Wood was excellent.

MR. FRED. LAMONT gave the first of two pianoforte recitals at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. The audience was not a large one, and yet the pianist is really one of high rank. He has brains as well as fingers, and he not only understands, but feels the music he is interpreting. Some pianists magnetise, as it were, their audience: such was Liszt or Rubinstein, such is now Paderewski. Mr. Lamont is rather of the Bülow school, one in which feeling, if not killed, is kept under strict supervision. The effect which he produces is not, therefore, exciting or overpowering; his genuine playing, however, commands respect and deserves admiration. The first piece on the programme was Brahms' Sonata in F minor (Op. 5), performed with rare insight into the music, both as regards its formal and also its spiritual aspect. The Sonata was indeed welcome, not so much as a tribute to the composer (whose name is in no danger of being forgotten), as from the fact that it is not hackneyed—for that, fortunately, it is too difficult. Mr. Lamont might, by the way, have announced the fine one in C (Op. 1) for his second recital, in place of the "Waldstein," which has almost been worn to pieces by pianists both great and small, good and bad. The other item of importance was Schumann's "Carneval." I spoke lately about a traditional reading of this composer's music—one which should be kept up as long as possible. Mr. Lamont's reading—excepting, occasionally, in hurrying of the tempo—was thoroughly sound, and for the most part effective. Eusebius and Reconnaissance were a trifle cold, and Promenade not quite as romantic as one could have desired, but the rest deserves high praise. Chopin was not very forcibly represented. The Nocturne in C sharp minor (Op. 27, No. 1), is fine enough, but the Valse in G flat is a commonplace trifle quite unworthy of the composer. Schubert's characteristic four-handed March in B minor was served up à la Liszt. It was brilliantly played, yet—Well, I am tired of writing, and reading what others have written, against transcriptions. Protesting seems in vain. Some day, perhaps, when the public is better educated, they will express disapproval of such adulterated music. I particularly regret to find Mr. Lamont playing such a piece. If great pianists will not set a good example, what can one expect from the rest?

MR. AUGUSTUS HYLLESTED, a Danish composer and pianist, gave an orchestral concert at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening. The programme was a severe one, for it included two Pianoforte Concertos and a Symphonic Poem, the last named, for orchestra, ending with double chorus, being a work written by the concert giver. The first concerto was Beethoven's in E flat. Mr. Hyllested has fair technique, but his reading of the work lacked breadth and nobility. He has a delicate touch, which for such music as that of Chopin or Grieg would no doubt prove of advantage. The slow movement was the most satisfactory, though even here the playing was too tricky. How the second concerto—Liszt in E flat—was interpreted, I cannot say. After the Symphonic Poem I felt that I had heard more than enough. To attempt anything like an analysis of this work would be impossible. The Scherzo and part of the slow movement, though commonplace, were fairly intelligible. The long opening movement, Quasi Fantasia, was sound for the most part without sense—some passages indeed seemed as if the notes had been flung on to paper regardless of the effect they would produce. The Finale was long, loud, and tedious, while in the closing chorus—one choir singing the 150th Psalm, the other the Lord's Prayer—one could not hear the music for the noise. This Symphonic Poem was greater than Beethoven's Choral Symphony in one, and only in one, respect—that of length! The composer conducted his work. The applause at the close must surely have been an expression of thankfulness that the end had at length arrived.

J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

THE American journal Science prints a posthumous note by the late Prof. E. D. Cope, containing a summary of some arguments advanced by him at a meeting of the Society of Naturalists. It forms an interesting appendix to the discussion on "acquired characteristics," and deserves partial quotation as coming from a man whose views, if not generally accepted, are invariably treated with the greatest respect, and whose knowledge of palæontology was second to none, either on this or the other side of the Atlantic.

PROF. COPE referred to the "history of the moulding of the articulations of the vertebrate, and especially of the mammalian skeleton, of which such complete series have been furnished by palæontology. The forms of the articulations he believed to be the result of their movements, for the reason that they could be formed artificially, as the result of experiments, or in consequence of luxations. He believed that the resulting forms have been inherited, because they are found in embryo before the animal has had a chance of developing the structure for itself by interaction with the environment." Prof. Cope being a strong Lamarckian, has a natural penchant for the influence of environment.

In attempting to explain the foregoing phenomena, Prof. Cope points out first that the adherents of preformation have never offered any explanation of it. From the point of view of epigenesis, the phenomena of memory furnish a plausible parallel.

Stimuli from within and from without the organism leave a record on the brain-cells "which give the form to consciousness, when the latter invades them, along the guiding lines of association." Why, he asks, should not the germ-plasma be capable of a similar record of stimuli which is expressed in the recapitulatory growth of the embryo? He thought that the evidence pointed to such a process. Those who studied the long discussion between Prof. Weismann and Mr. Herbert Spencer will recollect that the question of inheritance or non-inheritance of mutilations came up more than once, and the late Mr. Romanes made a series of (not very successful) experiments with a view to determine this point. Prof. Cope also deals with it briefly. He says:

"The certainty of the record (on the germ-plasm) would depend on the frequency and strength of the impression, as is known to be the case with the memory of the mental organism. Hence mutilations or single impressions are rarely recorded, while those due to the constant and habitual movements are recorded, and form the physical basis of growth and of evolution of type."

WHAT a beautiful change has come over the spirit of scientific and theological controversy. The Duke of Argyll, in combating Mr. Spencer's theory of evolution in the Nineteenth Century, discusses with entire respect, even while misunderstanding, the views of his redoubtable antagonist. And Mr. Spencer, in replying briefly to certain points on which his attitude had been misrepresented, acknowledges gracefully the courtesy with which he had been treated. Things were very different in the early days of evolution, when bishops went upon the warpath and blasted their opponents (Tyndall, Huxley, and Darwin) with all the damnation and anathema of which they were capable. Now the same bishops preach evolution as a part of Genesis, and the Duke of Argyll and Mr. Spencer exchange politeness in print. The millennium must be nearer than some people imagine.

LAST week, owing to considerations of space, an appeal which I had framed on behalf of the University of Cambridge was unavoidably crowded out. It is, I think, a reflection upon the age of gold that the Universities should be compelled to beg for funds to carry on the work they have been doing for so many centuries. I say the Universities, because although Cambridge only has so far revealed the bareness of its cupboard, Oxford is known to be in pretty nearly the same predicament. It is impossible, unfortunately, to recapitulate all the arguments by which I sought to induce the tardy benefactor to step forward and emulate the splendid munificence of his ancestors. The Duke of Devonshire's appeal will, I hope, have the desired effect without my well-meant assistance; and certainly no one has a better right to appeal than the generous Chancellor who has so nobly endowed and fitted up the Cavendish laboratories, one of the leading features of modern Cambridge. Surely there are millionaires about with a sufficient appreciation for the value of pure culture to save the Universities from abandoning any of their high ideals on that most vulgar of all accounts, the want of money.

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"CENONE."

London.

In the essay on Tennyson's poetry which appeared in a recent issue, with its keen appreciation of the poet's earlier efforts, the above poem is deservedly noticed for "its glorious descriptive opening." What adds to the value of that opening is the fact that it is strictly in accordance with what Homer says of the locality—

"To Ida's spring-abounding hill he came,
And to the crest of Gargarus, wild nurse
Of mountain beasts."
(Earl of Derby: Iliad, bk. viii. 51-53.)

The English poet's landscape is simply an amplification of the Homeric lines. That Tennyson had this passage in his mind is further evidenced by the first line in Cenone's soliloquy:

"Oh, mother Ida, many fountain'd Ida."

In that soliloquy Cenone is made to say:

"Dear mother Ida, harken ere I die.
For now the noonday quiet holds the hill:
The grasshopper is silent in the grass:
The lizard, with his shadow on the stone,
Rests like a shadow, and the cicada sleeps."

A curious mistake this, for it is precisely during those hours when the sun burns fiercest, and the parched hills are being deserted by man and beast, that the sturdy little trumpeter breaks out into his most shrill tunes. He revels in that atmosphere of fire, and the noise he makes is positively deafening. No noonday siesta for the Ionic cicada, as I know from experience.

THOMAS DELTA.

THE ORIGINS OF CIVILISATION.

Haslemere.

Permit me, in answer to the half-dozen questions put to me by your reviewer of Greek Folk Poesy, to say that, having been for the last seventeen years working out in personal exploration and research my theory of the origins of civilisation, I do happen to be "aware" of the opinions he quotes, and also of what is alone important for my theory, namely, the results of the most recent researches of professed and authoritative ethnologists, Egyptologists and Assyriologists, no one of which titles can be claimed for any of the writers he quotes. Permit me also to say that these volumes, dedicated as they are to Mr. Gladstone, do not contain "attacks on Christianity," and that such an assertion, calculated as it is to excite mere unreasoning prejudice, is a somewhat ignoble way of endeavouring to strengthen a weak case. Finally, permit me to remind your readers that while in these two volumes some tens of pages only are given to scientific discussion, they contain hundreds of pages of such translations of Greek folk poesy, both in verse and prose, as reveal the very heart of the people now struggling for life and for liberty.

J. S. STUART-GLENNIE.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Archbishop Benson's "Cyprian." (Macmillan.) THAT which is, perhaps, the most interesting notice of the late Primate's book appeared in the columns of the Chronicle, from the pen of "an extremely learned Roman theologian." "In scholarship," writes this critic, "as one might anticipate, it leaves little to be desired. It is the work of a painstaking if somewhat peremptory, and, almost we had said, pedantic student. . . . Its acquaintance with that tumultuous and fateful third Christian century is such as becomes the disciple and imitator of Bishop Lightfoot. . . . Its style is much too quaint, obscure, and abrupt ever to make it popular. . . . From the whole there seems to rise up before us the figure of a strong and resolute character, who is delighted to observe in the great Carthaginian bishop and martyr a combination of learning with practical wisdom, of freedom with refinement, of piety and good sense with unflinching resistance to what he deemed unwarrantable usurpations, such as this brave Englishman would fain emulate in his modern person. . . . To [Dr. Benson] . . . Carthage was a sort of ante-Nicene Canterbury. . . . But . . . this far from ungenial volume might, as regards the scientific handling of its topics, have been dated in the seventeenth century. It is . . . simply a Rettung or 'Rectification' of Cyprian from the moderate Anglican point of view." The Saturday describes the book as "an exhaustive monograph on the martyr, carried to such an extremity of perseverance that it seems unlikely that a single fact or a single aspect has been omitted." The style "reminds us of that of the best English divines who wrote before the Restoration"; "effective," says the Spectator, "though somewhat laborious in its ornament"; Thucydides and Meredith are named by the Chronicle critic. The book "is full of recondite learning," says the Pall Mall, "and is written in a concise and engaging style." "Dr. Benson," pronounces the Westminster, "knew everything that could be known about Cyprian; it is not probable that all his conclusions will be accepted—some of them have to do with great controversies that are not likely ever to be settled—but the thoroughness of his knowledge and . . . his intelligence, and the integrity of his judgment will be conceded on all hands." In the matter of style, the Archbishop was "too careful not to be obvious," which "sometimes tends to obscurity." The Athenaeum, which devotes two pages to the book, acknowledges that in the earlier portion the author is "singularly straightforward in preventing the ideas of the present from affecting his exposition of the past," but laments that, when he comes to those questions in which he feels a deep personal interest, "he . . . is no longer the scholar or historian . . . but the polemical prelate. . . ." The scholarship is pronounced "quite first-rate"; the style is described as "rugged and picturesque . . . always impressive and intense."

"The Spoils of Poynton."
By Henry James.
(Heinsmann.)

"MR. HENRY JAMES," says the Chronicle, has written nothing more characteristic of his exquisite talent than this book, which is an appreciable contribution to the very small stock of genuine literature represented by modern English fiction." Having described "the elements of the comedy which Mr. Henry James has woven with a perfect mastery of his delicate art," the critic adds: "Fleda ought to be welcomed by women who complain that masculine novelists never believe that woman can appreciate the point of honour." The Westminster Review is "strongly of opinion that The Spoils of Poynton is the best novel that Mr. Henry James has given us for several years. To say that the writing is subtle, exquisite, and abounding in delicate shades of meaning is only to say what is true of nearly all his writings. . . . But in The Spoils of Poynton we have an excellent idea running through the book, and holding it together with a single motive . . . of that fruitful kind which lends itself to the development of a variety of characters, and acts as a sort of touchstone of their real dispositions. The conclusion may seem to some people a little perverse and tangled, for Mr. Henry James would not be himself if he did not achieve some deep involutions of motive which evaded the ordinary reader. His skill in that respect is positive virtuosity, and when he is at it we seem to be watching some amazing display of figure-skating. The Standard suggests that if the author has been encouraged by the safeguard against the commonplace afforded by the furniture theme "to throw himself more fully into his situations, we can have no objection: for that is just what he has done. In this respect a change is visible in the writer's workmanship, which we cannot but think a change for the better. In his last novel . . . he gave us a situation which with a less refined writer would have been melodramatic, but which in his hands was treated with exquisite skill. And here again we have genuine love scenes, not only hinted at, but given boldly and unflinchingly." "That there is a fund of rich humour in the situation is undeniable," writes the Manchester Guardian. ". . . At times, however, he is inclined to take it too seriously, and then it is that a sense of unreality creeps in. But the old felicity of phrase and epithet, the quick, subtle flashes of insight, the fastidious liking for the best in character and art, which have given Mr. James his peculiar place in modern literature, are as marked as ever, and can give one an intellectual pleasure for which one cannot be too grateful."

ESTABLISHED 51.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.
SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.
BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.
BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SEELEY & CO'S NEW BOOKS. THE PORTFOLIO.

Published Quarterly, 3s. 6d. net.

APRIL NUMBER.

CROME and COTMAN. By LAURENCE BINYON.

"Clever and sympathetic essay . . . Admirably illustrated."—Manchester Guardian.
"The number is admirably got up and printed."—Eastern Press.

JANUARY NUMBER.

THE PAINTINGS and DRAWINGS of ALBERT DURER

By LIONEL CUST, Director of the National Portrait Gallery.
"A very complete account of the great artist's paintings and drawings."—Times.
"Illustrated with numerous admirable reproductions."—Daily Chronicle.

THE MOUNT: Narrative of a Visit to the Site of a Gallic

City on Mount Beuvray. With a Description of the Neighbouring City of Autun. By the late P. HAMERTON. 3s. 6d.
"The late Mr. P. G. Hamerton had a very rare gift of delicate word-painting, and his artistic instinct was more conspicuous than in this his last volume of essays."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Nothing more delightfully genial and informing ever fell from the pen of that accomplished artist and writer."—Manchester Guardian.

SOCIAL TRANSFORMATIONS of the VICTORIAN AGE

By T. H. S. ESCOTT, Author of "England: its People, Polity, and Pursuits." 6s. [Now ready.]

CASTLE MEADOW: a Story of Norwich a Hundred Years Ago.

By Mrs. MARSHALL. 3s. 6d. [Now ready.]

LIFE at the ZOO. By C. J. CORNISH. With Illustrations

by Gambier Bolton. Fifth and Cheaper Edition. 6s.
"A more companionable book we cannot imagine."—Spectator.
"Curiously felicitous in description, with frequent touches of quiet humour."—Times.

London: SEELEY and CO., Limited, 38, Great Russell-street.

Crown 8vo. cloth, Half-a-Crown.
OUTSPOKEN ESSAYS on SOCIAL SUBJECTS. By E. BELFORD BAX. Contents: 1. From Phallism to Purism. 2. The Everlasting Female. 3. The Materialistic Doctrine of History. 4. The Futility of Holiness. 5. Early Christianity and Modern Socialism. 6. Century-Ends and Mid-Centuries. 7. The Rule of the Small Middle-Class. 8. Two Questions begging "Saws." 9. Luxury, Ease, and Vice. 10. The Natural History of the Nonconformist Conscience. 11. Value. 12. Voluntaryism v. Socialism.

ANNALS of TOIL or LABOUR. History Outlines, Roman and British. By MORRISON DAVIDSON. Two Books, 1s. each.

A CREED for CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS. By the DEAN of ELIZ. 1s.; cloth, 2s.

LAWS of ETERNAL LIFE: Studies in the Church Catechism. By Rev. STEWART HEADLAM. 1s.; or cloth, 2s.

London: WILLIAM BEEVES, 185, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

NEW NOVEL OF THEATRICAL LIFE.
"Daring in the scheme of it, and even more so in its dénouement."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.
DAUGHTERS OF THESPIAS.

By JOHN BICKERDYKE,
Author of "Lady Val's Elopement," &c.
Published at 6s.
SIMPSON, MARSHALL & Co., Paternoster Row, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.
COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.
Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT
Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.
The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE MANCHESTER.

A PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT

Of unique interest is given with each issue of "THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:—

	1896.
BEN JONSON	November 14
JOHN KEATS	" 21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING	" 23
TOM HOOD	December 5
THOMAS GRAY	" 12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON	" 14
SIR WALTER SCOTT	" 26

	1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON	January 2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY	" 5
LEIGH HUNT	" 16
LORD MACAULAY	" 23
ROBERT SOUTHEY	" 30
S. T. COLERIDGE	February 6
CHARLES LAMB	" 13
MICHAEL DRAYTON	" 20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR	" 27
SAMUEL PEPYS	March 6
EDMUND WALLER	" 13
WILKIE COLLINS	" 20
JOHN MILTON	" 27
WILLIAM COWPER	April 3
CHARLES DARWIN	" 10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON	" 17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW	" 24
ANDREW MARVELL	May 1

To-day's Issue.
ROBERT BROWNING.

E P P S'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
C O C O A

WHAT THE EDITORS SAY.

Caw's Safety Fountain Pen.

Caw's Stylographic Pen.

THE WESTMINSTER BUDGET.

A USEFUL COMPANION FOR THE WRITING DESK.

"Everybody agrees with Lord Lytton's king-cardinal that 'the pen is mightier than the sword.' As in other matters in this our day, it goes without saying that there are pens and pens. We are not confined to the reed, the stick, or the goose-quill for writing purposes. The Americans have changed all that. To-day the greatest dunce in facts knows that our cousins across the sea have their almost perpetual ink-well pen within itself, known as the Fountain pen, and also that smaller arrangement for the pocket, the Stylograph. Both are progressive inventions. When these items for writers first came into service there were little faults in their construction that made the user cry out, 'Bother this pen!' But those little irregularities are almost, if not quite, past history. And in many points the Caw Pen Company has been the magician. Caw's Safety Fountain and Stylograph pens have, because of their special points, a repute beyond most of their neighbours on the market. One of the little benefits of the Caw pens is that the pen is always in a well of ink, so that it never gets dry, and from this it follows that there is always a supply of the necessary fluid when the pen is in use, and further the pen never gets choked up; but the great feature of these Caw Safety Pens is the hitherto non-existent advantage that the pen need not be carried in a horizontal position, but can lie in the waistcoat pocket, or be held upside down, without possibility of leakage of ink. Then the 'Hexagon' stylo-pen, as its name infers, is not made as round as a rolling-pin, but is a bevelled plinth, and from this cause it has the happy quality of keeping on the spot where you put it down; hence the pen does not skate off your desk as if it were marble. The cost of the pens varies, of course, according to size and finish. You can invest in Caw's pens in any amount from 5s. up to 30s., and any one of them is a boon in writing. But they will give you all details in regard to each and every one at your stationer's, at the stores, or at the village chemist's shop. The British depôt is 46, Holborn Viaduct. M.P.'s and busy business men, make a note of Caw's pens. There may be a mine of wealth buried in the suggestion."

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Pencil.

TRUTH.

"The latest Yankee notion in lead pencils: the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

THE EVENING NEWS AND POST (London).

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the 'Blaisdell Paper Pencil.' Penknives, blackened thumbs, and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

BLACK AND WHITE.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

THE LADY.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the 'Blaisdell' variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

A SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL.

"Has the death-day of the cedar pencil arrived? It may be so. At any rate, the 'Blaisdell' self-sharpening paper pencil is an innovation. Your pencil is never pointless—surely a boon to all busy people, be they writers, printers' readers, or warehouse folks; or others, a part of whose business it is to set their mark on this or that item or article."

MORNING LEADER (London).

"The ordinary blacklead pencil in its wooden case if of good quality does not promise much scope to the inventive genius thirsting to discover a real improvement, but a clever American firm have a design in lead pencils that deserves popularity for its ingenuity. The lead is as usual, but round it is wound a thin strip of paper to the ordinary pencil thickness, and slightly notched at intervals, so that a small portion can be removed at a time as the lead wears down, producing an ever-sharpened pencil, always in working order. The new device is known as the 'Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Paper Pencil.'"

THE QUEEN.

"In these hurrying days any invention that tends to economise time and labour is a universal boon, and such a one is the 'Blaisdell' paper pencil, which is winning golden opinions in America, and is now coming into use on this side the Atlantic. What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening! and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated. The 'Blaisdell' pencils are made in various colours."

The BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL is

Manufactured in 5 degrees of Graphite, viz.: HB, H, B, HH, BB, price 2d. each.
5 varieties of Colours: Blue, Red, Green, Yellow, Soft Black 3d. ..

Shape, size, and use exactly the same as a cedar pencil;

BUT,

It is covered with paper—not wood! Its point is always perfect—no chips, no dust. It does not waste in re-sharpening—the only wear is the wear of the lead in writing.

SAVES TIME, TROUBLE, AND MONEY.

 If not found at any Stationers, a Set of 3 Black and 2 Coloured Pencils will be sent Post Free to any address in the United Kingdom for 1s., by THE BLAISDELL PENCIL COMPANY, Limited, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

THE ANCIENT HEBREW TRADITION as ILLUSTRATED by the MONUMENTS. A Protest against the Modern School of Old Testament Criticism. By Dr. FRITZ HOMMEL, Professor of the Semitic Languages in the University of Munich. Translated from German by EDMUND MCCLURE, M.A., and LEONARD CROSSLE. With Map. Large post 8vo, buckram boards, 5s.

Deals from an entirely new point of view with the Graf-Wellhausen position, and shows that it is utterly untenable.

. The work will appear simultaneously in Munich, London, and New York.

OUTLINES of the HISTORY of the THEOLOGICAL LITERATURE of the CHURCH of ENGLAND from the REFORMATION to the CLOSE of the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. The Bishop Paddock Lectures. By JOHN DOWDEN, D.D., Bishop of Edinburgh. 8vo, cloth boards, 3s.

THE STRUGGLE of the NATIONS: Egypt, Syria, and Assyria. By Professor MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Professor SAYCE. Translated by M. L. MCCLURE. With Maps, 3 Coloured Plates, and over 400 Illustrations. Demy 4to (approximately), cloth, bevelled boards, 25s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 50s.

This is a companion volume to "The Dawn of Civilization," and contains the History of the Ancient Peoples of the East from the XIVth Egyptian Dynasty to the end of the Ramesside period. This interval covers the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt and their Exodus therefrom. The recent discovery of an Egyptian Stele mentioning the Israelites gives special interest to this volume, where the matter is discussed with his usual acumen by the Author.

"The translation by M. L. McClure is in both cases excellent. Professor Maspero's presentation of the new learning is at once eminently popular and attractive."—Times.

THE DAWN of CIVILIZATION (EGYPT and CHALDEA). New and Revised Edition. By Professor MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Professor SAYCE. Translated by M. L. MCCLURE. With Map and over 470 Illustrations, including 3 Coloured Plates. Demy 4to (approximately), cloth, bevelled boards, 24s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 48s.

Professor Maspero, by using the result of the most recent researches in Egypt and Mesopotamia, has brought this New Edition up to the latest date.

THE LAMBETH CONFERENCES of 1867, 1878, and 1888. With the Official Reports and Resolutions, together with the Sermons preached at the Conferences. A New and Revised Edition, with Index. Edited by the Right Rev. RANDALL T. DAVIDSON, D.D., Bishop of Winchester. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

DIOCESAN HISTORIES.—LINCOLN. By the late Rev. Canon E. VENABLES and the late Ven. Archdeacon PERRY. With Map. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

DIOCESAN HISTORIES.—ROCHESTER. By the Rev. A. J. PEARMAN, M.A. With Map. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

A HANDY BOOK of the CHURCH of ENGLAND. By the Rev. EDWARD L. CUTTS, D.D. New and Improved Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

THE CONVERSION of the HEPTARCHY. By the Right Rev. G. F. BROWNE, B.D., Bishop of Stepney. Small post 8vo, with several illustrations, cloth boards, 3s.

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH in THESE ISLANDS before the COMING of AUGUSTINE. By the Right Rev. G. F. BROWNE, D.D., D.C.L. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

AUGUSTINE and HIS COMPANIONS. By the Right Rev. G. F. BROWNE, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop of Stepney. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

PATRIARCHAL PALESTINE. By the Rev. A. H. SAYCE, Professor of Assyriology, Oxford. Crown 8vo, with Map, buckram boards, 4s.

[This book is the first to apply the Tel-el-Amarna Tablets, both published and unpublished, towards elucidating the condition of Syria at this period. It also contains a recent and important revision of the Egyptian Geographical Lists bearing on Palestine.]

THE "HIGHER CRITICISM" and the VERDICT of the MONUMENTS. By the Rev. Professor SAYCE, Queen's College, Oxford. Fifth Edition. Demy 8vo, buckram, bevelled boards, 7s. 6d.

"A really valuable and important work; perhaps the best which Professor Sayce has yet written."—Academy.

ANCIENT HISTORY from the MONUMENTS—THE HISTORY of BABYLONIA. By the late GEORGE SMITH. Edited and brought up to date by the Rev. Professor A. H. SAYCE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

VERSES. By Christina G. Rossetti. Reprinted from "Called to be Saints," "Time Flies," and "The Face of the Deep." Small post 8vo, printed in red and black on hand-made paper, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.; limp roan, 5s.; Levantine, 6s. 6d.; limp German calf, 7s.; limp morocco, 7s. 6d.

THE PROTESTATION ISSUED by the ENGLISH ROMANISTS in 1788. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by the Rev. A. J. C. ALLEN, M.A. Small post 8vo, limp cloth, 6d.

PAPAL CLAIMS and ANGLICAN ORDERS. By the Right Rev. C. W. SANDFORD, D.D., Bishop of Gibraltar. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 4d.

THE CHURCH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

These Publications are issued under the auspices of the Church Historical Society, of which the President is the Right Rev. M. CREIGHTON, D.D., Bishop of London.

XXII. THE ELIZABETHAN BISHOPS and the CIVIL POWER. Statute 8 Eliz. c. 1 (A.D. 1565-66). Small post 8vo, paper cover, 2d.

. A Complete List of the Church Historical Society's Publications may be had on application.

DR. NANSEN: the Man and his Work. By Frederic DOLMAN. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

THE HEROES of the ARCTIC and their ADVENTURE. By FREDERICK WHYMPER, Author of "The Romance of the Sea," &c. 12th Edition, Revised and brought up to date, with Illustrations and Map of the Regions. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s.

THE QUEEN, HER EMPIRE, and the ENGLISH SPEAKING WORLD, 1837-1897.

This Volume, specially prepared for the approaching celebration of the "Record" Bicentenary, consists of—

- I. A LIFE of QUEEN VICTORIA. By Mrs. ISLA SITWELL. A short but comprehensive Sketch of Her Majesty's Life, illustrated with Portrait.
- II. THE BRITISH EMPIRE. Selected Views of the Colonies and Dependencies of the Crown, including the following countries:—India, Australasia, Egypt, Canada, Bermuda, Jamaica, Bahamas, &c.
- III. THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING WORLD. Fifty Views selected from those of the most interesting places in America.

Over 130 Illustrations carefully reproduced from copyright photographs, constituting the complete set of views on the subject ever published. Large portfolio size, cloth boards, 4s.

LIFE of HER MAJESTY the QUEEN. With Sketches of the Royal Family. A "Diamond" Jubilee Memoir. Copiously illustrated. Fcap. 4to, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

BEAUTIFUL BRITAIN. The Scenery and Splendours of the United Kingdom. Specially approved by Her Majesty Queen Victoria. Consisting of 198 Photo Reproductions of the most noteworthy Scenes in these Islands, with accompanying Text. This is an Edition de Luxe, and is beautifully printed. Large 4to, 21 1s.

THE ROYAL COLLECTION of FOREIGN and COLONIAL VIEWS. Photographic Reproductions of the most interesting Scenes in 37 Colonies and Dependencies, and all Countries comprising the English-Speaking World. 4to, cloth boards, 4s.

THE ROMANCE of the SEA: its Fictions, Facts, and Folk-lore. By FRED. WHYMPER. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

WAYSIDE SKETCHES. By Professor Hulme, F.R.S., F.S.A. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

SIMPLE EXPERIMENTS for SCIENCE TEACHING. With numerous Diagrams, including 200 Experiments fully illustrating the Elements of Physics and Chemistry Division in the Evening School Continuation Code. By A. BOWER. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

HOW to MAKE COMMON THINGS. For Boys. By John A. BOWER, Author of "Science Applied to Work," &c. Copiously illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

THE ROMANCE OF SCIENCE.

THE SPLASH of a DROP. By Prof. Worthington. With numerous Diagrams. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

OUR SECRET FRIENDS and FOES. By Percy Faraday FRANKLAND, Ph.D., B.Sc. (London), F.R.S. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 3s.

"It is a book which every clergyman, every magistrate, every guardian of the poor, every parent of a school ought to possess and master."—Guardian.

COLOUR. By Captain Abney, F.R.S. With numerous Diagrams. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

COAL. By Prof. R. Meldola. With numerous Diagrams. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

DISEASES of PLANTS. By Prof. Marshall Ward. With numerous Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

TIME and TIDE: a Romance of the Moon. Third Edition, Revised. By Sir ROBERT S. BALL, LL.D., F.R.S., Royal Astronomer of Ireland. Illustrated. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE STORY of a TINDER-BOX. By the late Charles MEYMOTT TIDY, M.B.M.S., F.C.S. With numerous Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

THE BIRTH and GROWTH of WORLDS. A Lecture by Prof. GREEN, M.A., F.R.S. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

SOAP BUBBLES and the FORCES which MOULD THEM. Being a Course of Three Lectures delivered at the London Institution, in December, 1889, and January, 1890, before a Juvenile Audience. By C. V. BOYS, A.R.S.M., F.R.S. With numerous Diagrams. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

SPINNING TOPS. The Operatives' Lecture of the British Association Meeting at Leeds, September, 1890. By Prof. J. PERRY, M.E., D.R.S. F.R.S. With numerous Diagrams. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE MAKING of FLOWERS. By the Rev. Prof. George HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., F.G.S. With several Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.
BRIGHTON: 129, NORTH STREET.

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1306.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied
promptly to order.
Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.

LATEST CATALOGUES—
No. 51 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
.. 52, 54, MISCELLANEOUS. (762, 728 lots.)
.. 53, PHILOSOPHY. (840 lots.)

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

TH. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

THORNTON & SON, BOOKSELLERS,
11, BROAD STREET, OXFORD.

JUST OUT.
A CATALOGUE OF INTERESTING GENERAL BOOKS.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT OF LITERATURE, No. 564, just published, contains a collection of Books in Classical Literature, including numerous early and recent English Translations, and Works on Classical Antiquities.—Post free from
H. SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C., or 37, Piccadilly, W., London.

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 114, for March), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 28 West 23rd Street, New York, and 34, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-
TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS.—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS and EXPORTERS,
3, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPRING & Co.
Telegrams: MORSELL, LONDON. [Established 1819.]

TO AUTHORS.—Messrs. DIGBY, LONG & CO.
(Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net, eighth
edition) INVITE AUTHORS to FORWARD their MSS. (Fiction,
Travel, Poetry, &c.) suitable for Volumes for prompt consideration.—
Address 18, Boulevard Street, Fleet Street, London.

IMPORTANT—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, BELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.,
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast
folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africaism, London."

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)
Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

TYPE-WRITING neatly, accurately, and ex-
pediently executed. Scientific MSS. a specialty.—Miss
MARTY 19, Beaumont Street, Portland Place, W.

THE SECOND INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY
CONFERENCE, 1897.

President—
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., F.R.S.
Hon. Treasurer—
HENRY R. TEDDER, Esq.
Hon. Secretary—
J. Y. W. MAULISTON, Esq.
20, Hanover Square, W.

The Conference will be held (by the kind permission of the Right
Hon. the Lord Mayor and Corporation) in the COUNCIL CHAMBER,
GUILDHALL, LONDON, on JULY 13, 14, 15, and 16, 1897, and will be attended by the representatives of the principal libraries throughout the world. Papers will be read on appropriate subjects, and some time will be devoted to open Discussions. All persons interested in the extension of the library movement or in the management of libraries are cordially invited to join the Conference. The Lord Mayor has invited the members of the Conference to a Conversation in the Mansion House on the evening of July 13.
An Exhibition of Library Appliances will be an important feature of the Conference. Intending exhibitors should communicate with the Hon. Secretary of the Exhibition Committee, THOMAS MARSH, Esq., 115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. The Subscription, One Guinea, entitles Members to receive the Transactions and other Publications gratis, and to attend all meetings and social gatherings. Applications for Membership should be sent at once to the Hon. Secretary.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

(Incorporated by Royal Charter).
Patron—HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.
President—The Right Hon. Sir M. E. G. ST. DUFF, G.C.S.I.
THURSDAY, May 20th, at 8 p.m., at the MUSEUM of PRACTICAL GEOLOGY, Jernyn Street, S.W., the following Paper will be read:—"SOME POLITICAL THEORIES OF THE EARLY JESUITS," by Rev. J. NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A.
KILNAT HALL, Director and Hon. Secretary.
115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.
THURSDAY NEXT (May 20th), at 3 o'clock, CHURTON COLLINS, Esq., M.A., FIRST OF FOUR LECTURES ON "THE FRENCH REVOLUTION AND ENGLISH LITERATURE—BURKE, WILLIAM GODWIN, MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT, WORDSWORTH, and COLERIDGE." Half-a-Guinea the Course.
SATURDAY (May 22nd), at 3 o'clock, J. A. FULLER MATTLAND, Esq., M.A., F.R.S., FIRST OF FOUR LECTURES ON "MUSIC IN ENGLAND during the REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA" (with Musical Illustrations). Half-a-Guinea.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 61, Pall Mall East, S.W.

126th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIR FREDERICK H. HENKON, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—FORTHCOM-
ING EXAMINATION.—DRAUGHTSMAN in the HYDRO-
GRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT of the ADMIRALTY (17-20), 7th
JULY. Expertness in Graphical Chart Drawing essential.—The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received.
They must be made on forms, to be obtained, with particulars, from
the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

MCGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL,
CANADA.

CHAIR OF ZOOLOGY.
The Governors of McGill University are prepared to receive APPLI-CATIONS for Appointment to the newly founded PROFESSORSHIP of ZOOLOGY. Salary, $3000.00 per annum. Candidates from Great Britain are requested to forward applications, with any testimonials and references they may desire to submit, on or before
15th June, addressed, "PRINCIPAL," Office of the High Commissioner
for Canada, 17, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE. — SCHOLARSHIPS.
1897.—EXAMINATION, JULY 6th, 7th. One of £80, two of
£60, and Minor Scholarships of £15 to £30. Candidates to be under
17 years of age.
For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL. — AN EXAMINA-
TION will be held in July next to fill up not less than FIVE
RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS,
and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the HEAD
MASTER, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI-
LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.

The last, most complete and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-
Instruction.
Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.
Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 2.0s. 6d. 5 cents.
American, 10s. 6d. English. Post free.
Prospectus with opinions of Eminent, SCIENTIFIC, PROFESSIONAL,
and BUSINESS MEN all over the world free.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 127, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
NOT SOLD ELSEWHERE. 200 REGENT STREET, LONDON

CAMBRIDGE TRAINING COLLEGE for WOMEN TEACHERS.—THREE SCHOLARSHIPS ($30, $20, $15) are offered to Graduates for SEPTEMBER, 1897.

Full details can be obtained from the PRINCIPAL, to whom applications must be made before June 3d.
A certain number of Bursaries of $5 and $10 are also given each year to Students of inadequate means.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)
WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

SALES BY AUCTION.

Valuable Library of Archaeological and Antiquarian
Books of the late Rev. WM. SPARROW SIMPSON,
M.A., D.D., Sub-Dean of St. Paul's.

MESSRS. HODGSON will SELL by AUCTION, at their ROOMS, 115, CHANCERY LANE, W.C., during the present Month, the VALUABLE LIBRARY of the late Rev. WM.
SPARROW SIMPSON, M.A., D.D., Sub-Dean of St. Paul's, and Hon.
Librarian to His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, comprising MANY VALUABLE ARCHEOLOGICAL, TOPOGRAPHICAL, and ANTIQUARIAN BOOKS, as well as the usual Standard Works in Theology and General Literature.

Further particulars will be duly announced, and Catalogues are preparing.

The RUSSELL INSTITUTION, 55, Great Coram Street, Russell Square.—Valuable and Extensive Library of upwards of 20,000 vols. of Books—Two capital Billiard Tables—Statues, Busts, &c.—Mahogany and other Bookcases, and the usual Fittings.

MESSRS. HODGSON have received instructions to SELL by AUCTION, at the end of the present Month, on the PREMISES of the RUSSELL INSTITUTION, 55, Great Coram
Street, Russell Square, W.C., the above VALUABLE and EXTEN-SIVE LIBRARY: also the Mahogany and other Bookcases—Two Billiard Tables by Thurston—Stone Statues of Antinous, Hercules, and Euphrosyne—Busts of Heroes, Poets, and Statesmen—Large Board Room Table—several Card and Occasional Tables, and the usual fittings.
Catalogues are preparing, and will be forwarded (when ready) on application to the Auctioneers, No. 115, Chancery Lane, W.C.

TUESDAY, May 25.

A valuable Collection of Curiosities.

MR. J. C. STEVENS will SELL by AUCTION at his GREAT ROOMS, 38, KING STREET, COVENT GARDEN, on TUESDAY, May 25, at half-past 12 o'clock precisely, a COLLECTION of NATIVE WEAPONS, ORNAMENTS, DRESS, WAR
Clubs, and other Curios from New Guinea, South Africa, and other Parts—Native Gods, Carved Tanka, Cannon Ball, and other Curiosities just received from Benin City—Armour and Arms—Antiquities—
China—Engravings—a magnificent Skin Carpet—Chinese Carvings, &c.
On view the day prior 10 till 4 and morning of Sale, and Catalogues had.

THE OLD MASTERS.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & CO. will
SELL by AUCTION, at AMSTERDAM, on TUESDAY,
JUNE 1, 1897, the very important Cabinets of OLD PICTURES of
G. DE OLEERQ, Esq., and of Mrs. JENTINE-FARRER, containing exceedingly fine specimens by Avercamp, Asselvoet, Berck-heyde, Berghem, van Beyeren, F. Bol, J. Both, Velvet-Breughel, Pieter Claess, Coddé, Decker, Duuk, van Everdingen, Fyt, Hasekaert (3 pieces), D. Hals, Heda, de Heem, B. van der Helst (marvellous composition of four figures—life size), Hondelcoeter, Honthorst, Koningh, Lieveens, Maas, van der Meer, van der Meulen, J. M. Moenens (3 pieces), Aert van der Neer (5 pieces), G. Noyls, A. Palamedes (3 pieces), Pynacker (3 pieces), G. de King, J. Ruissel, R. Ruysdael, H. Saff-leven, Stingelandt, Jan Steen (3 pieces), Stoop (3 pieces), van Ströck, Terborch, A. van de Velde, W. van de Velde, Jun. (capital battle-scene of the English and Dutch fleets), van de Venne (3 pieces), Ver-elst, Vinckboons, S. d. Vlieter, Mart de Vos, E. van Vries, Walscappelle, van de Werf, Weenix, &c.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & CO. will
SELL by AUCTION, on the SAME DAY, the beautiful
Collection of OLD DRAWINGS, the Cabinet of W. F. PIET, Esq.
Please apply for the Illustrated Catalogues at the Office Doelenstraat 10, Amsterdam.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

WILL BE PUBLISHED SHORTLY.

THE NORWICH SCHOOL OF PAINTING.

A Series of Autotype Reproductions of Works by JOHN BELL
COTMAN, OLD CROMIE, STARK, LADBROOKE, BRIGHT
MIDDLETON, DANIELL, LEMAN, LOUND, &c. Forty Aut o-type Plates, mounted on grey boards, in portfolio. Price Ten Guineas net.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON.

This important Series of over Four Hundred Permanent Carbon
Reproductions of the chief Pictures in this magnificent collection includes representative selections from the Italian, Flemish,
Dutch, Spanish, French, and English Schools. By the aid of the most recent improvements in Photographic Science, absolutely
faithful and Permanent Copies have been secured, on a scale which adequately represents the Original Paintings. These are printed in rich brown pigments, on specially prepared paper, size
18 by 15 inches, and are sold at a uniform price of TWELVE
SHILLINGS EACH.

G. F. WATTS, R.A.,
SIR E. BURNE-JONES,
D. G. ROSSETTI.

An Extensive Selection of the Works of these Masters at prices ranging from Three Shillings and Sixpence to Three Guineas.

For particulars of Autotype Permanent Reproductions from the Old and Modern Masters see post free on application to
THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET LONDON W.C.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COLLECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CONTINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED, AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE CHANGES.

The characteristics of the literary matter, and of the advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE*	8 6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	4 6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	2 6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS, the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 6s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate. Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by over 80 pages, whilst the price (6s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LIMITED, St. Dunstan House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

Crown 8vo, cloth, Half-a-Crown.
OUTSPOKEN ESSAYS ON SOCIAL SUBJECTS. By E. BELFORD BAX. Contents: 1. From Phallism to Purism. 2. The Everlasting Female. 3. The Materialistic Doctrine of History. 4. The Futility of Holiness. 5. Early Christianity and Modern Socialism. 6. Century-Ends and Mid-Centuries. 7. The Rule of the Small Middle-Class. 8. Two Questions begging "Saws." 9. Luxury, Ease, and Vice. 10. The Natural History of the Nonconformist Conscience. 11. Value. 12. Voluntarism v. Socialism.

ANNALS OF TOIL OR LABOUR. History Outlines, Roman and British. By MORRISON DAVIDSON. Two Books, 1s. each.

A CREED FOR CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS. By the Dean of Ely. 1s.; cloth, 2s.

LAWS OF ETERNAL LIFE: Studies in the Church Catechism. By Rev. STEWART HEADLAM. 1s.; or cloth, 2s.

London: WILLIAM BURNS, 185, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

NEW NOVEL OF THEATRICAL LIFE.
"Distinctly powerful....A series of vigorous, if rather matric, social pictures in a narrative of no common interest and skill."
Glasgow Herald.

DAUGHTERS OF THESPIA.

By JOHN BICKERDYKE,
Author of "Lady Val's Elopement," &c.
Published at 6s.

SIMPSON, MARSHALL & Co., Paternoster Row, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.
COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.
Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BANTON ARCADE MANCHESTER.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO., ART REPRODUCERS.

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERB HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,
the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

MESSRS. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process

For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS., Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c., &c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.
Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

E P P S'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
C O C O A

JARROLD & SONS' LIST

NOW READY, crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

A SHORT POPULAR HISTORY OF CRETE.

By J. H. FRIESE, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge; Author of a Revised Translation of "Livy," Books I., II., III., and IV., and a Translation, with Notes, of Homer's "Iliad," Books XXII. and XXIII.

With Introduction by P. W. OLAYDEN.

Maps of Crete and Seat of War.

Mr. GLADSTONE writes: "I hope this book may tend to enhance the public interest in the condition of Crete, which at present threatens to bring serious disgrace upon this country."

MAURUS JOKAI'S NEW NOVEL.

THE GREEN BOOK; Or, Freedom Under the Snow.

By the Author of "Black Diamonds," "Pretty Michal," "Midst the Wild Carpathians," &c.

With Engraved Portrait of Author, 6s. [Fifth Edition.]

"Altogether a great book and worth all the novels of native growth we are likely to see this season."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"In its panoramic width of outlook, its inexhaustible fertility of invention and barbaric splendour of colouring, Maurus Jokai's great novel challenges comparison with Tolstoy's 'War and Peace.' There is a succession of brilliant tableaux. To read this remarkable book is like witnessing a magnificent Oriental pageant. It is of enthralling interest and takes rank with the great novels of the century."—Speaker.

"The author has given us a group of striking personalities, of every one of whom it is not too much to say that it is brilliantly drawn and vividly presented. From every point of view 'The Green Book' is a book to be read. It is a work of fine art."—Daily Chronicle.

Mr. Courtney says in the Daily Telegraph: "It is truly an astounding book. In force and fire and prodigious variety he reminds one of the older Dumas."

HIS DOUBLE SELF;

Or, the Transformation of Keith Winstanley.

By E. CURTIS,

Author of "Dr. Malochi," "Queen or Bondswoman," "Lamar the Witch," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"The tale is not without a certain cleverness in working out a plot such as Dickens only, among modern novelists, could keep seriously going. There is something enjoyable in the plausible fancy with which the tale maintains its air of mystery."—Scotsman.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C. And of all Booksellers.

A PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT

Of unique interest is given with each issue of "THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared this year:—

SAMUEL RICHARDSON	January 2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY	" 9
LEIGH HUNT	" 16
LORD MACAULAY	" 23
ROBERT SOUTHAY	" 30
S. T. COLERIDGE	February 6
CHARLES LAMB	" 13
MICHAEL DRAYTON	" 20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR	" 27
SAMUEL PEPYS	March 6
EDMUND WALLER	" 13
WILKIE COLLINS	" 20
JOHN MILTON	" 27
WILLIAM COWPER	April 3
CHARLES DARWIN	" 10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON	" 17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW	" 24
ANDREW MARVELL	May 1
ROBERT BROWNING	" 8

To-day's Issue.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums of deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

READY SHORTLY.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THE COUNSELS OF WILLIAM DE BRITAINE.

A Volume of Seventeenth Century
Precepts and Aphorisms.

EDITED BY

HERBERT STURMER.

Mr. F. E. Robinson also begs to announce that he has almost completed arrangements for producing

TWO SERIES OF POPULAR HISTORIES OF THE COLLEGES OF OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

Each volume will be written by someone officially connected with the College of which it treats, or at least by some member of that College who is specially qualified for the task.

Further particulars will be announced later.

LONDON:

F. E. ROBINSON, 20, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, BLOOMSBURY.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE and
FREE REVIEW: a Monthly Magazine. Edited by
"DEMOCRITUS."

CONTENTS OF THE MAY NUMBER: Bentley and Anthony
Collins—Roden Noel—Tourgenieff—The Downfall of Olive
Schreiner—Marie Corelli and her Public—Moral Instruction
without Theology—The Social Purty Hallucination—
Current Pseudo-Philosophy—Slumland by Night—William
Blake and Modern Problems—The Social Evil and the Moral Law—Periodicals—New Books.

PSEUDO-PHILOSOPHY at the END
of the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By HUGH
MORTIMER OECIL. 1. AN IRRATIONALIST TRIO
(KIDD, DRUMMOND, BALFOUR). 10s. net.

A vigorous Refutation of the Works of the Three Irrationalists.

THE SAXON and the CELT. By
JOHN M. ROBERTSON. 8s. net.

CONTENTS: I. The Question of Race. 1. The Present
Irish Trouble. 2. English and Irish. 3. French and Germans. 4. The Problem of Race Origins. 5. The Naming
of Celts, Gauls and Teutons. 6. "Celtic" and "Teutonic"
History. 7. The Ethic of Race Instinct. II. The Lessons of Irish History. 1. The Causation of the Past. 2. The Verdict of Europe. III. Hill Burton on the Scottish Celts.
IV. J. R. Green on Celts and Teutons. V. The Duke of Argyll on Irish History. VI. Mr. Goldwin Smith's Polemic.
VII. Mr. Froude on Ireland. VIII. Mr. Balfour on Irish
Civilisation. Epilogue: A Programme for Ireland.

2s. 6d. net.

THE BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:
an Anatomy of the Disease and a Theory of Curative
Treatment. By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

CONTENTS: 1. What is Respectability? 2. The Pathology
of the Disease. 3. Ladies and Gentlemen. 4. Specific Symptoms of the Malady in Women. 5. Respectability and Morals. 6. Cultured Gentility. 7. Plutocracy. 8. Villa-
dom. 9. The Tyranny of Respectability. 10. Respectable
Civilisation and After. 11. Conclusion.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,
16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

CONAN DOYLE'S NEW NOVEL.

READY THIS DAY.

With 12 Full-page Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

UNCLE BERNAC:

A Memory of the Empire.

BY

A. CONAN DOYLE,

Author of "The White Company,"
"Rodney Stone," &c.

New Volume by Mrs. Oliphant.

With a Preface entitled "On the Ebb Tide," crown 8vo, 6s.

THE WAYS of LIFE. Two Stories:
1. Mr. SANDFORD. 2. THE WONDERFUL HISTORY
of Mr. ROBERT DALYELL. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

New Novel by Alexander Innes Shand.

Just published, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LADY GRANGE. By Alexander
INNES SHAND, Author of "Kilcarra: a Novel,"
"Half a Century; or, Changes in Men and Manners," &c.

THE REVIVAL of LEARNING. By
the late JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Next week.]

* * This is Volume II. of a NEW and CHEAPER EDITION
of "THE RENAISSANCE in ITALY," in 7 vols., large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. each. The remaining volumes will be published at intervals.

Next Tuesday, with Portraits, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

ISABELLA the CATHOLIC, QUEEN
of SPAIN: her Life, Reign, and Times, 1451-1504. By
M. LE BARON DE NERVO. Translated from the Original French by Lieut.-Colonel TEMPEST-WEST
(Retired).

On May 26, with Portraits, and a Preface by Sir EDWARD B.
MALET, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., &c., demy 8vo, 16s.

GABRIELE VON BULOW, Daughter
of Wilhelm von Humboldt. A Memoir Compiled from the Family Papers of Wilhelm von Humboldt and his Children, 1791-1887. Translated by CLARA NORD-
LINGER.

FROM GRAVE to GAY: being Essays
and Studies concerned with Certain Subjects of Serious Interest, with the Puritans, with Literature, and with
the Humours of Life, now for the first time Collected
and Arranged. By J. ST. LOE STRACHEY. Crown
8vo, 6s.

"Undeniably clever, well-informed, brightly written, and
in many ways interesting."—Times.
"Mr. Strachey's book is indeed 'a cup that cheers and not inebriates.' It is right-down good reading, and the critic
.....can have nothing worse to say of it than that it is entirely good humoured."—Daily Chronicle.

New Volumes of Smith, Elder & Co.'s
Popular 2s. 6d. Series.

Crown 8vo, limp red cloth, 2s. 6d. each.

THE MARTYRED FOOL. By D.
CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Rainbow Gold,"
"Joseph's Coat," &c.

GRANIA: the Story of an Island. By the Hon. EMILY LAWLESS, Author of "Hurryh,"
"With Essex in Ireland," &c.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO.,
15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

MR. WM. HEINEMANN'S LIST.

PETER THE GREAT.

By K. WALISZEWSKI, Author of "The Romance of an Empress," "The Story of a Throne." Translated by Lady MARY LOYD. In 3 vols., demy 8vo, with a Portrait, 28s.

SPANISH PROTESTANTS IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

Compiled from Dr. WILKEN'S German Work by RACHEL CHALLICE. With an Introduction by the late the Most Rev. Lord PLUNKET, Archbishop of Dublin, D.D., and a Preface by the Rev. Canon
FLEMING, B.D. Crown 8vo, buckram, 4s. 6d. net.

THE OUTGOING TURK:

Impressions of a Journey through the Western Balkans.
By H. O. THOMSON, Author of "The Chitral Campaign." Demy 8vo, with 78 Illustrations from Photographs, and 3 Maps, 14s. net.

THE NEW AFRICA:

A Journey up the Oboe and down the Okavango
Rivers. By AUREL SCHULZ, M.D., and AUGUST HAMMAR, C.E. Demy 8vo, with 70 Illustrations and a Map. [Next week.]

RHODESIA, PAST AND PRESENT.

By S. J. DU TOIT. 8vo, with 18 Full-Page Illustrations from Photographs by the Author, 7s. 6d.

ROMANTIC INDIA.

Translated from the French of ANDRÉ CHEVRIL-
LON by WILLIAM MARCHANT. Demy 8vo,
7s. 6d. net.

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS.

From a French Point of View. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

NEW FICTION.

First Edition exhausted, Second now ready.

FLAMES: a London Fantasy.

By ROBERT HICHENS.

1 vol., 6s.

The World.—"Wetly fascinating and engrossing. Will certainly rank among the most notable novels of the season."

THE THIRD VIOLET.

By STEPHEN CRANE.

1 vol., 6s.

SOLDIERS OF FORTUNE.

By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS.

Illustrated by Charles Dana Gibson.

1 vol., 6s.

[Next week.]

THE SPOILS OF POYNTON.

By HENRY JAMES.

1 vol., 6s.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE PARISH.

By JOHN QUINN.

1 vol., 6s.

COTTAGE FOLK.

By Mrs. COOMYNS CARR.

1 vol., 6s.

THE OUTSPAN: Tales of South Africa.

By J. PERCY FITZPATRICK.

1 vol., 3s. 6d.

The Pall Mall Gazette.—"Fine, stirring tales, instinct with the half weary, half restless spirit of the pioneer leaders of South Africa."

MR. BLAKE OF NEWMARKET.

By E. H. COOPER.

1 vol., 3s. 6d.

The Sportsman.—"The best exposition of turf life that we know."

YEKL: a Tale of the New York Ghetto.

By A. CAHAN.

Cloth, 3s. net; paper, 2s. 6d. net.

[PIONEER SERIES.]

London:

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

8vo, 15s.

THE BIBLE:

*Its Meaning and Supremacy.*By F. W. FARRAR, D.D., F.R.S., Dean of Canterbury.

"This book will rank among the most important and influential works of the kind that have been issued from the press during recent years. It is at once a powerful vindication of the truths of Scripture, their majesty, and their harmony with the lofty conceptions of human society; but it is, at the same time, an equally powerful blow at dogmas which are no part of the Christian faith, or are in nowise essential to its integrity."—Scotsman.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

LECTURES in the LYCEUM:

Or, Aristotle's Ethics for English Readers.

Edited by ST. GEORGE STOCK.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

CROMWELL'S PLACE IN HISTORY.

*Founded on Six Lectures delivered at Oxford.*By SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER, D.C.L., Ford's Lecturer, 1896.

With 2 Portraits, 8vo, 18s.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS WAKLEY,

Founder and First Editor of "The Lancet,"Member of Parliament for Finsbury, and Coroner for West Middlesex.

By S. SQUIRE SPRIGGE, M.B. Cantab.

8vo, 18s.

THE ANNUAL REGISTER.

*A Review of Public Events at Home and Abroad
for the Year 1896..* Volumes of the ANNUAL REGISTER for the
Years 1863-1895 can still be had, 18s. each.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY PRESS SERIES.

Vol. V., 8vo, 14s., just published.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF CICERO.

*A Revised Text, with Notes and Prolegomena.*By ROBERT Y. TYRRELL, D.C.L., LL.D., Fellow of Trinity College, and Regius Professor of Greek in Trinity College, Dublin;

AND

LOUIS CLAUDE PURSER, Litt.D.,
Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Dublin.. Vol. I., 12s.; Vol. II., 12s.; Vol. III., 12s.; Vol. IV., 15s.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

SKETCHES in LAVENDER:

Blue and Green.

A Collection of Short Stories.

By JEROME K. JEROME.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
London, New York, and Bombay.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE SECRET OF SAINT FLOREL.

By JOHN BERWICK.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE FALL OF A STAR.

A NOVEL.

By SIR WM. MAGNAY, Bart.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

VOLUME II., NOW READY.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH POETRY.

By W. J. COURTHOPE, C.B., M.A., D.Litt., Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. Vol. II., THE RENAISSANCE and the REFORMATION; Influence of the Court and the Universities. 8vo, 10s. net.

NEW BOOK BY PROFESSOR J. P. MAHAFFY.

A SURVEY OF GREEK CIVILIZATION.

By Professor J. P. MAHAFFY, D.D., D.C.L. (Oxon), Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. Extra crown
8vo, 6s.

Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

AN OUTLINE OF THE LAW OF LIBEL.

Being Six Lectures delivered in the Middle Temple
Hall during Michaelmas Term, 1896. By W. BLAKE
ODGERS, of the Middle Temple, M.A., LL.D., Q.C.

NEW BOOK BY B. BOSANQUET.

PSYCHOLOGY OF THE MORAL SELF.

By B. BOSANQUET. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE MODERN READER'S BIBLE.

NEW VOLUME.

Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by RICHARD G.
MOULTON, M.A. (Camb.). The Text is that of the Revised Version. It is used by special permission of the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge.

JEREMIAH.

CLASSICAL SERIES.—New Volumes.

THE FIRST PHILIPPIC AND THE OLYNTHIACS OF DEMOSTHENES.

With Introduction and Critical and Explanatory Notes, by JOHN EDWIN SANDYS, Litt.D., &c. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

The TROADES of EURIPIDES.

With Revised Text and Notes, by ROBERT
YELVERTON TYRRELL, Litt.D., Fellow of Trinity
College, &c. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. MACQUEEN has much pleasure in announcing that he will publish on Wednesday, the 19th inst., a New Novel by LORIN KAYE, Author of "Her Ladyship's Income," entitled "A DRAWING-ROOM CYNIC," handsomely bound in art canvas, gilt tops, crown 8vo, 6s.

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

"Something absolutely new in fiction."

THE WORLD.

A RUSSIAN WILD FLOWER. By

E. A. BRAYLEY HODGETTS, Author of "Round about Armenia," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The story is charming from every point of view; it makes the reader feel, when he closes the book, that he knows Russia as no other writer has ever enabled him to know the vast dim Empire of the Czar in some of its most intimate social aspects, and to realise certain types among its strongly marked social varieties..... Princess Olga Obolenski is the most living and gracious heroine of fiction we have met for a dreary length of time, and her story inspires the liveliest sympathy."—The World, May 12, 1897.

MISS TUDOR: a Novel. By John

LE BRETON, Author of "The Sin of Father Baptiste," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A true and faithfully drawn picture of the times. It has a strong and dramatic story, and the interest is well sustained. 'Miss Tudor' is a notable book."—The Encore.

ABBÉ CONSTANTIN. By Ludovic

HALÉVY. Translated from the French by THÉRÈSE BATBEDAT. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Very welcome is the English translation of Ludovic Halévy's 'Abbé Constantin.' The story is, as all the world knows, very charming, and should in its present shape find many English readers."—Globe.

"An excellent translation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

First Edition nearly exhausted.

SECOND EDITION in the Press.

A FLIRTATION with TRUTH. By

CURTIS YORKE, Author of "Once," "A Record of Disasters," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A well-written novel of fashionable life..... The dialogue is essentially 'smart.'"—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Curtis Yorke has told the story well, brightly, humorously, and with a sufficiency of pathos."—Daily Chronicle.

"A clever, witty, 'Dodo' kind of book.... It has grace and strength of style which it is impossible not to admire."—Freeman's Journal.

"The best book on the subject."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

A NARRATIVE of the BOER WAR

By T. F. CARTER. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"This great work is history, exhaustive, impartial, and realistic."—Sheffield Telegraph.

"The book is generally recognised as a standard work on the subject."—African Critic.

"The best work of its class."—South Africa.

A MANUAL of ITALIAN LITERATURE.

By F. H. CLIFFE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

MR. WILLIAM LE QUÉUX, in The Literary World. "Considerable thought and pains have been bestowed upon this book, for the critical estimates are, for the most part, sound, the examples of style are generally well chosen, and the biographical detail obtained from the best available sources. Mr. Cliffe gives a little too much prominence perhaps to his pet writer Leopardi; nevertheless, the work has few faults, and those of a trivial character. It is useful, and may be relied upon, as well as being interesting."

JOHN MACQUEEN, HASTINGS HOUSE,
NORFOLK STREET, STRAND.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
A Maker of Australia	513
The Ancient Volcanoes of Great Britain	514
A Chronicle of Sentiment	515
Cicero and his Friends	516
The Whirlpool	516
An Anonymous Post	517
Six Old Novels made New	517
FROM CROWDED SHELVES	518
FICTION:
Love in Old Clothes—In the Name of Liberty—Roe of Dutcher's Coolly—The Flight of the Eagle—In a Country Town—The Dreams of Danis—"Daughters of Theopis"—Tales from the Isles of Greece	519
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books	521
New Books Received	522
NOTES AND NEWS	523
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXVII., THOMAS CARLYLE	524
SHAKESPEARE'S NATURAL HISTORY	524
FIONA MACLEOD	525
THE BOOK MARKET	526
ART	526
DRAMA	527
MUSIC	528
SCIENCE	529
CORRESPONDENCE	530
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED	530

REVIEWS.

A MAKER OF AUSTRALIA.

Life of Sir Henry Parkes, G.C.M.G., Australian Statesman. By Charles E. Lyne. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

SIR HENRY PARKES is described on the title-page as "Australian Statesman." A statesman we understand, but the "Australian statesman" is a new brand, like other Australian brands, and we have not yet quite established our standards of judgment. Sir Henry Parkes was, of course, called, at the end of a long life, "the grand old man of Australia"; and one cannot imagine Mr. Gladstone grudging the epithet to him as a gift, whole and complete—an epithet which fits him well, and which belongs to Colonial and to Provincial life as apart from Imperial and Metropolitan. Indeed, one imagines there are friends and followers of Mr. Gladstone who never heard the phrase without something of the shudder that was Evan Harrington's when his father was alluded to as "the great Mel." The son of a Warwickshire peasant, and obliged to work for his living from the age of eight, Sir Henry Parkes himself drew a contrast between his own career and Mr. Gladstone's which is all to the point:

"When Mr. Gladstone was at Eton preparing himself for Oxford, enjoying all the advantages of a good education, with plenty of money, and being trained in every way for his future position as a statesman, I was working in a rope-walk at fourpence a day, and suffered such cruel treatment that I was knocked down by a crowbar, and did not recover my senses for half-an-hour. From the rope-walk I went to labour in a brick-yard, where I was again brutally used; and when Mr. Gladstone was at Oxford, I was breaking stones on the Queen's highway, with hardly enough clothing to protect me from the cold."

There were the makings of "a grand old man," if you want them! To have outlived these trials gives "old" age an earned value; and the "grandeur" of the future Prime Minister's lot was one that such an apprenticeship made obvious to everybody in the Colony, including himself.

Parkes landed in Sydney as "a bounty immigrant" in 1839. He was then twenty-five, and was already married. The state of his purse may be surmised from the fact that it was an event when he found sixpence on one of the pavements. He had been working as an ivory and bone turner in Birmingham, and to that occupation he reverted, after a few experiences as agricultural labourer, as sheep-washer, and with an ironmonger. He took a little shop, in which he made and sold his "fancy goods," his billiard balls, his paper knives, and the rest, until the call to journalism—which has hummed so loudly in the ears of modern young men whose station seemed to them too lowly for their destiny—made music for him also, and he rose obedient to the summons. The Empire newspaper came into being in December, 1849—a pleasing, anxious being it was, and one which it resigned after a period of struggle. Its death left Parkes a bankrupt, but it had served its purpose in one respect—it had introduced him to public life, and he had taken his seat in the Legislature as member for the city of Sydney. Himself a man of the people, he did not go back on his antecedents in his political life. He knew what he had himself suffered; and it was his wish to be on the side of Labour and Poverty. To write a history of Australian politics has not been the aim of Mr. Lyne, though his volume runs to nearly six hundred pages; and certainly it is not ours. Suffice it to say that when responsible government was accorded the Colony in 1856 Parkes was returned to the Legislative Assembly, and henceforth, with rare intervals, was an active "Australian statesman," holding the office of Prime Minister in New South Wales over a series of tenures. Money difficulties dogged his steps; and debt to most men is anything but the incentive it was to one of Disraeli's heroes—it is, what Burke declared it to be, degrading. In 1870 he was trading as the firm of Parkes & Co., general merchants, when he was declared insolvent, his debts being £20,000. He had to resign his seat for Kiama in consequence; but in a fortnight's time he was re-elected. Attacked in the Assembly, he resigned his seat, but in a year was back again, stronger than ever, and beginning his long career as Prime Minister. Even then, his embarrassments were many. What he bought, in the way of new books, for instance, he had to sell again; and at the end of his life he was hard pressed for the bare means of living. "How strange it is," he wrote, "that I should occupy the high position I do and be so poor as to be compelled to receive presents from my friends!" The passages of letters relating to his willingness to accept a grant from Government, if one were offered to him, are sorry reading—they are enough, one would suppose, to reconcile even the English democrat to our own automatic pensions for ex-Ministers who require them. Other worries were his. The lady who was his wife in 1889

"did not secure the goodwill of society." He ceased to be a figure at social festivals. She was not invited, and therefore he did not go. Replying to an invitation from Government House in the May of that year, he wrote to Lord Carrington:

"Sir Henry Parkes regrets that he cannot accept the invitation of His Excellency the Governor to dinner. He owes it to his wife, whatever may be the occasion, not to enter the door which is closed against her; but he desires at the same time to be understood as not seeking a reversal of her exclusion, while he insists upon sharing any indignity to which she is subjected."

That lady died. Sir Henry was married again within six months; and this time his wife was received. But he had then only a few months left him to live; and the worry of household poverty was his to the last. "When I left office," he said one day to a friend, "I had scarcely £10 to my credit." The Government bore the expenses of the illness, which resulted in his lamented death in the April of 1896. He was one of the makers of Australia, which has made so many fortunes for others; and, perhaps, he was great and brotherly enough to feel that if he contributed to their success he himself could not be called a failure.

The strangest thing remains to be told. For this self-made man, whose life, from the age of infancy, had been passed in struggle, had another success in its way, where you would least expect it. He wrote books—and books of verse. We do not pretend to have read them all, and Sir Charles Dilke, whose judgment in such a matter we are ready to make our own, in his Problems of Greater Britain describes the early poems as "trashy." True, when Sir Henry Parkes sent Sir Charles Dilke his collected volume of Fragmentary Thoughts in 1895, Sir Charles for once showed himself the courtier:

"I am touched and charmed," he wrote, "by your sending me the volume of poems. I have no doubt that you saw the impertinent adjective I applied to your earlier poems; but you must excuse me if I repeat that even pretty poems seem to me trashy if weighed along with your services to what we hope will soon be the Australian State."

That volume, by the way, was dedicated to Tennyson, and Tennyson as the friend of Parkes is an unfamiliar figure, on which it is a pleasure to pause:

"Permit me," Sir Henry wrote, "to dedicate this volume to you, in remembrance of golden hours of life spent with you in various ways. Our happy walks together, in the groves and over the downs in the neighbourhood of Farringford, and through the bowery lanes and across the green fields around Aldworth; the hours of rare enjoyment vouchsafed to me when, under your honoured roof, I have listened to your reading of your immortal poems; the delicate kindnesses extended to me by the gracious lady who, for so many years, has made the spiritual sunshine of your illustrious life—all remain to me as memories whose beauties can never die."

To which Tennyson replied:

"MY DEAR SIR HENRY,—I send you from over the convex of our little world, which you are doing your best to make better, my choicest thanks for your volume of poems and your kind and affectionate dedication, and, moreover, congratulate you that you have, not unsuccessfully, interwoven the laurel of the Muses with the civic wreath which you wear as a statesman.—Always yours,

"TENNYSON."

The old Australian statesman was cheered and delighted—to him the letter of the Laureate was supreme success. Nor were they idle words from Farringford. There are many worse sonnets from the hands of professed poets than is this, for instance, by the Australian artisan turned statesman:

"UNFIT FOR FREEDOM."

"Inscrutable and Omnipresent God!

Who dost behold, as Thou sustainest, all;
With Thee it will not weigh, or great or small,
Or rich or poor. Thy creatures plan and plod
In building temples, while the labourer's hod Hard grinds the shoulder's flesh. On Thee they call

When terrors in their worldly path appal,
But few devoutly miss Thy chastening rod!
A people poor in heart, O God of Truth!
Not fashioned like our fathers for great deeds,
We know not how, nobly to live and die:
Of different clay were men in the world's youth;

Too much of knowledge and too many creeds
Have we, unawed by Freedom's majesty."

That is a sonnet full of tradition, and even great tradition. The man who wrote it must have had his Milton and his Wordsworth in his heart: and that is one of the happiest thoughts on which we can pass away from this strange yet typical, this masterful yet beaten, man—Sir Henry Parkes.

ANCIENT VOLCANOES.

The Ancient Volcanoes of Great Britain. By Sir Archibald Geikie, F.R.S., D.C.L., &c. With Seven Maps and Numerous Illustrations. (Macmillan & Co.)

THIS monumental work is the outcome of a long and busy life spent in the service of geology, and intrinsically, as well as from the fact that it is the crowning work of the chief of the English Survey, it earns a right to be regarded as a stepping-stone in the science which no subsequent discoveries can displace. It is intended, says the author, "to offer a summary of all that has been ascertained regarding the former volcanoes of the British Isles," a record which involves practically the volcanic history of the globe, for

"situated as they are on the margin of a great ocean basin, and extending along the edge of a continent, these islands have lain on a critical borderland of the terrestrial surface, where volcanic action is apt to be most vigorous and continuous."

Britain, in fact, from the remotest ages of the past down to a point in the Tertiary period which is clearly defined, has, though superficial observers could not guess it, been the theatre of almost perpetual volcanic disturbance. A break in the record was made during the long and placid age when the Mesozoic strata were deposited, but this was made up for by the increased violence of the Tertiary outbreaks, which crumpled and plicated the Mesozoic beds into hopeless confusion, and flooded the land with sheets of lava of a portentous depth and extent. Every well-marked type of volcanic vent is found among the remains of the vast Palaeozoic periods represented in our island geology. There are craters like Etna and Vesuvius, scattered groups of small cones like the famous Puys of Auvergne, and fissure or dyke eruptions like those of recent times in Iceland. Nor is this the only fact which gives to Sir Archibald Geikie's work its world-wide significance and importance.

"The geological revolutions of successive ages have made this long volcanic chronicle fully accessible to observation. Had the lavas and ashes of one geological period remained buried under the sedimentary accumulations of the next, their story would have been lost to us. Fortunately, the endless vicissitudes of a continental border have brought up the older rocks once more to the surface. All the latter formations of the earth's crust have been likewise upraised and exposed to denudation during long cycles of time. In this manner the rocky framework of the country has been broken up and raised once more to view. The active vents of former periods have been dissected, submarine streams of lava have been uncovered, sheets of ashes that fell over the sea-bottom have been laid bare. The process of denudation is specially favoured in a climate like that of Britain, and thus by the co-operation of underground and meteoric causes the marvellous volcanic records of this country have been laid open in minutest detail."

Curiously enough, in spite of this, the volcanic nature of our geological record is concealed from all but expert eyes. Features that appear volcanic are often quite illusory. Not a single crater remains, except where it has been buried under lava, nor, save in a few dubious instances, have any original cones been preserved. The chief remains, apart from the Tertiary basalt plateaux which are so prominent, consist of solid columns of lava, tuff or agglomerate filling up the necks of ancient vents which once broke through the overlying crust. The hardness of these has caused them to wear less than the surrounding sedimentary rocks.

In his earlier chapters Sir Archibald Geikie gives a brief but clear outline of the faith that is in him respecting volcanoes. The famous struggle which took place in the beginning of the century between the "Neptunists," or followers of Werner, and the "Volcanists," as to their extent and importance as a geological factor, is relegated to a few paragraphs in the preface, being now ancient history and forgotten. The study of volcanic action since the days of Murchison, and, indeed, of Hutton, has become one of the prime labours of a geologist, and nothing shows more plainly how much may be accomplished by concerted and well-directed effort than the astounding array of facts and properly sifted evidence contained in these two volumes.

It is comforting to find that Sir Archibald Geikie has no novel or revolutionary theory to propound concerning the origin of volcanic outbreaks, but leaves the problem where it stands. Everything points to an enormously high temperature in the interior of the earth. Yet the nucleus remains solid owing to the enormous pressure to which it is subjected. If the pressure is reduced the intensely hot material will pass into the liquid state, and there is one known cause capable of producing this effect. The outer crust being comparatively cool, and its temperature not being increased by the uprising of heat from within, the hot nucleus must cool, and therefore shrink, faster than the crust is doing. This causes the shell to subside, a thing which it can do only by plication or rupture. Here Sir Archibald Geikie has a passage showing how from earliest times the "lines of relief" have followed certain definite directions, coinciding, as a whole, with the axis of the continents. The great mountain chains are crests of waves into which the earth's surface has been thrown. The ridging up of a portion of the crust will afford relief from pressure to the part immediately beneath, and from what has gone before it is likely that along the lines of terrestrial uplift there would be outbursts of material suddenly allowed to pass into the molten state. It is along those lines that active volcanoes are chiefly found. In the chapters that follow a general description is given of the leading traits by which volcanic rocks are recognised, and rules are laid down for determining their date in the geological sequence. Where, as is often the case, volcanic layers are sandwiched between fossil-bearing strata, this becomes a matter of comparative ease.

From such a basis of general introduction Sir Archibald Geikie starts his masterly catalogue of British volcanic remains, beginning with the earliest of all, those scattered over the vast undatable period classed as "Pre-Cambrian." For rocks of this incalculably early age there are few richer hunting-grounds than the north and west of Scotland. Sir Archibald takes his readers all over the field of the Lewisian gneiss, with excursions into the younger schists, the almost Scottish rocks of Anglesey, the Wrekin and Charnwood forest. One would like to linger over the poetic feeling instilled into some of these learned summaries, but space forbids. Each subsequent period is handled with the same minuteness and wide range of instance, the Cambrian, the Silurian, and Devonian or Old Red Sandstone, the Carboniferous, the Permian, and the Tertiary, when the last volcanoes that disturbed our island peace broke out and were silenced. Twelve million years, Sir Archibald reckons, must have passed over the land since then, making a second break in the almost continuous record, the other period of quiescence being that during the long ages of the Mesozoic already referred to.

At the conclusion of his second volume, Sir Archibald Geikie sums up the knowledge to be learned from this exhaustive survey. These relate to the situation and persistence of lines of volcanic activity, the determining causes of outbreaks in particular spots, the relationship of volcanic phenomena with other concurrent disturbances, their connexion with periods of gigantic subsidence following local uplift, the uniformity of the volcanic record throughout all time, and the signs of gradual diminution of activity in successive ages. In addition, we have luminous chapters devoted to the character of volcanic rocks in general, their metamorphism, and geological arrangement. Science never stands still; the mass of this information has been acquired during Sir Archibald Geikie's lifetime, and much of it under his own supervision. It is but natural to suppose that his successors will amass no less. But this is a work of which it is safe to say that future discoveries can only add to, and will never detract from it. It marks an epoch in the world's knowledge, and as such it can never become obsolete.

A CHRONICLE OF SENTIMENT.

Limbo, and Other Essays. By Vernon Lee. (Grant Richards.)

VERNON LEE is one of the large body of modern writers who proclaim themselves connoisseurs in the rarer sentiments. Her knowledge of Italian life and art made her previous work on the Renaissance scholar-like and valuable. In this book she returns to the occasional essay—the record of a fleeting thought or mood, the meditation in little. Her point of view is always that of the art critic, and even on alien subjects she falls into technicalities and studio-talk. Roughly, the book may be divided into essays in which landscape is the chief feature, and essays where it is less in evidence. "Limbo," "In Praise of Old Houses," and "About Leisure" come under the second head; "The Lie of the Land," "Tuscan Midsummer Magic," "Of Modern Travelling," and "Old Italian Gardens" under the first.

"Limbo" is an attempt at a natural history of the "Kingdom of Lost Possibilities," the pleasure which we miss from sheer ineptitude and mental bluntness. On such a subject one demands clear, compact thought, definite phrasing, some endeavour at least to crystallise ordinary indefinite feeling; but this the author seems just to fall short of. Somewhere a delicate thought is struggling for utterance, but it never comes, and we get only vague repetitions and illustrations. Still more is this true of the next essay, "In Praise of Old Houses," in spite of the prettiness of much of the writing. The "sentiment for the past" is hard to elucidate, but it does not help matters to call it "ineffable, indescribable," "a kind of rapture not easy to define," and then illustrate by recollections which from their purely personal nature convey no fresh meaning to the reader. Many of the sayings are good, such as "The action of time makes man's works into natural objects," and "To be symmetrical means, after all, to repeat the same thing twice over," though we dimly remember having heard both before. Good, too, are the closing sentences on Browning's Toccata of Galuppi's:

"Was a lady such a lady? They will say that of our ladies also. And, in recognising this, we will recognise how trumpery, flat, stale, and unprofitable were those ladies of the past. It is not they who make the past charming, but the past that makes them. Time has wonderful cosmetics for its favoured ones; and if it brings white hairs and wrinkles to the realities, how much does it not heighten the bloom, brighten the eyes and hair of those who survive in our imagination."

The essay "About Leisure" is a plea against a cheaply utilitarian spirit in the cultivation of "life's pauses"—a curious little meditation quaintly linked with the name of St. Jerome.

"Being at leisure," says the author truly, "is but a name for being active from an inner impulse instead of a necessity; moving like a dancer or skater for the sake of one's inner rhythm, instead of moving, like a ploughman or an errand-boy, for the sake of the wages you get for it."

"Tuscan Midsummer Magic" and "Old Italian Gardens" are clever expositions of the charm of summer weather in a certain Italian landscape and the lingering old-world grace of Italian gardens. In such work it is easy to attain a facile and vague picturesqueness, but to produce the exact characteristic impression of a scene or weather is the most difficult triumph of art. We cannot think that Vernon Lee achieves the whole, but she goes far towards it. Of the old sentiment for Italy she writes thus:

"Nowadays Italy means mainly certain familiar effects of light and cloud, certain exquisitenesses of sunset under against ultramarine hills, of winter mists among misty olives, of folds and folds of pale blue mountains; it is a country which belongs to no time, which will always exist, superior to picturesqueness and romance. But that is but a vague, half-indifferent habit of enjoyment. And every now and then, when the Midsummer magic is rife, there comes to me that very different, old, childish meaning of the word; as on that day among the roses of those Benedictine cloisters, the cool shadow of the fig-trees in the yards, with the whiff of that queer smell, heavy with romance, of wine-saturated oak and crumbling plaster; and I know, with a little stab of joy, that this is Italy."

The most notable paper in the book is "The Lie of the Land." The modern impressionists, says the author, are right in insisting on colour, atmosphere, and the qualities in a scene which appeal rudely to the eye, as against the mere configuration—the dry-bones of landscape. Yet in the bald configuration there is something which they miss. It is the unvarying items of a landscape which live in memory, in which we walk in fancy; and to take no account of them is to give no picture of landscape which shall completely satisfy. Here we have a sure truth clearly thought out, and we are grateful for a new fact. But we are not perfectly sure if we can follow the author when she continues her analysis. Is the magic of the "Lie of the Land" a quality inherent in a landscape and appealing to all men alike, or does it, like the charm of colour, depend upon a particular attitude of the observer's mind, differing from it only in being more capable of fanciful associations? It is not clear from these pages, and the author seems to halt between two opinions. But the essay is to be recommended as full of wise, if somewhat disconnected, notes on the relations of nature and art.

To conclude, Vernon Lee, as an occasional essayist, attempts to unite two radically different methods. She wishes to put a sentiment under the microscope, and explain it by nice analysis, and at the same time to reproduce it by the cadence and rhythm of words, the use of imagery and visualised description—the means, in short, which we are accustomed to associate with what we call creative art. She has some acuteness, a graceful, if somewhat careless, style, and much honest enthusiasm. She has not the gift of exact and incisive words, the power of sustaining thought and perfecting arrangement till the essay is a rounded whole, which are the peculiar virtues of this literary form. As compared with, say, Mrs. Meynell, her matter is less valuable and the form several degrees further from perfection. But within limits her work has power to charm and interest. The book, in a way, is typical of a class. Sentiments and memories are in themselves pleasant, and a desire to collect them under headlines and fix them by analysis is common to many. Hence the genesis of this type of essayist, and if the writer have some insight, a high sense of order, and a compact style, some measure of success follows his efforts. But the essay is scarcely the proper mode for the attempt, for what is really sought in most cases is not analysis, but reproduction; and the fitting form for the latter is some variety of fiction, as for the former a semi-scientific treatise. Only when embodied in creative work can such niceties of sentiment meet with a proper response from the reader; and they to whom this gift has been denied are compelled to strain and refine, and at the last find their reward only in cold intellectual acquiescence.

CICERO AND HIS FRIENDS.

Cicero and his Friends. By Gaston Boissier. Translated by Adnah David Jones. (Innes & Co.)

MR. JONES has done good service by this rendering of a delightful book. His style, though not always without fault, is natural and pleasing; and the few press-errors will mislead no one. We have here one of those charming studies in which French scholars excel, where learning, wide and accurate, is presented to the world of letters, no less than to professed students, in its most engaging form. To M. Boissier it has evidently been a labour of love to search through Cicero's wide and varied correspondence, his speeches, and philosophic writings, supplemented from Sallust, Plutarch, Cæsar, and Suetonius; and the result is a vivid picture of Rome in the splendid, but horrible, last half-century of the Republic, where her greatest sons, most virtuous citizens, and most daring criminals seem to live again. What a great and moving spectacle it is! There are Cicero and Cæsar; Atticus, Brutus, and Cato of Utica; Verres, Clodius, and Catiline; grim, ruthless Sulla stalks in the background when the drama opens, and cold, un pitying Octavius rules its closing scenes.

The book contains six brilliant studies in biography. First there is the story of Cicero's public, and then of his private, life: his political struggles and triumphs; the joys and sorrows of his home; his great achievements at the bar and in the senate; his wide literary and philosophic work, and especially his wonderful letters—all these are traced and described with insight and sympathy; and with tender indulgence for those "folies of the wise" which we know chiefly from Cicero's own self-revealings. Then we have the great Roman displayed in the life-story of his friends—of Atticus, Cælius, Cæsar, Brutus, and Octavius. Born in 106 B.C., the same year as Pompey, with whose fortunes his own were afterwards so entangled, of well-to-do parents at Volscian Arpinum, the birthplace of Caius Marius, whose fame then filled the world, Marcus Tullius Cicero was (accepting Mommsen's date) but four years older than Julius Cæsar. Taken by his father to Rome for education, he early bent his great powers to legal study, diligently attending those famous orators, Scævola and Cræsus; and so, resolved to win himself a name, he "scorned delights and lived laborious days." The city was at this time reeking with blood, steeped in vice; religion had ceased to be a power; honour seemed lost among men, and modesty banished from among women; and over all brooded the gloomy tyranny of Sulla and his satellites. The dark picture may be seen in the pages of Sallust and Catullus, and is sketched also in a few terrible lines of Matthew Arnold. That spell of fear Cicero dared to break, and from the day he braved Chrysogonus and saved Roscius, he was marked out for honour. Favoured by the people, he triumphed over the silly contempt and opposition of the nobles; filling with dignity the higher magistracies in succession, marking each year with fresh oratorical achievements, smiting Verres in defence of hapless Sicily—he reached at length (suo anno, as with just pride he tells us) that highest goal of Roman ambition, the Consulship. His year, 63 B.C., was famous for the defeat of Catiline's foul plot and the death of the conspirators. Cicero loved to dwell on it, and gloried in the deed. To our thinking he was justified. He rose to the height of a great crisis, and though his heroic act failed to save Rome, it was that Rome could no longer be saved. Mortification of the whole body politic had set in, and the surgeon's knife was useless. Cicero's public life thereafter is well known. Doubtless he was no match for Cæsar, and Pompey—unstable and vain—was no leader for the time. But Cicero was throughout a true patriot, hating tyranny and wickedness; and he died nobly, sacrificed by Octavius's policy to Antony's hate, murdered by one whose life he had saved.

In his home Cicero was not happy: his wife Terentia was somewhat greedy and shrewish, and jealous of her own daughter; and, after thirty years of marriage, he divorced her, at a time when misfortunes crowded thick about him. Quintus, his brother, was a brave, rough, coarse soldier, yet sincerely attached to him; and to Quintus, Cæsar's trusted lieutenant, Marcus often owed much. Tullia, his darling daughter, Dolabella's unhappy wife, Cicero lost not long after he divorced her mother; and his only son, whom also he dearly loved, was not worthy. His fortune was easy, if he had used it with economy; and M. Boissier gives a clear and interesting account of how he made it. And Cicero was happy in his friends. Atticus, the wise, cultivated, wealthy banker, true as steel and secret as the grave, helped and counselled him from student-days at Athens. It is to him we owe those matchless letters, where Cicero's brilliant and receptive mind mirrors the life of contemporary Rome; and we feel a thrill of peculiar pleasure in knowing him also as manufacturer of pedigrees for the nobility! One fourth of the book is given to the story of Cicero and Cæsar, their times of mutual attraction and repulsion. Each perforce admired the other, both were men of high literary genius and cultivated taste, and we are of those who hold that Cicero acted wisely (not basely) in submitting to Cæsar after Pharsalia. The description of Cæsar's court and camp in Gaul is most fascinating; modern history yields no parallel to it, save perhaps the state of a Governor-General in India. Wellesley or Dalhousie might compare even with Cæsar, and the 60,000 British troops with the famous legions of Rome.

On two points we cannot quite agree with M. Boissier. We doubt whether Cæsar foresaw and planned his career from the first; and the Roman law-books, with the witness of (among others) Sallust, Juvenal, and Tacitus, forbid us to think that even domestic slavery was much influenced by philosophic teaching. A Roman was pitiless, and Cicero's humanitas was personal to himself and a few more. Remembering this, and remembering, too, how he championed the provincials against others and ruled them mildly himself, we may well apply to him the canon of human kindness:

"What's done we partly may compute,
But we know not what's resisted."

We are glad to find that Mr. Strachan-Davidson, in his recent study of Cicero as the Hero of Rome, agrees generally with Boissier. In the same favourable verdict concur our own Middleton and Merivale, and the German scholar Abeken, in his learned, but dry, volume. Nevertheless, for Englishmen throughout all time, judgment has already been pronounced on Cæsar and Cicero, Brutus, Antony, and Octavius, and from Shakespeare's tribunal there is no appeal.

THE WHIRLPOOL.

The Whirlpool. By George Gissing. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

A SALUTARY and valuable investigation of grime and grayness in social life: a mournful, mocking, strong book. Penitents, from time to time, go through an "examination of conscience": what most profoundly saddens most of them is no monstrous magnificence of sin, some exceptional audacity in wrong-doing, but the sordid average of petty faults, the mean level of ignobility, the general prevalence of littleness and insignificance, the dreary mass of cowardly concessions and drifting compromises. That is much the burden of Mr. Gissing's dreadful and admirable story: we are all in "the whirlpool" of modern life, society, culture; we give in, as Stevenson has it, to "this stuffy business of living in houses," with what it involves; we are polished and urbane Frankensteins, creating heartily the silliest and most oppressive monsters. And somewhere—there are free sky and air, the feeling of a joyous activity, a sense of rational existence, a possibility of "plain living and high thinking"; but we are caught in "the whirlpool," and we suffer grotesque miseries all our lives. "Appearances," and the imperious duty of "keeping them up," are our chief realities; we struggle on in a perpetual gray sickness; we are dazed and dizzied round the whirlpool. Money, and the part it plays in modern life, are to Mr. Gissing themes of fascination; he states his tragedies in terms of money. All London speaks to him in the language of money; streets, clubs, theatres, lodgings, restaurants, suggest to him the human fight and fret and fume over money, its conventional tyranny and exigence. In this book he does not treat of the poverty of the penniless, of anxiety about pence; not the brave penury of Johnson and Goldsmith, or the miseries of "the sweated" and of "casuals" and of "submerged." It is the harassing, haunting preoccupations of those who seem forced to make one thousand do the work of two, or to abstain from marriage, because marriage is "out of the question" upon five hundred pounds; those who are coerced by social opinion in matters of service and establishment. He dwells upon the demoralising influence of the supposed need for costly superfluities of civilisation, upon the wretched and dishonouring crime that comes of it, the squalid frauds and ugly intrigues and paltry ambitions. All this, told with a curious, simple sincerity, with no forced or violent emphasis, leaves the reader with a kind of aching admiration or jaded enjoyment of Mr. Gissing's very notable art. You have had a good walk; but you are splashed with mud, you are rather fagged, the day has been depressing: you want a warm bath, clean things, a cheering dinner, and then to lose yourself in Elia or the Odyssey. But the walk was a good walk, no doubt of it.

The story turns upon money, and upon money in main connexion with marriage and its problems. Harvey Rolfe and his wife Alma, Hugh Carnaby and his wife Sibyl, with all the minor characters, their relatives and acquaintances, illustrate the action of the "whirlpool," in which society, the middle classes, the rank and file of the professions and arts, the people of comparative leisure, the men of business, are engulfed. There is definite, straightforward tragedy in the book; suicide and homicide are among its important incidents. But the dominant tragic note is not struck in scenes of passionate action; it is heard in the obscurer colloquies and debates of the will, in the timorous hesitations of decision and choice, in the sense of life as a thing tangled, involved, perplexed. It seems dangerous to take any step in any direction;

there is nowhere any simplicity; it is as though a rational human existence were no longer possible. Or, if possible it be, it is away from the whirl and clash of city life and interests: in some peaceful, ancient town, the home of your forefathers, where you have lived from childhood, where you pursue a life of decent business, keep your mind open and alert, and have wife and children as rational as yourself. That was the happy lot of Basil Morton, corn dealer and old-fashioned scholar; and, grimly enough, he and his are the only successful and contented folk in Mr. Gissing's book. It had been more satisfactory had he planted them in Bloomsbury or West Kensington, and shown that, to alter a word of Arnold's sonnet, "even in London life may be led well." We cannot all, in Turgeneff's favourite phrase, "simplify" ourselves by electing to live and prosper in Arcadia. But Mr. Gissing has no relenting mercies: his other folk, with scarce an exception, succumb to the miasmatic influences of London and its ideals: most of them are well-meaning, but the fatality is heavy upon them all, and they drift or drive into unhappiness or dishonour. And the worst of it is, that Mr. Gissing's method is terribly and disastrously strong unto conviction: subtly, quietly, imperceptibly he persuades us that these ghastly, marred, soiled, broken lives are nothing uncommon. We have met so many of them: the futile weaklings, the just tolerable cads, the maddening toadies and artistic pretenders, the riff-raff of gentility and culture, the people of sinister success, and the people of pitiable failure, with the crowds of the entirely uninteresting, who do not enjoy the lives they lead, yet persist in living them. No one is to blame, nothing can be done: "the whirlpool" or, in Aristophanes' phrase, "whirligig is king." Harvey Rolfe and Hugh Carnaby, each after his kind, were excellent fellows; but they and theirs are caught in the bewilderments of modern life, as it were by some pathetic necessity, some inevitable taint and infection in the air. One may seek peace and simpleness in Welsh valleys, the other chase adventure and prosperity at the Antipodes; but fatality, plus their wives, bring them back to malarious London, its rottenness and stifling ways. We are left with the consolation, of doubtful efficacy, that perhaps the robustious and shouting genius of Mr. Kipling heralds an age of blood and iron, with the British Empire on the warpath—or the raid. The soliloquist of Maud spoke in that spirit; and he was mad. This may not be Mr. Gissing's masterpiece; but certainly no other of his books can show more brilliant characterisation. His creatures are marvellously living; here is realism of a real kind. Those men and women grip the memory; we have a perfect faith in every one of them. Yet the story, the plot, is not of itself arresting; it would lose all its excellence in a summary. But the play of forces, the collision of motives, the inner springs of action and passion, the spiritual pathology, these are felt and realised with rare strength and sureness. Mr. Gissing is in love with ideas, and can illustrate them through flesh and blood: his work lives.

AN ANONYMOUS POET.

The Desolate Soul. By Maria Monica.
(Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.)

THE Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge published for Miss Christina Rossetti, which is, perhaps, why to them also has gone the lady who writes under the seemingly inadequate name of Maria Monica. One who has so grave a poetical mission should come to us, we say at first sight, with full credentials; yet, on second thoughts, it may be held more fitting that "the desolate soul" should have the outward and visible immolation of what is practically anonymity. Certain it is that the hymn-writer in this case is a rare poet. In "The Hours of the Passion," in "Easter Eve," and in "Night Watches," she shows herself the possessor of the gift of intimacy in religion and of a capacity, even a magic, to express moods of the mind that come with conviction even to those beyond whose experience they are. We take as example some of the "Easter Eve" verses:

"It was early in the day—
I awoke, I awoke; I came.
Thou did'st not call me by my name;
I had no light but the Eastern flame,
And none to show the way.

"I heard of One who died,
And my heart went out from me.
Though it be far over land and sea,
Let me come too, to die with Thee,
Where Thou wast crucified!

"The name of the Mount I knew;
It stands so plain, and so high.
The shadowing of Mount Calvary
Is always written against the sky,
Which ever way we view."

The beautiful things of nature call to her, but do not detain her quest, and the night comes

"Sweet and cold
Under the stars, out on the wold,
Where the sheep are lying in the fold,
And the woods stand listening."

She reaches the three crosses in the dark, but fails to distinguish the form of the Crucified:

"I have found Thy Cross—not Thee:
Thy Cross is mighty and dread;
I am held and hammered there fast instead;
And the thorns pierce deep in my wounded head,
And my life is going from me."

The same symbolism pervades other poems; but in "The Hours of the Passion" the pleading of the soul is all for escape from Calvary, an escape her master, guardian, and lover will not allow. At eventide she sings:

"O Master, let me go!
The air is fair and still,
The dews of sunset steep
The flowers upon the hill;
All the wild skies are pale,
All the wide earth lies free;
Let me now wander forth
To dream of love and Thee;
To linger at my will
Along the purple vales:
There will I find a secret flower,
That all its heart exhales—
Its heart to Thee exhales,
Let me go!"

At twilight the pleading is renewed:

"O Shepherd, let me go!
Under the evening stars
Within my breast there swells
Music in lines and bars;
I hear a song that calls,
A song of heaven and Thee;
Its words are echoes blown
From where the winds sweep free;
Oh, let me out one hour—
One hour of liberty—
And I will bring Thee back my song,
And sing my song to Thee;
My song of heaven and Thee.
Let me go!"

At midnight the suit gathers in intensity:

"O Lover, let me go!
This is the hour for sleep;
All tender things of earth
Lie folded soft and deep
Worn out am I and spent,
My heavy eyelids close;
Worse is this weariness
Than slave or captive knows;
Let me lie down and sleep,
And dream of things Divine,
And in the morning wake and lift
A face refreshed to Thine;
My face, Beloved, to Thine.
Let me go!"

And so it proceeds through all the watches, until at last the agony is reached, and then the soul knows her place; and

"O Lord, let me not go"

becomes her cry at the close of the poem. In such poetry as this the religious world has a possession of which it cannot long be unaware.

SIX OLD NOVELS MADE NEW.

Harold. By Lord Lytton. With Introduction and Notes by G. Laurence Gomme. (Constable & Co.)

Shirley. By Charlotte Brontë. Illustrated by F. H. Townsend. (Service & Paton.)

The Scarlet Letter. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. Illustrated by F. H. Townsend. (Service & Paton.)

Poor Jack. By Captain Marryat. Illustrated by F. Pegram. (Macmillan & Co.)

The Parents' Assistant. By Maria Edgeworth. Illustrated by Chris. Hammond. (Macmillan & Co.)

Charles O'Malley. By Charles Lever. Illustrated by Arthur Rackham. (Service & Paton.)

Harold, the best of Lord Lytton's historical novels, comes to us from Messrs. Constable embellished, as the last century publishers would say, with reproductions of portions of the Bayeux tapestry bearing upon the subject. It has also a long introduction and notes by Mr. G. L. Gomme. Lytton having written his romance merely to entertain, gaining, as he says, "the greatest amount of dramatic effect at the least expense of historic truth," one cannot help deeming the editor of such a work somewhat of a superfluity. There is too much editing nowadays. None the less those who obtain their history only vid romance may not be sorry to have Mr. Gomme's facts side by side with Lord Lytton's fiction. It is late to speak of Harold itself. It is one of those books which when read at school are magnificent, and when read afterwards are disenchanting. He who misses the joy of them when he is a boy will never find it in later life. The present edition of Harold is, we think, less good than it might be by reason of the minuteness of its type. The editor's introduction, being leaded, is to be read far more easily than the story itself—which is a rather humorous circumstance!

In somewhat similar form comes from Messrs. Service and Paton, a comparatively new publishing firm, a pleasing edition of Charlotte Brontë's Shirley. Mr. F. H. Townsend, whose pencil has been so worthily employed in recent reprints of old fiction, supplies sixteen illustrations, but nothing quite in his best manner. Most of his subjects from Shirley are well chosen; the drawing, however, of Mr. Malone slipping on the stairs is not a sound choice. A transitory action of this kind is not to be perpetuated in black and white. The picture representing Shirley bidding Donne begone is an excellent piece of work. Mr. Townsend's illustrations deserve more care from the printer than they have received in this volume.

In The Scarlet Letter, the first of the new edition of the romance of Nathaniel Hawthorne, which the same firm is preparing, Mr. Townsend has been treated with more kindness by the printer. Here he is admirable. The frontispiece, showing Hester branded with the damning A, has both strength and delicacy, and there is the added grace of charm in certain of the other pictures. To this edition Mr. Moncure D. Conway, who was a personal friend of Hawthorne, is contributing introductions. Incidentally in his account of The Scarlet Letter he speaks of its author as "the most original imagination which America has produced"—a decision with which no one is likely to quarrel.

Mr. Fred. Pegram's illustrations to Captain Marryat's Poor Jack, in Messrs. Macmillan's excellent "Peacock" series, are extremely good. Both for sympathy with the text and masterly technique they are admirable. We have a kindness for Captain Marryat that we must extend also to an illustrator of such appreciativeness and intelligence as Mr. Pegram. Mr. David Hannay's introduction to the present reprint is a piece of sound criticism. As he points out, Poor Jack is essentially a book for boys. It is likely to continue popular with them for many years yet to come.

For the children of a generation or so earlier than those for whom Captain Marryat wrote Poor Jack Miss Edgeworth was the most distinguished author, and her Parents' Assistant contains some of her best work in this kind. That book Messrs. Macmillan have just added to their "Peacock" series, with illustrations of some merit by Miss Chris. Hammond. Those who like an old-fashioned flavour in stories will eagerly acquire The Parents' Assistant, while it should very pleasantly recall the past to readers of mature age. It has, for example, re-mined Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, who writes an introduction, of her father's reading aloud to her the story of the "Little Merchants" when his own invention flagged. "The Purple Jar," probably the favourite among Miss Edgeworth's juvenile stories, has here its sequel, "The Birthday Present." Mrs. Ritchie considers "Lazy Lawrence" the prettiest of the tales, but is inclined to esteem most highly "Simple Susan." In the course of her introductory remarks she is very severe upon certain "revolting" tendencies of modern fiction; and in contrasting the old and the new complains that the books of to-day are "indecent on principle." But surely a change has lately set in which is worthy of notice! Mrs. Ritchie is referring to the novels of two or three years ago. We are far healthier now.

If all of Mr. Arthur Rackham's illustrations to Charles O'Malley, another volume of Messrs. Service and Paton's "Illustrated English Library," were as good as his frontispiece, representing an accident to a post-chaise, they would be a valuable addition to Lever's delightfully genial and garrulous pages. But nowhere else is this height reached. The book is almost too long to have been attempted in a single volume of this series: the type has to be so packed. However, for those who want Lever's novel, and do not care to subscribe to the complete set of his works which another firm is issuing, Messrs. Service and Paton's edition will be useful.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The House of Dreams. Anonymous. (James Bowden.)

WHEN earnestness and sincerity are qualities which go to the making of a book, generosity demands that shortcomings shall not be treated too severely; it is, however, needful to remember that in themselves earnestness and sincerity do not suffice to ensure artistic excellence. The impression left by a perusal of The House of Dreams is that the account of that Easter-eve vision has been written, not for effect, but in order to give expression to a profound spiritual conviction. To the narrator life presented itself in ashen-grey hues, destitute of hope, until, led by the soul of his dead child, the spirit-world was revealed to him, where reign perfect justice and perfect love. The keynote of the book is to be found in Browning's lines:

"All I could never be,
All, men ignored in me,

This, I was worth to God, whose wheel the pitcher shaped."

The aim of the author is lofty, his methods faulty. His appeal would be infinitely stronger if the volume were expressed in half its present length. In particular, the disquisitions on "The Unuttered" and on "The Throne of the Highest" are too long; and the attempt to find a scientific basis for hope is out of place here, especially when it leads to a description of the sixth sense as that which "sees where no vision is" and "is also the perception of the imperceptible"—mystical words which, to be effective, require a simple austere setting. The anonymous author, again—whose command of the allegorical method of expression is imperfect—might with advantage have omitted the epilogue in verse.

* * *

Problems of Modern Democracy. By Edwin Lawrence Godkin. (Constable & Co. and Charles Scribner's Sons.)

THIS is an admirable collection of essays by a writer better known, perhaps, in America than in England, reprinted from the North American Review, the Forum, the Atlantic Monthly, and other periodicals. The first, and in some respects the most interesting, appeared originally towards the close of the Civil War.

It cannot be said that in the thirty years which have passed since this essay was written the American democracy has entirely lost the defects of which the aristocratic critic complained; but it is confronted by other and more serious difficulties. In the paper on "The Real Problems of Democracy" Mr. Godkin points to one very serious defect in the practical working of democratic government. In theory the citizens decide who shall represent them at the seat of government; in practice they do nothing of the kind. The vastness of the electorate precludes such a course, and calls into existence the wirepuller. Such a contingency was never contemplated by the theorists, or even by the framers of the American Constitution. "They did not anticipate," writes Mr. Godkin, "the necessity of organising and directing the suffrage, nor of the intervention of the boss and his assistants." This essay is a very striking presentment of one of the principal defects of American democracy, which has obviously outgrown its constitutional breeches. One is, however, a little surprised to find scarcely any mention of another pressing peril to democratic institutions—the immense power of capital when it is concentrated in the hands of trusts and syndicates.

Space forbids us to do more than mention one or two of the most suggestive essays in this excellent little volume, such as the paper on the currency question, on the cost of Socialism, and on the sorrows of the millionaire in America. Mr. Godkin is no political pessimist. He has faith in the principles of democracy, but his faith does not blind him to the faults which democracy—like all human institutions—develops. He is a clear thinker, and his style is a faithful mirror of his thought.

* * *

The Edge of the Orient. By R. H. Russell. (Kegan Paul.)

ALTHOUGH Mr. R. H. Russell's route did not lead him to any of the countries which are now the seat of war, the account of his travels on the edge of the Orient is of much interest, for he touches in a light and chatty style on those points of the Turkish empire which lie nearest to us in Europe. He began his journey at Trieste and visited Zara and the other quaint half-dead old cities of the Dalmatian coast as far down as Cattaro. Just as a matter of protest it may be noted that others before Mr. Russell have visited and have been struck with the fascination of Ragusa, Spalato, and their sister cities; but still the Eastern shores of the Adriatic are so little known to the average Englishman that Mr. Russell, and more especially the results of Mr. Russell's camera, are heartily welcome. Montenegro is better known, thanks to recent royal marriages, and Mr. Russell has nothing new to say of the little Principality. From the Black Mountain the author takes us to Constantinople, Smyrna and Salonica, Beyrout, Damascus, Alexandria, Cairo, Luxor, and Assouan, and about each place he writes pleasantly and freshly, as is possible only to an American from the States to whom the East is absolutely new and unexplored. To those who know the places written of, Mr. Russell's book will bring many pleasant reminiscences, while those who have never known the near East will find his descriptions sufficiently lively to invite perusal. The opening chapters, dealing with the Dalmatian coast, will be the freshest to most people, and their value is greatly increased by the excellent photographs which illustrate their pages. We may perhaps be allowed to congratulate ourselves that it was a citizen of the U.S.A., and not an Englishman, who had the interview—in thick boots and knickerbockers—with the Governor of Damascus; and also to protest against the Yankee spelling and provincialisms which disfigure the book.

* * *

A Man's Value to Society: Studies in Self-Culture. By Newell Dwight Hillis. (Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

THIS volume contains fourteen essays in the American tongue. Such subjects as "Character," "Imagination as the Architect of Manhood," "The Enthusiasm of Friendship," "Visions that Disturb Contentment," "The Revelators [sic] of Character," are volubly treated. The size of the book is moderate, but the style is torrential. Mr. Hillis is a man full of words; and his choice of them would seem to be directed rather by the aptness of their sound than by the propriety of their signification. At any time he will sacrifice exactness to antithesis, and antithesis to alliteration. Here is a typical excerpt from "The Moral Uses of Memory":

"From the chill of arctic enmity, it is given to the soul through memory to rise above the storm and cold, and in a moment to enter the tropic atmosphere of noble friendship, where are fragrance and beauty, perpetual warmth and wealth."

There is plenty of good sense under the pretentious phrasing, and a wealth of familiar allusions that should fascinate the college-girl; but the spelling is aggressive, and there should certainly have been a clause in the International Copyright arrangement to exclude such atrocities as the dismemberment of process into 'proc-ess.'

Biblia Innocentium. Being the Story of God's Chosen People before the Coming of Our Lord Jesus Christ upon Earth. Written anew for Children by J. W. Mackail, sometime Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. (Longmans & Co.)

FROM the books of the Old Testament Mr. Mackail has extracted two hundred incidents, and, at a length of one to three pages, has told them in a condensed style that is permeated by the phraseology of the Authorised Version from which he has made his excerpts. With the exception of the first chapter, in which the rebellion of angels is described and the end of man's creation is declared to be that the sons of men should fill the seats left vacant by them that fell, and of the penultimate chapter, in which the "Pax Romana" is made to bear upon the Desire of the nations, no hint is given from which the author's attitude towards the Sacred Books may be determined: there is no such attempt to extract any moral lesson from the incidents as used to make bitter the Sundays of our childhood; there is no mystic transference forward to a future dispensation, nor any critical appreciation of the historical value of the sources. The advantage of this colourless method is that the volume will be equally serviceable to the orthodox parent and to one who desires to introduce an adolescent mind to a literature of folklore.

* * *

Quiet Hours. By John Pulsford, D.D. "Books for the Heart" Series. (Andrew Melrose.)

WE learn from the preface to this volume that Dr. John Pulsford is "by God's goodness happily spared to us still." We confess that, though he would appear to have borne his name a very long time, it was until the other day unknown to us. We gather that he is a Dissenting preacher, and that the present "cardiphonia"—a word which would seem to be peculiar to Nonconformist circles—do not constitute his first book. The loss, we are free to confess, is ours: we are convinced that he must be a very charming and saintly old man, and there are passages in the book before us which not only are written in an exact and graceful style, but are instinct with such a sweet and lightsome spirit as we do not always associate with the soul of the Conventicle.

FICTION.

Love in Old Clothes, and Other Stories. By H. C. Bunner. (Downey & Co.)

THIS is a pleasingly illustrated collection of stories, chiefly in the light comedy vein, full of the little sentimentalities and prettinesses which characterise one kind of Transatlantic fiction. The late Mr. Bunner was always a deviser of quaint expedients, and the tale which gives its title to the book is a piece of modern love-making done in the style of Pepys. It says much for the author's skill that the result is successful, for we have found the archaic rendering of slang infinitely amusing. In "French for a Fortnight" a Sabbatarian clergyman is betrayed into joining a Sunday fête of French New Yorkers, and there and then repents of his narrowness. "The Chromatic Uncle" is a pleasant sketch of an older New England; and the uncle himself, who was no uncle after all, but only a certain Tommy Biggs, is a character worth knowing. On the whole we prefer Mr. Bunner in his lighter moods; but one at least of his graver stories has high merit. "Crazy Wife's Ship" is the tale of a prim old woman, who deliberately cuts herself off from her neighbours and the little fashions of the place for the purpose of preventing her daughter-in-law from hearing of her husband's death. She is compelled to forego the wearing of mourning, in which her soul delighted, and take upon herself a reputation for imbecility; but, when at last the girl dies, the old woman crosses to the mainland, and returns with sufficient mourning clothes to last her to the end of life. The story is admirably told, the village idiom is racy and expressive, and the pathos is all the stronger from the studious reticence. "The Red Silk Handkerchief" is a variation on the old theme of the lover who for long dreams of his mistress, and then is rudely awakened by meeting her on her wedding tour. The thing is well enough done in its way, but the final scene is so old and stale that it fails to touch our jaded emotions. Better is "A Letter and a Paragraph," a curious forecast of a happy future, which a poor and unknown man writes to a friend on the eve of his death. Last of the seven comes a story of revivalism in the backwoods—the country of Theron Ware and his "illumination"—where an aged bishop stills the nervous excitement by the repetition of parts of the Prayer Book. Somehow the story seems just to miss its due effect, and the final picture has awkward suggestions of the comic which spoil its dignity. The truth is, that Bishop Waldegrave is too histrionic a figure to convince, and his speech savours of the religious novel of our forefathers. We like the author best when he indulges in pure comedy, but the whole book is readable and entertaining.

In the Name of Liberty. By Florence Marryat. (Digby, Long & Co.)

THIS is another version of the painful story of the lost heir who at last returns to gladden the eyes of the mourning Earl. Maurice Farrell is a wicked anarchist; Jane, his wife, a private detective; and the Earl of Innisfale, a benevolent Irish nobleman. Maurice and his friends try to blow up the Earl, the detective frustrates him, and, finally, he awakes to the wickedness of his life, and is rescued from anarchy by the efforts of his father. "If you bring any news," says the Earl, "concerning him [Viscount Ballantyne, as his right name is] you shall be liberally rewarded." But for its obvious air of good faith, the book reads like a parody. There is a certain young Aileen O'Brien who is revealed to our astonished gaze sitting "with her beauty unpaled, but her spirits sunk to zero." There is the usual betrayal, without which such books seem unable to get along, and the Earl in his younger days has most orthodoxly married "the daughter of his bed-maker at Oxford." We rather wonder how he managed it. The description of the Anarchist brotherhood is funnily amateurish, and altogether the book, though it has not a shred of merit, makes amusing reading.

Rose of Dutcher's Coolly. By Hamlin Garland. (Neville Beeman.)

THE name of Mr. Hamlin Garland is already known in England as a young American poet of an aggressively Western type. He is a writer of considerable power, and in Rose of Dutcher's Coolly he has produced a good novel. The theme is the development of a country girl of more than ordinary intelligence, from childhood to womanhood; the treatment is truthful, and at the same time restrained. Rose Dutcher is a farmer's only child. She runs wild with the freedom of a boy, grows straight and strong and brown, and thus builds up that splendid physique which is truly the best start in life that can be given to a woman. Nature grows, mates, dies and is born before her simple eyes, and questioning, thinking, and instinctively comprehending, she absorbs the fundamental lessons of her environment. The growth of ideals in her mind as she ceases to be a child is told with remarkable knowledge, and full of truth and insight is the account of the sudden crystallisation of these ideals round the figure of an athlete whom she sees in a travelling circus. She realises the world beyond the Coolly, and sees herself untaught and uncouth. By her own desire she enters college at Madison. Her beauty and strength of mind, as well as strength of body, make her path a smooth one. The ideal which, half-unconsciously, she has formed round the figure of the athlete saves her, at one or two crucial moments, from plunging into marriage, and her course goes on uninterrupted. After graduating she moves to Chicago, to seek some definite work in the world, and there gains an introduction to a group of intellectual people. Among others she meets Warren Mason and Elbert Harvey, divergent types of manhood, and with them comes again the stress of the marriage question. In Harvey culminates all that is fine in manly youth; in Mason she finds her intellectual mate. But she is beginning to feel her way to her work; she has written some good verse, and is on the threshold of a career. Is she to be drawn under by marriage? As her history thus far may be taken as a scheme of education for women, so may the plan on which Mason and she seek to arrange their married life be taken as a workable compromise for an intellectual and ambitious woman. This is a book to be read, and we commend it to the attention of the English reader.

The Flight of the Eagle. By Standish O'Grady. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

THIS book is not so much a historical romance as a romantic history; but whatever it may be called, it is a good book.

The story it tells is the youth of Red Hugh O'Donnell from the time when Sir John Perrott, Viceroy of Ireland, had him treacherously kidnapped on board a pretended merchantman in Lough Swilly, the year before the Armada, till the day when he made his second escape from Dublin into Wicklow. From Wicklow he rode north into Ulster, baffling Fitzwilliam's guard by taking the only ford of the Liffey that lay unguarded—for no one thought that an escaping party would ride under the very walls of the castle and through the heart of the garrison. Altogether it is a stirring narrative told with fire and energy, in spite of appalling lapses of style which occur from time to time. Mr. O'Grady has the life of Ireland under Elizabeth clear before him, and he makes it clear to his readers. On the one hand are the Gaelic speaking chieftains, whose way of living resembled closely enough that of Lobengula or Cetewayo, yet who themselves were often civilised and well-educated gentlemen; on the other, Elizabethan statesmen, like Sir John Perrott, bastard of Henry VIII., and Fitzwilliam, men of a more modern world, yet who did not scruple to employ the poisoner, but actually took credit for their success. And for the mere quality of narrative it would not be easy to find anything more vivid than the tale of Hugh Roe's first escape and his wanderings in the dark over Three Rock Mountain. Why, however, does Mr. O'Grady talk of Irish fjords? Loughs is the name for them, except in railway advertisements.

In a Country Town. By Honor Perceval. (Bentley & Son.)

WE imagine that the author of this book has not previously published a novel. We judge this not only from the fact that no other works from her pen are mentioned on the title-page of In a Country Town, but also from internal evidence. For her story, though it bears signs of care and thought in the writing, is exceedingly amateurish, while her plot, such as it is, is handled feebly and without grip. The fact is, Honor Perceval has been too ambitious. She has set herself to write a psychological novel, without any real grasp of human character or knowledge of its workings. The result is a story that is essentially unconvincing and, if the truth must be told, occasionally maudlin. The ending is not merely unsatisfactory but also absurd.

The Dreams of Dania. By Frederick Langbridge. (James Bowden.)

MR. LANGBRIDGE is favourably known to us as the author of a volume of poems which, though intended mainly for recitation, yet contained some rather pretty verse of a sentimental order. But as a novelist he strikes us as out of his element. He is painfully didactic, and he sentimentalises too much. Moreover, his conception of humorous dialogue is appalling. The Dreams of Dania is the story of a young lady with a taste for writing, who neglects her father in order to indulge that taste. Her lover, who disapproves of this, hints that merely as literature her work is bad, while a wholly impossible Irish editor on the contrary praises it and prints it. Whereupon she throws over the lover for the editor. Those who feel tempted to pursue this very tearful story further must read the book for themselves. The moral is, "Do your household duties and you will become a distinguished writer." It is an excellent moral; but will you?

"Daughters of Thespis." By John Bickerdyke. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

MR. BICKERDYKE, in a would-be humorous prefatory note, addressed to his brother journalists and others, printed in a strange mixture of italics and capitals, urges in extenuation of his subject and its treatment that "it may serve a useful end to hold up the LOOKING-GLASS OF TRUTH in which the *DAUGHTERS OF THESPI*s and, may I add, SONS OF BELIAL may see HUMAN NATURE as it still is," &c. We are inclined to differ from Mr. Bickerdyke in spite of his rather overwhelming display of capital letters, and to maintain that Daughters of Thespis will serve no useful end whatever. It is a lurid melodrama, dealing with one of that class which the author calls "the soiled doves of the stage," in her relations with all sorts and conditions of scoundrels, and it is not even amusing. That it is particularly immoral we do not say, but it strikes us at once as tedious, and the nature of the subject is not redeemed by any remarkable display of skill or good taste in the treatment.

Tales from the Isles of Greece. Translated from the Greek of Argyris Ephtaliotis by W. H. D. Rouse. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

MR. ROUSE tells us that the book from which these stories and sketches are taken has excited much interest in Greece. They are principally studies of peasant life in the islands: a life apart, and only here and there faintly touched—corrupted, the author appears to think—by Western civilisation. They have, therefore, an interest, as preserving the memory of evanescent manners and fading picturesqueness. As literature they are nothing very remarkable. The grip of incident in them is peculiarly slight, and the primitive emotions are somewhat primitively observed. Such Hellenic affinities as they have are with Theocritus rather than with Euripides: they miss the Attic distinction, but catch something of the Doric delicacy and happy touch of idyllic landscape. The stories called "Angelica" and "Marinos Kontaras" have perhaps rather more substance than the rest; and it is fair to say that certain qualities of simplicity and naïveté which may have had their charm in the original seem to have evaporated in the process of translation. In view of recent events, two or three episodes from the Greek War of Independence have been included in the English edition.

SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1897.
No. 1306, New Series.
TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.
The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.
Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.
All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.
CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow in due course.]
THE books published in the past week indicate the subdued, Jubilee-shadowed state of the publishing world. Few of them are challenges to a large public. Several scholarly works are published. The most bulky is Historic Studies in Vaud, Berne and Savoy by the late General Meredith Read. General Read stumbled in 1879 on Gibbon's old mansion, La Grotte, at Lausanne, and there found interesting people, documents and what not—the materials for a big book. The Evolution of the Aryan, Customs of Augustinian Canons, and Prehistoric Problems are books to which Jubilees are as nothing. But they are not so dull as they sound. The fifth volume of Mr. W. A. Ellis's translations of the prose works of Wagner is an arrival of the week. Also, Prof. Dowden's welcome critical hand is again shown. Then there is a small rush of technical and educational books. Captain Hayes's Veterinary Notes for Horse Owners pops up again, careless of motor-cars. A huge treatise on electricity and magnetism, and a treatise on the nature and qualities of dairy milk, and a text-book on the vertebrate skeleton also swim into our ken. Political books are arriving freely. By the way, how many books have been published lately with the words Imperial Defence in their titles? A new book on Rhodesia reminds us that a bibliography of South African books will soon be necessary. Nearly a score of novels sprinkle our table; and a week which brings us a story by Dr. Conan Doyle, two short stories by Mrs. Oliphant, and another by Mr. Stephen Crane has a Jubilee gladness after all. Altogether, not a bad week.

“THE FRENCH REVOLUTION AND ENGLISH LITERATURE.” UNDER this title Mr. Edward Dowden publishes what in substance is a series of lectures delivered in Trinity College, Cambridge. The same lectures, revised and expanded, were delivered later at Princeton University on the occasion of its Sesqui-centennial Celebration. Mr. Dowden limits the scope of the book to the following:
“I do not attempt to prove a thesis. I have tried to enter, in a disinterested way, into the spirit of each writer who comes within the scope of my subject, and to let the meanings of the French Revolution, as they entered into English literature, expound themselves. To present some important figures on a background of history—history of ideas rather than of events—has been my aim.”
THREE books come to hand OTHER BOOKS. which are inspired by the events and interests of the present time. Imperial Defence, by Lieut.-Col. Sir George S. Clarke, is dedicated by permission “To the Queen-Empress.” The author has striven
“to show what the Empire is, and how it has been built up; to point out alike its immense potential strength and its points of weakness; to lay down definite principles of defence, based on the experience of great wars, and to plead for an organisation in harmony with such principles.”
The book is divided into five chapters, entitled respectively: “The Empire,” “Trade,” “The Navy,” “The Army,” and “Imperial Organisation.” The naval chapter is illustrated, and an interesting map is given showing our principal trade routes and fortified ports. . . . Rhodesia, Past and Present, by S. J. Du Toit, is an easy-going narrative of travel in Rhodesia penned, or pencilled, in the wagon by the glare of a camp fire, or wherever possible. “Let the reader take it for what it is worth,” says Mr. Du Toit in his breezy way. The book is furnished with photographic illustrations. . . . Pioneer Women in Victoria's Reign, by Edwin A. Pratt, is an attempt to give some account of the pioneers of women's work; and we have biographical sketches of notable women under such heads as “Emigration,” “The Higher Education of Women,” “Pioneer Women Doctors,” “Nursing,” “Organised Philanthropy,” &c. . . . Ibsen on His Merits, by Sir Edward Russell, editor of the Liverpool Post, and Mr. Percy Cross Standing, is a timely appreciation of Ibsen, and, as the authors plead, is but the second that has been published in book-form in England. The characteristics of Ibsen's drama and of individual plays are discussed, and the final chapter deals with “John Gabriel Borkman.”
THREE novels of the week are sure to be good. Uncle Bernac, by A. Conan Doyle, is described as “A Memory of the Empire,” and the author explains that it has been rewritten and lengthened by one-third since its appearance in serial form. Napoleon, Josephine, and Talleyrand are introduced as characters, the empire being the First Empire. The Ways of Life, by Mrs. Oliphant, consists of two stories, preceded by a Preface. From the latter we learn that the stories are more or less studies of that phase of human experience, which may be called the ebb “in contradistinction to that tide in the affairs of men which we all know is, to those who can identify and seize it, the great turning-point of life, and leads on to fortune.” It is the moment when men realise that “such successes as they may have achieved are over, and that henceforth they must accustom themselves to the thought of going out with the tide.” The stories are entitled respectively, “Mr. Sandford” and “The Wonderful History of Mr. Robert Dalyell.” . . . Mr. Stephen Crane's story, The Third Violet, is not of the battle field: it will be found that Mr. Crane has brought his gifts of insight and expression to the making of a love-story.

MR. GEORGE M'CALL THEAL'S NEW EDITIONS. South Africa, one of the most successful volumes of the “Story of the Nation” Series, has just been re-issued in a fourth edition. Mr. Theal has re-written the last five chapters of his book, bringing the narrative down to February of this year. . . . It is not likely that the second edition of Mrs. Brightwen's Inmates of My House and Garden will be the last. No alteration is made from the first edition, and, indeed, none was needed. . . . Mr. Stopford A. Brooke has found a new application for Wordsworth's Poems Dedicated to National Independence and Liberty. He has published these in separate form as “a remonstrance and encouragement to the English people—a remonstrance to those whose policy it is to check the national independence and liberty of the Cretans, and an encouragement to those who, following the long traditions of the English people, have looked on that policy with dismay, and have endured it, for a time with patient, but indignant difficulty.”
The cheaper issue of Messrs. Blackwood and Sons' “Ancient Classics for English Readers” is continued, Virgil and Horace being now published.
NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.
[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]
BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.
OUTLINES OF THE HISTORY OF THE THEOLOGICAL LITERATURE OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. By John Dowden, D.D. S.P.C.K.
BIOGRAPHY.
“FAMOUS SCOTS” SERIES: THE “BLACKWOOD” GROUP. By Sir George Douglas. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 1s. 6d.
THE ROMANCE OF ISABEL, LADY BURTON. Told in part by herself and in part by W. H. Wilkins. 2 vols. Hutchinson & Co.
PIONEER WOMEN IN VICTORIA'S REIGN. By Edwin A. Pratt. George Newnes, Ltd. 5s.
HISTORY.
HISTORIC STUDIES IN VAUD, BERNE, AND SAVOY. By General Meredith Read. Chatto & Windus. 28s.
CUSTOMS OF AUGUSTINIAN CANONS. By J. Willis Clark. Macmillan & Bowes (Cambridge).
A SHORT POPULAR HISTORY OF CRETE. By J. H. Freese, M.A. Jarrold & Sons. 1s. 6d.
THE “STORY OF THE NATIONS” SERIES: SOUTH AFRICA. By George M'Call Theal, LL.D. Fourth edition. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.
POETRY.
THE OPENING OF THE GATES: A MOSAIC OF SONG. By James MacBeth. Kegan Paul. 5s.

DRAMA, BELLES LETTRES.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH POETRY. By W. J. Courthope. Vol. II. Macmillan & Co. 10s.
THE WHITEHALL SHAKESPEARES: Vol. VIII. Archibald Constable & Co. 6s.
THE FRENCH REVOLUTION AND ENGLISH LITERATURE. By Edward Dowden. Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.

FICTION.

THE TRACK OF MIDNIGHT. By G. Firth Scott. Sampson Low.
HAROLD EFFERNBERG. By Michael Costello. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.
MISS TUDOR. By John Le Breton. John Macqueen.
THE MISTRESS OF THE RANCH. By Frederick Thicksun Clark. Sampson Low.
DEAR FAUSTINA. By Rhoda Broughton. Richard Bentley & Son.
THE LADY GRANGE. By Alexander Innes Shand. Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.
THE WAYS OF LIFE: TWO STORIES. By Mrs. Oliphant. Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.
A LADY OF WALES. By Rev. Vincent J. Leatherdale, M.A. Horace Cox.
A GREAT LIE. By Wilfrid Hugh Chesson. T. Fisher Unwin.
FORDHAM'S FEUD. By Bertram Mitford. Ward, Lock & Co.
A PRINCESS OF ISLAM. By J. W. Sherer, C.S.I. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 6s.
A FLAME OF FIRE. By Mrs. Haweis. Hurst & Blackett.
SYBIL FOSTER'S LOVE STORY; OR, THE COUNTRY COUSIN. By Lady Watkin Williams. Chapman & Hall. 6s.
CAPTAIN KID'S MILLIONS. By Alan Oscar. Chapman & Hall.
A DAUGHTER OF THE ELEPHS. By Isabella Fyrie Mayo. W. & R. Chambers. 8s. 6d.
NULMA. By Mrs. Campbell Praed. Chatto & Windus.
THE SECRET OF SAINT FLORENCE. By John Berwick. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

SCIENCE, NATURAL HISTORY, ETC.

THE VERTEBRATE SKELETON. By Sidney H. Reynolds, M.A. Cambridge University Press. 12s. 6d.
THE YOUNG BEETLE-COLLECTOR'S HANDBOOK. By Dr. E. Hofmann. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 4s. 6s.
PREHISTORIC PROBLEMS. By Robert Munro, M.A. William Blackwood & Sons.
THE THEORY OF ELECTRICITY AND MAGNETISM, BEING LECTURES ON MATHEMATICAL PHYSICS. By Arthur Gordon Webster. Macmillan & Co. 14s.

TRAVEL AND GEOGRAPHY.

A HISTORY OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY. By H. F. Toner, M.A. Cambridge University Press. 10s. 6d.
RHODESIA PAST AND PRESENT. By S. J. Du Toit. William Heinemann.

PSYCHOLOGY.

PSYCHOLOGY OF THE MORAL SELF. By B. Bosanquet. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

DEMOSTHENES: THE FIRST PHILIPPIC AND THE OLYMPIAC. With Critical Notes by John Edwin Sandys. Macmillan & Co. 5s.
THE TROADES OF EURIPIDES. With Revised Text and Notes by Robert Yelverton Tyrrell, Litt.D. 3s. 6d.
ANCIENT CLASSICS FOR ENGLISH READERS. Cheap Re-issue.
HORACE. By Sir Theodore Martin. VIRGIL. By Rev. Lucas Collins, M.A.
THE ELEMENTS OF PHYSICS: A COLLEGE TEXT-BOOK. Vol. III.: LIGHT AND SOUND. By Edward L. Nichols and William S. Franklin. Macmillan & Co. 6s.
LIVY: BOOK VI. Edited by W. F. Mason, M.A. W. B. Clive.
AN ELEMENTARY OLD ENGLISH GRAMMAR (Early West Saxon). By A. J. Wyatt. Cambridge University Press. 4s. 6d.
THE KINDERGARTEN SYSTEM: ITS ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT. By Fanny Franks. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ISSUE OF HIS MERITS. By Sir Edward R. Russel and Percy Cross Standing. Chapman & Hall. 5s.
TALES FROM CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL. By Mrs. Frewen Lord. Sampson Low. 1s.
RICHARD WAGNER'S PROSE WORKS. Translated by William Ashton Ellis. Vol. V.: ACTORS AND SINGERS. Kegan Paul. 12s. 6d.
THE EVOLUTION OF THE ARTAN. By Rudolph von Ihering. Translated by A. Drucker, M.P. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.
IMPERIAL DEFENCE. By Lieut.-Col. Sir George S. Clarke, K.C.M.G. The Imperial Press, Ltd.
INMATES OF MY HOUSE AND GARDEN. By Mrs. Brightwen. Second edition. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.
MILK AND ITS PRODUCTS. By Henry H. Wing. The Macmillan Co.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE publication of Mr. Francis Thompson's new volume of poems, entitled simply New Poems, is likely to be one of the most considerable literary events of the year. The book is varied in character, consisting of five divisions, called respectively: "Sight and Insight," "A Narrow Vessel" ("being a little dramatic sequence on the aspect of primitive girl-nature towards a love beyond its capacities"), "Miscellaneous Odes," "Miscellaneous Poems," and "Ultima." The first of the miscellaneous Odes is an "Ode to the Setting Sun," which is at once the second longest and the earliest poem in the collection. We believe we are right in stating that this Ode was Mr. Thompson's first poem, anterior to anything in Poems or Sister Songs. Mr. Thompson, who until lately was resident in Wales, has now established himself in London.

THE speeches at the Booksellers' dinner became more entertaining as the evening drew towards an end, when Mr. Anthony Hope spoke, and Mr. L. F. Austin replied for the guests wittily and with wisdom. His serio-comic appeal to Archdeacon Sinclair, asking that he would lend him Agag for use in an allusion was excellent. Mr. Lecky's sing-song manner of utterance did not agree very well with the acoustic properties of the hall; but he made a bland and genial chairman, his only lapse into solemnity being when one of the speakers recalled his History of Rationalism and confessed to the great influence of that work upon his life. The most effective speech of the evening was that delivered by the operator of the flash-light photograph. He stood upon a pair of tall steps, in that great silence, the cynosure of every eye. "Thank you. It is finished," he said.

LIKE Mr. Austin, Mr. Anthony Hope can always be counted upon for an amusing speech. He had often read, he remarked, that such and such a book was "readable, but not literature." What that meant he did not know, but it had stirred his ambition to write some day a volume that should not be readable, but should be literature. Possibly Mr. Anthony Hope had this ambition in his mind when he composed the paper on "Romance," which he delivered last Friday at the Royal Institution. At the conclusion a lady was heard to remark to a friend who awaited her in the vestibule: "Oh, I've been so interested. It was real literature. Just the sort of thing you read in the Pall Mall Magazine."

AN attempt to interest London seriously in Chicago-made fiction is to be made by Messrs. John and Horace Cowley, an Edinburgh firm of publishers who have taken an office in Arundel-street. Among their first books will be novels by Mr. Stanley Waterloo, Mr. Opie Read, and Mr. Percival Pollard, whom they describe as members of the Chicago School of Novelists. In June they will also issue the first number of a periodical entitled The Philistine, modelled upon the Chicago Chap Book, which is to chronicle literary affairs in this country in the American manner. Signed articles will be a feature of The Philistine.

MEANWHILE, opportunely to Messrs. Cowley's announcement, we read in the Chap Book, a Chicago publication, the following authoritative remarks upon Chicago as a city of culture: "Chicago supports Chicago authors. It buys the books largely. It sets thousands of women, banded together in clubs, to studying their work. It believes in Chicago as a literary centre. And meanwhile almost every writer who stays here does so by force of circumstance, rather than from inclination. Every year there are more writers and more who cannot go away, and in time the atmosphere may excite artists to their best endeavour." It may be, if Messrs. Cowley are successful in inculcating a taste for Chicago-made literature in British readers, that the Chicago writers will regard London as a home.

THE list of the fifty best English books published during the past year, which, with the assistance of all the librarians of New York State, has just been published by the Central Library, is headed by Mr. Barrie's Sentimental Tommy. The English sale of this book reaches 43,000 copies.

THE tablet erected in Llanstiffnod Church in memory and honour of Henry Vaughan, on the 202nd anniversary of his death, bears the following inscription from the pen of the Dean of Llandaff:—

"In late but reverent remembrance of a sweet Psalmist of Israel,

HENRY VAUGHAN, M.D.

(known as the "Silurist"),

Of Newton-by-Uk, in this Parish,

Who died April 23, 1695,

Aged 73 years,

And was buried in this Churchyard.

'He that hath left life's vain joys and vain care Hath got an house where many mansions are.'
1896. SILEX SCINTILLAS."

APROPOS of the recent inquiry made by a magazine into the amount of words produced per diem by popular authors, the Critic is reminded of an American author whose method is to work until he comes to the end of his ink. He uses a fountain pen which holds ink enough for 10,000 words. His supply of invention is coterminous with the supply of fluid. Makers of fountain pens might advertise the number of words which their pens are guaranteed to contain.

ARTHUR PENDENYS, the engaging commentator on current literature and events in Messrs. Hatchard's Books of To-Day and Books of To-Morrow has compiled a short but damning list of the errors into which certain journalists and authors have, with the assistance of the printer, recently fallen.

"In one evening's reading," he writes, "I noticed among others that the Daily News referred to Du Maurier's last story as 'Martial.' In Patience Sparhawk, that new story by Gertrude Atherton, one of the characters is 'the manor born,' a rather curious travesty of Shakespeare. The Spectator reviewed Miss Warden's story as The Sun by the Sea, whereas a moment's reflection would have aroused suspicion that something was wrong. The book is called The Inn by the Sea. Sir Algernon West in the Nineteenth Century for April speaks of Lucas 'Mallett,' and the current Edinburgh Review spells Mr. Walter Morison's name with two r's in the name. In Ouida's new novel, The Massarenes, Lady Kenilworth is observed in a strange atmosphere—she is at Hamburg, walking with the King of Greece."

The weapon with which people are attacked for misprints and misquotations is so often a boomerang. In Mr. Pendenys' entertaining periodical we find one of the ballads of the American Ambassador mentioned as "Banty Jim." It should be Banty Tim."

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS has in preparation a little book by Mr. Jacobi, the manager of the Chiswick Press, who is probably the first living authority on printing. It is called Gesta Typographica, and is a collection of printers' sayings and doings, facetious and otherwise. In his preface Mr. Jacobi remarks: "The printer in his own sphere is usually a humorous person, and a collection of his wit and wisdom has been thought not uninteresting." Gesta Typographica is certain to be entertaining. There is an American book on the same subject, called Secrets of the Sanctum, which is a delight.

THE new intermittent magazine, The Comet, which is to appear fitfully now and again when it deems itself needed, is not likely to kindle the Thames in the course of its fiery orbit. It calls itself a magazine of Free Opinion, and seems to be mainly the work of young men in a bad temper. Her Majesty the Queen, Fregoli, the President of the Royal Academy, women generally, and, indeed, most persons and things, are out of favour with the Opinionated Free. The only novel feature of The Comet is the invitation offered by the editor to all reviewers whose talents have been neglected, asking them to contribute reviews to his pages at the rate usually paid for high class fiction. By this means he hopes to found a "new school of criticism." We imagine that he will, but the new is not necessarily the true.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Rather a curious little coincidence occurred in the British Museum Reading-room the other day. I wished to consult an old philosophical book, which there is good reason to believe Shakespeare studied, and my interest in the book depended on this fact. When the folio was brought to me, and I opened it, I was startled to read on the fly-leaf: 'William Shakespeare, His Booke, 1597.' Did I hold Shakespeare's own copy in my hands? Dismissing this as impossible, yet being puzzled by the apparently old and correct autograph, I consulted the librarian, in whom, however, I failed to awaken any emotion of surprise. Indeed, he knew all about the inscription and the book before I could tell him, and he very courteously showed me that the inscription was one of the minor forgeries of Ireland. Before Ireland became the past-master of forgery which Vortigern declared him to be, he used to present his credulous father, who was a bookseller, with early printed books in which he had forged Shakespeare's signature. It was on one of these books that I had alighted. The incident gave me a new idea of the wickedness of literary forgery."

A NEW paper for Londoners has been projected under the title The London Argus. The journal—an illustrated weekly—will be devoted to the record and criticism of the local proceedings of the metropolis: the deeds of the Vestries, Boards of Guardians, and all municipal bodies. A signed article by a public man on a subject of current interest will be a feature of The London Argus, which is to be published by Messrs. Virtue.

HAVING essayed the stage impersonation of Dr. Johnson, Mr. Arthur Bouchier now proposes to appear as Lord Byron. This is versatility indeed.

DEAN FARRAR asks us to announce for the information of the numerous strangers now in London, and of all interested in such matters, that on May 31 Sir Henry Irving will read Tennyson's Becket in the restored Chapter House of Canterbury Cathedral, for the benefit of the Thirteenth Centenary Fund. St. Thomas Becket entered the Chapter House on the evening of December 29, 1170, only a few minutes before his murder. The restored Chapter House will be re-opened by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales on Saturday, May 29, and will be first publicly used for the reading which Sir Henry Irving is to give.

THE Duke of Buccleuch will perform the duty of unveiling the Scott Memorial in Westminster Abbey at a quarter to two on Friday, May 21. Previous to that ceremony speeches will be delivered in the Chapter House by Mr. A. J. Balfour and the United States Ambassador. Admission to the Chapter House will be by tickets only, to be obtained by subscribers from Mr. Richard Lees, Town Clerk, Galashiels.

THE private view of the Society of Miniature Painters' second exhibition takes place to-day (Saturday), at Messrs. Graves & Co.'s Gallery, and the exhibition will be open to the public from the 17th inst. to the end of June. All exhibits will consist of works by contemporary artists.

AN exhibition of engravings by Mr. Frank Short of those drawings made for the Liber Studiorum which Turner did not himself reproduce with the needle is now open at Mr. Dunthorne's, in Vigo-street.

THE Second International Library Conference, of which Sir John Lubbock is the president, will take place in London on July 13, 14, 15, and 16, in the Corporation's Council Chamber.

MR. STEPHEN CRANE's adventures in the escaping from the Commodore last winter, when that vessel was wrecked off the coast of Florida, will be found described in a paper entitled "The Open Boat," which he contributes to the June Scribner's.

MRS. F. A. STEEL has signed a contract to write another long Indian story, to appear in the Pall Mall Magazine.

MR. KIPLING has authorised a German translation of The Jungle Book, made by Mr. Abel-Musgrave, who is Senior Modern Languages Master at Mr. Kipling's old school at Westward Ho.

MR. F. E. ROBINSON, M.A., who has started as a publisher at 20, Great Russell-street, is preparing for publication, under the title of The Counsels of William de Britaine, an edition of an aphoristic book of the seventeenth century, with preface and notes by Mr. Herbert Sturmer.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. will shortly publish a work entitled The Eastern Question, by Karl Marx. It is a reprint of letters written for the New York Tribune, Ernest Jones's People's Paper, and the Free Press, dealing with the events leading up to the Crimean War and with the war itself. These letters, written over forty years ago, throw light not only upon the events of the fifties, but upon what is taking place in Europe at the present moment.

A COLLECTION of early writings of Thomas Carlyle, under the title of Montaigne and Other Essays, chiefly Biographical, will be published shortly by Messrs. J. Cowans & Son. They were contributed to Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopædia between 1820 and 1823, and have never been issued in book form. The volume extends to about 300 pages, and will contain an Introduction by Mr. S. R. Crockett.

MR. WILLIAM CANTON is gathering together in one volume the papers upon his child "W. V." which have already appeared in The Invisible Playmate and W. V., His Book. He intends to take out of the latter the miscellaneous verses and add a new prose chapter.

On Thursday next, May 20, Mr. Churton Collins, M.A., will begin a course of four lectures at the Royal Institution on "The French Revolution and English Literature—Burke, William Godwin, Mary Wollstonecraft, Wordsworth and Coleridge." On Saturday, May 22, Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland will deliver the first of a course of four lectures on "Music in England during the Reign of Queen Victoria" (with musical illustrations), and on Tuesday, May 25, Dr. Ernest H. Starling will begin a course of three lectures on "The Heart and its Work." The Friday evening discourse on May 21 will be delivered by Lord Kelvin, his subject being "Contact Electricity of Metals."

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXVII.—THOMAS CARLYLE.

THE biographers of Carlyle have, without exception, missed the historical clue. His own method in setting forth the life of a man was to spare no trouble to obtain the atmosphere and surroundings. Carlyle fits in to his environment as naturally as a white sail to the sea. He was of his own time as essentially as Tennyson himself; he was the nursling of peculiar conditions, the expression of a national mood, the off-spring of a phase of thought, the spokesman of a toiling age. Understand that, and no more will it be a mystery either that he wielded an enormous influence in his day, or that this influence, as far as it is direct, is fast waning. In a word, his story runs parallel to that of Byron, with a difference. England gathered to Byron's feet because, he expressed, as no other did, the rebellion of the moment; but the mood has passed; the thoughts it engendered are forgotten. He, too, was of his own time only, and in his own time he had his reward.

When Carlyle came to maturity England was emerging from revolt and preparing for work. He was born in 1795, before the battles of the Nile, Copenhagen, and Trafalgar, before Vittoria, Salamanca, or Waterloo; and when, warfare ended, the nation settled down to that career of industrial triumph that has distinguished the Victorian era, he was coming to his strength. But, to adopt one of his similes, figure his mind as an "echoing cavern," and try to realise the sounds reverberating therein as he studied at Edinburgh University, schoolmastered at Kirkcaldy, tutored with the Bullers. England, free at last from foreign war, turned to the arts of peace with an energy unsurpassed in history. Byron's time had been pre-eminently one of revolt, Carlyle's is one of labour. Now began the Lancashire cotton mills to whizz as they had not whizzed before, now did engines snort on land and sea. While, first at Craigenputtock and afterwards at Cheyne-row, he was toiling at Sartor and the French Revolution, engineers were mapping out the railways, shipbuilders were laying down the first ocean-going steamers, Cook was working at the telegraph, Hill planning postal reform. Theirs it was to labour, his to preach the nobility of toil. And thus, as it were, you get one term of the equation.

But, besides being a day of toil, it was also the day of strife—the contest not being one of swords and bludgeons, but a battle of classes, of industrialism against agriculture, of the trader against the noble, of commerce against the last remnant of feudality. When the French Revolution appeared in 1837, there was good reason for dreading a repetition here of the scenes it ardently describes. And in the succeeding volumes, in Past and Present and Chartism and the Latter-Day Pamphlets, the unrest and dissatisfaction seethe and bubble. The clamour of the time resounds in the "echoing cavern" of the author's mind. You see there more clearly than anywhere else how fully Carlyle lived the life of his own generation, and, indeed, he could never get away from it. If he were attracted by the figures of an older time, it was always and only to gain a lesson from them, to bring their valour or their vices home to his contemporaries. He was a born moralist, not an artist, and his limitation is touched when one discerns that his mind, overcharged with book-lore, reads into contemporaneous events meanings they did not possess. After all, he gave no very luminous interpretation of the phenomena that came before his eyes. Time has not justified his prophecy.

His philosophy also belongs exclusively to his era. He had arrived at middle life before Darwin came home from his voyage with the Beagle—it was a quarter of a century after that ere he published his great work—and so Carlyle did not come under the influence of that doctrine which has revolutionised our way of looking at things. But, nevertheless, the ideas that Darwin, Spencer, and others reduced to definite expression were then floating in the air, impalpable, yet influencing susceptible minds. Their presence is apparent enough in the vague beliefs and hopes of "doubting Thomas." Here, too, his writings reflect the mind of his age, and give you one more term in the equation.

In this brief notice of an interesting personality it would be impossible to elaborate and work out this argument. All I pretend to offer is a clue, and in doing so it has been necessary to omit the usual gossip into which latter-day biography tends to degenerate. Carlyle's dyspepsia, his sharp temper, the Jane Welsh gossip, the indiscretions of Mr. Froude, the persons whose fine feelings were hurt by references to them in the Diary and the Reminiscences—why, we may leave matters like these to those who are interested in chatter about Harriet or in the morality of Mary Campbell. One does not like, however, to omit all mention of that typical Scottish household at Mainhill—the father and mother and sisters and brothers who played so important a part in his development.

Only a sentence has to be added. From what has been said it might be inferred that we number Carlyle and Byron among authors whose vogue is past. In a sense this is true. They had their standpoint, and the country ever since has been swimming away from it. No young man born and educated in the atmosphere of the last five and twenty years can possibly read Carlyle with relish. But, on the other hand, all that was good in him has passed into the very blood and fibre of the nation and is therefore in a sense immortal. And there is much to be grateful for. Life, after all, is not wholly fiddling and comic opera; nor is literature mental acrobatics and grinning through a horse collar. Who feels the mystery and austere beauty as well as the animalism and great gross passions in the one, will also recognise that earnestness and strength in writing are qualities to be prized even if it be but a question of entertainment. And we have reason to be as proud of Carlyle as of his giant contemporaries—Tennyson and Darwin and the heroes who ushered in "the steamship and the railway and the thoughts that shake mankind."

P. ANDERSON GRAHAM.

SHAKESPEARE'S NATURAL HISTORY.

ONE is apt to think that nothing is dead as an exploded theory. A recent exploded theory is very dead. But Van Winkles of truth creep back into the world and are welcomed. Theories return to toys, and books which Time had made foolish are reprinted when Time, in his diligence, has made them funny. This is the case with certain gleanings from the works of Elizabethan naturalists which Mr. Elliot Stock has published under the title of Natural History in Shakespeare's Time. We shall presently demur to the use of Shakespeare's name. But indifferent naturalists who do not distinguish at a glance between a hawk and a handsaw, or who like Jacques, might take "this lark for a bunting," will thank Mr. H. W. Seager, the editor, for enabling them to commiserate the naturalists of the sixteenth century for the rest of their lives. They can resign themselves to be envious of the field lore of a Jefferies, or a Buckland, and they can efface themselves in the presence of botanising female cousins or the new schoolboy. But they will feel benevolently at ease among naturalists who proclaim that Crabs take no food, that the Goshawk breathes through his ears, that Honey is "a certain sweat of the sky or some unctuous jelly proceeding from the stars," and that Serpents are engendered by heavy rains and by "men's blood in war." All the woe which cockney pride has taken in the last yard, or the songful woods, must heal on these pages are studied; for here is natural history which puts ignorance on a pedestal.

And yet the reverence of these Elizabethans for nature begets reverence in themselves. Their language is a joy to them; they write with a diligent search for words that help a marvellous narrative. Bartholomew, whose De Proprietatibus Rerum was probably read by Shakespeare in John Trevisa's translation, strives with Topsell to depict the horrific character of the hyæna. The hyæna, says the former,

"is a cruel beast like to the wolf in devouring and gluttony. It is his kind to change sexes, for he is now male and now female, and is therefore an unclean beast. And cometh to houses by night, and feigneth man's voice as he may, for men should trow that it is a man, and herds tell that among stables, he feigneth speech of mankind, and calleth some man by his own name, and rendeth him when he hath him without. And he feigneth oft the name of some man for to make hounds run out, that he may take and eat them."

To which Topsell adds:

"The skilful lapidarists affirm that the beast hath a stone in his eyes (or rather in his head) called hyæna or Hyænius; but the ancients say that the apple or pupil of his eye is turned into such a stone, and that if a man lay it under his tongue, he shall be able to fortell and prophesy of things to come. . . . There is also great hatred between a pardel and this beast, for if, after death, their skins be mingled together the hair falleth off from the pardel's skin, but not from the hyæna's."

For relief we turn to a gentler and a smaller animal. Bartholomew tells us that "Ghires (i.e., dormice) be little beasts, as it

THOMAS CARLYLE

From the Picture by Sir J. E. Millais, P.R.A., in the National Portrait Gallery great mice, and have that name for sleep as them fat. They love their fellows that know, and strive and fight against other. they love their father and mother with mildness and pity, and feed and serve in their age."

Topsell says the dormouse is "a biting an angry beast."

f the elephant we read :

These beasts void and flee the mouse. n they be sick they gather good herbs, and hey use the herbs they heave up the head, look up toward heaven, and pray for help tod in a certain religion."

According to the Hortus Sanitatis the hant has no joints in his legs. But Topwiser, says: "It is false." Thirty rs after Shakespeare's death it was worth Thomas Browne's while to argue against belief in this jointlessness of the elephant. Shakespeare hit the mark in Troilus and Cressida: "The elephant hath joints, but ue for courtesy—his legs are legs for neces- not for flexure."

The flea, we read, again in Bartholomew, "a little worm"

I wonder lightness; and scapeth and voideth il with leaping, and not with running, and keth slow and faileth in cold time, and in amer time it waxeth quiver and swift."

must be confessed that later naturalists ve added little of moment to this account the insect.

The goat is still a quaint animal, but nmonplace, it would seem, compared with : mediæval forbears.

"The Goat breathes at the ears, and not at e nose and is sold without fever. . . . And a man draw one out of the flock by the beard, e others be astonished and behold. And also e same happeth when one of them biteth a rtain herb. And if the Goat conceive afore e northern wind, she yeareth males, and if e conceive afore the southern wind she aneth females. And if a man take a Goat, d rear him suddenly, then the other rear em also, and behold him sadly. . . . And oats die if they lick honey. If they lick rpents after these have cast their skin, they ill not grow old, though they become white, . . . Their hoofs burnt and pounded with quid pitch cure baldness."

Bartholomew's account of the bear may e an instance of Shakespeare's indebtedness to him. Decius says, in Julius Caesar, hat

"Unicorns may be betray'd with trees
And bears with glasses."

Bartholomew writes :

"And the Bear . . . will be avenged on all hose that him toucheth. If another touch im, anon he leaveth the first, and reseth on he second, and reseth on the third; and when e is taken, he is made blind with a bright asin, and is bound with chains and compelled to play."

But it is time to consider what Shakepeare's indebtedness to these library naturalists really amounted to. Mr. Seager writes of their natural history as being "accepted by Shakespeare and his contemporaries." Indeed, the plan of his compilation is closely Shakesperean. He takes the birds, beasts, fishes, and plants named by Shakespeare, and tacks upon each passages from Bartholomew, Topsell, Holland's Pliny, and Lupton, the author of A Thousand Notable Things. The inference is that Mr. Seager wishes to present their books to us as the sources of Shakespeare's knowledge of natural history. Nor is this impression much weakened by Mr. Seager's brief admission that "Shakespeare's knowledge of natural history (in so far as his own observation went) was far greater than that of his contemporaries as here illustrated." Verily it was; but, that being so, why should Mr. Seager print the words "Shakespeare's Natural History" above every page of his extracts. Shakespeare's "own observation" was the basis not of an insignificant portion of his "natural history," as Mr. Seager seems to imply, but of nine-tenths of it. A dozen, a score, a hundred of his lines leap to the memory to protest against the assumption that Shakespeare derived his knowledge of the lower creation from these books. Assuredly it was not from Friar Bartholomew that he learned to write of Cressida:

"She fetches her breath so short as a new ta'en sparrow."

Or of the mole :

"Well said, old mole, canst work i' the earth so fast."

Or of the wounded duck :

"Alas, poor fowl, now will he creep into sedges!"

Or of the daffodils :

"That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty."

Or of the rabbits :

"They will out of their burrows, like conies after rain."

Or of the fowler's gun :

"When they him spy,
As wild geese that the creeping fowler eye,
Or russet-pated choughs, many in sort,
Rising and cawing at the gun's report,
Sever themselves, and madly sweep the sky;
So, at his sight, away his fellows fly."

Or of the fly that Marcus kills on his dish :

"But how, if that fly had a father and mother?
How would he hang his slender gilded wings,
And buzz lamenting doings in the air?
Poor harmless fly!
That with his pretty buzzing melody,
Came here to make us merry; and thou hast killed him."

The truth is, that Shakespeare's natural history is modern in its vividness, its good sense, its sympathy. It is more profitable to compare his bird-lore with Gilbert White's, than with anything in Bartholomew; more just to set his animals against Buffon's than the grotesque "four-footed beasts" of Topsell; more useful to verify his botany by Sowerby than by Gerarde or John Parkinson. Modern naturalists and nature-lovers have not been slow to claim Shakespeare as their brother. Mr. James Edmund Harting has answered for the truth of much of his ornithology; and we remember a capital article in the Gentleman's Magazine some six years ago in which justice was done to Shakespeare's nice observation of all created things. It would be astonishing if in the years when Bacon was elaborating his Novum Organum Shakespeare was taking his Natural History from men whose whole system of inquiry was tottering to the abyss.

FIONA MACLEOD.

THE reissue of the shorter stories of Fiona Macleod has once more drawn the attention of the reading public to an interesting personality. In these days it is not easy to conceal the identity of a writer; but the author of The Sin Eater has succeeded to a remarkable degree in shrouding herself in the dim mystery of the wild Celtic nature. She prohibits any reproduction of her photograph; she declines any interview the object of which is to obtain personal details; and those who know her personally feel bound to observe her wishes with respect to the non-obtrusion of the details of her private life. This strange reticence has naturally led to a number of somewhat wild guesses at her identity. It has been stated at various times that Fiona MacLeod is Mr. or Mrs. William Sharp, Mr. W. B. Yeats, and Miss Maud Hopper in conjunction, and one of the latest canards is to the effect that there is no such person as Fiona Macleod at all, but simply a syndicate of young Celtic authors who write under that name. In course of time all these conjectures will be found to be without any foundation, for, although Fiona MacLeod dreads publicity of all kinds, she is by no means a hermit, and is already well known personally to several men and women of letters. It does not seem to have occurred to the paragraphists that Fiona Macleod might be a young married woman writing under her maiden name.

Miss Macleod is by birth and conviction a Celt of the Celts. She is a member of an old Highland family, and, contrary to general belief, the name is no pseudonym, but a genuine one, Fiona being the diminutive of Fionaghal, the Gaelic of Flora.

Miss Macleod spent most of her childhood in the Outer and Inner Hebrides and the Western Highlands, particularly in the islands of Iona and Arran. She is passionately fond of Iona, which represents to her the birthplace of her imaginative life. Eight years ago, on account of delicate health, she spent some time in Italy, on the Riviera, and in Southern France. She knows Brittany well, and resided for a considerable period in Paris. Sometimes a faint echo from the most modern of cities seems to find its way into one of her Barbaric Tales, and the effect of this strange blending of the old with the new is fantastic in the extreme. Before she went abroad for the first time Miss Macleod lost her father—her mother died when she was still a child—but fortunately she was not left dependent on her pen, which, indeed, at that time she had not begun to use. But Miss Macleod is essentially a child of nature and the open air, having no sympathy with the hurried life of the great cities, which she seldom visits. Her chief pleasure consists in cruising among the isles in a small yacht or even half-decked wherry, in going out with the herring-fishers, and in visiting the remote "bothies" of the shepherds high up on the bleak and lonely mountains.

Miss Macleod's first literary experiment was a short story which she sent, in the autumn of 1893, to the National Observer (at that time The Scots' Observer). This story,

"The Last Fantasy of James Achanna," was declined by Mr. Henley, who, however, wrote to the author a word of genuine encouragement. This story has never been republished. Miss Fiona Macleod's first book, Pharais, which, by the way, is a slightly Anglicised spelling of the genitive of the Gaelic word for Paradise, was begun in the summer of 1893 and finished before the close of that year. Pharais is one of the most personal of all Miss Macleod's writings. It is generally understood that the island of Irmisron which is depicted in this romance is the remote island where the author spent many summers of her early childhood, and there are certain incidental autobiographical touches in the portraiture and environment of the heroine, Lora. Pharais was published through Mr. Frank Murray, of Derby, simultaneously with the volume of dramatic studies entitled Vistas by the author's relative, Mr. William Sharp, who was her intermediary in the publication of this volume, and also of The Mountain Lovers, which was issued by Mr. John Lane in the spring of 1895. It was doubtless through this connexion that the rumour first got abroad that Fiona Macleod was either Mr. or Mrs. Sharp. For some time after the publication of her first two romances Miss Macleod worked at a volume which has since been published under the title of Green Fire, and which was projected about the same time as Pharais. She, however, felt convinced that her subjects were most suited to the short story, and in the intervals of work at the longer romances she had written a number of short tales which were published under the titles: The Sin Eater and Other Tales; and The Washer and Other Legendary Moralities. Miss Macleod's reputation rests largely on these two collections, which have now been reissued in three distinct groups with several additions. The Sin Eater was published in the autumn of 1895 by a new firm, Messrs. Patrick Geddes & Colleagues, who have shown themselves eager in every way to identify themselves with the work of Miss Macleod, and have issued her books in a particularly appropriate and artistic format. Last autumn Miss Macleod published her earlier romance, Green Fires, through Messrs. Constable & Co. The many critics who have warned the author of this book against an over-elaborateness and artificiality will be glad to hear that it is the work she likes least. Miss Macleod is now concentrating all her energies on an historical romance, and she has consequently put aside a number of short stories and one or two longer books. It is not likely, therefore, that much from her pen will see the light before this romance is completed. The only book by her that may positively appear this year is a story for children, which Messrs. Constable & Co. wish to issue at Christmas. The publication of a short romance, The Lily Leven, which has been again and again announced, is indefinitely postponed, though the story is practically finished. In this book it will be found that Miss Macleod has worked from a new standpoint, and has dwelt on the humour, gaiety, and grotesque contrasts of Celtic life.

In spite of the success that has attended the publication of her poems, "From the Hill of Dreams," which is by far the most personal and intimate book Miss Macleod has given to the world, she has determined to publish no more verses.

THE BOOK MARKET.

THE NEW EDITION OF "MODERN PAINTERS."

A TALK WITH MR. GEORGE ALLEN.

WHAT took me to the Charing Cross-road yesterday was this. I wanted to get from Mr. Allen a few particulars about the cheaper edition of Modern Painters, which he has just announced as in preparation. Modern Painters is one of the books of the reign. Its own reign has been long.

"And are you going to produce it at a third of its present price?" I said to Mr. George Allen.

"Yes; at less than that. The present price of the work, including the Index volume—six volumes in all—is seven pounds. The new edition will cost the public two guineas."

"And it will be complete?"

"Quite complete, and with all the illustrations. These, of course, will be smaller than those in the present editions, the new edition being in crown octavo. We are having the new plates made by various processes from proof impressions of the old ones. Some will be in photogravure, others in half tone; and, in some cases, I am having lithographs redrawn on the stone. My object is to make the illustrations to this new edition absolutely worthy of the book. I may tell you that Mr. Ruskin has already seen many of the new plates, and has expressed his satisfaction with them."

"Then, Mr. Allen, will the six volumes be for sale separately? Hitherto, I believe, single volumes have not been purchasable."

"No, they have not hitherto. But the new edition will be issued in single volumes after the first two. The first two will be issued together, at eleven shillings. These volumes contain no plate. The third, fourth, and fifth volumes, each containing plates, will be sold separately at eight, nine, and nine shillings respectively. The sixth volume, in which the splendid Index will be printed in full, will be five shillings."

"And when do you expect to begin issuing the work?"

"In July; and if all be well the last volume will be out before Christmas."

"May I take it that this step is part of a policy, and that you will continue to issue cheaper editions of Mr. Ruskin's more expensive works?"

"Oh, yes. Our next undertaking will probably be a cheap edition of The Stones of Venice. This work is already issued in two five-shilling volumes, but these are abridged, and lack the illustrations. I shall take the complete work, now published in three volumes at four guineas, and issue it in three octavo volumes, with all the plates reduced in size, like those of Modern Painters. The work will then be available to the public at the price of about thirty shillings."

"I have often heard it suggested, Mr. Allen, that what is now wanted is a shilling or half-crown library of Mr. Ruskin's more popular works. Does that—ask—commend itself to you?"

"It does; and such a scheme has been discussed; but there are naturally difficulties in its way. Undoubtedly the prices will come, but not yet."

"Can you give me a little idea of the present extent of Mr. Ruskin's hold on the public?"

"Well, I can give you a few figures from memory. We sell between 4,000 and 5,000 copies of Sesame and Lilies every year. This Last is very little behind it in sales. The Crown of Wild Olive has a steady sale of nearly 3,000 copies a year. The Queen of the Air and The Two Paths are also very popular and have large sales. I may say that the sales of certain of Mr. Ruskin's moral and economical writings are actually increasing."

"Then you are busy at Orpington?"

"Busy, yes; but not at Orpington. You share the popular mistake of supposing that Mr. Ruskin's works are produced there."

"But, Mr. Allen, that is the cherished belief of thousands!"

"It is a myth."

"But I have caught colds in the last looking out of the railway carriage window at Orpington to see some sign of the beautiful factory where Mr. Ruskin's thoughts were minted!"

"Other people have done more; they have got out of the train. Parties of American travellers have repeatedly arrived at Orpington to see what never existed there. . . . Truly, Mr. Ruskin's books were warehoused at Orpington, and issued from Orpington, but the 'beautiful factory,' as you call it, and as others have imagined it, is a superstition. Mr. Ruskin's books, said Mr. Allen, with a convincing smile, 'have always been printed and bound in London.'"

A R T.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

II.

WITH a curious show of ceremony the two landscape-portraits of Mr. C. W. Furse are hoisted to either exact side of a large canvas—itsself barely visible—making punctual pendants to one another up aloft where it is hardly possible to see more than a suggestion of their quality. You may be aware of a kind of rich and generous manner that does not look modern, of a landscape decked in bright and rather profound colours, of vivid accents, of life in men, horses and hounds, of a canvas altogether filled with explicit but easily contained work, and of a triumphant composition; but all this is rather guessed at than seen. To Mr. Arthur Lemon better justice has been done, and his very beautiful picture is on the line, but in, or near, a corner; it is certainly not treated with all the honour owed to work so fine and so original.

the play is useless. The development of an unthinking woman, a doll-wife, into a woman who realises what manner of man her husband is and what is her relation to him: that is an interesting phase of life. But it cannot take place in "three consecutive days" without ideas suggested from without, in reading, or by friends. Now, Nora Helmer starts as the doll-child-wife absolutely: we learn that she has a character, that she is capable of self-sacrifice, and has shown courage when her husband's health was at stake; for all that, in so far as the connubial relation is concerned, she is a child, accepting the husband's dicta without question and gratifying an innocent taste for sweets in secret, for fear of his displeasure. Yet in three days we find her an awakened woman, armed with reasons. "This morning I was a girl, to-night I am a woman"—it is merely a variant of the dear old cliché. You see, Dr. Ibsen wanted a dramatic contrast between the doll and the individual woman, and to that he sacrificed the psychology of Nora Helmer. Again, the wide problem in sociology—wider than the individual psychology—is interesting, and a fresh example is not amiss. But Dr. Ibsen wanted a story—I dare not say to interest the groundlings—to assist the dramatic effect; he introduces accordingly a story about Nora's forging his father's name and being afraid to tell her husband, although she thought it innocent, and had done it to save his life, and the money was paid: a story as bald and improbable as anything in an Adelphi melodrama. It snuffs out completely any light there was on a problem in sociology. All this tends to show that Dr. Ibsen is a dramatist first and a philosopher afterwards. I rejoice in the fact: philosophers are many and dramatists are few. Without the improbable story about the forgery we might not have had the delightful scene where Helmer forgives his wife at the moment she is seeing for the first time his selfishness and shallowness—one of the finest pieces of ironical comedy known to me. "A Doll's House" is a very fine play: it is not a profound study of contemporary life.

The performance by the Independent Theatre at the Globe was unequal. That, certainly, was inevitable with Miss Achurch as Nora, since she is one of the very few intellectual actresses who can act, and has brought her study of this part to a point of subtle perfection. It must be a terribly exacting part. In one unimportant detail, indeed, Dr. Ibsen has been positively wanton in his demands; how can he expect an actress, a Northern actress at least, to be able to play Nora and also to dance a lively tarantella? Of Miss Achurch I can but say that this unimportant detail was the only point where I thought she failed in the least degree. But she was ill supported. I thought Mr. Fulton the best of her companions, but Nils Knogstad is not a difficult part to an actor with any range and with a strong manner, which Mr. Fulton has. (By the way, Norway is really a strange country; I have known several money-lenders in my time, but never a one like this.) Mr. Charrington was a passable, but an ineffective, Dr. Rank. Mr. Courtenay Thorpe's Helmer was extremely intelligent and well-intentioned: it was not good acting. His manner throughout was intensely artificial, whereas it is an essential part of Helmer that he should be an ordinary, respectable man. In the last act, however, he achieved some vigorous effects, which, if not of the highest order, were tolerably good.

I HOPE that Mr. Wilson Barrett will have a success with "Virginius" at the Lyric. It is a good, honest play of its sort, several times better than, for example, "The Daughters of Babylon." What has interested me most in the subject, however, has been not Sheridan Knowles's play but Hazlitt's essay on it. Here you have a stirring, bold, bombastic melodrama, and there you have an acute and intellectual critic charging for it horse and foot. To make out his case, to be sure, he had to go rather far. He quotes you—"Let the forum wait for us!" and remarks that "this is the true language of nature and passion, and all that we can wish for, or require, in dramatic writing." It is a curious essay to read—The London Magazine, July, 1820. Hazlitt said that Virginius was the best of Macready's performances: it is perhaps Mr. Wilson Barrett's also. It is a part after his own heart, full of manly tenderness and manly pathos and courage and righteous indignation. I thought the stabbing scene ineffectively done, but otherwise Mr. Barrett was excellent; he made every point firmly, and if he sometimes seemed to exaggerate that was all in the way of Sheridan Knowles. There were several well done parts, notably the Dentatus of Mr. McLeay and the Caius Claudius of Mr. Percyval. Mr. Irwin's Icilius and Mr. Brydone's Appius were fairly good. Miss Maud Jeffries was a little too sweet and clinging, perhaps, but did what the part required, and was an admirable picture of Virginia. Miss Ivor spoke Servia's speech in the forum with effect. The mounting of the play suggested Rome of the Empire more or less, and Rome of the Decemvirate not at all; but Macready mounted it after a like fashion.

THE Olympic has commenced a Shakespearean series, under Mr. Ben Greet's auspices, with "Hamlet." Mr. Nutcombe Gould played Hamlet in a capable, honest, unambitious manner, and the rest took their cue from him. It was a pleasant performance altogether, undistinguished, but sound, so far as it went, and there should be enough people in London who like Shakespeare for his own sake, and not for trappings and curiosities of acting, to make it a success. Miss Lily Hanbury did not try to do too much with Ophelia, and what she did was well done; she looked, perhaps, a little too strong and stately for the part, but her manner was good. Mr. Ben Greet's Polonius was pleasantly clear.

I DID not see "Chand d'Habits" in Paris, and Mr. Tree has written to the papers to say that all was not well on its first performance at his theatre. I say nothing about the little part that I have heard, and can well believe that certain alterations to suit the public did not improve it. Mr. S. is extremely clever and interesting, and Zanfretta charming to see.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE setting of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's ballad by Dr. J. F. Bridge, performed last week at the Albert Hall, is a fine example of the sister art, and yet the poem itself may not exactly suit the music, and yet the sister art may, in some instances, serve to colour and enliven the words; and this is what the poet seems to have felt. The music keeps within reasonable bounds: it always follows the lead; it lacks neither breadth nor intensity; it has, as it were, a flavour of the poem, with its four "wind" sections, and reiterated "Go forth, for it is time," the close of each one, determines to a great extent the form of the musical structure. The work is easy to grasp, even at first hearing. It is written for soprano, chorus, and orchestra. For the solo part, Dr. Bridge had Mme. Albani, a special view, for she sang at the Albert Hall "Flag of England" is respectfully dedicated to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and together with the Jubilee excitement, say nothing of its intrinsic merit—no doubt render it popular.

MR. DAVID BISPHAM, who has just returned from America, gave a Brahms Recital at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon. In memory of the composer he sang the four Serious Songs (Op. 12). They are the last things which Brahms wrote, and—as if he felt that his end was nigh at hand—their theme is death. In his last moments he is said to have wept bitterly for to him death was no welcome guest. The solemn, mournful music was, apparently, the true expression of his feelings, and hence its power. The songs certainly seem out of place in the concert-room; as part of a funeral service they would prove deeply impressive. They were interpreted by Mr. Bispham with dignity and pathos; the applause at the close was, in the way, singularly inappropriate. Mr. Bispham is too excellent an artist to have mistaken silence for indifference.

They were followed by the "Magelone" cycle of songs (Op. 33), given for the first time here in its entirety. The poems are all taken from Tieck's Liebesgeschichten in schönen Magelone, which tells of the love of Peter for the beautiful daughter of the King of Naples. The story is quaint; and Mr. Bispham gave a résumé of it so that the audience might understand and follow the various moods of the music. He told the little tale well, and yet—in this condensed form, at any rate—it was scarcely worth the telling. A brief summary in the programme-book would have been quite sufficient. The "Magelone" songs contain many admirable specimens of the composer's lyric art; in some numbers inspiration is not, however, at fever heat. It was, of course, interesting to hear them all; but, as a rule, a selection would prove more attractive. Mr. Bispham, who had the lion's share, was assisted by Miss Rosa Olitzka, Miss Marie Engle, and Mr. Reginald Groome. Miss Olitzka sang her songs with feeling and intelligence, although the quality of tone of her voice was not altogether pleasant; Miss Engle gave a dainty rendering of "Sulima's Song." Mr. Bispham was in fine form. Mr. Leonard Borwick was at the pianoforte, and his task was no light one. His playing was admirable; yet in one or two of the earlier numbers he did not study the vocalist quite as much as he might have done.

On Tuesday evening Mr. Felix Mottl gave his fourth concert at the Queen's Hall. The programme contained two important selections from "Parsifal." Excerpts from ordinary operas are bad enough; still worse are those from Wagner's music-dramas, especially the later ones. This must be the verdict of all intelligent admirers of the master, and yet no doubt many such were present at this concert, and enjoyed the performances. To some they no doubt proved pleasant echoes of Bayreuth; to others, a profitable preparation for an intended pilgrimage thither. So far, then, as they serve such purposes it would be unreasonable to complain. In the case of "Parsifal," which cannot be heard out of Bayreuth, one is almost disposed to welcome them. The music is wonderfully impressive even shorn of the surroundings which give it such point and meaning. My great objection to excerpts is a very practical one. In London stage performances of Wagner's works are few and far between, while excerpts in the concert-room are becoming more and more numerous. I fear, therefore, that many of the public, especially among the rising generation, are becoming acquainted with Wagner by means truly un-Wagnerian. If "Wagner" concerts induce musicians to go to the theatre, and for "Parsifal" especially, to Bayreuth, they are doing good; if not, then the result, however showy, is unsatisfactory.

On Tuesday evening Herr Heinrich Vogl, of Munich fame, gave a fine rendering of the Lenz-Lied from "Die Walküre." But he was heard to still greater advantage in the scene with the Flower Maidens and the scene with Kundry. His voice shows the effect of long and earnest work; but his artistic rendering of the music and fine declamation were beyond all praise. Frau Mottl as Kundry was most impressive. There was immense power, and restrained power too, in her wonderful impersonation—I use that term purposely, for she almost persuaded me that I was listening to a stage performance—of the weird woman. The solo Flower Maidens, of which the chief was Miss Esther Palliser, and the chorus from the Royal College of Music, greatly distinguished themselves. At the close the applause was not only enthusiastic, but prolonged. Frau Mottl must have been more than satisfied at her reception. The playing of the orchestra under Herr Mottl was exceedingly fine.

The programme included a not very interesting Symphonic Poem by Smetana, also Weber's Overture to Oberon. The programme-book, by the way, spoke of Weber's remains having been removed from St. Paul's to Dresden. That was a strange slip of the pen. Weber was a Roman Catholic, and on his death, in 1826, was buried at Moorfields Chapel. J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

THERE are days in the lives of most of us when we ask ourselves what is the use of anything. On other days we are told, and we believe, that art has an ennobling mission, that the higher drama is good for our souls, and that honest work is a kind of philanthropy. But on days of dejection these truisms cease to act. Among other things I have believed, and have preached, that museums have a lofty educational value; but occasionally this belief, too, has gone the way of other illusions, and I have failed to see in museums more than an endless collection of labelled specimens, interesting chiefly as curiosities. I am pleased, therefore, to come across a Paper by one of our most advanced curators, Mr. F. A. Bather, of the Natural History Museum, South Kensington, entitled "How may Museums best Retard the Progress of Science?"

This is "writ sarcastic," of course (as there would have been no need to point out if one had been able to quote at length), and is addressed to the author's colleagues of the Museum Association. In it Mr. Bather satirises rather handsomely the methods in vogue in most museums even at the present day, treating them as worthy of fuller cultivation.

"We know," he says, "how to strike dulness through the hearts of thousands by our funereal rows of stuffed birds, with their melancholy lines of Latin names. We know how to chill the enthusiasm of the young and to disgust the susceptibilities of tender souls by the display of entrails and abortions stewing in some brown decoction in the depths of antiquated pickle-jars. To suggest such well-known methods (of retarding science) to the experienced audience of practical curators before me would be ridiculous and a waste of time."

Mr. Bather then goes on to show how a museum, by jealously guarding its specimens, and not permitting them to be examined, can prevent the spread of knowledge. He quotes as an instance the history of the genus Spirula, of which an account was published in the Challenger records. Naturalists for long had desired to obtain for dissection a complete specimen, and at last one was taken near Port Jackson. "But," adds the report, "it was deposited in the Sydney Museum and consequently could not be made the subject of anatomical research."

MR. BATHER's third point deals with the classification of specimens in museums, and it should be premised that he is speaking throughout of natural history museums. By mere force of circumstances, lack of time, undermanning, and so forth, he says the arrangement of specimens in the show cases of a museum remains the same throughout many years. Classifications come and classifications go, but the classification adopted when the museum was built goes on for ever. In the spirit of his paper he defends this system as introducing, like the text-book, an element of stability among the changeful vagaries of ephemeral publication.

"If we cannot" he says, "like the text-book writers, foist upon the public senile illustrations that are no better than caricatures, we can always excuse an effete arrangement or an obsolete nomenclature on the plea that time and money are wanting to re-name the specimens. We can, with much show of justice, refuse to give concrete form to the philosophic ideas of our greatest thinkers."

In this connexion also Mr. Bather tells a pretty story of one of our great zoologists in the days when species were regarded as separate creations, who, being asked by a sceptic what he did with the connecting links, whispered in reply, "My dear sir, I throw them out of the window." It is these window specimens that form the basis of our theory of evolution. It is by their means alone that all the most pressing problems of geographical distribution, heredity, growth and origin can be solved. But as, unlike curios or type-specimens, they are difficult to classify, no museum curator has ever done justice to them. Prof. Herrera, of the National Museum of Mexico, has a scheme for founding a museum of the future to represent ideas, in which collections will not exist, and specimens will be purely subordinate. Mr. Bather treats this proposal with mock contumely, but quotes a little from it to show what it involves. Thus a specimen, he says, is not to be exhibited because it is rare; we are to show the utmost contempt for specimens that are anyway rare, curious, or pretty. Here we have in a nutshell the revolt from our present museum system.

AFTER suggesting some of the ideas which may be exemplified in museums, Prof. Herrera adds:

"But instead of studying these ideas and exhibiting them, man from time immemorial has tried to imprison the things of nature in a fixed classification, which is not the whole of science, and which cannot be the nest of the whole of philosophy. Nature in her vastness protests against the classifiers; she revolts against routine."

"What rubbish!" replies Mr. Bather. "How can a curator at £70 a year be expected to have ideas of this kind? And what would our Boards of Governors, Trustees, &c., say if they went into a museum and found a curator calmly reading the Origin of Species when he ought to be mounting specimens by the hundred and making as large a display as possible?"

I HAVE not space to follow this amusing and instructive paper any further. It contains the germs of a system of museum reform which must come some day, but will take many years to accomplish. Mr. Bather perhaps fails to recognise a necessity for two kinds of museums—the preservative as well as the educational—and in his indignation at the absence of the latter kind condemns the former blindly. With the bias of a specialist he ignores the fact that all men are not devoted to the problems of natural selection, heredity, and organic development. There are some people for whom a gallery of humming birds has an æsthetic charm. There are others to whom it opens possibly the only vista of faunas and distant lands different from their own. There are many reasons why such exhibits should be preserved. There are none why they should not be supplemented for the use of students and experts in the way that Mr. Bather, and I doubt not many of his be-rated colleagues also, are desirous to see brought about.

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE EDINBURGH STEVENSON."

Dundee: May 6.

The new volume (xxiii.) will be a disappointment to many subscribers. The prospectus of the supplementary volumes promised a volume of five plays, the fifth being the hitherto unpublished "The Hanging Judge." The volume just issued contains only the four Stevenson-Henley plays, which have all seen the light before. Doubtless there are others besides myself who were looking forward to the pleasure of reading a pure Stevenson play. Perhaps the editor of the edition will explain?

The bibliographical note prefixed to "Macaire" is not quite correct. "Macaire" did not appear in Nutt's edition, 1892, but it did appear in the New Review for June, 1895.

C. M. FALCONER.

"THE FLIGHT OF THE KING."

I have just read your review upon my book and (I conclude) Mr. Penderel Brodhurst's old grievance respecting my statements relating to his particular branch of the loyal peasants of Boscobel and Whiteladies. [See the Standard, March 19, 20, 22, 23, 26, and 29.] May I be allowed to say that as his is the solitary instance of disapproval, where genealogical matters are written upon, the work can scarcely be condemned throughout?

With regard to the Jane and Joan controversy, might I be allowed to tell Mr. Brodhurst that by my pointing out the portrait of "Jane Penderel as the mother of the brothers" I fail to see how I "give away" my case, as no Christian name appears upon the original painting? In addition to my authority that "Jane" was the name of the mother, "Tract I."—no mean authority either, as acknowledged by all who have studied the subject—Blount's Boscobel of 1660 speaks of William Penderel's wife (the daughter-in-law of Jane Penderel) as the "good wife whom his Majesty was pleased to call My Dame Joan," the King at that time being at Boscobel, where William was caretaker. The mother, who lived at Hobbal, could hardly be referred to as "the good wife" when her husband (whose name Mr. Brodhurst informs us, upon what authority I should very much like to know, was William also) was certainly not living at the time of the King's visit, for he is mentioned in no contemporary record extant.

With regard to my other statements about Mr. Brodhurst's connecting links with the miller of Whiteladies, my authorities are given—viz., Notes and Queries and the National Biographical Dictionary, and if he looks these up I think he will find the information about the father and the son and of Edmund Penderel was provided originally by himself. With all humility also to Mr. Brodhurst's superior knowledge, I beg to say there was a "late Humphry Penderel, Esq.," referred to on page 59. In conclusion, may I be permitted to say that I probably should have gone to Mr. Brodhurst direct had not his glaring errors in an article in the Art Journal for 1889 come to my notice. If I have made blunders in my work, surely none can vie with that where Charles' gallant companion, Lord Wilnot, is confused with his son, the notorious libertine of the Restoration!

ALLAN FEA.

The writer of the review on Mr. Allan Fea's book, The Flight of the King, assumes that the aged widow of the head of the Penderel family was the actual person who was called "My Dame Joan" by King Charles II., and says this stout old lady was the mother of the five brothers Penderel. It occurs to most people to wonder how this stout old lady, the mother of grown-up sons, and an aged woman at the time, could have managed to attend to the many wants of the distressed King from her house, which was some distance from Boscobel.

From the context the wife of William Penderel is evidently the person on whom his Majesty bestowed the title of Dame, both from sentiment and real gratitude. With regard to the portrait mentioned by the reviewer, he says the artist has painted on it the words "Dame Penderel, 1662." I am credibly informed that the original portrait has no name on it, but only the word "Dame." With the great advantage of his own researches, and those of others, it is scarcely likely that Mr. Fea, who is a very careful writer, will have made a mistake in his genealogy.

CHARLES PENRUDDOCKE.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"Amoris Victima." By Arthur Symons. (Leonard Smithers.)

"We are afraid," writes the Saturday Review, "that to those who are not actually suffering from the acute stage of amatory disease which Mr. Symons so ably diagnoses his Amoris Victima will seem a little dull. . . . But if he would not so entirely ignore the spiritual part of man . . . his gifts, native and acquired, are such as should secure for him an audience better worth having than a little circle of self-contemplating youths with inflamed brains and atrophied consciences. If he could but be persuaded that 'the emotions and sensations of a typical modern man' are essentially uninteresting unless they include some unselfish relations towards other persons, what an agreeable poet he would be! In technical respects this volume shows an advance on Mr. Symons's previous writings." "We had hoped," writes the National Observer and British Review "that Mr. Symons might have risen to a conception of 'romance' which . . . would have been at all events more dignified and interesting; and are not sure that his present work does not represent an attempt in this direction. If it does, we fear the attempt failed. As his former volumes celebrate the loves of the music-halls, so does this represent the satiety which even music-halls will at last produce. . . . It is to be regretted that a writer who uses language so skilfully should have nothing to say that can be listened to with interest or even patience." "Taking a poem as he wishes it read, as a whole," the Chronicle writes, "one must reckon it a tribute to science rather than the product of passion. . . . The great loves that the great poems were something more than nympholepsy, a state of mind of which Mr. Symons, curiously enough, has given all the ennui and despair, while suggesting hardly any of the fascination. He can do anything but interest us. . . . And somehow, he is a poet for all that—poet without a charm." Says the News: "It is Petrarch in a medium nineteenth century unrest."

Mr. Goldwin Smith's "Guesses at the Riddle of Existence." (Macmillan.)

"He says what he has to say," writes the Athenæum, "not in a spirit of agnosticism, if agnosticism means despair of spiritual truth, but in a spirit of free and hopeful inquiry." While acknowledging that the book deserves to be widely read, the Athenæum takes leave to suggest that "an excess of zeal in the way of destruction is apt to frustrate the work of rebuilding." Having epitomised the contents of the volume, the reviewer concludes:

"Like everything he writes, it is level, vigorous all through; and if not very original it is at least manly, outspoken, and stimulating. Perhaps its chief weakness is that it reveals a certain narrowness of reading and a certain reliance on old-fashioned authors of an exclusively English type. Toronto, we have not an intellectually bracing atmosphere, and there are some books on religious philosophy which Mr. Smith ought to have read. It apparently has not. The result is a certain all-pervading impression of what may be called Anglican common sense, which is not the best frame of mind in which to approach transcendental problems."

The Pall Mall, in the course of a free and buoyant notice, observes:

"The pessimistic strain that has always marked his attitude towards the politics of his own time is evident in his utterances on their religious opinions. With none of them can he be satisfied. The views which he expressed when in the penumbra of orthodoxy he now recants, and he finds the Church's new view of Scripture—if it be new—nearly as 'geocentric' as the old. Nor does he see any safer path pointed out to him by newer guides. The defence of theism lately put forward by Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Henry Drummond, and Mr. Mill pass before him in turn, and he finds no support in any of them. Positivism he cannot avow with, and even Agnosticism is too dogmatic for him 'if it imports despair of spiritual truth.' The fact is," concludes this gay critic, "that the pessimism of people like Dr. Goldwin Smith is a great deal more due to the eyes with which they look upon things in general than to any inherent badness in the things themselves."

The Doom of the Cedar Pencil Fountain Pens and Stylos :

The objections to them, and how they have been met.

The cedar pencil, it appears, has received its death-blow. We are so accustomed to regard it as one of the things which are a matter of course, that for many years no attempt was made to improve it, until the other day there appeared on the market something which so obviously excels the cedar pencil in every possible way that the extinction of the latter can only be a matter of time.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Paper Pencil is of the same size and presents the same appearance as an ordinary pencil, the only difference is that the cedar-wood is replaced by tightly rolled paper, divided off into sections by little round marks down the side of the pencil. When the latter wants sharpening, all you have to do is to pick up the edge of the paper-covering with a pin, or the point of a knife, and unravel a section of it, until it breaks of itself, by which time a fresh piece of lead is exposed, and the pencil ready for continued use. The advantages of the Blaisdell Pencil are so obvious, that nobody who has ever seen it will ever use a cedar pencil again. To begin with, it lasts about three times as long as a cedar pencil, none of the lead being broken in cutting. Then the point is always perfectly conical—can't be otherwise: the fingers are not soiled with blacklead nor the place littered with chips in sharpening it, and the latter operation takes but five seconds to accomplish. The Blaisdell Paper Pencil is already being sold by many stationers; it costs twopence, which makes it much cheaper to use than any penny pencil on the market; and the lead is much better than any twopenny pencil ever sold. The blue and red Blaisdell Pencils (which cost 3d.) are even more superior to cedar ones than the black, because ordinary coloured pencils are more prone to break in sharpening. A set of specimens can be had (post free in the United Kingdom) for a shilling from the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL COMPANY, Limited, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C., on application.

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a reputé beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

CLARENDON PRESS PUBLICATIONS.

Immediately, in 2 vols., medium 8vo, half-roan, 28s.

*. Uniform with Dr. Birkbeck Hill's Editions of Boswell's "Life of Johnson," and "Letters of Samuel Johnson."

JOHNSONIAN MISCELLANIES. Arranged and Edited by GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L., LL.D., Honorary Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford.

*. This Work includes all the Writings generally entitled "Johnsoniana," most of which have never yet been Edited with an adequate Commentary.

OTHER WORKS BY THE SAME EDITOR.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. Including Boswell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides, and Johnson's Diary of a Journey into North Wales. With Portraits and Facsimiles, 8vo, half-bound, 28 3s.

Spectator.—"The most exhaustive edition of Boswell's famous work that has hitherto been published."

WIT and WISDOM of SAMUEL JOHNSON. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Scotsman.—"Probably no man living knows the works and character of Dr. Johnson better than Dr. Birkbeck Hill. The selection and arrangement of characteristic passages from his works and his life and his letters have been admirably done."

RASSELAS. With Introduction and Notes. Extra fcap.

8vo, bevelled boards, 3s. 6d.; parchment, 4s. 6d.

Scottish Review.—"By far the handiest and best edition of the work which we have seen."

LETTERS of SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL.D. With a Facsimile. In 2 vols., medium 8vo, half-roan, 28s.

Standard.—"Excellent reading." Daily Chronicle.—"Full of charm." Times.—"All lovers of Johnson will appreciate the scholarly manner in which Dr. Hill has discharged his editorial task. We cannot but congratulate him on his fresh addition to the stately Johnsonian edifice he has reared with so much skill and labour."

Demy 8vo, cloth, Vol. I., 12s. 6d.

BURNET'S HISTORY of MY OWN TIME: the Reign of Charles II. A New Edition based on that of M. J. ROUTH, D.D., and Edited by OSMUND AIRY, M.A.

Times.—"All serious students will commend the laudable enterprise of the Clarendon Press in issuing a new edition of this famous work, and in securing the services of so competent an editor as Mr. Airy."

2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, pp. lxx.—876, 18s.

BRITISH MORALISTS: being Selections from Writers principally of the Eighteenth Century. Edited, with an Introduction and Analytical Index, by L. A. SELBY-BIGGE, M.A., formerly Fellow and Lecturer of University College, Oxford.

SCOTSMAN.—"A reader interested in the ethical thought of this country in the last century could find few books, if any, by which he could be better informed."

ATHENÆUM.—"A most useful collection of extracts.....The introduction contains interesting and judicious remarks."

THE ISLANDS of the AEGEAN. By H. Fanshawe Tozer, M.A., F.R.G.S. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"Mr. Tozer's remarks on Crete are of special value just now."

Part VII. now ready, price 3s. 6d. net.

HISTORICAL ATLAS of MODERN EUROPE, from the Decline of the Roman Empire. Comprising also Maps of Parts of Asia and of the New World connected with European History. Edited by R. L. POOLE, M.A. Imperial 4to.

Parts I.-VI. already published, 3s. 6d. net each.

SCOTSMAN.—"This atlas has already established its reputation as the most generally satisfactory which a modern English student can consult."

Crown 4to, cloth, 8s. 6d. net.

A STUDENT'S DICTIONARY of ANGLO-SAXON. By HENRY SWEET, M.A.

Brevity and conciseness have been aimed at throughout. The meanings are given in plain modern English. References have been omitted, irregular forms are noticed very briefly, and cognate words are given only in Old English itself.

Athenæum.—"By far the most trustworthy of the language that has yet been published."

ALSO PUBLISHED BY HENRY FROWDE.

In artistic cloth binding, 2s. 6d. net.

THE THACKERAYS in INDIA, and "Some Calcutta Graves." By Sir WILLIAM WILSON HUNTER, K.C.S.I., M.A., LL.D.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Well timed is the appearance of this new work. It is a grand record, and Sir William tells it in the picturesque language and with the subtle humour and dignified pathos which we have learned to expect from the author of "The Old Missionary."

"THE BEST MEMENTO OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN."

THE QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE PRAYER-BOOK.

In Various Forms and to Match the Bibles. Containing two Portraits of Her Majesty and a Series of Colotypes ranging from 1s. 6d. (or with Hymns, A. & M., price 2s.).

N.B.—Each Copy contains the Special Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving written by the Archbishop of Canterbury by direction of the Privy Council for Use on Accession Sunday, June 20th Next.

Also

THE QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE BIBLE. In Sizes and Styles to suit all classes of Her Majesty's Subjects. Containing two other Portraits of Her Majesty and another Series of Colotypes, at prices ranging from 4s. 6d. (or with the Portraits only, price 2s. 6d.).

Full Clarendon Press Catalogues will be sent post free on application.

LONDON:

HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

JUBILEE VOLUME OF "A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES"

To be ready immediately, demy 8vo, cloth, 12s

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIME

FROM 1880 TO THE DIAMOND JUBILEE

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P.

*. (Uniform with the Library Edition of the first Four Volumes.)

MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED'S New Novel, NULMA, is now ready, at Booksellers' and Libraries. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

SIR WALTER BESANT'S New Novel, A FOUNTAIN SEAL will be ready immediately, with a Frontispiece by H. G. Burgess. (Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

CLARK RUSSELL'S New Novel, THE LAST ENTRY, with Frontispiece by Max Cooper, is now ready at all Booksellers'. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

JOHN STAFFORD'S New Novel, CARLTON PRIORS, by the author of "Deris and I," is now ready at all Libraries and Booksellers'. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

OLD CORCORAN'S MONEY, by RICHARD DOWLING, Author of "The Mystery of Killard," is now ready at all Booksellers'. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

LOUIS ZANGWILL'S New Novel, A NINETEENTH CENTURY MIRACLE, by "Z Z," will be ready at all Booksellers' on May 1. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

DAGONET ABROAD. By George R. Sims. Cheap Edition. Post 8vo, picture boards, 2s.; cloth, 2s. 6d.

MARK TWAIN'S CHOICE WORKS. Revised by the AUTHOR. With Portrait, Memoir, and Illustrations. Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

Also, uniform, crown 8vo, blue cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

MARK TWAIN'S LIBRARY of HUMOUR. With 197 Illustrations.

ROUGHING IT; and the Innocents at Home. With 200 Illustrations.

TOM SAWYER ABROAD. With 26 Illustrations.

TOM SAWYER, DETECTIVE. With Photogravure Portrait.

A TRAMP ABROAD. With 314 Illustrations.

THE PRINCE and the PAUPER. With 190 Illustrations.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS of JOAN of ARC. With 12 Illustrations by F. V. Coats. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A COUNTRY SWEETHEART. By Dora Russell, Author of "Footprints in the Snow." Post 8vo, picture boards, 2s.

OF HIGH DEGREE. By Charles Gibbon. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

LOVIOE. By Mrs. Hungerford, Author of "Molly Bawn."

BEYOND the PALE. By B. M. Croker, Author of "Diamond Barrington." SECOND EDITION.

WITH the RED EAGLE. By William Westall. Third EDITION.

SEBASTIAN'S SECRET. By S. E. Waller. Illustrated by the Author.

ACADEMY NOTES, 1897. With nearly 200 Illustrations. An ILLUSTRATED GUIDE to the PARIS SALON. With 400 Illustrations. 3s.

THE RIDDLE RING. By Justin McCarthy, M.P. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE CHRONICLES of MICHAEL DANEVITCH, of the Russian Secret Service. By DICK DONOVAN, Author of "A Detective's Triumphs." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

HIS EXCELLENCY (Eugene Rougon). By Emile Zola. With Preface by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

DULCIE EVERTON. By E. Lynn Linton, Author of "Patricia Kemball." Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

MADAME SANS-GENE. (Founded on Sardou and Moreau's Play.) By EDMOND LEPELLETIER. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE CHARLATAN. By ROBERT BUCHANAN and HENRY MURRAY.

THE PLUNGER. By HAWLEY SMART.

THE PRINCE of BALKISTAN. By ALLEN UPWARD.

MR. JERVIS. By B. M. CROKER.

THE WHITE VIRGIN. By G. MARVILLE FENN.

THE GOOD SHIP "MOHOCK." By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

MOUNT DESPAIR. By D. CROFT MURRAY.

BEYOND the DREAMS of AVALANCE. By Sir WALTER BESANT.

AT MARKET VALUE. By GRANT ALLEN.

LADY PATTY. By Mrs. HUNGERFORD.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

WITH PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT—PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1307.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1897.

PRIOR 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied
promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.
LATEST CATALOGUES—
No. 31 SEMITIC—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
No. 52, 54, MISCELLANEOUS. (762, 732 lots.)
No. 53, PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
Catalogues of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 37, BOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 114, for March), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STAMPAED PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.
Telegrams: MOWSILL, LONDON. (Established 1819.)

TO AUTHORS.—Messrs. DIGBY, LONG & CO.
(Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net, eighth
edition) INVITE AUTHORS to FORWARD their MSS. (Fiction,
Travel, Poetry, &c.) suitable for Volumes for prompt consideration.—
Address 18, Boulevard Street, Fleet Street, London.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RALTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 18, Gough Square, E. 40, Court, Fleet Street, E.C.
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast
folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS FOR SALE.

(Advertisements are inserted under this heading at 4d. per line, prepaid.)
FOR SALE, BURTON'S ARABIAN NIGHTS,
16 vols., first-rate condition, £28 net.—A. F. L., 32, Sinclair Road, West Kensington.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

WANTED BOOKPLATES.—Any good Plates, or proofs, purchased for cash.—HENRY HIGHAM, 84, Tytherton Road, London, N.

WANTED. BOOKPLATES of Bozman, Walker,
Giles, Reverley, Cabot, Parr; also any Old Specimens. Very best prices will be paid.—MOON, 6, Trelaw Road, Leyton, Essex.

THE SECOND INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY CONFERENCE, 1897.

President—
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., F.R.S.

Hon. Treasurer—
HENRY R. TEDDER, Esq.

Hon. Secretary—
J. Y. W. MAC ALISTER, Esq.,
20, Hanover Square, W.

The Conference will be held (by the kind permission of the Right
Hon. the Lord Mayor and Corporation) in the COUNCIL CHAMBER,
GUILDHALL, LONDON, on JULY 13, 14, 15, and 16, 1897, and will be attended by the representatives of the principal libraries throughout the world. Papers will be read on appropriate subjects, and some time will be devoted to open Discussions. All persons interested in the extension of the library movement or in the management of libraries are cordially invited to join the Conference. The Lord Mayor has invited the members of the Conference to a Conversation in the Mansion House on the evening of July 13.

An Exhibition of Library Appliances will be an important feature of the Conference. Intending exhibitors should communicate with the Hon. Secretary of the Exhibition Committee, THOMAS MASO, Esq., 115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. The Subscription, One Guinea, entitles Members to receive the Transactions and other Publications gratis, and to attend all meetings and social gatherings. Applications for Membership should be sent at once to the Hon. Secretary.

N.B.—The programme of Papers is now complete, and no further offers can be considered.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 54, Pall Mall East, S.W.
128th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIGFRIED H. HENKOWSKI, JUN., Secretary (pro tem.).

THE LIBER STUDIUM of
J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.,
And NEW MEZZOTINTS by FRANK SHORT,
TO COMPLETE THE BOOK,
ON VIEW at ROBERT DUNTHORNE'S, THE REMBRANDT GAL-
LERY, 5, Vigo Street, W. Admission, including Catalogue, 1s.

McGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL,
CANADA.

CHAIR OF ZOOLOGY.

The Governors of McGill University are prepared to receive APPLI-CATIONS for Appointment to the newly founded PROFESSORSHIP
of ZOOLOGY. Salary, 2,500 Dols. per annum. Candidates from
Great Britain are requested to forward applications, with any testimonials and references they may desire to submit, on or before
15th June, addressed, "PRINCIPAL," Office of the High Commissioner
for Canada, 17, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—FORTHCOM-
ING EXAMINATION.—DRAUGHTSMAN in the HYDRO-
GRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT of the ADMIRALTY (17-26), 7th
JULY. Expertness in Hydrographical Chart Drawing essential.—The
date specified is the latest at which applications can be received.
They must be made on forms, to be obtained, with particulars, from
the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.
1897.—EXAMINATION, JULY 6th, 7th. One of £20, two of
£20, and Minor Scholarships of £15 to £20. Candidates to be under 16 years of age.
For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An EXAMINA-
TION will be held in July next to fill up not less than FIVE
RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS,
and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the HEAD
MASTER, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI-
LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.

The last, most complete and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-
Instruction.
Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.
Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 2 dols. 50 cents.
American, 10s. 6d. English. Post free.
Prospectus with opinions of EDUCATORS, SCIENTIFIC, PROFESSIONAL,
and BUSINESS MEN all over the world free.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 227, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
NOT SOLD ELSEWHERE. 200 REGENT STREET, LONDON.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

ASSISTANCE WANTED.

The undermentioned CASES, for which it has not been found possible to raise the necessary help from other sources, are RECOMMENDED by the CHARITY ORGANI-SATION SOCIETY. Contributions towards their assistance will be gladly received by C. S. LOCK, Secretary, 15, Buckingham Street, Adelphi, W.C. :—

12,002.—£3 12s. 6d. is required towards the support of a single woman of 33 in a Home for Incubers. For some years she supported her mother by laundry work, and saved over £100, on which she and her mother lived for the past three or four years. Two brothers have now undertaken the support of their mother, and a home has been found for the daughter at a cost of 10s. a week.

14,904.—An Eastern Committee ask for £4, to supplement an allowance to an old couple, aged 73 and 71. Four sons and the local clergy assist.

15,905.—£4 15s. is required towards the cost of keeping the two girls, aged 9 and 7, of a widow of good character, at a Home at Reigate for six months, and it is proposed that they shall remain there till they are self-supporting. The total cost of maintenance is £9 15s., and the mother is contributing out of her earnings as a domestic servant the balance of £5. The late father, a grocer, had previously been ten years in the navy and ten in the merchant service.

15,842.—Wanted, £5, to complete a pension of 5s. 6d. a week for a very respectable old woman of 74. She was formerly a children's nurse, and bore an excellent character. Her savings, at one time considerable, are now exhausted.

SALES BY AUCTION.

THE OLD MASTERS.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & CO. will
SELL by AUCTION, at AMSTERDAM, on TUESDAY,
JUNE 1, 1897, the very important Cabinets of OLD PICTURES of
G. DE OLERIO, Esq., and of Mrs. JENTINK-FARRET, containing exceedingly fine specimens by Avercamp, Asselijn, Bakhuizen, Berck-heyde, Berghem, van Beyer, F. Bol, J. Both, Velvet-Breughel, Pieter Class, Coddé, Decker, Dusk, van Everdingen, Fyt, Hackaert (3 pieces), D. Hals, Heda, de Heem, E. van der Helst (magnificent composition of four figures—life size), Hondius, Honthorst, Knaalok, Lieveens, Maes, van der Meer, van der Meulen, J. M. Molesmar (3 pieces), Aert van der Neer (3 pieces), G. Neyt, A. Palamedes (3 pieces), Fyanecker (3 pieces), G. de Ring, J. Ruysdael, R. Ruysdael, H. Sals-leven, Slingelandt, Jan Steen (3 pieces), Stoop (2 pieces), van Steek, Terborch, A. van de Velde, W. van de Velde, Jun. (capital battle-scene of the English and Dutch fleets), van de Venne (3 pieces), Verboom, Vinckboons, S. de Vlieger, Mari de Vos, K. van Vries, Walscappelle, van de Werf, Weenix, &c.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & CO. will
SELL by AUCTION, on the SAME DAY, the beautiful
Collection of OLD DRAWINGS, the Cabinet of W. F. PIJKE, Esq.
Please apply for the illustrated Catalogues at the Office Doelenstraat 10, Amsterdam.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

G. F. WATTS, R.A.,
SIR E. BURNE-JONES,
D. G. ROSSETTI.

An Extensive Selection of the Works of these Masters at prices ranging from Three Shillings and Sixpence to Three Guineas.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON.

This important Series of over Four Hundred Permanent Carbon
Reproductions of the chief Pictures in this magnificent collection includes representative selections from the Italian, Flemish,
Dutch, Spanish, French, and English Schools. By the aid of the most recent improvements in Photographic Science, absolutely
faithful and Permanent Copies have been secured, on a scale which adequately represents the Original Paintings. These are printed in rich brown pigments, on specially prepared paper, size
18 by 15 inches, and are sold at a uniform price of TWELVE
SHILLINGS EACH.

FAMOUS MASTERS in FOREIGN GALLERIES,

including the Masterpieces of the Louvre, Uffizi, Pitti, Dresden, Berlin, and other Collections. The same size and price as the above.

FRAMES specially designed and executed in oak and walnut.

Full particulars of Autotype Permanent Reproductions from the Old and Modern Masters sent post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

The Doom of the Cedar Pencil Fountain Pens and Stylos

The objections to them, and how they have been met.

The cedar pencil, it appears, has received its death-blow. We are so accustomed to regard it as one of the things which are a matter of course, that for many years no attempt was made to improve it, until the other day there appeared on the market something which so obviously excels the cedar pencil in every possible way that the extinction of the latter can only be a matter of time.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Paper Pencil is of the same size and presents the same appearance as an ordinary pencil, the only difference is that the cedar-wood is replaced by tightly rolled paper, divided off into sections by little round marks down the side of the pencil. When the latter wants sharpening, all you have to do is to pick up the edge of the paper-covering with a pin, or the point of a knife, and unravel a section of it, until it breaks of itself, by which time a fresh piece of lead is exposed, and the pencil ready for continued use. The advantages of the Blaisdell Pencil are so obvious, that nobody who has ever seen it will ever use a cedar pencil again. To begin with, it lasts about three times as long as a cedar pencil, none of the lead being broken in cutting. Then the point is always perfectly conical—can't be otherwise: the fingers are not soiled with blacklead nor the place littered with chips in sharpening it, and the latter operation takes but five seconds to accomplish. The Blaisdell Paper Pencil is already being sold by many stationers; it costs twopence, which makes it much cheaper to use than any penny pencil on the market; and the lead is much better than any twopenny pencil ever sold. The blue and red Blaisdell Pencils (which cost 3d.) are even more superior to cedar ones than the black, because ordinary coloured pencils are more prone to break in sharpening. A set of specimens can be had (post free in the United Kingdom) for a shilling from the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL COMPANY, Limited, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C., on application.

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use fountain pen that carries its own ink, and therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "The fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Price from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED, SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE EXCHANGES.

The characteristics of the Literary matter, and of the advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Advertisers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE*	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven shillings.

N.B.—THE ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES THE LARGE EXPORT AND EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS, IS SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line advertisement free each week in the out-of-print books Wanted column.

NOW READY.
BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.
Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME OF THE English Catalogue for 1896 differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the FULL TITLE With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by over 80 pages, whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

IN RELATION TO FOREIGN COMPETITION.
WITH STATISTICAL TABLES, &c.
By WILLIAM S. H. GASTRELL,
Commercial Attaché to H.M.'s Embassy at Berlin, &c.
Royal 8vo, 6s. [This day.]

LYRICS OF LOWLY LIFE.
By PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR.
With an Introduction by W. D. HOWELLS,
And Photogravure Portrait of Author.
Small crown 8vo, 5s. [This day.]

Mr. W. D. HOWELLS, the American novelist, says:—"Paul Dunbar's brilliant and unique achievement is to have studied the American negro objectively, and to have represented him with humour, with sympathy, and with truthfulness."

THE SULTAN AND HIS SUBJECTS.
By RICHARD DAVEY.
In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 24s.

The SPECTATOR says: "We have seldom taken up a book of a like weight and importance which we have found it so difficult to lay down."

The DAILY CHRONICLE says: "It deserves not only to be read, but to find a permanent place upon the book-shelf."

The SATURDAY REVIEW says: "Mr. Davey has compiled one of the best books ever written on Turkey."

SEVENTH THOUSAND.
CECIL RHODES:
A Biography and an Appreciation.
By IMPERIALIST and Dr. JAMESON.
Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.
CAPTAIN KID'S MILLIONS. By ALAN OSCAR. [Ready.]

SYBIL FOSTER'S LOVE STORY. By LADY WATKIN WILLIAMS. [Ready.]

THE GIFT OF LIFE. By James CASSIDY. [This day.]

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.
TALE OF TWO WINNERS.

Crown 8vo, 6s.
THE SECRET OF SAINT FLOREL.
By JOHN BERWICK.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE FALL OF A STAR.
A NOVEL.
By SIR WM. MAGNAY, Bart.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

With Illustrations. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.
A RIDE THROUGH WESTERN ASIA.

By CLIVE BIGHAM. Part I., ASIA MINOR. Part II., PERSIA, North to South. Part III., TURKISH ARABIA. Part IV., PERSIA, West to East. Part V., CENTRAL ASIA.

DAILY NEWS.—"A pleasant, gossip narrative.... The book contains occasional observations which students of political movements in the East will find very suggestive."

THE ANNUAL OF THE BRITISH SCHOOL at ATHENS.
No. II. SESSION 1895-96.

Containing (1) Reports of the Committee and of the Meeting of Subscribers; (2) Papers read at the School or otherwise illustrating its work. Crown 4to, 10s. 6d.

VOLUME II., NOW READY.
A HISTORY OF ENGLISH POETRY.

By W. J. COURTHOPE, C.B., M.A., D.Litt., Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. Vol. II., THE RENAISSANCE and the REFORMATION. Influence of the Court and the Universities. 8vo, 10s. net.
SCOTSMAN.—"Careful and accurate in its learning, the

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

"Dr. Conan Doyle's fascinating story."
DAILY NEWS.

With 12 Full-page Illustrations.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

UNCLE BERNAC: A Memory of the Empire.

BY
A. CONAN DOYLE,

Author of "The White Company,"
"Rodney Stone," &c.

"The fascination of it is extraordinary. It reaches everywhere a high literary level."—Daily Chronicle.
"Uncle Bernac" has the vitality, the power, and the true human touch which we have learnt to expect from this master of his craft."—Daily Mail.

THE WAYS of LIFE Two Stories:
1. Mr. SANDFORD. 2. THE WONDERFUL HISTORY
of Mr. ROBERT DALYELL. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.
With a Preface entitled "On the Ebb Tide." Crown
8vo, 6s.

THE LADY GRANGE. By Alexander
INNES SHAND, Author of "Kilcarra: a Novel,"
"Half a Century; or, Changes in Men and Manners," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Taking the book as a whole, it is doubtful if anything better of the kind has been done since Robert Louis Stevenson laid down his pen."—Scotsman.

THE REVIVAL of LEARNING. By
the late JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS. Large
crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.
* This is Volume II. of a NEW and CHEAPER EDITION
of "THE RENAISSANCE in ITALY," in 7 vols., large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. each. The remaining volumes will be published at intervals.

Now ready, with Portraits, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

ISABELLA the CATHOLIC, QUEEN
of SPAIN: her Life, Reign, and Times, 1461-1504. By
M. LE BARON DE NERVO. Translated from the Original French by Lieut.-Colonel TEMPEST-WEST
(Retired).

On May 26, with Portraits, and a Preface by Sir EDWARD B.
MALER, G.O.B., G.O.M.G., &c., demy 8vo, 16s.

GABRIELE VON BULOW, Daughter
of Wilhelm von Humboldt. A Memoir Compiled from the Family Papers of Wilhelm von Humboldt and his Children, 1791-1897. Translated by CLARA NORD-
LINGER.

New Volume of Smith, Elder & Co.'s
Popular 2s. 6d. Series.

On May 26, crown 8vo, limp red cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE DISAPPEARANCE of GEORGE DRIFFELL. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy," &c.

CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For JUNE. Price ONE SHILLING. Contents:

THE ENGLISHMAN'S CALENDAR (June).
THE BATTLE of SLUIS: an Anniversary Study. By
W. LAIRD CLOWES.
SOME MEMORIES of the QUEEN'S CHILDHOOD and MARRIAGE. By Lady JANE ELLICE.
SIAM and the KING'S VISIT. By PERCY CROSS STANDING.
PARIS in JUNE, 1871. By A. J. BUTLER.
ST. PAUL'S. By ARTHUR PATENT MARTIN.
THE PARSON'S REVELS. By Mrs. STEPHEN BATSON.
DUELS of all NATIONS.—IV. The Duels of Italy, Spain, and Russia. By JAMES PEMBERTON GRUND.
THE MODERN PENTATHLON. By HORACE HUTCHINSON.
"MISSING": a Story of the South Pacific. By JOHN ARTHUR BARRY.
THE BATTLE of SPINGES. By WILLIAM WESTALL.
TALES from the DRAMATISTS.—I. The Witch of Edmonton.
FREEMASONRY and the CHURCH of ROME. By FRED
J. W. CROWE.
QUIS PRO DOMINA? By OWEN SEAMAN.
PAGES from a PRIVATE DIARY.
IN KEDAR'S TENTS. Chapters XVI.-XVIII. By HENRY
SETON MERRIMAN, Author of "The Sowers," &c.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO.,
15, WATERLOO PLACE.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

FICTION.

THE WHITE HECATOMB, and
Other Stories. By W. C. SCULLY. Crown 8vo, 6s.
[Just published.]

AN ODD EXPERIMENT. By
HANNAH LYNCH. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
[Just published.]

PHROSO: a Romance. By ANTHONY HOPE. Second Edition. Illustrated.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Anthony Hope has produced his latest novel in a happy hour. At a time when the chief theme of conversation is Crete and the islands of the Archipelago, the lawlessness of the Eastern races, and the inveteracy of old racial grudges, he has issued a book with all the elements of romance, recounting the fortunes of an eccentric Englishman, who, because he is tired of ordinary travel, purchases an island belonging to Turkey and inhabited by Greeks."—
Daily Telegraph.

A HANDFUL of EXOTICS:
Stories and Incidents chiefly of Russo-Jewish Life. By
S. GORDON. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Many sides of the character of the Russian Jew are brought out in this interesting and striking volume. Only an artist of real literary skill could have written these pages."—Weekly Sun.

GUAVAS the TINNER. By
S. BARING-GOULD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"There is a kind of flavour about this book which alone elevates it far above the ordinary novel. The story itself has a grandeur in harmony with the wild and ragged scenery which is its setting."—Athenaeum.

WILT THOU HAVE THIS WOMAN? By J. MACLAREN COBBAN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"In the present day it is refreshing to come across a novel of this description. The story in its old-world charm and country setting reminds one of Anthony Trollope."—
New Saturday.

UNDER SHADOW of the MISSION. By L. STUDDIFORD M'CHESNEY.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Those whose minds are open to the finer issues of life, who can appreciate graceful thought and refined expression of it, from them this volume will receive a welcome as enthusiastic as it will be based on critical knowledge."—
Church Times.

THE SEATS of the MIGHTY.
By GILBERT PARKER. Seventh Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Will in time rank among the classics of English fiction."—
Western Morning News.

CLARISSA FURIOSA. By
W. E. NORRIS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It ranks with the best of the author's productions; and to say this is, in our opinion, equivalent to placing it with the best novels of our time."—St. James's Gazette.

THE SPECULATORS. By J.
BREWER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A pretty bit of comedy.....It is undeniably a clever book."—Academy.

THE FAITHFUL CITY. By
H. MORRAH. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Convinces and enthral the reader with his mysterious savages, his gigantic tower, and his uncompromising men and women. This is a haunting mysterious book, not without an element of stupendous grandeur."—Athenaeum.

THE PLATTNER STORY, and Others. By H. G. WELLS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"There are seventeen stories in the volume, and he will be wrong who misses reading any of them."—
Daily Chronicle.

Messrs. Methuen's New Catalogue and Book Gazette
sent to any address.

METHUEN & CO., 36, ESSEX STREET, STRAND.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

THE MATABELE CAMPAIGN,
1896. Being a Narrative of the Campaign in Suppressing the Native Rising in Matabeleland and Mashonaland. By Colonel R. S. BADEN-POWELL, 18th
Hussars. With nearly 100 Illustrations, Maps, &c.
Demy 8vo, 15s.

"As a straightforward, unpretentious account of a great deal of plucky work unpretentiously done, this diary of the campaign is well worth reading; the simplicity of the narrative is all in its favour, and accords in a peculiarly English fashion with the nature of the subject."—Times.

"The whole tale is real, there is an absence of padding, while it is one which alike delights children and grown persons, a true story."—Broad Arrow.

THE FALL of the CONGO
ARABS. By Captain SIDNEY L. HINDE. With Map, Portraits, and Plans. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

"His narrative is rife with thrilling interest, and abounds in descriptive matter throwing much new light on native life in Central Africa.....On the whole, there is not a page in the book which is not thoroughly readable. If merit be a criterion of success, 'The Fall of the Congo Arabs' should achieve a widespread popularity."—Daily Telegraph.

"The story told by Captain S. L. Hinde, to which the attention of Parliament has been called, and especially the revelations concerning cannibalism, have shocked the public mind."—St. James's Gazette.

The NORTH-WEST PROVINCES

of INDIA: their History, Ethnology, and Administration. By W. UROOKE, Bengal Civil Service (Retired).
With 16 full-page illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo,
10s. 6d.

"A scholarly work on the history, ethnology, and administration of a vast tract of country officially known as the North-Western Provinces. The book contains a map and many excellent photographs."—Daily News.

THE LIFE and WRITINGS of

JOHN DAVENANT, D.D. (1571-1641), Lord Bishop of Salisbury. By the Rev. MORRIS FULLER, B.D.,
Vicar of St. Mark's, Marylebone. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"Written with an uncommon sympathy, and is both readable and instructive. It gives a very full and trustworthy view of the ecclesiastical controversies that agitated England during the hundred years immediately following the Reformation."—Scotsman.

THE XXXIX. ARTICLES of the CHURCH of ENGLAND. Edited, with an Introduction, by E. C. S. GIBSON, D.D., Vicar of Leeds, late Principal of Wells Theological College. In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. each.

"The book will be welcome to all students of the subject, and its sound, definite, and loyal theology ought to be of great service."—National Observer.

An INTRODUCTION to the HIS-TORY of RELIGION. By F. P. JEVONS, M.A., Litt.D., Tutor at the University of Durham. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"Displays a mental power of no ordinary kind, and is the result of much and well-directed study."—Scotsman.

ST. ANSELM of CANTERBURY

a Chapter in the History of Religion. By J. M. RIGGS, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"Mr. Riggs has told the story of the great Primate's life with scholarly ability, and has thereby contributed an interesting chapter to the history of the Norman period."—
Daily Chronicle.

THE DECLINE and FALL of the ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIBBON. A

New Edition. Edited, with Notes, Appendices, and Maps, by J. B. BURY, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. In 7 vols. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 8s. 6d.; crown
8vo, 6s. each. [Vol. III.]

LIFE in WEST LONDON: a

Study and a Contrast. By ARTHUR SHERWELL,
M.A. Second and Revised Edition with Supplementary
Chapter. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Messrs. Methuen's New Catalogue and Book Gazette
sent to any address.

METHUEN & CO., 36, ESSEX STREET, STRAND.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Mr. Thompson's New Poems	537
"General" Inspiration	539
Gravity and Levity	540
Mr. Stephen Crane's New Book	541
Malay and Negrito Characteristics	541
Literature and Music	542
A Woman's Part in a Revolution	543
FROM CROWDED SHELVES	544
FICTION:
Jinny Blake—Yekl: a Tale of the New York Ghetto —Zelma—Broken Away—Triscombe Stone	544
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books	546
New Books Received	546
NOTES AND NEWS	547
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXVIII., PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY	548
OUIDA	549
PARIS LETTER	550
THE BOOK MARKET:
The Chandery-lane Auctions	551
What America Reads	551
ART	553
MUSIC	553
SCIENCE	554
CORRESPONDENCE	554
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED	554

REVIEWS.

MR. THOMPSON'S NEW POEMS.

New Poems. By Francis Thompson. (Archibald Constable & Co.)

FUSELI, much more considerable as an aphorist than as a painter, once said that the reader who does not fancy himself the part-author of the beauties he recites is not the least of men; and Rossetti, in his copy of Fuseli, scored with a pencil of approval this counsel of humility. Yet even with Rossetti's poetry how much must the reader himself bring to the task of appreciation if he would carry nothing away! No good seed will grow save in ground prepared for it. Even temptation, as Thomas à Kempis says, does not transform a man, but only shows him what he is. In that sense the reader, with no arrogance at all, may feel himself to be the partner of the poet, and no sleeping partner either, if the poet's own account of poets be true:

"We speak a lesson taught we know not how,
And what it is that from us flows
The hearer better than the utterer knows."

That is Mr. Francis Thompson's rendering of the relations between poets and readers; and in his own case it is particularly true. Mr. Thompson's readers are in a sense his colleagues in creation.

The greater a poet's message, the more profound his thought, the larger his range, and the more exquisite his note, the deeper and more incessant will be his demand upon his reader. That is why the great poets have had to wait for their recognition. Only the few will or can co-operate at the beginning; but they are the leaven; and now whole masses can see the poetic purport of Shelley, Coleridge, Keats, and Wordsworth, of whom the contemporary criticism was a thing over which you laugh or cry, as the mood has you. Those who see in Mr. Francis Thompson an authentic poet have at any rate the profound interest of watching the various stages in the making of their Immortal. How have the portents followed the precedent afforded by the poets just named? In general, very accurately, we think. The common attitude of critics towards them and him has been very similar—in the case of Shelley it is so near in its very wording as to be sometimes startling. Extravagances and novelties of diction, a toppling-over of images, and "obscurity"—of course that—were dwelt upon by objectors—very just objectors, no doubt—who, busied and troubled about details, lost all sense of proportion, and had no ear for the great and ultimate meaning of the poet's message. To be able to make merry over Peter Bell was easy to men who had no prescience of Wordsworth as the supreme reconciler of Nature and God among modern men—

"By grace divine,
Not otherwise, O Nature, are we thine."

Strange is it now to read pages of puerilities written of a great poet by men who had not the ear within the ear to hear the only things by which he gives and draws life now in the hearts of men. So it is with Mr. Thompson; you may read columns about his poetry in which his poetry never once appears; and to critics who have not caught the matter you must deny even the faculty to judge the utterance, since form and substance are indivisible and one. If, then, we do not dwell on verbal defects, which are easily discoverable in Mr. Thompson's verses, but which are never without a certain illustrious lineage; if we waste no time in enumerating the offences against the conventions—which, in his case, are never, we think, offences against positive canons of literary morality; if we ignore his occasional contortions of epithet, the result of too much hammering rather than the sign of carelessness of execution; it is because we are warned by the failure of yesterday's criticism. Who would not weep for Adonais that he had no critic to assure him that his name was not writ in water? Not that Mr. Thompson can pass away, as Keats or Shelley passed, without a call of recognition. Contemporaries such as Mr. Coventry Patmore—to whom as a poet and philosopher Mr. Thompson is under double obligations in his new volume—at once knew him as brother; and the Edinburgh Review, hitherto a sort of shambles for young poets, has done an absolutely new thing in quarterly reviewing—it has hailed as "a great poet" a writer of only three years' reputation, and of only two thin volumes—the Poems and the Sister Songs. We are not disturbed on Mr. Thompson's account, but very much flattered on account of contemporary taste and courage, by this departure from the old formula of the neglect of a new poet. From this time henceforward we believe that great poetry will meet with some measure of immediate reward; and those who are able to comprehend Mr. Thompson at all will not have waited for his third volume to appoint to him his place.

These New Poems will not, therefore, show Mr. Thompson essentially in any new light. They take him further as a teacher, it is true. What were hints before are now full disclosures. They vary, they embellish, they bring to ultimate completion, they perfect, once or twice they frankly repeat. If this old mastery has a new manner, it is new in the direction of asceticism. There is less obvious beauty than before, and that, of course, is intentional; but there is no stay in the abundance of the imagery, no pause in the procession of thoughts. There is greater actual range of subject; and though great poetry is independent of that kind of variety, being all inclusive, there may easily be readers to whom one section of the book will appeal more than the rest—indeed, some to whom this section may appeal and another not at all. The mystical poems, twelve in number, come under the heading of "Sight and Insight"; there are four "Miscellaneous Odes" and twenty-one "Miscellaneous Poems"; in "A Narrow Vessel" we have eight poems, forming a "dramatic sequence on the aspect of primitive girl nature towards a love beyond its capacities"; and the book closes with the section called "Ultima," in which, through some half-dozen poems, "Love's almsman plaineth his fare":

"Sweet Lady, how
Little a linking of the hand to you!
Though I should touch yours careless for a year,
Not one blue vein would lie divinelier blue
Upon your fragile temple, to unsphere
The seraphim for kisses! . . .

That you might
Be lover for one space, and make essay
What 'tis to pass unsuppered to your couch,
Keep fast from love all day; and so be taught
The famine which these craving lines avouch!
Ah! miser of good things that cost thee naught,
How know'st thou poor men's hunger?—Misery!
When I go doleless and unfed by thee!

"A Holocaust" sings the rending of the poet's heart from the lady of his song, likening that heart to fresh fruit torn "bleeding from the peel," and producing another simile that is not read without a shock. But no undue violence is done in the rendings in another poem of this series:

"UNTO THIS LAST.

"Yet had I torn (man knoweth not,
Nor scarce the unweeping angels wot
Of such dread task the lightest part)
Her fingers from about my heart.

Pangs fore-tempted, which in vain
I, faithless, have denied, now bud
To untented fragrance and the mood
Of contrite heavenliness; all days
Joy affrights me in my ways;
Extremities of old delight
Afflict me with new exquisite
Virgin piercings of surprise—
Stung by those wild brown bees, her eyes!"

"Contrite heavenliness" is the note, too, of another poem of the series:

"AFTER HER GOING.

"The after-even! Ah, did I walk,
Indeed, in her or even?
For nothing of me or around
But absent She did leaven,
Felt in my body as its soul,
And in my soul its heaven.

"Ah me! my very flesh turns soul,
'Essenced,' I sighed, 'with bliss!'
And the blackbird held his lutany,
All fragrant-through with bliss;
And all things stilled were as a maid
Sweet with a single kiss."

That last image shows us Mr. Thompson in his radiant mood, from which he is not far withdrawn in "My Lady, the Tyranness," when he tells her:

"God for His heaven will not forego
Her whom I found such heaven below,
And she will train Him to her lures.
Nought, lady, I love
In you but more is loved above;
What made me, makes Him yours."

The poet keeps his philosophy for the last of this set of poems, that called "Ultimum":

"Now in these last spent drops, slow, slower shed,
Love dies, Love dies, Love dies—ah, Love is dead!
Sad Love in life, sore Love in agony,
Pale Love in death; while all his offspring
songs,
Like children, versed not in death's chilly wrongs,
About him flit, frightened to see him lie
So still, who did not know that Love could die."

I slew, that moan for him: he lifted me
Above myself, and that I might not be Less than myself, need was that he should
die;
Since Love that first did wing, now clogged me from the sky."

And, Lady, thus I dare to say,
Not all with you is passed away! . . .
Beyond your star, still, still the stars are bright;
Beyond your highness, still I follow height. . .
This wisdom sings my song with last firm breath,
Caught from the twisted lore of Love and Death. . .

'On him the unpetitioned heavens descend,
Who heaven on earth proposes not for end;
The perilous and celestial excess
Taking with peace, lacking with thankfulness.
Bliss in extreme befits thee not, until Thou'rt not extreme in bliss; be equal still:
Sweets to be granted think thyself unmeet
Till thou have learned to hold sweet not too sweet.'

This thing not far is he from wise in art
Who teacheth; nor who doth, from wise in heart."

The doctrine of Denial, to which these love-passages are turned, is the underlying principle of the "Sight and Insight" series, which deals with the hidden things of the spirit. "The Mistress of Vision," in her secret garden—

"Thrice three times it was enwalled
With an emerald"—

declares to the seeker after "the Land of Luthany," and "the Tract of Elenore":

"Pierce thy heart to find the key;
With thee take
Only what none else would keep;
Learn to dream when thou dost wake,
Learn to wake when thou dost sleep."

Plough thou the rock until it bear;
Know, for thou else could'st not believe;
Lose, that the lost thou may'st receive;
Die, for none other way canst live."

Then, being further pressed for tidings of the way, the Mistress of Vision says:

"When to the new eyes of thee
All things by immortal power,
Near or far,
Hiddenly
To each other linked are,
That thou canst not stir a flower
Without troubling of a star;

O seek no more!
Pass the gates of Luthany, tread the region
Elenore."

Mr. Thompson gives in this same poem one of his favourite correspondences between all things in heaven and on the earth. He connects, by a vine-stem, the Flood with the Crucifixion, Adam with Christ:

"On Ararat there grew a vine,
When Asia from her bathing rose;
Our first sailor made a twine
Thereof for his prefiguring brows.
Canst divine

Where, upon our dusty earth, of that vine a cluster grows?"

The reply is, of course, that of the ascetic:

"On Golgotha there grew a thorn Round the long-prefigured Brows"— and from that thorn, pressed into the heart, "the tendrils start." That is the burden of the greater part of Mr. Thompson's spiritual singing, the withdrawal, the renunciation, the dread of a height from which he may fall

"To broken writhings in the shameful slime—
Lower than man, for I dreamed higher,
Thrust down by how much I aspire."

But the note that comes most majestically from Mr. Thompson is that of the reconciliation of the two natures and destinies of man. To that literal oneness Wordsworth groped in his merely "kindred points of heaven and home." Of that oneness Rossetti had the hint, and Coventry Patmore the full vision. Mr. Thompson is the heir of the poets, and he has entered fully into his inheritance. He has not picked their flowers and worn them fading; their seed has passed into his life, and they have blossomed anew. He does not imitate them, rather have they moulded him. No mere echo is he of any of them, although their voices are heard in his. This, of course, we say, of style and method mostly. In vision and judgment he is himself, even when he is most Coventry Patmore's chosen disciple, as in "The Way of a Maid":

"And while she feels the heavens lie bare,
She only talks about her hair";

in snatches of the "Orient Ode":

"Yea, thy gazes, blissful lover,
Make the beauties they discover";

in "The After Woman," and elsewhere.

Mr. Thompson's is the essential poetry of essential Christianity, and he has recaptured for his creed many a too lightly ceded citadel. If the poetry of Keats is "the wail of a dispossessed Paganism," Mr. Thompson's is, among richer things, the psalm of Paganism repossessed. He knows the evolution of things, and, as in poetry, so in religion, he is heir of ages and proud of his inheritance:

"Happiness is the shadow of things past,
Which fools still take for that which is to be!
And not all foolishly:
For all the past, read true, is prophecy,
And all the firsts are hauntings of some Last,
And all the springs are flash-lights of one Spring."

Then leaf, and flower, and fallous fruit
Shall hang together on the unyellowing bough;
And silence shall be Music mute
For her surcharged heart. Hush thou!
These things are far too sure that thou should'st dream

Thereof, lest they appear as things that seem."

So it is that in his "Orient Ode" the spiritual imagination, over which he holds uncontested mastery, finds expression in a series of amazing images, and closes with the invocation:

"Not unto thee, great Image, not to thee
Did the wise heathen bend an idle knee;
And in an age of faith grown frore
If I too shall adore,
Be it accounted unto me
A bright scintill idolatry!"

Again, in the "Ode to the Setting Sun," the poet asks after the sundown:

"Where is the throne o' the sea?
And why not dirges thee
The wind, that sings to himself as he makes stride
Lonely and terrible, on the Andréan height?
Where is the Naiad 'mid her sworded sedge?
The Nymph wan glimmering by her wan fount's verge?"

"Why withers their lament?
Their tresses tear-besprent,
Have they sighed hence with trailing garment-hem?
O sweet, O sad, O fair!
I catch your flying hair,
Draw your eyes down to me, and dream on them!"

A space and they fleet from me. Must ye fade—
O old, essential candours, ye who made
The earth a living and a radiant thing?"

The lament moves on with majesty till the end is reached—the divinising of the sun at his setting as a "type memorial" of the Crucifixion. To the sun his "constant magian" says:

"If with exultant tread
Thou foot the Eastern sea,
Or like a golden bee
Sting the West to angry red,
Thou dost image, thou dost follow
That King-Maker of Creation,
Who, ere Hellas hailed Apollo,
Gave thee, angel-god, thy station;
Thou art of Him a type memorial.
Like Him, thou hang'st in dreadful pomp of blood
Upon thy Western rood;
And His stained brow did veil like thine
to night,
Yet lift once more Its light,
And, risen, again departed from our ball,
And when It set on earth arose in Heaven."

Among other spiritual poems, the "Assumpta Maria" stands at Mr. Thompson's high-water mark. So does "Any Saint," and the two together will rank with the author's "Hound of Heaven," which has taken its place among the world's most "heart-remembered verse."

"GENERAL" INSPIRATION.

The Bible; its Meaning and Supremacy. By F. W. Farrar, D.D., F.R.S., Dean of Canterbury. (Longmans.)

THE day has gone by when Dr. Farrar was looked upon as a daring innovator. He is recognised now as a staunch Bible Christian, although, probably from habit, he clings to the pose of one who greatly dares to say what another will hardly venture to think. He is free from the taint of Popery that clings to the more modern school of Liberalism sprung from the embers of the Oxford Movement; he furnishes in each volume his due credentials of Protestantism, and makes his expected protest against "Romish" error and priestcraft; he has a facile style of popular exposition. His very limitations are a passport to the hearing of a certain wide public, and his positive qualities of scholarship and culture qualify him to be in a measure its apostle of sweetness and light.

The volume before us is interesting, not as marking any fresh advance on the part of its author, nor as the product of original research or reflection, but as a book perfectly apt to attain the end in view, produced, with the unflinching instinct of the popular theologian, at the fitting moment.

"No one," writes Dr. Farrar, "can take up a book or newspaper which contains the arguments of sceptics without seeing that nine-tenths of their case is made up of attacks upon the Bible. . . . I would fain take this quiver out of their hands and show how its broken arrows, so far from piercing the shield of Christianity, do but tinkle harmlessly on its rim. . . . What such assailants demolish so entirely to their satisfaction is not Christianity, but a mummy elaborately painted in its semblance. . . ."

Somewhat diffusely the author explains that the Bible is not so much a book as the remains of a wider literature, and that this variety is not inconsistent with an essential unity, of which the true centre is Christ. "The Bible contains an ever-advancing revelation," of which the earlier stages are "transitory and imperfect as compared with its latest developments." From the failure to recognise this fact, to us in the days of the Higher Criticism so obvious, and from the adoption of a theory of inspiration that annihilated the activity of the human faculties, arose the need of such a system of allegoric interpretation as, by the Stoics, had been applied to the Homeric poems. Thus, according to Philo, the words, "God did not rain upon the earth," signify that God did not shed the perceptions of things upon the senses; "with my staff I passed over this Jordan" means, "by discipline I have overcome baseness." From the Jewish Church the method was transmitted as a legacy to the Christian Fathers, and as time went on it received some extraordinary developments. Thus Origen elaborated a system of three-fold interpretation which reduced the exposition of Scripture to a kind of divination; and this method he pretended to justify by the text, "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life"—of which the true sense is a contrast between the Mosaic law, which threatened death to such as disobeyed it, and the spirit of the Gospel, which offers life to such as accept it.

The Manichees proved that Christ did not retain His mortal body in heaven, but left it in the sun, from Psalm xix. 4: "He hath placed His tabernacle in the sun" [Old Latin version]. Now "tabernacle" means "body," as in John i. 14: "The Word tabernacled amongst us." Nor have examples of a like extravagance been wanting in modern times. Here is a specimen of Swedenborg's exegesis:

"And Rebecca arose,—hereby is signified an elevation of the affection of truth—'and her damsels,'—hereby are signified subservient affections—'and they rode upon camels,'—hereby is signified the intellectual principle elevated above natural scientific."

It is a just comment on such a method that it "reduces large sections of the Bible to a mere abracadabra."

The Dean of Canterbury, therefore, rejecting the "organic or dictation" theory of inspiration—rejecting also those modifications of it known as the theories of "dynamic" and "illuminative" inspiration—maintains a "general" inspiration, which he thus rather vaguely describes:

"Those who hold it do not regard the inspiration of the sacred writers throughout the whole extent of Scripture as more extraordinary, transcendent, and supernatural in kind, nor even in degree, than that which is vouchsafed to other noble and holy souls. This view . . . looks upon Biblical inspiration as a thing entirely subordinate to the Divine economy. It regards the New Testament as simply the truthful record of the life and doctrine of Christ, and does not consider the action of the Holy Spirit on the heart of its writers as specifically distinct from the analogous influence which (as all admit) He exercises on the heart and intellect of all true Christian men."

Erasmus, Grotius, Perrone, Dollinger, Paley, Laud, Whately, and Alford are cited, with many others, as "more or less" supporting this view, from which it would follow that "the maintenance of the opinion that the Bible is, in every text and utterance, inerrant is no part of the Christian faith." And if it be objected that in that case it rests with the reader to sift the Divine from the human elements, the reply is that just such a necessity has been imposed, and just such a task has been accomplished, in the selection from a large number of soi-disant sacred books of such as should be accounted canonical.

A temperate chapter is devoted to the explanation of that bugbear of the Nonconformist conscience, the Higher Criticism; and another to a comparison of various Protestant documents bearing on the character of the Holy Scriptures, from which it is shown that, "whether by providential superintendency or by reasonable knowledge" on the part of those who framed them, members of the great dogmatic post-Reformation communities are not pledged to maintain that every word of Scripture is infallible and inerrant, as though it came immediately from God Himself. A protest against the use of detached fragments, "texts," is not yet out of date, and is illuminated by the agreeable narrative of a spirited old lady who, upon her deathbed, entirely declined to repent, in accordance with the advice of her spiritual adviser, alleging that "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." A chapter is devoted to "Scripture difficulties," in which (not, however, without occasional recourse to the reprobated system of allegorising) the stories of the Fall, of the Tower of Babel, of Balaam's ass, of Jonah, are treated with more or less success. The explanation of the miracle narrated in the tenth chapter of Joshua is no doubt the true one:

"In the poem [lifted from the Book of Jasher] Joshua is represented as standing on the heights of Beth-horon, uplifting his victorious spear and uttering the fine poetic apostrophe:

"Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon,
And thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon!
Till the nation have avenged themselves
upon their enemies";

which in plain prose was equivalent to a prayer that ere sunset the rout and massacre might be complete. The daylight lasted long enough for the purpose of decisive triumph. This was represented in the antistrophe of the ode by the words:

"And the Sun stood still
And the Moon stayed
Till the nation had avenged themselves upon their enemies."

To this poetic quotation the prose chronicler adds his comment (being, it would seem, of imaginative temperament): "So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day." Among the hypotheses by which commentators have sought to give vraisemblance to the supposed miracle are that there was a parhelion, or some form of refraction and semblance, and that the earth's orbit was affected by a shower of meteorites.

Dr. Farrar has collected from people so diverse as Newman and Huxley, Goethe and John Wesley, Browning and Blackstone, Mr. Gladstone and Alfred de Musset, quite a treasury of literary appreciations. Many of them are touching and eloquent, but there is one utterance so quaintly bathetic that we cannot refrain from quoting it:

"I have carefully and regularly perused these Holy Scriptures, and am of opinion that the volume, independently of its Divine origin, contains more sublimity, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains of eloquence than can be collected from all other books, in whatever language they may have been written."

No need to ask the profession of this good gentleman! Mr. Ruskin, with characteristic vehemence, has written:

"All that I have taught of Art, everything that I have written, whatever greatness there has been in any thought of mine, whatever I have done in my life, has simply been due to the fact that when I was a child my mother daily read with me a part of the Bible, and daily made me learn a part of it by heart."

The book is somewhat disorderly in its arrangement, and the din of frequent repetition obscures rather than serves to strengthen the argument; but few competent students (now that poor Dean Burgon has gone) will be found to criticise it on the score of extravagant innovation, and there is a multitude to whom it will bring strength and consolation.

GRAVITY AND LEVITY.

Some Unrecognised Laws of Nature. By Ignatius Singer and Lewis H. Berens. (John Murray.)

AMATEUR naturalists and triflers with science are now so numerous, and their literary products are usually so wearisome, that a reviewer may be pardoned for regarding a book of this kind with suspicion and impatience. A glance through the pages is sufficient in most cases to furnish evidence to justify that position; for your ordinary man with a mission lets his zeal run away with his sense, the strength of his convictions being in inverse proportion to the depth of his knowledge of the subject with which he plays. He mistakes aspiration for inspiration, as Huxley once put it; therefore, if it were worth while, he could be confounded by his own words; but it is not worth while. Once a man has publicly enunciated a theory, he is unable to weigh fairly the facts which bear upon it, and, acting in the spirit of "What I sez I sticks to," he spends the remainder of his life in magnifying the importance of things which give gravity to his conception and in belittling the mass of knowledge which tilts the beam in the opposite direction.

So much in general depreciation of well-meaning but futile efforts to illuminate the world of science. We now hasten to add that this book is in some respects an exception to the common run of literature of its class. The authors know what they are writing about, and they contribute to their subject the results of a number of experiments personally conducted by them. They are thus not mere compilers or pickers of other men's brains, but deserve rather to be classed as working students of science whose conclusions merit careful attention.

The book is "an inquiry into the causes of physical phenomena, with special reference to the law of gravitation," which asserts that all bodies attract one another with a force proportional to the quantities of matter in them. According to the theory worked out by Newton, the strength of the earth's pull upon the body of each of us depends upon the amount of substance in the earth and the quantity of material in ourselves. If the earth were made of lead, says the law of gravitation, we should be attracted to its surface with double the present intensity, and should weigh twice as much, because the mass of the attracting body would have been doubled. This statement may seem simple enough, but it is based upon fallacious argument. Because lead weighs twice as much as the average rocks which make up the earth, we conclude that it has twice the mass or quantity of matter, and that it is therefore capable of exerting twice the attracting force. The reasoning is weak throughout. It ought not to be assumed that, under all conditions, weight is proportional to mass or that the attraction of gravity is proportional to mass, while no means exist for exactly measuring mass. This apparently erroneous statement needs a few words of explanation.

If a piece of iron is hung from one spring balance and a piece of lead of equal mass from another, equal weights are, of course, indicated by the balances, and from this equality the conclusion is reached that the iron and the lead contain equal quantities of matter, or that their masses are the same. By bringing a strong magnet under the suspended metals, the apparent weight of the iron is increased, though not a particle has been added to the quantity of matter it contains. And if the magnet is held above instead of below, the iron is thereby caused to appear lighter, though nothing has been taken from it. It is not difficult to imagine a planet which contains so large a quantity of iron that a piece of iron weighs more there than it does upon the earth, even when all other causes which influence the result are taken into consideration. In short, we can conceive a planet where iron seems to be by far the heaviest metal on account of the magnetic attraction being added to the attraction due to gravity; and a planet may exist in which iron seems to be the lightest metal, on account of the upward attraction of a strongly magnetised atmosphere acting in opposition to the downward pull of gravitation.

The fact is that we have no real knowledge of what constitutes equality of mass in respect of different substances. In weighing out a pound of butter, the dairyman places a brass weight in one pan of the balance and counterpoises it with butter in the other pan; and, according to the Newtonian doctrine, both contain an equal quantity of matter. Of course, the operation proves nothing of the kind; it only proves that the butter is equivalent, not equal, to the brass weight as regards the attraction of the earth, but in no other respect can one logically be said even to be equivalent to the other. Upon another planet it is conceivable that the two substances would not equipoise each other.

How, then, can absolute mass be determined? "Any two bodies are of equal mass," says Clerk Maxwell, "if equal forces applied to these bodies produce, in equal times, equal changes of velocity." The difficulty now is to define equal forces without bringing in the idea of mass. Dynamics teaches that two forces are equal when they produce equal changes of velocity in bodies of equal mass, hence the definitions of mass and force seem to be excellent examples of reasoning in a circle, force being referred to mass while mass is calculated from force. Astronomy, which is believed to give so much support to the law of gravitation, fails at this very point. From observations of the orbits of satellites, and the perturbations occasioned by a planet, the mass of the planet is calculated.

A force of attraction does certainly exist between the various bodies in the solar system, and the strength of the force differs inversely as the square of the distance separating the bodies, but the determination of a force does not afford grounds upon which to base conclusions as to the quantity of matter. For instance, the planet Jupiter is said to have a mass about three hundred times greater than the mass of the earth; but what is actually known is that Jupiter exerts an attractive force about three hundred times stronger than the earth does. It is only by assuming that mass is in direct proportion to this attractive force that anything at all can be concluded with regard to the masses of the different members of the solar system.

The whole point of the foregoing is that one of the cardinal doctrines of gravitation—that attraction is proportional to mass—remains unproven. This leads to the very remarkable inference that mass, or what is generally known as weight, is not an invariable property of matter; for a substance has weight merely on account of the downward pull of gravity, and it may be possible to bring the particles into such a condition that the gravitational attraction upon them is lessened or altogether annulled. Wild as such a speculation will seem to the orthodox man of science, support can be found for it. Chemists know that the discovery of argon in the atmosphere, and the isolation of helium from certain minerals, have raised difficulties as to the weights of the atoms of these elements. No place can be found for argon in the table in which other elements are systematically arranged according to the weights of their atoms.

However, as a tentative method of explaining the anomalous character of argon in regard to this periodic arrangement of elements, Prof. Ramsay recently suggested that temperature or peculiar electrical condition may make atoms lighter or heavier than they would otherwise be. By a strange coincidence, this is precisely the position taken up by the authors of the present work, and to substantiate it they describe a number of experiments of their own which seem to show that temperature really has an influence upon gravitational attraction. If this is established, there is no knowing to what wonderful applications it will lead. It may be possible to transform a heavy body into a light one by making it hot, or by altering its electric potential; so that, without undue exercise of the imagination, we can look forward to the epoch when everyone will be able to rise into the air by sitting on a square of metal or in a car which can be given levity by turning on the force which counteracts gravitational attraction.

Our notice must now be brought to a conclusion. In reading the work we frequently became impatient with the authors because of their diffuse style of writing, and in many cases imperfect knowledge. They labour to destroy the two-fluid theory of electricity, though scarcely a physicist now believes in it; and much of their work is devoted to combating similar obsolete ideas. We have scored dozens of statements which are open to severe criticism, and it was more with the intention to curse than to bless that we sat down to write this notice.

But as we wrote, the conclusion was borne in upon us that the authors have probed a weak point in physical theory. At first sight their opinions appear not to deserve an hour's consideration, but we leave the book with less faith in the law of gravitation than we had when we began to read it.

MR. STEPHEN CRANE'S NEW BOOK.

The Third Violet. By Stephen Crane. (Heinemann.)

A PRECIPITATE outpouring of lively pictures, a spontaneous dazzle of colour, a frequent success in the quest of the right word and phrase, were among the qualities which won for The Red Badge of Courage immediate recognition as the product of genius. It was felt to be the work of one who had sought deep down in his inner consciousness for the thought and for the image, and had been rigorous in rejecting inadequate expression. These qualities, with less of their excess, are manifest in the The Third Violet; and the sincere psychology, the scientific analysis, which in the earlier work lay at the root of the treatment of its subject-matter, are no less sure in the author's portrayal of more daily emotions—the hackneyed, yet never to be outworn, themes of a man's love, a woman's modesty, and the snobbery which is very near to us all. Of the hundreds who strive after this inward vision, and this power of just expression, once in a decade of years, or in a score, one attains to them; and the result is literature.

The artist, Billie Hawker, the son of a poor farmer, fell in love with Grace Fanhall, a rich heiress, when she paid a visit to the village where his parents lived. It was in the "stage" that he met her. With his artist's equipment, he was to pay a summer visit to his father's farm; and she, with her sister-in-law and her brother's children, was to spend some months of summer weather at the Hemlock Inn. As his eyes lighted on her, "a wave of astonishment whirled into his hair." No sooner was he seated than his humiliation began. The driver, whose "tone to his passengers was always a yell," identified him. "He glanced furtively down the stage. She was apparently deep in talk with the mother of the children." When he reached home, the door of the lighted kitchen was opened, and Hawker "saw his two sisters shading their eyes and peering down the yellow stream." "The girls clamoured sentences at him." "Saw your illustrations in the May number of Perkinson's," said his father, "and then added, quite weakly, 'Pretty good.'" When he opened his bedroom window, "on the black brow of the mountain, he could see two long rows of twinkling dots, which marked the position of Hemlock Inn." At this hostelry was a writing man, Hollenden by name. "Say, Hawker," he said suddenly, "why don't you marry Miss Fanhall?" And in an experimental spirit of Puckish amity he devoted himself to inflaming and irritating the passion of his friend.

"Hollenden saw a dramatic situation in the distance, and with a bright smile he studied it. "Say," he exclaimed, "suppose she should not go to the picnic to-morrow? She said this morning she did not know if she could go. Somebody was expected from New York, I think. Wouldn't it break you up though—eh?"

"And rivals too! The woods must be crowded with them. A girl like that, you know! And then all that money! Say, your rivals must number enough to make a brigade of militia."

"Hawker seemed overcome with a deep dislike of himself. . . .

"Confound you for a meddling, gabbling idiot!" cried Hawker suddenly.

"Hollenden replied:

"What did you do with that violet she dropped at the side of the tennis-court yesterday?"

That was the first violet. The second was a free gift.

"Hawker turned to the girl:

"I—I—I shall miss you dreadfully."

"She turned to look at him, and smiled.

"Shall you?" she said, in a low voice.

"Yes," he said.

"Thereafter he stood before her awkwardly, and in silence. She scrutinised the boards of the floor. Suddenly she drew a violet from a cluster of them upon her gown, and thrust it out to him."

Here is another colloquy between this quaint couple:

"You are very unreasonable. If I were you—an heiress—

"The girl flushed, and turned upon him angrily.

"Well!" he glowered back at her. "You are, you know. You can't deny it."

"She looked at the red-stained crags. At last she said:

"You seemed really contemptuous."

"Well, I assure you that I do not feel contemptuous. On the contrary, I am filled with admiration. Thank Heaven, I am a man of the world! Whenever I meet heiresses I always have the deepest admiration."

"As he said this, he wore a brave hang-dog expression."

This was the rock upon which he split. He followed her back to New York, hoping nothing; for, in spite of the pains the girl had taken to disabuse his mind—she had even accepted a lift in his father's ox-wagon—he was entirely possessed with the notion that "general poverty" was a fatal disqualification. Then follows a series of episodes, representing the Latin Quarter life of New York, the organic connexion of which with the story at large is slight. But Mr. Crane has a method of his own, and his work is to be judged by the effectiveness of his results. Also—and for this the author cannot fairly be held responsible—they unpleasantly remind one of a far too immortal work: for there is in the group of Billie Hawker's chums—besides his brother artists, Wrinkless, Grief, and Penny—an engaging model, Florinda by name (by nickname Splutter), who is extremely attached to him. These friends and this adoring damsel watch Billie's out-goings and in-comings; and their grotesque comments and sham reticence are a novel and piquant medium of information.

Even the gift of the third violet—so strongly is his prejudice against himself entrenched—he interprets into an insolent triumphing over the hopelessness of his passion. Very delicately the inarticulate crisis of mutual intelligence arrives, and "later she told him that he was perfectly ridiculous."

Mr. Crane's dialogue, so far at least as it has sentiment for an element, depends for its charm upon the absolute assurance of its fitness for the purpose and the people. In the same way the brilliant rays he throws from moment to moment upon the insensible environment of his characters are a joy, not as bearing any mystic or symbolical relation to the narrative in which they occur; the sky is not clouded when his hero's prospects are overcast, nor do the clouds pour out water when his heroine weeps: they are effective because inanimate nature is pictured with just such flashes of observation as the senses will still busily register while the intellect, so far as it is the servant of the will, is concentrated wholly upon a different matter. Human fates and passions thus are shown in their due proportion, in their right relation—none the less all-important to their patients because, to all appearance, nugatory in the general process.

By this latest product of his genius our impression of Mr. Crane is confirmed: that for psychological insight, for dramatic intensity, and for potency of phrase he is already in the front rank of English and American writers of fiction; and that he possesses a certain separate quality which places him apart. It is a short story and a slender; but taking it in conjunction with what he has previously given us, there remains, in our judgment, no room for doubt.

MALAY AND NEGRITO CHARACTERISTICS.

In Court and Kampong, being Tales and Sketches of Native Life in the Malay Peninsula. By Hugh Clifford. (Grant Richards.)

HITHERTO Mr. Hugh Clifford has been chiefly known in the official world as an efficient political agent in the Native States lying within the British section of the Malay Peninsula, and to a small circle of students as the author of several valuable papers on the anthropology of the same region contributed to the Journal of the Straits Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society. But with the present work he at once takes a high place, both as an English prose writer and as a trustworthy exponent of the social life of the rude Negrito aborigines and later Malay intruders in the Peninsula. The tales, incidents, and personal reminiscences here brought together are set forth in language which, for dramatic effect and splendour of diction, may compare with the vivid scenes depicted in Mr. W. H. Hudson's Idle Days in Patagonia. But their scientific value, for they present a series of life-like pictures drawn from nature in illustration of social relations which, under the irresistible advance of European influences, are rapidly disappearing, at least from the settled districts.

"My stories," says the writer, "deal with natives of all classes; dwellers in the courts of kings; peasants in their kampungs, or villages, by the rivers and the rice-fields; and with the fisher-folk on the seashore. I have tried to describe these things as they appear when viewed from the inside, as I have myself seen them during the many dreary years that I have spent in the wilder parts of the Malay Peninsula. . . . The conditions of life of which I write, more especially in those sketches and tales which deal with native society in an

GRAVITY AND LEVITY.

Some Unrecognised Laws of Nature. By Ignatius Singer and Lewis H. Berens. (John Murray.)

AMATEUR naturalists and triflers with science are now so numerous, and their literary products are usually so wearisome, that a reviewer may be pardoned for regarding a book of this kind with suspicion and impatience. A glance through the pages is sufficient in most cases to furnish evidence to justify that position; for your ordinary man with a mission lets his zeal run away with his sense, the strength of his convictions being in inverse proportion to the depth of his knowledge of the subject with which he plays. He mistakes aspiration for inspiration, as Huxley once put it; therefore, if it were worth while, he could be confounded by his own words; but it is not worth while. Once a man has publicly enunciated a theory, he is unable to weigh fairly the facts which bear upon it, and, acting in the spirit of "What I sez I sticks to," he spends the remainder of his life in magnifying the importance of things which give gravity to his conception and in belittling the mass of knowledge which tilts the beam in the opposite direction.

So much in general depreciation of well-meaning but futile efforts to illuminate the world of science. We now hasten to add that this book is in some respects an exception to the common run of literature of its class. The authors know what they are writing about, and they contribute to their subject the results of a number of experiments personally conducted by them. They are thus not mere compilers or pickers of other men's brains, but deserve rather to be classed as working students of science whose conclusions merit careful attention.

The book is "an inquiry into the causes of physical phenomena, with special reference to the law of gravitation," which asserts that all bodies attract one another with a force proportional to the quantities of matter in them. According to the theory worked out by Newton, the strength of the earth's pull upon the body of each of us depends upon the amount of substance in the earth and the quantity of material in ourselves. If the earth were made of lead, says the law of gravitation, we should be attracted to its surface with double the present intensity, and should weigh twice as much, because the mass of the attracting body would have been doubled. This statement may seem simple enough, but it is based upon fallacious argument. Because lead weighs twice as much as the average rocks which make up the earth, we conclude that it has twice the mass or quantity of matter, and that it is therefore capable of exerting twice the attracting force. The reasoning is weak throughout. It ought not to be assumed that, under all conditions, weight is proportional to mass or that the attraction of gravity is proportional to mass, while no means exist for exactly measuring mass. This apparently erroneous statement needs a few words of explanation.

If a piece of iron is hung from one

spring balance and a piece of lead of equal mass from another, equal weights are, of course, indicated by the balances, and from this equality the conclusion is reached that the iron and the lead contain equal quantities of matter, or that their masses are the same. By bringing a strong magnet under the suspended metals, the apparent weight of the iron is increased, though not a particle has been added to the quantity of matter it contains. And if the magnet is held above instead of below, the iron is thereby caused to appear lighter, though nothing has been taken from it. It is not difficult to imagine a planet which contains so large a quantity of iron that a piece of iron weighs more there than it does upon the earth, even when all other causes which influence the result are taken into consideration. In short, we can conceive a planet where iron seems to be by far the heaviest metal on account of the magnetic attraction being added to the attraction due to gravity; and a planet may exist in which iron seems to be the lightest metal, on account of the upward attraction of a strongly magnetised atmosphere acting in opposition to the downward pull of gravitation.

The fact is that we have no real knowledge of what constitutes equality of mass in respect of different substances. In weighing out a pound of butter, the dairyman places a brass weight in one pan of the balance and counterpoises it with butter in the other pan; and, according to the Newtonian doctrine, both contain an equal quantity of matter. Of course, the operation proves nothing of the kind; it only proves that the butter is equivalent, not equal, to the brass weight as regards the attraction of the earth, but in no other respect can one logically be said even to be equivalent to the other. Upon another planet it is conceivable that the two substances would not equipoise each other.

How, then, can absolute mass be determined? "Any two bodies are of equal mass," says Clerk Maxwell, "if equal forces applied to these bodies produce, in equal times, equal changes of velocity." The difficulty now is to define equal forces without bringing in the idea of mass. Dynamics teaches that two forces are equal when they produce equal changes of velocity in bodies of equal mass, hence the definitions of mass and force seem to be excellent examples of reasoning in a circle, force being referred to mass while mass is calculated from force. Astronomy, which is believed to give so much support to the law of gravitation, fails at this very point. From observations of the orbits of satellites, and the perturbations occasioned by a planet, the mass of the planet is calculated.

A force of attraction does certainly exist between the various bodies in the solar system, and the strength of the force differs inversely as the square of the distance separating the bodies, but the determination of a force does not afford grounds upon which to base conclusions as to the quantity of matter. For instance, the planet Jupiter is said to have a mass about three hundred times greater than the mass of the earth; but what is actually known is that Jupiter exerts an attractive force about three hundred times stronger than the earth does. It is only by assuming that mass is in direct proportion to this attractive force that anything at all can be concluded with regard to the masses of the different members of the solar system.

The whole point of the foregoing is that one of the cardinal doctrines of gravitation—that attraction is proportional to mass—remains unproven. This leads to the very remarkable inference that mass, or what is generally known as weight, is not an invariable property of matter; for a substance has weight merely on account of the downward pull of gravity, and it may be possible to bring the particles into such a condition that the gravitational attraction upon them is lessened or altogether annulled. Wild as such a speculation will seem to the orthodox man of science, support can be found for it. Chemists know that the discovery of argon in the atmosphere, and the isolation of helium from certain minerals, have raised difficulties as to the weights of the atoms of these elements. No place can be found for argon in the table in which other elements are systematically arranged according to the weights of their atoms.

However, as a tentative method of explaining the anomalous character of argon in regard to this periodic arrangement of elements, Prof. Ramsay recently suggested that temperature or peculiar electrical condition may make atoms lighter or heavier than they would otherwise be. By a strange coincidence, this is precisely the position taken up by the authors of the present work, and to substantiate it they describe a number of experiments of their own which seem to show that temperature really has an influence upon gravitational attraction. If this is established, there is no knowing to what wonderful applications it will lead. It may be possible to transform a heavy body into a light one by making it hot, or by altering its electric potential; so that, without undue exercise of the imagination, we can look forward to the epoch when every one will be able to rise into the air by sitting on a square of metal or in a car which can be given levity by turning on the force which counteracts gravitational attraction.

Our notice must now be brought to a conclusion. In reading the work we frequently became impatient with the authors because of their diffuse style of writing, and in many cases imperfect knowledge. They labour to destroy the two-fluid theory of electricity, though scarcely a physicist now believes in it; and much of their work is devoted to combating similar obsolete ideas. We have scored dozens of statements which are open to severe criticism, and it was more with the intention to curse than to bless that we sat down to write this notice.

But as we wrote, the conclusion was borne in upon us that the authors have probed a weak point in physical theory. At first sight their opinions appear not to deserve an hour's consideration, but we leave the book with less faith in the law of gravitation than we had when we began to read it.

a planet
the heaviest c attraction on due to t in which metal, on a strongly opposition on.

real know-
ty of mass
In weigh-dairyman an of the h butter in the New-an equal operation uly proves equal, to raction of can one valent to t is conould not be deter-of equal al forces

n equal
The without ynamics en they bodies

man of science, support can be Chemists know that the dissem-in the atmosphere, and the influfrom certain minerals, have raised as to the weights of the atoms ments. No place can be found in the table in which other elements atically arranged according to
of their atoms.

However, as a tentative methplaining the anomalous charac-
in regard to this periodic array elements, Prof. Ramsay recently that temperature or peculiar condition may make atoms lighter than they would otherwise be. By coincidence, this is precisely the taken up by the authors of the work, and to substantiate it they a number of experiments of their seem to show that temperature has influence upon gravitational attraction. If this is established, there is no what wonderful applications it may be possible to transform a into a light one by making it altering its electric potential; so out undue exercise of the imagination can look forward to the epoch when one will be able to rise into the air on a square of metal or in a car be given levity by turning it which counteracts gravitational attraction.

Our notice must now be brought to a close. In reading the work we the treatment of its subject-matter, are no less sure in the author's portrayal of more daily emotions—of the hackneyed, yet never to be outworn, themes of a man's love, a woman's modesty, and the snobbery which is very near to us all. Of the hundreds who strive after this inward vision, and this power of just expression, once in a decade of years, or in a score, one attains to them;

and the result is literature.

The artist, Billie Hawker, the son of a poor farmer, fell in love with Grace Fanhall, a rich heiress, when she paid a visit to the village where his parents lived. It was in the "stage" that he met her. With his artist's equipment, he was to pay a summer visit to his father's farm; and she, with her sister-in-law and her brother's children, was to spend some months of summer weather at the Hemlock Inn. As his eyes lighted on her, "a wave of astonishment whirled into his hair." No sooner was he seated than his humiliation began. The driver, whose "tone to his passengers was always a yell," identified him. "He glanced furtively down the stage. She was apparently deep in talk with the mother of the children." When he reached home, the door of the lighted kitchen was opened, and Hawker "saw his two sisters shading their eyes and peering down the yellow stream."
"The girls clamoured sentences at him."
"Saw your illustrations in the May number of Perkinson's," said his father,
"and then added, quite weakly, 'Pretty good.'" When he opened his bedroom window, "on the black brow of the moun-

Here is another colloquy between this quaint couple:

"You are very unreasonable. If I were you—an heiress—"

"The girl flushed, and turned upon him angrily."

"Well!" he glowered back at her. "You are, you know. You can't deny it."

"She looked at the red-stained crags. At last she said:

"You seemed really contemptuous."

"Well, I assure you that I do not feel contemptuous. On the contrary, I am filled with admiration. Thank Heaven, I am a man of the world! Whenever I meet heiresses I always have the deepest admiration."

"As he said this, he wore a brave hang-dog expression."

This was the rock upon which he split.
He followed her back to New York, hoping nothing; for, in spite of the pains the girl had taken to disabuse his mind—she had even accepted a lift in his father's oxwaggon—he was entirely possessed with the notion that "general poverty" was a fatal disqualification. Then follows a series of episodes, representing the Latin Quarter life of New York, the organic connexion of which with the story at large is slight. But Mr.
Crane has a method of his own, and his work is to be judged by the effectiveness of his results. Also—and for this the author cannot fairly be held responsible—they unpleasantly remind one of a far too immortal work: for there is in the group of Billie Hawker's chums—besides his brother artists, Wrink-less, Grief, and Penny—an engaging model.

For psychological insight, for dramatic intensity, and for potency of phrase he is already in the front rank of English and American writers of fiction; and that he possesses a certain separate quality which places him apart. It is a short story and a slender; but taking it in conjunction with what he has previously given us, there remains, in our judgment, no room for doubt.

MALAY AND NEGRITO CHARACTERISTICS.

In Court and Kampong, being Tales and Sketches of Native Life in the Malay Peninsula. By Hugh Clifford. (Grant Richards.)

HITHERTO Mr. Hugh Clifford has been chiefly known in the official world as an efficient political agent in the Native States lying within the British section of the Malay Peninsula, and to a small circle of students as the author of several valuable papers on the anthropology of the same region contributed to the Journal of the Straits Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society.
But with the present work he at once takes a high place, both as an English prose writer and as a trustworthy exponent of the social life of the rude Negrito aborigines and later Malay intruders in the Peninsula.
The tales, incidents, and personal reminiscences here brought together are set forth in language which, for dramatic effect and independent Malay state, are rapidly passing away."

The work not being a formal treatise on the intricate ethnical relations of the Peninsula, the general reader will be puzzled by many allusions and incidental references to such tribal names as Sémang, Sákai, Se-noi, and others, with which even professed students are not over-familiar. Hence it may perhaps add to their enjoyment of the book if we here briefly explain that the inhabitants of the Peninsula form two absolutely distinct groups, the dwarfish, black, woolly-haired Negrito aborigines, and the taller, brown, lank-haired Malays, and that owing to secular interminglings almost every shade of transition is met with between these two stocks, and between their respective planes of culture. The full-blood Negritos, who are noted for a degree of prognathism exceeding that of any other race, are known in the different districts by a multiplicity of tribal names, regarding which much confusion prevails in ethnological writings. Here it must suffice to state that north of the Plus and Pérak rivers they take the collective name of Sémang, and farther south, that of Sákai, these latter forming in the Pahang district the two somewhat distinct groups, Se-noi and Tembe. In general the Sémangs are the most primitive, and hence are often raided and plundered, especially by those Sákai groups which have become most assimilated in speech and usages to their relatively civilised Malay neighbours. Otherwise there is little to choose between them, and equally to both applies the instructive account given by Mr. Abraham Hale of the primitive spirit-worship prevalent among the Sákai of the Pérak river:

"The Hautues [spirits] of the forest, of the mountains, of the rivers, of the winds, also the Hautues of Malay and Sákai chiefs who had died, also the Hautues of head-ache, of stomach-ache, the Hautues that caused his people to gamble, to make opium, and who sent all sorts of disputes, and who sent mosquitoes. He prayed to these Hautues to be kind to him and his people—to send plenty of food to eat, and not to send any evil things" (Jour. Anthropol. Inst., 1885, p. 300).

All these jungle-dwellers have an instinctive foreboding of their approaching doom—a sentiment which is embodied in the subjoined lines here quoted from The Song of the Last Sémangs, elsewhere published by Mr. Clifford:

"The paths are rough, the trails are blind,
The Jungle People tread;
The yams are scarce and hard to find
With which our folk are fed.
We suffer yet a little space,
Until we pass away—
The relics of an ancient race
That ne'er has had its day."

A visit paid by the author to a camp of the Upper Pérak Sémangs has inspired more than one vivid picture, such as the night-scene, when

"around us the forest rose black and impenetrable, the shadows deepened by the firelight of the camp. In the clear sky overhead the glorious Eastern stars were shining steadfastly, and at our feet a tiny stream pattered busily on the pebbles of its bed. Around the fire, and reddened by its light, sat or lay my three Malays, bare to the waist, but clothed in their bright sarongs and loose short trousers. The Sémangs, of both sexes and all ages, coal black, save where the gleams of the fire painted them a dull red, and nude, save for a narrow strip of coarse bark cloth twisted round their loins, lay on their stomachs with their chins propped upon their elbows, or squatted on their hams, smoking placidly. . . . A race which, though it first possessed the East, with all its possibilities and riches, could utilise none of them, and whose members carry in their eyes the melancholy look of dumb animals, which, when seen on the human countenance, denotes a people who are doomed to speedy extinction, and who, never since time began, have had their day or have played a part in human history" (p. 176).

But most attention is naturally claimed by the East Coast Malays, those especially of Trénggánu, Kélan, and Pahang, who have been hitherto least affected by Western influences, and among whom Mr. Clifford has for years lived in the closest intimacy as British Resident in Pahang. As a mere specimen of word-painting it would not be easy to quote anything much finer than the passage in which he describes his first approach from Singapore to these secluded shores of the China Sea:

"Sailing up the coast in a native craft, you may almost fancy yourself one of the early explorers skirting the lovely shores of some undiscovered country. As you sprawl on the bamboo decking under the shadow of the immense palm-leaf sail—which is so ingeniously rigged that, if taken aback, the boat must turn turtle, unless, by the blessing of the gods, the mast parts asunder—you look out through half-closed eyelids at a very beautiful coast. The waves dance, and glimmer, and shine in the sunlight, the long stretch of sand is yellow as a buttercup, and the fringes of graceful casuarina trees quiver like aspens in the breeze, and shimmer in the heat haze. The wash of the waves against the boat's side, and the ripple of the bow make music in your drowsy ears, and as you glide through cluster after cluster of thickly-wooded islands, you lie in that delightful comatose state in which you have all the pleasure of existence with none of the labour of living" (p. 8).

A specially delightful chapter is that devoted to the simple fisher-folk of these Eastern waters: but yesterday dreaded corsairs, to-day peaceful "toilers on the deep." And here again a snatch from another of the author's rhymes, The Song of the Fisher Folk:

"A palm-leaf sail that stretches wide,
A sea that's running strong,
A boat that dips its laving side,
The forefoot's rippling song.
A flaming sky, a crimson flood,
Here's joy for body and mind,
As in our canting crafts we scud
With a spanking breeze behind."

In the sharpest contrast to these pleasant scenes of quiet industry are the thrilling tales of blood and lawlessness, of treachery, abductions, intrigues, of princely oppression and ruthless vengeance, with which the better part of this fascinating book is crowded, and which are intended to illustrate the true national temperament of the free-born Malay as yet unmodified by contact with European culture. These tales, however, would be more valuable from the ethnological standpoint were not some of them obviously, and even confessedly, coloured by a rich imagination, which has evidently here and there refused to be confined to sober fact. Hence folklorists and students of racial characters will read with a feeling akin to regret that "all are more or less founded on fact," while for the accuracy of several "others are responsible, and I can only be held responsible for the framing of the picture." In future editions, which must surely be called for, these "others" should certainly be named, or at least a clear line should be drawn between fact and fiction. It would really be a relief to learn, for instance, that the horrors of those native prisons have been somewhat accentuated, although we are well aware that enough will remain to point the finger of scorn at the apathetic British administration, which still tolerates such unspeakable abominations. Occasion might also be taken to supply an index, and to correct a few misprints, such as Pérak for "Pérak," práhu for "práhu," Gahang for "Pahang," doubles ententes. In general, the orthography is that of a scholar thoroughly acquainted with the Malay language. But if it is necessary to accent Sultán, why not also Celébes? And on what principle are raiyat and ádat substituted for the usual and strictly correct ra'iyat and 'ádat, although, however written, no Malay will ever be got to pronounce such Arabic words properly.

LITERATURE AND MUSIC.

In Praise of Music: an Anthology. Prepared by Charles Sayle. (Eliot Stock.)

It was a happy idea to collect some of the compliments which literature has paid to music. Nor could Mr. Sayle have done better than follow, as he does with due acknowledgment, the plan on which Mr. Alexander Ireland constructed his charming Book Lover's Enchiridion. We have only one complaint to make against Mr. Sayle's execution of his task. It was surely unnecessary to print the original texts of Greek and Latin authors as well as translations. If the latter are good—and we have not critically examined them—they might well have stood alone in a book of this kind; and then Mr. Sayle need not have told us that considerations of space prevented the inclusion of Browning's "Abt Vogler," "Charles Avison," and other pieces. The twenty pages or so which would have been gained by this economy might also have saved Dryden's "Alexander's Feast" from omission. Mr. Sayle does not even mention it. We are privately grieved, too, that the passage in Charles Lamb's "Chapter on Ears" beginning—"When my friend commences upon one of those solemn anthems" is either crowded out or contemned. However, Mr. Sayle inserts the confession, very like Elia's, of one T. Twining, who, in a book called A Country Clergyman of the Eighteenth Century, which Lamb may well have read, says:

"All entertainments—plays, concerts, operas, oratorios—are too long for me. Music has been, and is, one of the greatest charms of my life, and nothing has fatigued me oftener."

That was Elia's confession in the mouth of an avowed lover of music.

De Quincey could discover only two passages in all literature in which music had been adequately treated; the well-known passage in the first scene of Twelfth Night and one in Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Laici. Mr. Sayle's familiarity with this judgment (which he quotes) has not discouraged him from filling nearly three hundred pages with passages of prose and verse in praise of music. He begins with the Bible, and gives us, besides several noble passages from the canonical books, this admirable piece of advice from Ecclesiasticus:

"If thou be made the master [of a feast] lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care for them and so sit down. . . . Speak, thou that art the elder, for it becometh thee—but with sound judgment; and hinder not musick. Pour not out words where there is a musician, and show not forth wisdom out of time. A concert of musick in a banquet of wine is as a signet of carbuncle set in gold. As a signet of an emerald set in a work of gold, so is the melody of musick, with pleasant wine."

From the Bible Mr. Sayle proceeds through the Greek and Latin classics and the mediæval writers to the high road of English literature—Musæus to Mr. Watson! It must be confessed that while there is everything to justify Mr. Sayle's collection there is much to excuse De Quincey's exaggerated view of the failure of literature to render an account of the feelings excited by music. If it is significant that of De Quincey's two chosen passages one is in prose, it is not less significant that Mr. Sayle's industry has resulted in a volume in which, as nearly as we can judge, the proportion of prose to poetry is as two to one. It would seem that Literature has paid its homage to Music with a prose humility. "Music," said Lamartine, "is the literature of the heart; it commences where speech ends." Among Mr. Sayle's poetical gleanings shines the following beautiful transfusion, by the late M. Du Maurier, of a little poem by Sully Prudhomme:

"Kindly watcher by my bed, lift no voice in prayer,
Waste not any words on me when the hour is nigh,
Let a stream of melody but flow from some sweet player,
And meekly will I lay my head and fold my hands to die.

"Sick am I of idle words, past all reconciling,
Words that weary and perplex and pander and conceal,
Wake the sounds that cannot lie, for all their sweet beguiling;
The language one need fathom not, but only hear and feel.

"Let them roll once more to me, and ripple in my hearing,
Like waves upon some lonely beach where no craft anchoreth:
That I may steep my soul therein, and craving nought, nor fearing,
Drift on through slumber to a dream, and through a dream to death."

This poem should be known to every lover of music.

AN AMERICAN'S WIFE.

A Woman's Part in a Revolution. By Mrs. John Hays Hammond. (Longmans.)

SINCE Mrs. Grimwood's story of the dreadful Manipur business no such poignantly dramatic "human document" has been published as Mrs. Hays Hammond's narrative of the abortive Johannesburg revolution, and the part she and her husband played in it. The realities of the situation, as it affected the Reform leaders, have even now hardly come home to the British public, engrossed overmuch in Dr. Jameson and the raiders only. But the American public, to whom this book is addressed, will, we should imagine, read Mrs. Hays Hammond's volume with certain definite impressions. That the Transvaal Republic really is a bullying oligarchy; that its prisons are fit only for Kaffirs, but that American gentlemen have to put up with them; that the British Government was exceedingly "funky" about speaking plainly to the little Republic over which it is suzerain (we observed in a Chicago paper only the other day a statement that Kruger was the one man John Bull was afraid of); that Mr. Chamberlain's applications for consideration on behalf of the prisoners were not of much use, but that "our Mr. Olney" had only to speak to be listened to; and that it is an American woman who has written this book, and has gone through those trials and troubles with such real grit and pluck and such honour to American womanhood—these, we fancy, will be some of the impressions of an American, and we record them in order that British readers may ask what effect they may have. For our own part, we take Mrs. Hammond's record not as a political pamphlet, not necessarily as a conclusive record of evidence, but as a most interesting self-revelation—the revelation of a wife of whom any man might be proud; a woman who stands by her husband in sickness or health, devoted, plucky, self-controlled, with a mother's heart and a man's brain.

Mrs. Hammond's volume is full of dramatic incidents; in fact, it contains nothing else; it palpitates, as the jargon is, with actuality. An English reader finds some of her notes and impressions rather odd. She found it wonderful, "as an American woman who retained a vivid recollection of Presidential elections," to see the two sides agreeing to an armistice over the Sabbath. President Kruger, she says, kept the Boers from storming Johannesburg by only promising each a new suit of clothes; "these they had since been seen carrying, tied to the cantle of their saddles." She appreciates the gentlemanly action of Lieutenant de Korte, her husband's gaoler, when through ill-health he had been removed to his own home—"he never wore his uniform in the house." Another of the gaolers she could never tolerate; "his voice was unpleasant, and he had a hard, high nose, and I do not fancy people with hard, high noses." Mrs. Hammond's two interviews with Mr. Kruger must be quoted entire. The first was when she went to ask for clemency.

"I was a woman from the enemy's camp. At the further end of the long room sat a large, sallow-skinned man with long, grizzled hair, swept abruptly up from his forehead. His eyes, which were keen, were partly obscured by heavy, swollen lids. The nose was massive, but not handsome. The thin-lipped mouth was large and flexible, and showed both sweetness and firmness. A fine mouth. He wore a beard. It was President Kruger. He was filling a pipe from his moleskin pouch, and I noticed that his broad stooping shoulders ended in arms abnormally long. We shook hands, and he continued to fill his pipe. I spoke slowly, Mr. Grobler interpreting. I explained that I had not come to talk politics. 'No, no politics,' interrupted the President in a thick, loud voice. Nor had I come to ask favour for my husband; but I had come as a woman and daughter of a Republic to ask him to continue the clemency which he had thus far shown, and to thank Mrs. Kruger for the tears she had shed when Johannesburg was in peril. President Kruger relaxed a little. 'That is true, she did weep.' He fixed me with his shrewd glance. 'Where were you?' he asked abruptly. 'I was in Johannesburg with my husband.' 'Were you not afraid?' 'Yes, those days have robbed me of my youth.' 'What did you think I was going to do?' 'I hoped you would come to an understanding with the Reformers.' His face darkened. 'I was disappointed that the Americans went against me,' he said. I was seized with one of those sudden and unaccountable panics, and from sheer embarrassment—my mood was far too tragic to admit of flippancy, blurted out, 'You must come to America, Mr. President, as soon as all this trouble is settled, and see how we manage matters.' Kruger's face lighted up with interest. 'I am too old to go so far.' 'No man is older than his brain, Mr. President'; and Kruger, who knew that in all the trouble he had shown the mental vigour of a man in his prime, accepted my praise with a hearty laugh. I stood to go. President Kruger rose, removed his pipe, and, coughing violently, gave me his hand."

The second interview was after the death-sentence, and it was suggested that a visit from Mrs. Hammond might reinforce the petition cabled over from America.

"The interview lasted five minutes, and was perfectly meaningless. I suppose it was meant to be that. Ten fathoms down, under many other things, I could see that Kruger had strong heart qualities. Educated and morally matured, he would be one of those grand characters who make epochs in the world's history. We shook hands at parting, and went out of each other's lives for ever."

We need not analyse Mrs. Hammond's volume at length. It is the first inside description of the imprisonment of the Reform leaders, done by a graphic pen, and with many observant little touches of local colour. But it is primarily the faithful picture of a woman in a crisis. A notable picture. We may say one of the pictures of the year.

The public at large knows so little of the true nature of the Boers and their President, and is so at the mercy of partisans who do not hesitate to misrepresent where their interests are likely to flourish from misrepresentations, that we should like to see Mrs. Hays Hammond's book widely read. The story of the Johannesburg revolt, told truthfully from within, is a very necessary document just now.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Pantalas, and What They Did with Him. By Edward Jenkins. (Bentley & Son.)

THOSE who remember Ginx's Baby and The Devil's Chain know what to expect from a new book by Mr. Jenkins. They know him for a critical onlooker upon life, intensely interested in Society and its problems, witty, sarcastic, fearless, shrewd, far-sighted, with an unusual capacity of forcible expression. In Pantalas Mr. Jenkins is at his best. His hero, called variously Pantalas and Bully Monster, is the personification of General Booth's "submerged tenth," and the satire takes the form of a narrative showing with what futility the amelioration of this creature was attempted by certain philanthropists, among them Mr. Cadman, of the local vestry; the Rev. Jonadab Bumpus, the famous Nonconformist preacher; Mr. Styles Mack, secretary of the Censors of Charity; Mr. Westcott, the eminent sociologist; Boanerges, the collectivist; Prelewski, the anarchist; and, lastly, the Generalissimo of the Holy Militia. All fail, and the story of their failure, though grim enough, is most entertaining. It is full of salt; Mr. Jenkins does not mince words, and he has delightful audacity and humour. The portrait of Mr. Westcott, the sociologist, whose disguise will very easily be penetrated, is a gem, and we have read few more diverting things than the Generalissimo's account of his regeneration scheme. Indeed, Mr. Jenkins is the most searching critic that the Salvation Army has yet encountered. Pantalas should be read by all persons interested in social reform: it is terribly true. In the last four pages Mr. Jenkins offers his own explanation of the failure of all attempts to succour Pantalas, and proffers advice to the reformers still to come; but they are not in the least likely to take it.

English Portraits. A Series of Lithographed Drawings. By Will Rothenstein. (Grant Richards.)

FOR presentments of our public men from life it is necessary to go to the picture galleries or to Vanity Fair. Mr. Will Rothenstein, whose crayon drawings of his friends have been not the least interesting feature of certain recent exhibitions, now proposes to add another to these venues. He is preparing a series of lithographed portraits of eminent persons, which Mr. Grant Richards will issue in wrappers, two at a time, with accompanying letterpress. The first number lies before us. Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Thomas Hardy are the sitters. Mr. Rothenstein's work is more deft than pleasing—he is too fond of non-essential scratchy lines, but the likenesses in both cases are good. Mr. Hardy is perhaps over-sinister in expression, but he would be recognised from this picture by anyone hitherto a stranger to him. The brief introduction supplied to each drawing, although good, might be wittier. We quote Mr. Hardy's:

"Mr. Thomas Hardy is a Dorsetshire man pushed to the point of genius. Born near Dorchester in 1840, he has taught his native county to realise itself in literature. Body, soul, and spirit, Mr. Hardy is a typical, though glorified, West Countryman. He has chosen the name of Wessex for the trade-mark of his novels; but it is really the popular and Celtic element of the West Country that he has enshrined in his life and work, not the aristocratic West Saxon or Norman factor. He knows the people, and he makes them live for us. He has the delicacy of touch that is innate with his folk; he has also the idyllic instinct, the pessimistic and almost fatalistic vein (which he shares with Jefferies), and the power of rising superior to all things base or low, even when he deigns to handle them. Retiring and almost timid in personal demeanour, he has yet the courage of his convictions, his art, and his processes. As lovable as he is modest, and as genial as he is great, he has endeared himself long since to all who know him, and to thousands who have never seen his face."

The name of the author of this concise estimate is not stated.

The Temple Classics. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

No cheap series of reprints has ever been offered to the public in more dainty, attractive guise than these Temple Classics of Messrs. Dent & Co. There is among the controllers of this firm someone with a genius for format, from whose efforts the buyers of books are appreciably the gainers. Before us lie several volumes of the series: two of Carlyle's French Revolution, which have Mr. G. F. Watts's National Portrait Gallery portrait of the historian as frontispiece to one of them, and a portrait of Mirabeau to the other; Malory's Morte d'Arthur, with a reproduction of one of Mr. Beardsley's designs in each volume; and Florio's Montaigne. Mr. George Moore, writing the other day in a contemporary, said that he had not read Montaigne. He might do worse than buy the Temple Classics and do so. The only fault we find in these volumes is the presence of an unnecessary device on the inside of the cover, placed just where the owner would naturally expect to put his book-plate.

Marlowe's Faustus. Edited by I. Gollancz. "The Temple Dramatists." (J. M. Dent & Co.)

THE "Temple" Shakespeare found so many admirers that the publishers have run no risks in following it with a supplementary series of plays by lesser men, under the general editorship of Mr. Gollancz. From no series of the kind could Marlowe's Tragical History of Dr. Faustus be omitted. Mr. Gollancz has put a preface, glossary, and notes to this little volume in his customary businesslike way, and it is further enriched by a reproduction of Rembrandt's portrait of the Doctor. The form of the play is exceedingly attractive, although, perhaps, less appropriate than that of the Shakespeare plays. Marlowe is not so suitable for the pocket as his greater contemporary.

An English Garner. Vol. VIII. Edited by Edward Arber. (Constable & Co.)

THIS, the eighth volume, concludes this series of Mr. Arber's "Ingatherings from History and Literature"; or, as it might flippantly be called, the Higher Tit-Bits. Its contents are by no means of equal interest. The three collections of posies, for example, are of little count, and Michael Drayton's Odes are less inaccessible than we expect Mr. Arber's selections to be. But the bulk of the book is valuable and welcome.

Rochester: The Cathedral and See, by G. H. Palmer; and Oxford: The Cathedral and See, by Rev. Percy Dearmer. (G. Bell & Sons.)

Norwich Cathedral, by Very Rev. Dean Lefroy; Canterbury Cathedral, by Very Rev. Dean Fremantle; Salisbury Cathedral, by Very Rev. Dean Boyle; and Gloucester Cathedral, by Very Rev. Dean Spence. (Isbister & Co.)

Two firms of publishers have suddenly burst into efflorescence with a series of handbooks to the English cathedrals—Messrs. Bell and Messrs. Isbister. Messrs. Isbister are the more dainty and impressionistic—they offer slender monographs on the cathedrals from the sympathetic pens of Deans, with dot-tesque and spottesque drawings by members of the Railton School (by which we mean that little body of artists who all draw like Mr. Herbert Railton). Messrs. Bell are the more thorough. Their series is in the hands of two editors—one of whom is (of course) Mr. Gleeson White—who see that the contributors are properly ecclesiastical and historical, and the draughtsmen businesslike. As a memento of a visit spent Messrs. Isbister's books are admirable; as a preparation for a visit to come Messrs. Bell's are invaluable.

MURRAY'S CYCLIST'S ROAD BOOKS: London to the New Forest (John Murray.)

THE first volume of Murray's Cyclist's Road Books, which, in a more limited way, should become as useful as the Murray Guides, gives an out-and-home route to the New Forest. The chosen way from London lies through Guildford, Chichester, Portsmouth, and Southampton; the return journey is through Romsey, Winchester, Guildford, Dorking, and Epsom. The route is clearly indicated, both in the letterpress and in the set of excellent little maps at the end. Mr. Murray's wish to make this series as complete as possible prompts him to ask in the preface for suggestions as to improvements.

FICTION.

Jinny Blake. By Hannah Lynch. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

IN her new novel Miss Lynch has set out to narrate how a high-spirited, imperious, idealistic, and commandingly beautiful girl was tamed and disillusioned. But she has brought to her task so much superfluous cleverness, and has delayed the movement with such a mass of non-essential impedimenta, that the strength of the character-sketch is sadly impaired. The book suffers from verbiage: one can hardly see the story for words. We are conscious, as we read, of a charming heroine, and we wish to know more of her and to follow her fortunes to the end; but so many other persons cross our path, and so much is said and so little done, that to track her course is a matter of serious difficulty. For example, after the incident described at second-hand in the first chapter, nothing whatever of real importance happens until p. 190. Moreover, neither the heroine, Jinny Blake, nor her chaperon, Lady Jewsbury, nor her patient lover, Mr. John Trowbridge, is ever properly accounted for: we meet them abruptly and are expected forthwith to be interested in them. Readers of fiction that deals with psychical problems must be wooed more persuasively than this: before extending their sympathy they must know much more of the actors than Miss Lynch thinks it necessary to tell. In a misunderstanding of essentials lies the weakness of the book: the author is not sufficiently conscious of what should be said, and what should be left unsaid. Were Jinny Blake's story cleared of extraneous matter it would be an excellent study of the mind of a young girl, shrewd, informing, and sympathetic. Instead, Jinny Blake is lost in a crowd, wherein the spirit of herself and of her adventures evaporates. We suspect that the truth of Miss Lynch's failure is that she has wished to write a novel in the manner of Mr. Meredith (whose influence is very visible) instead of in the manner of Miss Lynch—which she could do far better and with finer results. So admirable a writer, and so close an observer of life, has no occasion to imitate. None the less, the book as it stands is readable enough by those who care for a somewhat formless novel of manners: much of the conversation is amusing, and the air of Spain which one breathes in Miss Lynch's pages is welcome.

Yekl: a Tale of the New York Ghetto. By A. Cahan. "Pioneer Series." (W. Heinemann.)

THE differences between the New York Ghetto and the East-End of London are unimportant. The conditions of life are pretty much the same—the squalor set off by tawdriness, or the tawdriness which makes the squalor impotently sad. We know the flaunting obvious meretriciousness of Mamie as well as the slow honesty and easily assuaged griefs of the newly imported Gitl. But, on the whole, we would rather read well-rendered Cockney than Mr. Cahan's laborious vernacular. His method of translating Yiddish into English and then printing in italics English words incorporated in the original Yiddish is curiously involved and extremely annoying. Even if the book were a frank study in dialect and nothing more, we should object. The story is hardly more than a sketch, but although it is a clever sketch it does not move us so much as we feel it should. Just that indefinable human touch is lacking which marks the difference between effort and realisation in such work. Here and there we are almost convinced of the pathos, but the true note is missed. The woes of Gitl and the waywardness of Jake belong to that school of realism which neither quickens nor delays the pulse; we are scholars, not participants or sympathisers. The chapter entitled "A Housetop Idyll" is good, and there we think Mr. Cahan has distinctly succeeded. The setting is effective, the lures which Mamie employs are the lures of her class, and Jake is as eager to be caught as more sophisticated mortals.

Zalma. By T. Mullett Ellis. (Ash Partners, Limited.)

THIS is an illustrated edition of a novel which was first published in 1895. There are several reasons why "Zalma" should not have been selected for that distinction. Not merely is it a book of little merit and many fallacies, but, even granting it the possession of some redeeming qualities which it does not possess, its interest is exactly of that ephemeral kind which does not outlast the publisher's season. Evidently Mr. Ellis means to convey the impression that his book has a basis of fact. We have a Prince secretly married in Malta; a Cardinal who settles strikes; a Foreign Secretary and other persons whose names are but thinly disguised; and the whole is cast in an atmosphere of actuality, or what was actuality in 1895. Much of Zalma is in exceedingly bad taste; most of the rest of it is nonsense. But we cannot deny to the author the dangerous gift of a lively imagination. Never was tale so wild and fantastic, both words being used in their baser senses. It is a hotch-potch of scandal, debauchery, vivisection, anarchy, and rhodomontade. Mr. Ellis has the literary instinct of a sub-editor. The horrible has irresistible attractions for him; and for society we have the immoral. The book teems with incident and dulness.

Broken Away. By Beatrice Ethel Grimshaw. (John Lane.)

THE man of letters has become a familiar figure in fiction; indeed, the critic is fain to cry, "Enough, give us men and women instead of writers." But probably the great public enjoy to read in novels of fictitious novelists; to be introduced to those creatures who fill with their wares the windows of the bookseller; above all to see unveiled the artistic temperament. Stuart Rivington, the central figure in Miss Grimshaw's book, finding his fount of inspiration dried up, breaks away from his well-appointed home in Dublin, and, with his wife, a stern critic of his work, escapes to a lone shanty amid the Wicklow Hills. Rivington is dowered with the artistic temperament, he experiences

"the intense sensuous joy in beauty of every kind that can revel in a ray of sunlight filtered through green leaves, and ascend on a bar of solemn organ music, heard amid a dim mediæval glory of sapphire and ruby windows to the very gates of heaven."

In his unuplifted state, however, he regards but lightly what of music there is in the English tongue, as, for instance, when he alludes to Henry Moore's last novel as "a rotten, bad piece of work." This same Moore is the villain of the piece. His heart, or what passes for a heart, is set on a yellow-haired mercenary girl; but his recent novel sold badly, and his brain, despite all stimulants, refuses to render up a plot of any description. In a crudely-presented scene between Moore and Eva Rivington he learns that his rival has outlined a plot which, imaginatively wrought, will place him on a pinnacle above even Mr. George Meredith or Mr. Rudyard Kipling. Moore's soul thirsts for the sealed envelope wherein lies this plot. After several unsuccessful attempts to murder Rivington, Moore, who by this time is mad, has the ill-luck to kill himself. Although there are some good passages in Broken Away, the story is so ill-knit and inorganic, in places the treatment so crude, the sentences so seriously overweighted, that the book quite misses its mark.

Triscombe Stone: a Romance of the Quantock Hills. By Portland Board Akerman and Norman Hurst. (Bliss, Sands & Co.)

THIS story deals with the ill-fated rising in the West which resulted in the execution of the Duke of Monmouth. Grace Hewlyn, the heroine, is a "young girl, some nineteen years of age, tall, without being obtrusively so, with a perfectly symmetrical figure and daintily poised head, from which a profusion . . ."—in short, we know the young lady. She has two wooers: the one a scheming libertine—a baronet, naturally; the other, a spotless enthusiast for the Protestant cause, Hubert Annesley by name. Also there is a miller's niece "about seventeen years of age. Her figure was shapely, and her jet black hair hung in wavy profusion down her back"; she had "large lustrous dark eyes and beautiful, regular lashes." This dainty daughter of the soil becomes Grace's maid, and Sir Mark Noble (such is the caustic name of the wicked baronet) makes love to her and betrays her. The story of the abortive rising is told once more. Sir Mark Noble, on the Royalist side, plays a part in the affair of Sedgemoor; while for the rebels Hubert Annesley and Jack Swaine, the miller, perform prodigies of valour. The soul of the ruined girl is torn between love for the man who has deceived her and affection for her mistress and Annesley. She seeks the Royal camp and betrays the secret purpose of the night march, meeting death in some mysterious form as her reward. Poetic justice is rendered to the rest. Sir Mark is killed by the miller, as his father for a similar offence against the moral law had met his death at the hands of the miller's sire; while Annesley and Grace have a large and healthy family. It is fair, since the collaborators are of opinion that "it may perhaps add an additional interest" to the romance, to note that "most of the characters depicted really existed in history or in the traditions of the neighbourhood."

SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1897.

No. 1307, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow in due course.]

IT is not easy to find an adjective, or a phrase, that will describe the publications of the past week. Sometimes the output of a week seems to obey a law or illustrate a fact. According to Mr. Karl Pearson, in his new book of essays, Monte Carlo roulette "is not obedient to the laws of chance, but is chaotic in its manifestations." The literary roulette is not so lawless, but it has fits of lawlessness. This week, for instance, a few coincidences and contrasts offer themselves, but nothing more. Prof. Mahaffy gives us a study of Greek civilisation. Prof. Karl Pearson applies himself to some phases of the most modern of civilisations. Both are scholars who join to the learning of libraries a sagacious outlook on the world. But here resemblance ends. Prof. Mahaffy loves to explain the present by the past; Prof. Pearson to explain the future by the present. In his Survey of Greek Civilisation Prof. Mahaffy takes a very wide view of his wide subject, expressing his belief that

"the Chatauqua idea of starting from the knowledge and love of God as a great first principle, and passing from it into the broadest and most various survey of human knowledge as such, is not only the highest, but the only true method of education."

While, therefore, immersing his readers in his subject, Prof. Mahaffy seeks to keep them aware of its relation to the world's later history, and to indicate, without stress, "the contrasts of the culture of intellect without moral forces to balance it, to that which has received the powerful support of Christianity."

Prof. Karl Pearson's book is entitled after its first essay, The Chances of Death, and other Studies in Evolution.

"Standing," writes Mr. Pearson, "in 1875, on the well-known wooden bridge at Luzern, with its pictures of the Dance of Death, it struck me that something might be done to resuscitate the mediæval conception of the relation between Death and Chance, and to express it in a more modern scientific form."

The volume which opens with this essay is furnished with a frontispiece—a picture of the Bridge of Life as Mirza saw it in his vision. The remaining essays in the two volumes are concerned with such subjects as "Socialism and Natural Selection," "Reaction: a Criticism on Mr. Balfour's Attack on Rationalism," "Woman or Witch," and "The German Passion Play." The author hopes that the heterogeneity of the contents of the volumes will be found to be more apparent than real. They have at least a common origin in an exceptionally alert and original mind.

Two sixteenth century Anglican bishops are brought curiously to our notice by two books. The Life, Letters, and Writings of John Davenant, D.D. (1572-1641), is "an attempt to rescue from comparative obscurity a great and good man, who deserves to be better known, and to portray the characteristics of an eminent and typical theologian of the age in which he lived." The author, Mr. Morris Fuller, has already written the Life of Thomas Fuller, the Church historian; the two biographies may be regarded as companions, overlapping as they do and covering nearly a century (1572-1661). The Life of Davenant is intended as "an ideal picture of the via media of the Anglican Church." The author makes a point of having discovered, and printed for the first time, a "Fast Sermon" which Davenant preached at Westminster Abbey. The other bishop is Bishop Barlowe, whose Dialogue on the Lutheran Factions is reprinted with notes by the Rev. John Robert Lunn. The Bishop's very quaint spelling is retained. After the bishops, three national heroes assert themselves: Peter the Great, Washington, and Cromwell. Waliszewski's great work on Peter the Great is now available to English readers in a translation, filling two handsome volumes, by Lady Mary Loyd. We do not know whether the French original was supplied with an index, but the want of it in the translation seems a grave defect in a work which claims to be exhaustive and runs to nearly six hundred pages. Sir Godfrey Kneller's portrait of the great Russian is reproduced as frontispiece to the first volume. In The True George Washington the reader may look for a "nothing extenuate" portrait; or shall we say a portrait of Washington stripped of archangelic qualities? The tribute to Cromwell takes the indirect form of a genealogical history of his descendants, and is, indeed, only a very much revised edition of Mr. James Waylen's The House of Cromwell. The revising editor, Mr. John Gabriel Cromwell, states that the book now presents the history of the family from the fourteenth to the nineteenth century.

FICTION.

Mrs. Steel's In the Tideway takes us to India, but gives us a tragic comedy in a country house in the Hebrides, with the roar of the Atlantic, so to speak, between the lines. . . . The year of the Queen's accession is a good period to write about just now, and Mr. W. Clark Russell has appropriated it in his new sea story, The Last Entry. "This story," he writes, "belongs to the year 1837, and was regarded by the generations of that and a succeeding time as the most miraculous of all the recorded deliverances from death at sea." . . . A new novel by Mr. E. W. Hornung, the Australian writer who began his career in so promising a way with A Bride from the Bush, and has since written some half a dozen vigorous, sinewy stories, is to hand, with the title My Lord Duke. . . . Remoteness is the note of Carlton Priors, by John Stafford, whose collection of short stories, entitled Doris and I, gave high promise of his future work. Arcadian life and Arcadian loves are Mr. Stafford's material, and many a reader will be encouraged to take up Carlton Priors by its motto from Chaucer:

"The god of love, a! benedicte!
How mighty and how grete a lord is he!"

Impossibilities, by Israel Mondego, we judge, on a cursory inspection, to be a skit on all that is "precious," exotic, and extravagant in the artistic world.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

BISHOP BARLOWE'S DIALOGUE ON THE LUTHERAN FACTIONS. Edited by John Robert Lunn, B.D. Ellis & Kears. 2s. 6d.

ANCIENT HEBREW TRADITION AS ILLUSTRATED BY THE MONUMENTS. By Dr. Fritz Hommel. Translated by Edmund McClure and Leonard Crosslé. S.P.C.K.

HISTORY.

A SURVEY OF GREEK CIVILISATION. By J. P. Mahaffy, D.D. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

SOCIAL TRANSFORMATIONS OF THE VICTORIAN AGE: A SURVEY OF COURT AND COUNTRY. By T. H. S. Escott. Seeley & Co. 6s.

THE HOUSE OF CROMWELL: A GENEALOGICAL HISTORY. By James Waylen. New Edition, Revised by J. G. Cromwell. Elliot Stock.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY: THE DOMESDAY OF ENCLOSURES. Edited by J. S. Leadham, M.A. 2 vols. Longmans, Green & Co.

BIOGRAPHY.

PETER THE GREAT. By K. Waliszewski. Translated from the French by Lady Mary Loyd. 2 vols. William Heinemann. 3s. 6d.

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH, IN RELATION TO HIS WORK AS CHURCH MUSICIAN AND COMPOSER. By Sedley Taylor, M.A. Macmillan & Bowes (Cambridge).

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN DAVENANT, D.D. By Morris Fuller, B.D. Methuen & Co. 10s. 6d.

THE BRONTË HOMELAND: OR, MISREPRESENTATIONS RECTIFIED. By J. Ramsden. The Roxburghe Press.

THE TRUE GEORGE WASHINGTON. By Paul Leicester Ford. By J. B. Lippincott Company. 7s. 6d.

POETRY.

OPTIMUS, AND OTHER POEMS. By M. R. S. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 2s. 6d.

WILD MYRTLE. By L. M. Little. J. M. Dent & Co. 3s. 6d.

POEMS. By Horace Smith. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

THE POETS AND THE POETRY OF THE CENTURY: SACRED, MORAL, AND RELIGIOUS VERSE. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. Hutchinson & Co. 4s.

BELLES LETTRES.

THE BOOK-LOVER'S LIBRARY: THE NOVELS OF CHARLES DICKENS. By Frederic G. Kitton. Elliot Stock.

FICTION.

- A TRIUMPH OF DESTINY. By Julia Helen Twells, Jr. J. B. Lippincott Company. 5s.
 ONE MAN'S VIEW. By Leonard Merrick. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.
 THE SILENCE BROKEN. By G. M. Robins. Hurst & Blackett. 2s.
 BROKEN THREADS. By Compton Read. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.
 DINNER FOR THIRTEEN. By John Bridge. Digby, Long & Co. 6s.
 AUDREY CRAVEN. By May Sinclair. William Blackwood & Sons.
 THE INDISCRETION OF THE DUCHESS. By Anthony Hope. J. W. Arrowsmith. Illustrated Edition. 3s. 6d.
 THE HISTORY OF PANDENNIS. By W. M. Thackeray. Service & Paton. Illustrated Edition. 3s. 6d.
 ONLY AN ANGEL: A STORY OF TWO KREUTZER SONATAS. By Francis Gribble. A. D. Innes & Co.
 THE LAST ENTRY. By W. Clark Russell. Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.
 CARLTON PRIORS. By John Stafford. Chatto & Windus.
 THE GADSHILL DICKENS: MARTIN CHuzzleWIT. With Introduction and Notes by Andrew Lang. Chapman & Hall. 2 vols. 12s.
 IMPOSSIBILITIES, FANTASIES. By Israfel Mondego. H. Henry & Co. 4s.
 IN THE TIDEWAY. By Flora Annie Steel. Archibald Constable & Co. 6s.
 THE GIFT OF LIFE. By James Cassidy. Chapman & Hall. 6s.
 OLD CORCORAN'S MONEY. By Richard Dowling. Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.
 IN VALLOMBROSA. By Adeline Sergeant. F. V. White & Co.
 MRS. ORICHTON'S CREDITOR. By Mrs. Alexander. F. V. White & Co.
 THE FALL OF A STAR. By Sir William Magnay, Bart. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- WALKIN SKETCHES. By Emma Boore. Elliot Stock.
 A RIDE THROUGH WESTERN ASIA. By Clive Bigham. Macmillan & Co. 8s. 6d.

SOCIOLOGICAL.

- THE CHANCES OF DEATH, AND OTHER STUDIES IN EVOLUTION. By Karl Pearson, F.R.S. 2 vols. Edward Arnold. 25s.

NATURAL HISTORY.

- MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS. By Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart, M.P. Edward Arnold. 6s.
 ALLEN'S NATURALIST'S LIBRARY: A HANDBOOK OF THE ORDER LEPIDOPTERA. By W. F. Kirby, F.L.S. Vol. V.: MOTES. Part III. W. H. Allen & Co. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL.

- THE CALCULUS FOR BEGINNERS. By John Perry, D.Sc. Edward Arnold. 7s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- ENGLISH PORTRAITS: A SERIES OF LITHOGRAPHED DRAWINGS. By Will Rothenstein. Part I. 2s. 6d. Grant Richards.
 PRÉCIS WRITING AND OFFICE CORRESPONDENCE. By E. E. Whitfield, M.A. Methuen & Co.
 THE HANDBOOK OF JAMAICA FOR 1897. Compiled by S. P. Musson and T. L. Roxburgh. Edward Stanford. 7s. 6d.
 THE THEATRICAL "WORLD" OF 1896. By William Archer. Walter Scott, Ltd. 3s. 6d.
 TRIALS OF A STAFF-OFFICER. By Capt. Charles King, U.S.A. J. B. Lippincott Co. 3s. 6d.
 THE BIRDS OF OUR COUNTRY. By H. E. Stewart, B.A. Digby, Long & Co. 3s. 6d.
 AN OUTLINE OF THE LAW OF LIBEL. By W. Blake Odgers. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.
 BEAUTIES AND ANTIQUITIES OF IRELAND. By T. O. Russell. Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.
 THE ANNUAL OF THE BRITISH SCHOOL AT ATHENS. No. 2. Macmillan & Co. 10s. 6d.
 THE LAW OF LIBEL AND SLANDER. By Hugh Fraser, M.A., LL.D. Second edition. William Clowes & Sons.
 OUR TRADE IN THE WORLD IN RELATION TO FOREIGN COMPETITION: 1885-1896. By William S. H. Gastrell. Chapman & Hall. 6s.
 THE MONEY-LENDER UNMASKED. By Thomas Farrow. The Roxburghs Press. 2s.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE following authoritative statement concerning the completion of R. L. Stevenson's posthumous romance St. Ives has reached us for publication. The reasons which have prevailed with the family and executors in adopting the course of asking Mr. Quiller Couch to complete St. Ives are these: The story is in the master's lighter vein, and so far, at least as concerns a few of the later chapters which he did not live to revise, not of his highest execution. It is essentially a story of incident; and the nature of the incidents with which it was to conclude is not left to conjecture, but known on the authority of his step-daughter and amanuensis, Mrs. Strong. It would have been possible to state them baldly in an editorial postscript; but it seemed clear that the general reading public would like them better told in full, if a skilled and sympathetic hand could be found to do so in a spirit not too remote from that of the original. The executors believe that such a hand has been found in Mr. Quiller Couch; they think that the result will be an interesting literary experiment, quite justifiable in this particular case, though in other cases such an attempt might, of course, be inadmissible altogether. And they count with some confidence that this view of the matter will be shared by even the most sensitive admirers of the author when they have the result in their hands.

MR. QUILLER COUCH's qualifications for such a performance are many. He is, first and foremost, a thorough Stevensonian. When at Oxford he came under the spell, one result of which has been some admirable books for boys—Dead Man's Rock and The Splendid Spur among them. He is all for romance, and few men—Mr. Kipling included—are so rich in good stories. "Q's" collections of Cornish and other tales contain some exceedingly fine work: we remember, in particular, two little masterpieces—"Wrestlers" and "Love o' Naomi." Mr. Quiller Couch, moreover, is a critic of considerable acumen and wide range of reading, and is capable of comprehending the Stevensonian magic.

THE possession of these qualities does not, of course, necessarily prove that Mr. Quiller Couch can continue a work by Robert Louis Stevenson. He has not that writer's instinct for style, nor his impeccable fastidiousness. But we feel that he stands as good a chance of succeeding as anyone could; and it seems to us idle to protest, as some are doing, against this "Vandalism," and to utter plaintive regrets that St. Ives is not to remain the fragment it is. No one is obliged to read Mr. Quiller Couch's addition; the line of demarcation between the original matter and that of the other hand is likely to be clearly enough marked. But to those—and they are many—who care nothing for style and everything for the story, "Q." will come as a very real benefactor in completing this stirring romance.

MR. QUILLER COUCH's duties are more heavy than is generally supposed, for there are quite six chapters to supply, including the balloon escape and rescue by privateers. We wish "Q." all success. When finished, his additions will be published in the Pall Mall Magazine, where St. Ives is now appearing.

MR. GEORGE MOORE's wrong-headed strictures on Stevenson, which were answered in the Academy by Mr. Vernon Blackburn, have drawn forth an article in the Westminster Gazette by Mr. Le Gallienne, which he entitles "The Dethroning of Stevenson." "One sees Mr. Moore," says his critic happily, "a sort of Loki, who, when all the world is weeping for Stevenson, sits sulkily in his cavern and says, 'No, I will not weep; I have wept for Balzac, but I will not weep for Stevenson. He couldn't think, and he was no novelist. He couldn't even write.' Happily, Mr. Moore is a Loki whose criticism will keep no one out of Valhalla, least of all Stevenson, for Mr. Moore is always too angry when he differs for his criticisms to carry authority."

Esther Waters has recently won an enthusiastic patron in Tolstoi, who is presenting copies of the novel to his friends, and has written to Mr. George Moore congratulating him upon the work.

"IAN MACLAREN" is seen in a new character in the current North American Review. Hitherto we have known him as Kailyard idyllist and doctrinal expositor. He now appears as the biographer-in-little of his friend, the late Prof. Drummond, and his essay, which is a remarkable piece of work, supplies a better idea of Drummond than anything which has yet been published. It is sympathetic, outspoken, just; also, it is literature. Great stress is laid upon his personality, its distinction and mesmeric influence. Drummond, it seems, once practised mesmerism very successfully. Says Ian MacLaren: "One did not realise how commonplace and colourless other men were till they stood side by side with Drummond. He reduced us all to the peasantry."

DRUMMOND struck his friend as the "most vital man" he had ever known. "No man lived who had a more unaffected interest and keener joy in human life in the home or on the street. No power could drag him past a Punch and Judy show. . . . His sense of humour was unerring, swift, and masterful. If he came upon a good thing in his reading he would walk a mile to share it with a friend, and afterwards depart in the strength thereof; and he has been found in his room exhausted with delight with nothing before him but one of those Parisian plaster caricatures of a vagabond." He once wrote to "Ian MacLaren" from Central Africa saying that he had nothing on "but a helmet of three mosquitoes."

MR. E. LIVINGSTON PRESCOTT, the author of a recent military novel, Scarlet and Steel, who is annoyed that some of his assertions concerning the barbarity of military prison discipline have been doubted, writes to state a few facts bearing upon the subject. "On the authority of Parliamentary Paper 200," he says, "ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on May 7 and laid on the table last week, in 1893-4-5, the years immediately preceding the writing of Scarlet and Steel, in civil prisons (convict and local), England and Wales, one prisoner in every 1,175 was flogged or birched. Military prisons were not included in above return. But I have in my possession ample and detailed proof, drawn from official records, that (during the same period) in one military prison alone, taken haphazard, one (soldier) prisoner in every 150 was flogged or birched. That is to say," adds our correspondent, "that where one civilian was flogged nearly eight soldiers suffered the degrading punishment; in almost all cases, for what? Threatening language, idleness, damaging a shilling's-worth or so of prison property." Statistics are more convincing even than realistic novelists. But it is odd when writers of fiction are so serious about their facts!

K. S. RANJITSINHJI, the Indian prince whose prowess at cricket last year won him the honour of a dinner at Cambridge, at which the Master of Trinity presided, has been spending part of the winter in writing a book upon the game, which Messrs. Blackwood will publish. Good judges have called Ranjitsinhji (who already this season, although he has played only six innings, has an average of eighty) the most brilliant bat that the cricket-field has yet seen. It does not of course follow that his book will be brilliant, but it is almost certain to be interesting.

THE Westminster Gazette makes some extracts from the autographs contributed to The Book of the Bazaar, which was issued a few days ago in a northern town. Dr. George Macdonald sends this aphorism: "Cherished respectability is the dry rot of the heart" (which recalls the late Thomas Woolner's saying, "Respectability, but hate respectability"). Mr. Barry Pain quotes himself: "The only real things in this life are the things which exist in the imagination." Mr. Zangwill drops into verse:

"Whatever is right—if aught seems wrong below,
Then wrong it is—of thee to leave it so."

A NEW story of De Quincey comes to light in the Scots' Pictorial, a new illustrated paper devoted to the exploitation of Caledonia. In 1851 De Quincey, then living at Lasswade, had to fill up the census paper. It puzzled him considerably. After much thought he entered his occupation as "Writer to the magazines," and then his troubles began again over the occupation of his three daughters. After another spell of thought he put a ring round their names and wrote: "These are like the lilies of the field: they toil not, neither do they spin."

DR. W. J. KNAPP, of Chicago, author of a Spanish grammar and of many works on Spanish literature, who for some years has been living in Norwich, inquiring into the life of George Borrow, is now giving the last touches to the biography of Lavengro, to be published in the autumn by Mr. John Murray in three volumes. Few biographers have devoted so much time and labour to their subject as Dr. Knapp has. He has tracked Borrow all over Spain, and has literally ransacked Norfolk for records.

A THIRD edition of Ouida's new novel, The Massarenes, has already been called for. This indicates that Ouida's popularity is returning. An article on the novelist will be found on another page.

MR. G. S. STREET, who for a considerable time has acted as dramatic critic of the Pall Mall Gazette and the ACADEMY has decided upon ceasing his first-night duties, at any rate for the present. It is his intention to devote more of his time to creative work.

WE understand that at the request of the relations and friends of the late Prof. Drummond his biography has been undertaken by Prof. George Adam Smith. Any persons having letters of Prof. Drummond or other matters of interest connected with his work are invited to send the same either to Prof. Smith, 22, Sardinia-terrace, Glasgow; or to Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

IN anticipation of the Queen's Jubilee, Messrs. Bradbury, Agnew & Co. are preparing a collection of cartoons from Punch, illustrative of events in the long reign in which Her Majesty's personal connexion has suggested the subject for the week's picture. Toby, M.P., has written the letter-press explanatory of each cartoon, in its continuity forming a record of the Queen's reign. The Queen and Mr. Punch will be the title. Mr. Linley Sambourne has drawn a special picture of the Queen for the cover of the book.

MESSRS. JARROLD & SONS have in preparation, and will issue in a few days, the sixth edition of Dr. Maurus Jokai's most popular novel, entitled The Green Book; or, Freedom Under the Snow.

D'ANNUNZIO's novel, The Triumph of Death, has been translated by an American, and Messrs. G. H. Richmond & Co., of New York, have published the book. Mr. Comstock's action against the publishers for issuing immoral literature, which failed, may have won popularity for the book; for it is now in its fifth edition, and selling very fast.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co.'s fifteenth annual exhibition of Drawings in Black and White will be held at the Cutlers' Hall from June 1 to June 14 inclusive.

The Note-book of Tristram Risdon (1608-1628) has long been preserved in the library of Exeter Cathedral. It is a companion to the well-known Chronographical Description or Survey of the County of Devon, published in 1714, and contains much information which concerns Devonshire genealogists. Mr. James Dallas, of the Exeter Museum, has transcribed the MS., and Mr. Elliot Stock will publish it.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXVIII.—PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

WHEN Browning was a youth, not yet launched on his long and difficult poetic career, he found only one shop in London where he could procure the work of Percy Bysshe Shelley. So comparatively recent, so long delayed, has been the fame of this poet, now at last acknowledged, with Keats and Tennyson, as one of the greatest poets of the nineteenth century. Nothing could be more interesting and instructive to quote, if there were room, than the essay on this poet published after his death in the Edinburgh Review. There he is charged with affectation and coinage of expression, with fantastical imagery, with aloofness from human interest, with obscurity, with the whole train of offences wherewith each original poet is charged. Now, he is almost the god of the day. One dissents from him at one's peril. Book after book, edition after edition, expresses the adoration of present-day readers. Yet the animadversions of previous critics had really a measure of truth, if they were themselves purblind and unmeasured; the faults were very genuine faults, if the critics were moles who could see nothing but those faults.

In modern times, when the beauties once neglected of all men are seen of all men, the faults once seen of all men neglected of all men, Mr. Coventry Patmore rather vividly distinguished himself by bringing those faults forward in a sounder and more philosophic way than Shelley's contemporary critics had done. It was characteristic of Mr. Patmore that he could never busy himself with recognised truth; it was the unrecognised truth which attracted him. Had Shelley been an unrecognised poet, he would undoubtedly have dwelt on Shelley's merits. Shelley's merits being universally recognised, he dwelt on that poet's defects. His essay may be taken as a useful alternative to the abundant essays which dwell on Shelley's powers. So taken, it is altogether true; and both together give a very complete picture of that great poet's faults and virtues.

To begin with his defects. He was not a masculine poet. He did not, indeed, like Keats, concern himself altogether with beauty and sensitive impressions. He had a kind of philosophy, a concern for truth. But it was a nebulous philosophy. It was what Mr. Patmore would call a "fire-mist" of feeling, rather than the definite disc of apprehended doctrine. "God is Nature; Nature is love: there is no justice, for there is no sin—sin being merely error and weakness, not deliberate wrong-doing; therefore there is no sin in the sense which calls for justice." That is the nearest approach to definite doctrine which a life-long admirer can extract from him; and it is most vaguely expressed, in a cloud of indefinite rhetoric, and beautiful but still more indefinite poetry. Yet he will not suffer you to take him as merely a toyer with beauty for its own sake; he will be either a philosopher or nothing: while his philosophy is shallow, unresearched, and namby-pamby in the extreme. His poetry, again, is extra-human (to coin a word). It touches but little and seldom on human hopes, fears, joys, and agonies. His very love is a thing too metaphysical to be recognised for love by ordinary men and women. It is not the love of Troilus for Cressida, of Othello for Desdemona, of Romeo for Juliet. It is not the golden and ideal, yet human passion, in Tennyson's "Love and Duty." It is not the love of Coventry Patmore's most ardent odes. Almost, indeed, might one say that the divine passion in those odes is a more human thing than the love of "Epipsychidion." Shelley's love comes nearer to the love of the "Vita Nuova." But the "Vita Nuova" is mystical, whereas "Epipsychidion" is not. There is a false air of mysticism about the latter, which makes you look for inward meanings; but in the end you find that, mainly, it is simply a human passion insufficiently human. Again, his astounding gift of imagery drawn (principally) from nature, is carried to such an overwhelming excess that it becomes wearisome to all but a few gifted minds, which can tread without fatigue this perpetual intellectual tight-rope. Mr. Patmore complains of its repetition. But we think, on the whole, there is very little real repetition—certainly not one tithe as much as in Shelley's disciple, Mr. Swinburne. Most trying of all to the average reader, he is perpetually in the blue; perpetually dealing with the skies and the clouds and super-human fancies—fancies having no relation to any truth, either human or divine.

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

From a Drawing photographed by H. H. Hay Cameron

Enough here to explain why even some poets revolt against him. But then his merits! What ethereality, what seldom-equalled magic! What soaring ardour! What effortless fecundity of imagery—now flashing and arresting, now super-subtle and evanescent in quality! Consider merely that last act of "Prometheus Unbound." Was there ever such a succession of choruses, with their inexhaustible and unwearying imagery, passing in flight after flight, until the mind is overpowered by the incessant splendours and shifting music? It could hardly have been written, one thinks, out of Italy. The images are festooned and intertangled with the opulent prodigality of Southern flowers and creepers; the atmosphere has the burning aerial delicacy of southern heavens; the fancy, the flush of the seas and campagnas of that Hesperian land which gave him for a while abounding life, and, in the sequel, death. If Keats, one speculates, had but reached Italy earlier! What poetry might he not have given us had he breathed that climate of all poets' desire before death (in the language of Sir Thomas Browne) had set on him its broad arrow! Shelley drank deep of that divine air; and to it, it is natural enough to believe, we owe many of the illustrious rarities of his later poems. Consider the "Epipsychidion"—its visionary ardour, its thronging figures, which almost express the inexpressible. Inhuman we have expressed it; but can you not rejoice in its inhuman glories? It is the love of a sylph; but can you not forgive the eerie creature when "it unfurls its heaven-coloured pinions?" Consider the "Adonais," with its processional train of vaporous personifications:

"The moving pomp might seem Like pageantry of mist on an autumnal stream."

Consider what is perhaps his most magnificent choral achievement (it is a difficult matter to award the palm between this and the fourth act of "Prometheus"): the intense and towering "Hellas." Imagery, so innumerable, radiant, and meteorous; music so incessantly fluctuant and spherul; such daring and inebriate imagination; where are we to look for its lyrical parallel? Only "Kubla Khan" in a kind surpasses it.

The minor poems contain Shelley at his most concentrated. One need not dwell on the universally acknowledged "Skylark" and "Cloud." But where is there such a series of burning images as the "Sensitive Plant"? When was that easily trivial metre, the anapest, made the instrument of such rich, melodious, undulant harmonies? The "Ode to Heaven," "Palace-roof of cloudless nights, Paradise of golden lights"; many passages in the "Ode to Liberty"; and a wildness of the wildest and most fairy-like of songs; all these show the quintessential Shelley, master of a strange and rarefied magic. Mr. Patmore scandalised the world by minimising Shelley's power of music, which the world was enchanted by; but his strictures may be admitted true without affecting Shelley's melodious power. Shelley was no master of those deeper, graver, more profoundly significant harmonies, possessed by the Elizabethans, Milton, and occasionally by Tennyson; but in the lighter and more bird-like music he was inspired. To those larger harmonies Mr. Patmore had so narrowed himself that he had no ear for the other. It is doubtful whether he felt the difference between beautiful and trivial anapests or dactyls. Shelley very decidedly was not what he was not. He had no hearing for "the still small music of humanity." But he was what he was—a creature of dews and rainbows, a poet of the more fragile and fleeting senses, a child with all the outer universe for his box of toys.

OIDA.

AN ESTIMATE.

THE final seal of popularity has been set upon Ouida's reputation: Moths can be had in a sixpenny edition; and, no doubt, others of her novels will follow. Popularity is not everything, but an authoress who has retained her vogue undiminished through a quarter of a century has at the very least a right to serious consideration. No critic would call her a great writer, her shortcomings are patent, her inaccuracies are amazing, and the whole tone of her work offends any fastidious literary taste; but the fact remains, that she can hold the attention of a very large public, which is a difficult thing to do. From a critic's point of view her popularity is the most interesting thing about her; and so, in a general criticism, it is right to examine chiefly that side of her talent which most appeals to her readers. A good many people would agree that she is at her best when writing about children or animals, as, for instance, in Bimbi; a good many would prefer what Mr. Ruskin called her "photographic story" of A Village Carnival, grim though it is, to her studies of dukes and duchesses; but the fact remains that to her own public she is distinctively the authoress of Moths and similar novels, which represent a world in which men and women all have (or spend) a vast deal of money, and all are singularly beautiful and either very virtuous or very profligate. To this choice of subjects, no doubt, she owes much of her success. There are numberless people who want to know all about dukes and duchesses, and are content to read indefinitely about them, provided that the subject is approached in a proper manner, and not handled as it was by Trollope, in a way to destroy the poetry of it. Trollope's dukes are mostly just ordinary county gentlemen; Ouida's have something really ducal. But it would be wrong to suppose that Ouida chooses her subjects in any base spirit of commercialism, as Thackeray by his own account once promoted all the characters in a novel. She is plainly guided by that instinctive delight in magnificence, which is equally remarkable in Tancred and Lothair. She is not content to describe a merely beautiful woman; her heroine must be robed in priceless silks, her hero's garments, though they may be old, must be faultless in cut, and for background, unless we have the wild beauties of nature, there must be a sumptuous drawing-room with a Titian or two on the walls. The picture in this way gains an artistic completeness; your middle-class heroine may be just as pretty; but she is not triumphantly supreme among the most beautiful properties that money can buy. Again, if Ouida has to represent love-making, she and her readers are not satisfied with the mere romance of passion. It must be Vera, the most beautiful woman in Europe, who is wooed by the singer Correze, whose marvellous tenor voice is a lesser attraction than his personal charm. It is, moreover, practically necessary for her to select the wealthiest classes to represent, for she means to write almost exclusively about love-making, the most fascinating subject in the world. Ordinary men and women are kept in the paths of virtue very much by lack of opportunity to stray; a man who is eight hours daily at his office is during those hours perfectly useless to the novelist of passion; and his life is inartistically monotonous. Accordingly, Ouida—or, for the matter of that, Mr. Meredith—generally represents people who are free to come and go as they please, and have not only the desire but the means to get into picturesque complications. But beyond this artistic craving for variety and luxuriousness of setting which Ouida shares with such authors as Disraeli and Lytton, and beyond the desire for those enlarged possibilities of action which wealth gives to her characters, there is another and a stronger reason for her choice of subjects. Many people read her for her sentimental passages, which, as has been pointed out, gratify their sense of completeness, but far more delight in her as a rhetorical satirist.

As in Moths, so in her latest novel, The Massarenes (Sampson Low & Co.), she attacks energetically modern society—its frivolity, its indecency, its money worship; and, above all, the modern woman of fashion. In each case the central figure, the personage upon whom the book pivots, is a pretty, fashionable, and unscrupulous woman. Now there are few things more popular than denunciation, particularly their denunciation of the upper classes with details. Society papers live on it; any divine who liked to say "plain words" upon the corruption of our times and illustrate his discourse by references to divorce cases, would fill his church to overflowing. No one would delight in it more than the class denounced, for we all like to hear ourselves credited with picturesque vices. Ouida, of course, who draws on her imagination, is enabled to give fuller details, and make up in descriptiveness what she lacks in authenticity. She is doing very much what Juvenal did in his day; if Juvenal were alive now he would, no doubt, be writing novels—not verses; and, like Juvenal, she blackens her blacks and whitens her whites with no sparing hand. Practically, her indictment against society is very much the same as his. That proves, she would say, no doubt, that we are as bad as Rome in its worst degeneracy. Other people will think it proves that civilised society is very much of a muchness in all ages. It is all in the point of view.

"I have lived to see the day when a youthful scion of a noble and distinguished house produced from his pocket at dinner a sample bundle of silks to show how cheaply they could be bought at his establishment. Wine circulars with peers' coronets pursue me weekly, and I can buy my coal at 25s. a ton from wagons ornamented with a marquis's coronet."

That is the burden of Ouida's complaint in more eloquent pages than one would care to reckon; but that is not a quotation from Ouida, it is taken from Sir Algernon West's amusing "Reminiscences of Fifty Years" in the Nineteenth Century, and Sir Algernon is of opinion that on the whole we are better than our grandparents. Noblesse oblige is a dead letter, says Ouida, when she is confronted with the fact that marquises are coal merchants. It is easy to answer that nobility binds a noble to be and do all the things which it formerly bound him to be and do, but that it no longer binds him not to be a trader. On the matter of race—for she makes no great account of rank—and of hereditary obligations generally, Ouida has prejudices, which are honourable but illogical; but that makes no matter. Energy of invective and ardour of conviction are what one wants from a satirist, not judicial balance, and Ouida has them; but it is a pity that she is driven into novel writing. Juvenal would probably have made a very bad novelist; he lacks human tolerance and a sense of proportion. In one of his most vigorous passages he denounces a consul for driving his own coach: "It is night indeed, but the moon sees and the stars testify against him." Can one doubt that a man who wrote this would in any presentment of life have run into violent contrasts and made his characters overstep the modesty of nature?

At all events that is what Ouida does. Lady Dolly in Moths is not at all incredible for the most part. But it is perfectly incredible that any mother should have urged her daughter to marry the man whose mistress she had been herself, simply because he was a good match. The extra circumstances that the girl is extremely virtuous, and the man inordinately vicious, add little to the improbability. Ouida is not content with showing that the frivolous woman of fashion is heartless and mercenary, she insists that there is no crime she will not commit. Her perfect characters, too, are as ultra-perfect as the bad ones are ultra-bad. In The Massarenes the newly enriched couple who come to London to try admission into the best society are forcibly sketched: the ambitious plebeian and his plain, homely, and bewildered wife. One is made to feel Massarene's force and tenacity and his wife's kindly heart; but above all their ugly and grotesque incongruity is endlessly emphasised. Yet by way of contrast to the wicked Lady Kenilworth, who takes money from Massarene for her help to get him into society, and ultimately for other things too, the daughter of these rough, ugly people must be made as beautiful as the day, in the most exquisitely finished type.

Ouida has conceived a particularly strong situation: the daughter brought up away from her parents, ashamed of them, ashamed, above all, of their vulgar ambitions, and doubtful of the sources of their wealth, yet feeling it her duty to live with them. How truly dramatic the situation might have been if she had been the true child of her parents, like them in appearance and like them in mind, with only such a difference as chance and a happier education might have given. As it is, she does not belong to them at all; she may be whose daughter you like, but not theirs. But if Ouida had been content without this "faultless monster," what a picture she might have drawn of the young woman: a lady at heart, loathing from her soul the vulgarity of her surroundings and shrinking from wealth dishonestly acquired, yet not to the outward glance distinguishable from her family. If she then—the ugly plebeian with a beautiful soul—had given away all her father's millions the moment they came into her hands, as the only complete reparation possible for his wrong-doing, one might have been touched by the situation and driven to reflect. But as it is, there is no pathos in it, because there is no appearance of credibility in the relation of father and daughter; it is simply a stage device by which the heroine is enabled to marry Lord Hurstmanseaux, the one nobleman who has refused to know her father. A novel must at all events follow the reasonable probabilities of human nature; and by reason of her disregard for these probabilities, Ouida's work must be set down as bad art, in spite of her eloquence and the energy of her satire.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

FROM so practised a pen as that of M. Jules Claretie something more vividly and intellectually entertaining might have been expected than his Vie à Paris. Of a year of that most complex and brilliant thing called Parisian life he has made a comparatively insignificant volume, understood to be an adequate record of 1896. A writer stands in the position of the plus belle fille du monde. Neither can do more than please in their several ways. But neither should fall below the accepted standard. If beauty cannot afford to be heedless, how much more perilous for an Academician to drift into the commonest of journalism, or give us as literature the fugitive scribbling of a year. Yet such a book, if differently conceived, composed and written, might have been a record of lasting value, rich in detail, in point, in effective contrasts—a sparkling and witty page of Parisian history. Instead, we have mere French "Salaism." We had no right to expect anything profound or subtle from M. Claretie, the least subtle and profound of men; but to go to him for an echo of the late lamented George Augustus Sala! No. This betrays our temperate spirit of judgment, and we slip continually upon irritation.

Not, indeed, that the book is empty of memorable incidents and pleasant passages. What could be less modern or more typical than the recalled interview between George Sand's publisher and Pierre Leroux, her man of affairs? Leroux, the simple-minded Socialist and dreamer in a wideawake world, calls on the publisher with an offer of four volumes, and asks what prices they will fetch. "The usual one," says the publisher: "twenty pounds a volume." Leroux stares. "Twenty pounds a volume! Not possible." Whereupon the publisher, irritated, misinterpreting the reason of the philosopher's wonder, asserts his inability to offer a larger sum. "But do you understand that there are four volumes, and that would make in all two thousand francs." Leroux grows indignant at the idea of such an enormous sum being paid for mere fiction. "It is only a romance, sir," he cries; and positively declines, in George Sand's name and in his own, to countenance such a monstrous injustice as the payment of eighty pounds for four volumes of classical work. Astounded as the publisher was, he was still more astounded when he learned that George Sand herself, the greatest writer of the day, was of Leroux's opinion, and declined to accept so exorbitant a sum. Food for wonder at the Society of Authors! We picture the different nature of Mr. Watt's interviews with London publishers, as the very modern business man of England's emphatically lesser lights of literature.

M. Claretie reluctantly parts company with the guileless Socialist. We must smile with him at Leroux's naïve protest on visiting the splendid hotel his collaborator built in Paris while he had barely enough with which to keep body and soul together at Jersey. Leroux examines and admires everything imperturbably, and then says, without the smallest anger or reproach in his gentle voice: "Now, look here, you have a handsome house, a library, servants, a good table, and even a dressing gown, while I earn a pound a week. Is it just?"

Along the boulevards M. Claretie is inspired to a brightness of mood that sometimes reaches a witty flash, and has a kind of Parisian humour sufficiently engaging. The old aspect of the boulevard is, alas! vanishing, and with it the old-fashioned, punctilious boulevardier—the man who first trod its fascinating pavement in the plumed and conquering hour of youth then steadied down to the same table and same companions till old age overtook him, and he awoke to the gloomy aspect of reality to find that he had bartered home, hearth, and love for mere asphalt. Then Europe was simply a big Parisian suburb, that began at the Madeleine or Montmartre, and within these charmed limits was the only Paris a man could care to know. What went on outside mattered not. While French cannon were roaring at Crimea Maxime du Camp stopped to ask a boulevardier what news. "Abominable, inexplicable, totally irrational," replied the irritated boulevardier. "Feydeau's Fanny is in the fifth edition." The boulevard had its traditions then, since abolished by what its contempt of the rastaquouères has prompted it to define as the panmuffisme of to-day. It abhorred phrases out of which verbs, nouns, names, and courtesy are beaten out, and would not tolerate the waiter's reference to a customer as a table or a seat. Instead of shouting "Figaro clock," one of the habitués of a café recently said to the new-fashioned waiter, "I beg you will say, as was the more correct habit in my youth: 'Take the Figaro to the customer who is sitting at the table under the clock.'"

Now M. Claretie points out the boulevard is open to all nations of the world, with a disastrous loss of cachet. It is no longer the legendary Englishman, with a barbarous stiff-backed foreignness of appearance, who from time to time strolls past its crowded cafés, visibly a "my lord," making the grand tour. He was a "casual" from an eccentric isle, to stare at politely and, if his manners were bad, to muse upon in the spirit of grateful philosophy. When his manners were good, as they sometimes were, and he had money to do sufficient honour to them, his visit became a pleasure as well as instructive. In all circumstances he was then too isolated to suggest menace. But now the traditional invader has been forced to make way for hordes of Greeks, Poles, Russians, Roumanians, Yankees, and South Americans. Instead of the occasional, reserved, and superlatively well-dressed Saxon, who was but a mild dose of the inevitable, since Paris was destined as a refuge against ennui and leisure, various, and not always picturesque, colonies of rastaquouères throng the asphalt and shout and chatter, overdressed, gesticulating, and underbred. The boulevard does not like the innovation; neither does M. Jules Claretie.

H. L.

THE BOOK MARKET.

THE CHANCERY LANE AUCTIONS.

THERE are many grades of book auctions. The one I dropped into yesterday at the Chancery Lane Sale Rooms was an ordinary booksellers' affair. No valuable library was being dispersed. No rarities were being offered. Yet some four hundred lots of books were catalogued, and I found them passing to new owners at a rate which I cannot easily describe or make credible. Mr. Hodgson does not suspend his hammer long—it falls with beautiful decision at the right moment.

Yet the scene during such a sale as I have mentioned is not very lively. The attendance is not large, and there is an absence of excitement. But the calm is that of certain swift streams. The auctioneer's quiet intensity, his unflagging progress through the list, his skilled economy of voice, gesture, and time, and his perfect hearing, must be considered. The buyers, too, are old hands; they speak quietly and quickly, like men playing nap. You have not been there ten minutes before the whole process begins to seem mechanical. The offering, the bidding, and the disposal of the bundles go on in monotonous tones and movements, and you perceive that half the men at the table are not bidding, but are sitting like inactive volcanoes, awaiting future lots. There is nowhere any waste of energy. One bookseller seemed to be so much at leisure that I ventured to talk to him.

"I see," I said, "a good deal that is new to me; I want you to tell me, if you will, what it is I see. Where do all these books come from?"

"These books!—oh, from anywhere!"

"As, for instance?"

"Well, some of them will be put in by private people; a great many by booksellers."

"Booksellers?"

"Yes; you see, a bookseller finds his stock is big, and trade slow; he wants money; and he sends half a roomful of books here to be sold for what they will fetch. Or perhaps he bought a lot of books on spec in a sale last week; he puts them into this sale in the hope of making a profit."

"But, speaking generally, this is a sale to which second-hand booksellers come to buy general stock?"

"Certainly; and, of course, to buy books for which they have already got orders."

"In either case they seem to buy them at amazingly low prices. I see bundles of twenty books, many of them evidently published at five or six shillings, go for little more than the published price of one. I have just seen ninety-nine copies of a book, entitled The Canaries for Consumptives, go for eighteenpence. Now, this cannot be a popular book, but ninety-nine copies for eighteenpence! Then twenty-eight copies of a presentable book, called On Duty Under a Tropical Sun, fetched only half-a-crown; and twelve copies of a very decent-looking novel, called The Quest of Sir Bertrand, in cloth covers, went for 1d. each."

"Just so. But these books were worth no more. Take the consumptive book. There may be ninety-nine people in London who would give a shilling for it; but the man who bought them has no means of attracting those customers. He has only the general public, the passers-by, to work with; and if he tickets the books twopence each, getting about sixteen shillings for a parcel for which he paid one shilling and sixpence, consider the time it will take him to sell these books; it may take him six months; and he must find room for the books, and dust them, and push them. But the chances are that he'll sell them at one penny each, and be twice six months doing it."

"I notice that the most hopeless bundle of books fetches something."

"Yes; you see many books are bought here for the country. Sometimes they are sold by the sack, labelled "waste"; they are then bought very cheaply and sent down to Leeds or Newcastle. Barrow-men, who sell books one day and vegetables the next, also buy these books."

"For cash?"

"Yes; but they often combine, and so get over that difficulty."

"Well, now I notice that a good book will often fetch a high price. I saw Mr. Hodgson knock down Sir Archibald Geike's Ancient Volcanoes of Great Britain, in two volumes, for twenty-four shillings. What does that mean?"

"What does that mean?"

"Yes: the book was published at thirty-six shillings; it is a fine book, but can a second-hand bookseller afford to give twenty-four shillings for it in a sale room?"

"Probably he didn't; it most likely went to a private buyer, bidding against another private buyer."

"Then are private buyers allowed to bid?"

"Certainly."

"I saw forty-one volumes of the Waverley Novels in the author's favourite edition, with frontispieces complete, go for twelve shillings, and I wished I had the right to bid thirteen for them."

"Well, you had."

"I am not in the trade."

"That doesn't matter."

"Do you mean that I may come here and bid against booksellers?"

"Certainly."

"But you don't like that kind of thing?"

"No."

WHAT AMERICA READS.

We take the following reports of bookselling from the current American Bookman. Each list is furnished by a bookseller, who reports the titles of new books in the order of demand.

NEW YORK.

1. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
2. On the Face of the Waters. By Mrs. Steel.
3. Phroso. By Anthony Hope.
4. On Many Seas. By Williams.
5. Sentimental Tommy. By J. M. Barrie.
6. Tess of the D'Urbervilles. By Thomas Hardy.

BOSTON.

1. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
2. On the Face of the Waters. By Mrs. Steel.
3. Phroso. By Anthony Hope.
4. King Noanett. By Stimson.
5. America and the Americans. From a French Point of View.
6. Falcon of Langéac. By Whiteley.

CHICAGO.

1. Green Book. By Jókai.
2. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
3. On the Face of the Waters. By Mrs. Steel.
4. Through Unknown African Countries. By Smith.
5. Telepathy. By Mason.
6. Trooper Peter Halket. By Olive Schreiner.

SAN FRANCISCO.

1. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
2. On the Face of the Waters. By Mrs. Steel.
3. The Seven Seas. By Rudyard Kipling.
4. Margaret Ogilvy. By J. M. Barrie.
5. Phroso. By Anthony Hope.
6. Checkers. By Blossom.

TORONTO (CANADA).

1. Farthest North. By Nansen.
2. Guesses at the Riddle of Existence. By Goldwin Smith.
3. Story of Canada. By Bourinot.
4. Sentimental Tommy. By J. M. Barrie.
5. Rodney Stone. By Conan Doyle.
6. Land of the Leal. By David Lyall.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

1. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
2. On the Face of the Waters. By Mrs. Steel.
3. Phroso. By Anthony Hope.
4. Margaret Ogilvy. By J. M. Barrie.
5. Sentimental Tommy. By J. M. Barrie.
6. The Seven Seas. By Rudyard Kipling.

PITTSBURG, PA.

1. Farthest North. By Nansen.
2. On Many Seas. By Williams.
3. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
4. Phroso. By Anthony Hope.
5. Hon. Peter Stirling. By Ford.
6. Forge in the Forest. By Roberts.

ART.

SCULPTURE AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

SCULPTURE has for some years been noticeably more slender, sharper, finer, and more interesting; to the eye of the mere outsider, at least, that alteration of character seems conspicuous; and he is apt to attribute it indirectly to Mr. Alfred Gilbert. There was before this a kind of Græco-Roman aspect of which it is easy to get weary, but which seemed normal, if not inevitable. This is gone, and sculpture looks individual, brisk, enterprising, and less dull in gracefulness. The Venus de' Medici and Canova are finally driven out, and the relief of their going is very great. Elegance of quite another kind is now often aimed at, sometimes hit, and almost always confessed. To take the present collection at the Royal Academy in the order of the numbers, we find the fresher sense of style evident in "The Swan Girl" of Mr. George Simonds—a group in which the wreathing lines have not led the sculptor into the insipid and conventional graces that would have been but recently a matter of course in such a subject; the real grace and charm are so much the greater. Next, Miss Ella Curtois has taken the thin forms of a boy for her subject in "Child Playing at Marbles," and she has treated them with energy; the pause and intentness of the bodily expression are good, especially in the forward arm; the gesture is open and very boy-like. To "The Finding of Eurydice," a close group of two pliant figures, Mr. John Hughes has given real strength of feeling; this is no theatre embrace: the two faces are hidden from one another, and love strains together all the meek and gentle lines of the composition. The expression of feeling is rare in the present exhibition. Signor Carlo Caccia has done a bit of sentiment, on the other hand, in his figure of "Abraham Lincoln: from the Wood to the Presidency"—a little woodlander in the pauses of his toil dreaming of the future with a book upon his knee; the child is animated, in an Italian way, and has an Italian construction of forehead and breadth between the eyes. Mr. Oliver Wheatley has made a bold grasp at character and new vigour in his relief of "Prometheus." The Titan screams against the screaming vulture, and his hair and beard fly in the mountain storm. The sculptor has been no more preoccupied with the thought of dignity than was Æschylus himself; but whether he, too, has possessed it, without care, is a question. At any rate, his work is not languid. At the head of the Central Hall, either side of the door, are the two reliefs for the Oxford Town-hall in which Mr. Schenk has made allegories of "Sloth" and "Industry." The two figures—male and female—are made interesting, in the first place, by the manner in which they are niched, with the upper part of the body wide and free and the lower limbs folded; the decoration of the composition is well secured, and the sense of style that has so well arranged this is evident also in the figures, which have beauty. "Sloth" is perhaps hardly so satisfactory as the more expressive "Industry." Next comes a bronze—the statue of "Atalanta," by Mr. Gustav Natorp—smooth and full of prettiness, and by no means lacking in the spirit of her action. Inspired by Oriental feeling are the important decorative accessories of Miss Esther Moore's relief, "At the Gates of the Past." The figure is not without originality, and the lines of the gate, shown by the light colouring of the ground, are as free as though a quill pen had drawn them. Miss Adèle Hay's "Model of a Fountain" is an enterprising design, not unsuccessfully inspired by Rome.

In the Lecture Room the principal interest centres in Mr. George Frampton's experiment in bronze and marble—the statue of "Dame Alice Owen, Foundress of Owen's School, Islington." The intention of bringing close to one another, so that they should be indistinguishable, the manners of treatment proper to marble and to bronze is surely one that requires more justification than this single work can give. The mere combination of coloured marbles—white for the flesh, dark for the clothing—famous in a late-Italian statue on the Quirinal in Rome, is, of course, not a case in point, although the "Dame Alice" may remind us of it by her various colours. It seems hard that after English artists and craftsmen had been so lectured upon the powers and limitations of their material, and so scolded as they have been, a sculptor of this talent should rise up and contradict the doctrine. Mr. Frampton had no trifle to contend with in the Elizabethan dress, arbitrarily divided at the waist and thickly stiff with large, solid, repeated folds from the waist to the ground. These folds would undeniably have looked more stupid in marble than they do in bronze, a material that allows of their being patterned over with a flowered brocade. But this pattern in itself commits the sculptor to an unsculptural treatment, and once on the way to mixtures he seems to have given way to the ardour of experiment. His Dame Alice has a real stick—or if he took the trouble to make a stick in bronze when he might have bought one at the nearest shop, why did he so? In this little incident of the black walking-stick is to be found all the condemnation (too easy) that is necessary; for, Dame Alice, having (virtually) a real stick, is seen at once to have hands and a face of marble, and a dress made stiffer by bronze than even the fashion of the day had made it with whalebone; and the effect is uncomfortable. Even if these too obvious improprieties were to be condoned, there cannot be any excuse for introducing gilding. The surface of gilding is unlike any other surface; it is the most positive thing in the world, for every other surface represents—gilding only is. Nothing can make it represent, and nothing can make it anything other than insistently local. It is, however, a pity that so much has to be said of the material of a statue which is really a beautiful statue, full of dignity, standing with quiet animation, and expressive of sweetness and piety.

Mr. Onslow Ford has done excellent work in his busts in bronze—that of Mr. Herbert Spencer being one of even exceptional power; M. Dagnan Bouveret, Sir John Millais, Mr. George Alexander are all full of a life that penetrates to the very construction and the bone. Vital, with the vitality of action besides, is, as ever, the work of Mr. Swan, who exhibits a little silver group—"Young Indian Leopard and Tortoise." The leopard is intensely lively and strong; one curving paw holds the shell, the other shoulder is splendidly thrust out, the body is flattened with its action. With energy and life, too, do Mr. Charles Beacon's "Panthers" fight; the straight tail is decidedly a "document." But in his "Wounded Bunkie"—an equestrian group—Mr. Frederick Remington has lost movement, and lost it in a good cause. Much sculpture, many a painting, must be likewise sacrificed to truth of attitude before our long-deceived eyes are so accustomed as to associate movement with the galloping action of a horse as it really is. Meanwhile, the honest painter and sculptor are real martyrs, for their horse does not seem to go. Of course, they must hold on; there is nothing else for it; we cannot go back to a convention which outrages nature and has gained its effect of speed by the mere bad habit of the eye. Nevertheless they would do well to choose the less impossible-seeming (for there are such) of the real and actual movements of the horse, in consideration for the public weakness. Mr. Remington has allowed himself no such transactions. You may hear a confident passer-by decry him: "Look at that absurd thing! The horse has got one foot on the ground and the others in the air." The "absurdity" is Nature's own action, and Mr. Remington has spared us no shock of facts. His near horse has flying hind-hoofs, and one foreleg up while the other stiffly touches the ground; the off horse is equally truthful in the dead-spider attitude of the gallop.

Mr. David McGill's "Piccolo" is a very animated statue, without much grace. The "Victory" of Miss A. F. Gell is one of the works that owe so much to the suggestion, intelligently adopted, of Mr. Gilbert; so is the "Design for Athletic Challenge Shield" of Mr. Onslow Whiting. "The Dawn of Thought" is a very successful study, by Mr. Willis, of the first intent expression of a child. "Mother and Child," by Mr. Herbert Hampton, should have a word of warm praise for the naturalness that would have made it salient a few years ago. Among the few imaginative things is Mr. E. M. Rope's "Dream of the Sea," which has much grace; and for decorative work the "Design for Electric Lamp" of Mr. Onslow Whiting is to be praised for its fancy and spirit.

A. M.

MUSIC.

OPERA AND CONCERTS.

THE opera season commenced last Monday week at Covent Garden under the new management of Mr. Maurice Grau. The late Sir Augustus Harris understood well how many a slip there is between a promise and a production, and he opened his seasons quietly. The same lines have now been followed. Well-known modern operas have been given, or works like "Les Huguenots," which lives largely on its past reputation—for Wagner is now the rage, and the public cannot possibly serve or enjoy two masters so diametrically opposed as were Meyerbeer and Wagner: the one aimed at effect, the other at truth—and "Romeo and Juliet," which is apparently growing in favour. There is a talk of one or two novelties; and it is to be hoped that classical opera will not be neglected; that we shall, at any rate, hear "Orfeo," "Don Juan," and "Fidelio."

The performances of "Faust" and "Romeo" on the Monday and Tuesday do not call for special notice. On Wednesday M. van Dyck took the title-rôle in "Tann-häuser." He is a great artist; he has a fine voice and knows how to use it, and his acting is full of life. And yet his Tannhäuser seems to lack at times, especially at the close of the second act, a certain sincerity, and therefore impressiveness. The part of Elizabeth was to have been taken by Miss Eames, but she was prevented at the last moment, and Mlle. Pacary occupied her place. She possesses a good voice; but this, of course, was not the moment to judge either of her singing or acting. The "Wolfram" of M. Noté was correct, but dry. M. Journet, from Brussels, proved a dignified Landgrave. The orchestra was under the direction of Signor Mancinelli, who conducted in a peculiarly Italian vein. The opera was sung in French. Operas, so it seems to me, ought to be given in the language in which they were written, or in the one of the country in which they are performed.

"AIDA," on Thursday, was interesting on account of the appearance of Miss Susan Strong in the title-rôle. Her début last year in "Die Walküre" was one of brilliant promise, which was certainly not quite fulfilled in "Aida." Her rendering of the part was, however, in many ways, praiseworthy. Miss Marie Brema's impersonation of "Amneris" was striking, though it was most certainly at times overwrought.

Mlle. PACARY's voice was not in good order on "Les Huguenots" night. The chief points in the performance were the excellent "St. Bris" of M. Plançon, and the intelligent and effective conducting of M. Flori.

The programme of Mr. Eugen d'Albert's first recital at St. James's Hall on Thursday afternoon, May 13, was not a very exciting one. It commenced with a Sonata in F sharp minor from the pen of the concert giver. Rubinstein used at times to inflict some very dry music of his own on his audiences; but his magnificent renderings of the works of the great masters softened the hearts of the hearers, who otherwise might have proved rebellious. Mr. d'Albert is also a great interpreter of the masters, especially of Beethoven; and if he has written nothing for the pianoforte more attractive than the Sonata in question, it will be a pity for him to press his music on the public. The Sonata is undeniably clever; yet cleverness is only one, and not even the greatest, factor in a work of art; the music is exceedingly difficult, and it was, of course, brilliantly played. Chopin's Nocturne in C minor, though a trifle cold, was magnificently rendered; the reading of the Ballade in A flat was not, however, sufficiently spontaneous. Show pieces by Raff, Liszt, and Tausig displayed the pianist's wonderful gifts as an executant.

I SHOULD just like to mention the first performance, I believe, in London of Volkmann's interesting pianoforte Trio in B flat minor, well rendered by MM. Isidor Cohn, Elderhorst, and Whitehouse at their second concert at Steinway Hall last Monday.

Mme. Marchesi's attractive Vocal Recitals will be noticed next week.

MR. Wood's Tchaikowsky programme on Saturday afternoon proved in strong manner the unwisdom of the one-composer programme. To the monotony which, with few exceptions, results from such a scheme, was added, on this occasion, a certain disappointment: the earlier orchestral works of the Russian composer show skill and character, but the interest is never so high, never so sustained, as in the sixth, or even the fifth, symphony. The programme included a Suite in G (Op. 55), opening with a graceful, yet plaintive, movement entitled "Elegie," and concluding with a piquant theme and some exceedingly clever variations, all, except one, remarkable for their moderate length and refinement. The exception was the last, in which Tchaikowsky seems to have aimed at a violent contrast: the refinement of the earlier variations gives place to the commonplace; delicate orchestral effects to mere noise. The Symphony in F minor (No. 4, Op. 36) was produced at a Philharmonic concert in 1893, under the direction of the composer himself. It is clever, and in places highly effective, though unequal in interest. It is dangerous to study the artistic life of a man backwards. The Unfinished Symphony and the last one in C of Schubert have practically killed his earlier ones, which only recently came to light. So far as I can judge, Tchaikowsky's early symphonies will share a similar fate; the last two are the best; the last is exceedingly great. The performances under Mr. Wood were all excellent.

THE last Mottl programme on Tuesday evening filled the Queen's Hall from floor to ceiling. I spoke last week of the danger of concert performances of excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner, but also of extenuating circumstances in favour of "Parsifal." To assert that a concert rendering of the latter part of the third act of this "miracle" play reveals the dramatic genius of Wagner would be an artistic lie; to say that the admirable performance under the direction of Mr. Mottl was highly impressive, would be the plain truth. No doubt much is lost, and yet so much remains. The interpreters, all thoroughly in sympathy with the music, were MM. Vogl, E. Wachter, and D. Bispham, and there was a chorus from the Royal College of Music, which had been well prepared by Sir W. Parratt. New bells, constructed after a design of Mr. Mottl's, were employed; the tone is good, but unfortunately they were a shade sharp against the orchestra. The first part of the programme was devoted to Berlioz. The performance of "Harold en Italie" was one of the best I have ever heard; the viola solo part was most artistically interpreted by Mr. Michael Balling on the viola-alta, an instrument larger than the viola, and of which the tone is rich and sympathetic. The "Pilgrims' March" and "Serenade" of the symphony are small yet sparkling gems; the first movement is interesting, but the last is weak in inspiration.

J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

I HAVE been looking over my shelf of books to be reviewed. A scientific reviewer's shelf, however promptly dealt with, always contains one or two anomalous curiosities, books written to ventilate some hobby or to air some little grievance against established thought. Pathetic little books they are, most of them, comparable to the "minor poetry" which falls to the lot of the literary man; and one's thought about them in general is, how does it ever pay anyone to publish them? Sometimes they are large and aggressive, like (to take a couple of examples at random) Mrs. Bloomfield Moore's opus on Keeley and Dr. Somebody's great life of Anna Kingsford. I confess that when writers run to these lengths of verbiage they bore me. For the smaller kinds I have some sympathy. I would willingly, from pity, believe in rain-making, "vril," "od," Baron Reichenbach's sensitives, and the power of water-finding—indeed, I believe firmly in the last, and shall do, I expect, until I see it put into practice.

THEN there are people with merely heretical views—as that the earth is flat, or that the sun goes round it; these form a class far more numerous than anyone but a reviewer could suppose, and they include a wide range of protestants, from the extreme cases I have instanced down to Mr. Grant Allen, who once propounded a theory of force and energy which I am sorry to say I never understood. An Australian singing-master has inflicted on me recently some strange views concerning voice-production, of which I took in little but the abuse and a sense of capital letters. An American life of Edison gave me a bad half hour, and then there are the works on spiritualism, vivisection, preformation, and evolution (from the theological point of view), all of which are dull enough when written seriously, but ten times more so when conceived, as many of them are, in a spirit of banter.

I HAVE one before me now. It is called Is Science Guilty? and, being written by "A Barrister-at-Law," is chiefly remarkable for the erudite form in which the supposed trial of science is set forth. It is also affectionately dedicated to the head master of a school in which the writer spent seven happy "and profitably scholastic" years. The crimes alleged against science amount to the fact that whereas in heathen lands Christianity is becoming "a power of glorious and unparalleled importance," in so-called civilised lands it has ceased to make progress. The following quotation from the first page will probably suffice for most people:

"The indictment having been read, the prisoner, Madam Neo Science, was arraigned, and called upon to plead.

"Clerk of the Peace: 'How say you, Madam Neo Science, are you guilty or not guilty?'

"The Prisoner (in a loud voice, and holding up her right hand): 'Not guilty!'

"In view of the probable duration of the trial, a jury of fifteen, with Mr. Thomas Huxley [sic] as foreman, was sworn in. The wisdom of the arrangement will be seen from the fact that before the trial was finished the foreman died, and his place was filled by Mr. Max Nordau."

By Mr. Max Nordau, indeed!

It is a relief to turn from such nonsense to a little book the innocent purpose of which is to prove that the sun is only thirty-two miles in diameter, and that the earth is not a planet. The author (Dr. C. Robertson) is furious with all the astronomers who have written big books for assuming, instead of proving, the truth of the Copernican theory. He also gathers up at the end, and reads, those reviewers who speak lightly of his doctrines without taking the trouble to disprove them. Personally, I feel quite convinced, after reading his elaborate dissertation, that Dr. Robertson is right in his contentions. I am only sorry that he admits the earth to be round. I do not feel quite sure that the sun, if it were not larger than he says it is, would not have been burnt up during the long ages in which we can trace its existence without, apparently, material alteration; and I await Dr. Robertson's authority to regard the stars and the principal nebulae as no larger than the pin-points which they appear to be. Into the relative merits of Ptolemy and Copernicus space does not permit me to enter, but I imagine that the mass of the sun plays some part in astronomical physics, so far as the solar system is concerned; and if Ptolemy be right, it must have been a remarkably happy accident which led Adams and Leverrier independently to deduce the exact position of Neptune.

THE Royal Society soirée last Wednesday was remarkable for an unusually interesting average of exhibits. Among the novelties were Mr. Moore's collection of marine organisms from Tanganyika (which have already been mentioned in this column), a complete set of microscope slides illustrating the tsetse-fly disease, and some marvellous collections of lepidoptera showing the alterations of colouring and form caused by alterations of temperature in the pupal stage. A good deal of interest was shown also in a series of experiments by Mr. J. W. Swan, showing some curious stresses in viscous resin due to the convective electric discharge. The cause of these is very obscure; they seem, however, to bear out Lord Armstrong's theory of vortical action.

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WHY THE NIGHTINGALE SINGS AT NIGHT.

Siena: May 10.

After reading the review of a book by P. G. Hamerton in the ACADEMY for April 24, I was tempted to send you the following verse, repeated to me by a country girl at Siena, and supposed to be sung by the nightingale himself as an explanation of the fact that he sings at night and does not sleep:

"Se la vite non mi legasse,
Se la serpa non mi mangiasse,
Canterei fino al giorno chiaro-chiaro-chiaro-chiaro-chiaro."

Evidently the verse is based on some such legend as Mr. Hamerton's, though my contadina could not throw any further light on the subject.

DOROTHY H. CORNISH.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"The present volume," writes M. Maeterlinck's The Treasure of the Humble, "is a very clear exposition of what the essential characteristic of degeneracy and decadence is."

... It is this preference of the passive to the active that forms the substratum of the character of the true degenerate, and that makes him so ridiculous in the eyes of some, and so offensive in the eyes of others." Comparing Maeterlinck's idea with the passivity of Prometheus Vincit, the writer points out that they are totally different. "Instead of the Titan who gave fire to mortals and whose iron energy is unquenched by a thousand years of torture, his type of what is really vital [in life is the diseased semi-feminine creature who sighs and makes eyes at misfortune like a weak and sentimental schoolgirl, and courts our admiration by his moaning, not by suppressing his moans; or else by the mere dreamer, who can do nothing but drowse and dream. . . . That from this contemptible way of regarding human life an art and poetry may arrive which has [sic] many technical beauties we admit; but the beauty is all a beauty of putrescence, and when it has any influence at all it is as corrupting as it is corrupt. "Though a mystic's work," writes the Chronicle, "there is no mystical phraseology. . . . Like Emerson he expounds no explicit theory and system; unlike Emerson, he would seem to have them, but to shrink, partly for artistic reasons, still more for personal, from nakedly betraying them." He "does but adumbrate and whisper, knowing that there are who will understand." He "has a singular dramatic instinct in touching upon ordinary emotions, in translating them into imaginative phrase: phrase beautiful or fantastic, but always alive. . . . Sudden states of the soul, wrought by a breath of air, a 'nothing,' are for him the great realities and revelations, coming to him in colour and shape. . . . Very inevitably, he has a delicate touch upon morality, not altogether free from a kind of good and gentle antinomianism. . . . A certain childlike gravity and gladness in one pervades the writing of this mystic, as is always true of true travellers in the mystical country; his very sadnesses have no blackness, but only a sense of mystery round about." The Pall Mall's first impression was that "while he possessed poetry of imagination and delicacy of feeling, he lacked the subtlety of intellect and the skill in metaphysic which may make mysticism or neo-platonism interesting or valuable. The result seemed to us to be a confusion of well-sounding and unmeaning propositions, of pretty half-ideas, with here and there (as was natural in a poet) a flash of illuminating (though still formless) thought, a fancy wild, but beautiful and suggestive." The final judgment is: "We honestly believe that there are admirers of M. Maeterlinck who find the 'mystic' in the merely unintelligible. . . . He talks vague and grandiose nothings about the 'soul.' . . . We should have liked some assurance that the word has the same connotation throughout. Almost invariably, when the word is used, we come upon propositions unintelligible in themselves and bewildering in connexion with one another. . . . We think there is but one essay that has any intellectual value in it—that is, 'The Tragical in Daily Life,' and it is more than suggestive. . . . Mr. Sutro has translated it excellently well: his style is always good and sometimes impressive." The Saturday Review, confining himself to a consideration of Mr. Sutro's performance, premises: "M. Maeterlinck, who has more imagination than thought, more emotional sensibility than precision of speech, is a very difficult writer to translate," and concludes: "If you desire to know the meaning of M. Maeterlinck's expressions, Mr. Sutro will inform you about it; but of the charm, of the quaint singing cadences and murmuring falls which make M. Maeterlinck's prose like the whispering of a very wise child—of this you will get nothing."

"The Adventures of John Johns." By Frederic Carrel. (Bliss, Sands & Co.)

"Mr. CARREL's intention is 'to mirror, not to preach,'" begins the Chronicle, but "it is a property of mirrors . . . that they lower the tone of the world they reflect. The tone of the world into which John Johns adventures is undoubtedly very low indeed. . . . If the 'realism' of the early scenes of the adventures of John Johns be admitted nothing conceivable need surprise us. If this be a 'realistic novel' . . . we wonder not that there should be thousands who devoutly believe in the truth of Miss Marie Corelli's fantastic scenes from high life." "Mr. Carrel prefaces his new novel by remarking that it is his intention 'to mirror, not to preach,'" the National Observer begins, and "if the perfection of art lies in a faithful representation of life with its sordid motives, its greedy ambitions, and unprincipled immorality, then Mr. Carrel has given us something which very nearly approaches that standard. M. Zola has unfortunately done realism an injustice by associating it with what is monstrous, unclean, and repulsive. From this element Mr. Carrel's book is absolutely free, and if any accusation can be brought against him at all, it will be on the score of his surrounding immorality with too refined an atmosphere." The Pall Mall begins: "Mr. Carrel prefaces his book with a note to the effect that his endeavour in writing it has been 'to mirror, not to preach.'" "The book," it concludes, "is hardly calculated to give pleasure in its perusal, for its undeniable cleverness cannot atone for the unsavoury nature of the topics with which it so largely deals."

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE and FREE REVIEW: a Monthly Magazine. Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."

CONTENTS OF THE MAY NUMBER: Bentley and Anthony Collins—Roden Noel—Tougenieff—The Downfall of Olive Schreiner—Marie Corelli and her Public—Moral Instruction without Theology—The Social Purty Hallucination—Current Pseudo-Philosophy—Slumland by Night—William Blake and Modern Problems—The Social Evil and the Moral Law—Periodicals—New Books.

PSEUDO-PHILOSOPHY at the END of the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By HUGH MORTIMER CECIL. 1. AN IRRATIONALIST TRIO (KIDD, DRUMMOND, BALFOUR). 10s. net.

A vigorous Refutation of the Works of the Three Irrationalists.

THE SAXON and the CELT. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON. 8s. net.

CONTENTS: I. The Question of Race. 1. The Present Irish Trouble. 2. English and Irish. 3. French and Germans. 4. The Problem of Race Origins. 5. The Naming of Celts, Gauls and Teutons. 6. "Celtic" and "Teutonic" History. 7. The Ethic of Race Instinct. II. The Lessons of Irish History. 1. The Causation of the Past. 2. The Verdict of Europe. III. Hill Burton on the Scottish Celts. IV. J. R. Green on Celts and Teutons. V. The Duke of Argyll on Irish History. VI. Mr. Goldwin Smith's Polemic VII. Mr. Froude on Ireland. VIII. Mr. Balfour on Irish Civilisation. Epilogue: A Programme for Ireland.

2s. 6d. net.

THE BLIGHT OF RESPECTABILITY: an Anatomy of the Disease and a Theory of Curative Treatment. By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

CONTENTS: 1. What is Respectability? 2. The Pathology of the Disease. 3. Ladies and Gentlemen. 4. Specific Symptoms of the Malady in Women. 5. Respectability and Morals. 6. Cultured Gentility. 7. Plutocracy. 8. Villadom. 9. The Tyranny of Respectability. 10. Respectable Civilisation and After. 11. Conclusion.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,
16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO., ART REPRODUCERS.

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERB HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,
the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHURE now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

MESSRS. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their
Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS., Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c., &c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.
Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON.

BIRKBECK BANK.

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

NEW NOVEL OF THEATRICAL LIFE.
"Distinctly powerful. . . . A series of vigorous, if rather satiric, social pictures in a narrative of no common interest and skill."
Glasgow Herald.

DAUGHTERS OF THESPI.

By JOHN BICKERDYKE,
Author of "Lady Val's Elopement," &c.
Published at 6s.

SIMPSON, MARSHALL & Co., Paternoster Row, E.C.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. A SHORT POPULAR HISTORY OF CRETE.

By J. H. FRIESE, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.

With Introduction by P. W. CLAYDEN.
Maps of Crete and Seat of War.

Mr. GLADSTONE writes: "I hope this book may tend to enhance the public interest in the condition of Crete, which at present threatens to bring serious disgrace upon this country."
The Daily Chronicle says: "A useful piece of work. . . . a singularly clear account of the origin of the present crisis in the island."

THE GREEN BOOK; or, Freedom Under the Snow. By MAURUS JÓKAI. Sixth Edition. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"Altogether a great book and worth all the novels of native growth we are likely to see this season."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"In its panoramic width of outlook, its inexhaustible fertility of invention and barbaric splendour of colouring, Maurus Jókai's great novel challenges comparison with Tolstol's 'War and Peace.' There is a succession of brilliant tableaux. To read this remarkable book is like witnessing a magnificent Oriental pageant. It is of enthralling interest and takes rank with the great novels of the century."—Spectator.

'MIDST the WILD CARPATHIANS. By MAURUS JÓKAI. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

"Will enthrall all English lovers of romance, and gratify the natural curiosity now general concerning the work of the Hungarian novelist."—Saturday Review.

LADY JEAN'S SON. By Sarah Tytler. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"The glimpses of Edinburgh society while the Northern Athens was still the seat of fashion are life-like and clever. 'Lady Jean's Son' is from first to last a delightful story."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE WINDS OF MARCH. By George KNIGHT, Author of "Dust in the Balance," "Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

THE REJUVENATION of MISS SEMAPHORE: a Farical Novel. By HAL GODFREY. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls. By LEWIS MACNAMARA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.

Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now Offered at Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BRIMPTON ROAD S.W.;

48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and

at BARTON ARCADE MANCHESTER.

E P P S'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

O O C O A

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Specially Illustrated List Post Free on Application

Just ready, crown 8vo, art canvas gilt, 6s.

FALSE DAWN. By Francis Prevost.

"There is mingled delicacy and power.....intensely interesting. The book is one to be read and remembered."—The Speaker.

"Francis Prevost's books the critic always snatches greedily. Invariably interesting, he is invariably provocative of hope. One reads him expecting an illumination."—Vanity Fair.

FALSE DAWN. By Francis Prevost.

"Beautifully written, with real and rare powers both of psychology and of word painting."—Academy.

"He tells a story of love pure and simple; of unlawful love in fact, rarefied by its own force and its own fire. It is the work of a sincere thinker, marked by singular literary refinement."—Black and White.

FALSE DAWN. By Francis Prevost.

"Two types of manhood and womanhood that are as noble as they are unhappily rare. Mr. Prevost has all the qualities that go to make up the successful novelist. He understands his men and women. He has an eye for a plot and its situations. He can construct brilliant dialogue to any extent. We might compare him to Anthony Hope in this respect—to the latter's disadvantage. He has wit and humour and an eye for nature."—Glasgow Herald.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Crown 8vo, art canvas, 5s.

BUST of GOLD.

"A series of nine fin de siècle stories of great power and picturesqueness.....As wood pictures they are simply masterpieces."—Daily Telegraph.

ON the VERGE.

"If Mr. Prevost's work were not so good, one would praise it more. As it is, it challenges comparison with the best."—Daily Graphic.

Just ready, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

NEW NOVEL BY COULSON KERNAHAN,

Author of "God and the Ant" and "The Child, the Wise Man, and the Devil," of which 100,000 have been sold. Illustrated by E. S. Wilson.

CAPTAIN SHANNON.

"Here is a story which every novelist should have thought of years ago. No man possibly but Conan Doyle could have treated such an admirable first idea as well as Mr. Kernahan has treated it."—Daily Chronicle.

"As ingenious and thrilling a one, in fact, as we have ever read."—Christian Age.

CAPTAIN SHANNON.

"The only conceivable motive for the Aldergate outrage is the advertisement of Captain Shannon.....'Captain Shannon,' however, did not need this noisy advertisement, since it is quite sure to make its way on its merits."—Truth.

"The perils which Rissler has to undergo before he runs the victim to earth—or rather to water—are so terrible that they might well be warranted to turn the hair of any man white."—Speaker.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

SIXTH EDITION.

A DEAD MAN'S DIARY.

"The vigour of this book is great, and the anonymous author has an uncommon gift of intensity. On many readers, it may be guessed, the book will have a mesmerizing effect."—J. M. BARRIE in the British Weekly.

FIFTH EDITION.

A BOOK of STRANGE SINS.

"Such books are among the healthiest symptoms not only of modern literature, but of modern thought. The boom is a fine one."—Academy.

FOURTH EDITION.

SORROW and SONG.

"Of singular beauty and tenderness, but, at the same time, full of critical insight."—Athenaeum.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

FORDHAM'S FEUD. By Bertram Mitford.

Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.

"A powerful and decidedly interesting novel. The plot is a clever one... full of interest... gives some remarkably vivid portraits."—African Critic.

"Altogether outside the conventional groove. Interest in the story never flags."—Scotsman.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.

THE EXPIATION of WYNNE PALLISER.

"Phenomenal success. It is the best of this author's many excellent romances."—Globe.

THE CURSE of CLEMENT WAYNFLEETE.

"Telling us wonderful incidents of inter-racial warfare, of ambushes, sieges, surprises and assaults almost without number... A thoroughly exciting story, full of bright descriptions and stirring episodes."—The Daily Telegraph.

A VELDT OFFICIAL.

"We have seldom come across a more thrilling narrative. From start to finish Mr. Mitford secures unflagging attention."—Leeds Mercury.

GUY BOOTHBY'S NOVELS.

Profusely Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE FASCINATION of the KING.

After the remarkable success of Mr. Boothby's previous novels, "Dr. Nikola," "The Beautiful White Devil," "A Bid for Fortune," &c., this book will be eagerly welcomed, and will, it is anticipated, secure an even greater success.

FOURTH EDITION.

DOCTOR NIKOLA.

"Deeply interesting.....The charm of the book is its remoteness from the ordinary scenes and ways of fiction; after reading it one could almost fancy that one had stood within the gates of Lhasa the Blessed."—British Weekly.

SIXTH EDITION.

THE BEAUTIFUL WHITE DEVIL.

"An original idea worked out in original fashion. A book for all who like stories told in a bright, beautiful style."—Globe.

THIRD EDITION.

A BID for FORTUNE.

"He never allows the interest to drop from first to last...The plot is highly ingenious, and when once it has fairly thickened, exciting to a degree."—Times.

FOURTH EDITION.

IN STRANGE COMPANY.

"A capital novel of its kind—the sensational-adventurous. It has the quality of life and stir, and will carry the reader with curiosity unabated to the end."—World.

THIRD EDITION.

THE MARRIAGE of ESTHER.

"A story full of action, life, and dramatic interest.....There is a vigour and a power of illusion about it that raises it quite above the level of the ordinary novel of adventure."—Manchester Guardian.

Now ready, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

LADY TURPIN. By Henry Herman, Author of

"The Silver King," "His Angel," &c. Profusely Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.

"A breathlessly exciting tale."—The Bookman.

"Ingenuously constructed, and throbbing with excitement."—Sheffield Telegraph.

"An interesting story, full of exciting incident and detail."—Birmingham Gazette.

THE NOVELTY OF THE SEASON.

AN EDITION DE LUXE FOR 6d.

25,000 SOLD ON APPLICATION.

Leatherette gilt, 6d.; cloth gilt, gilt top, 1s.

Portrait of the Author and cover designed by Turbayne.

A LITERARY GENT.

By COULSON KERNAHAN.

"'A Literary Gent' should preach a finer apocalypse against intemperance than all the harangues of platform orators during the century."—Illustrated London News.

"'A Literary Gent' is as realistic and terrible a study of dipsomania and its mental and physical effects as we have ever read."—Review of Reviews.

"So vivid are the pictures that people with 'nerves' had better avoid them. We know of nothing so morbidly realistic since the famous Essay of Charles Lamb and 'The Confessions of an Opium Eater.'"—Christian World.

NEW EDITION JUST READY.

RED CLOTH, ROUND CORNERS.

ONE SHILLING.

GUIDE to LONDON.

"A model of what a cheap handbook of our vast city should be."—Daily News.

"One of the cheapest books ever issued.....The information is thorough and well up to date, and the coloured maps and plans especially clear and good."—Daily Telegraph.

"A Guide worthy of the city whose name it bears."—City Press.

COMPLETE LIST

OF

68 SHILLING

ILLUSTRATED GUIDE BOOKS,

EMBRACING ALL THE

PRINCIPAL HOLIDAY RESORTS

Of the United Kingdom and the Continent, post free, on application.

LONDON: WARD, LOCK & CO., LIMITED, SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1308.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied
promptly to order.
Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.
LATEST CATALOGUES:—
No. 51 SEMITIC—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
" 52, 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (782, 732 lots.)
" 53 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
Catalogues of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
Catalogues on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
Catalogues post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
Catalogues on application.

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 114, for March), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 33rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLI-CATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
Catalogues sent on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.
Telegrams: MOURSEL, LONDON. [Established 1819.]

TO AUTHORS.—Messrs. DIGBY, LONG & CO.
(Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net, eighth
edition) INVITE AUTHORS to FORWARD their MSS. (Fiction, Travel, Poetry, &c.) suitable for Volume for prompt consideration.—
Address 18, Boulevard Street, Fleet Street, London.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.,
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated and other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.
(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

WANTED BOOKPLATES.—Any good Plates, or parcels, purchased for cash.—HENRY HIGHAM, 84, Tytherton
Road, London, N.

WANTED, BOOKPLATES of Bozman, Walker,
Giles, Reverley, Cabot, Pace; also any Old Specimens. Very best prices will be paid.—MOORE, 6, Trelawn Road, Leyton, Essex.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—FORTHCOM-
ING EXAMINATION.—DRAUGHTSMAN in the HYDRO-
GRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT of the ADMIRALTY (17-28), 7th
JULY. Expertness in Hydrographical Chart Drawing essential.—The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received.
They must be made on forms, to be obtained, with particulars, from
the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

THE SECOND INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY CONFERENCE, 1897.

President—
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., F.R.S.
Hon. Treasurer—
HENRY R. TEDDER, Esq.
Hon. Secretary—
J. Y. W. MAC ALISTER, Esq.,
20, Hanover Square, W.

The Conference will be held (by the kind permission of the Right
Hon. the Lord Mayor and Corporation) in the COUNCIL CHAMBER,
GUILDHALL, LONDON, on JULY 13, 14, 15, and 16, 1897, and will be attended by the representatives of the principal libraries throughout the world. Papers will be read on appropriate subjects, and some time will be devoted to open Discussions. All persons interested in the extension of the library movement or in the management of libraries are cordially invited to join the Conference. The Lord Mayor has invited the members of the Conference to a Conversation in the Manor House on the evening of July 13.

An Exhibition of Library Appliances will be an important feature of the Conference. Intending exhibitors should communicate with
the Hon. Secretary of the Exhibition Committee, THOMAS MASON, Esq., 115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. The Subscription, One Guinea, entitles Members to receive the Transactions and other Publications gratis, and to attend all meetings and social gatherings. Applications for Membership should be sent at once to the Hon. Secretary.

N.B.—The programme of Papers is now complete, and no further offers can be considered.

TO LECTURE SOCIETIES.
MR. R. WALLACE, M.P. (Edin.), is now making his Lecturing arrangements for the Season 1897-98. Subjects:
"Cant," "House of Commons," "Mrs. Grundy," and "Shams." Details
on application.—9, Edith Villas, London, W.

AN EXHIBITION OF BOOKBINDING, showing a New Method of Decoration in Hand Embossed Leather, Modelled and Coloured. is NOW OPEN at the LIBRARY BUREAU, Limited, 10, BLOOMSBURY STREET, LONDON, W.C.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 5a, Pall Mall East, S.W.
120th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIGFRIED H. HERRKOMER, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

THE LIBER STUDIUM of
J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.,
And NEW MEZZOTINTS by FRANK SHORT,
TO COMPLETE THE BOOK,
ON VIEW at ROBERT DUNTHORNE'S, the REMBRANDT GAL-
LERY, 5, Vigo Street, W. Admission, including Catalogue, 1s.

MCGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL,
CANADA.

CHAIR OF ZOOLOGY.
The Governors of McGill University are prepared to receive APPLI-CATIONS for Appointment to the newly founded PROFESSORSHIP of ZOOLOGY. Salary, $2,500 Dollars per annum. Candidates from Great Britain are requested to forward applications, with any testimonials and references they may desire to submit, on or before
15th June, addressed, "PRINCIPAL," Office of the High Commissioner
for Canada, 17, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.
1897.—EXAMINATION, JULY 6th, 7th. One of £30, two of
£20, and Minor Scholarships of £15 to £30. Candidates to be under 15 years of age.
For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—AN EXAMINA-
TION will be held in July next to fill up not less than FIVE
RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS,
and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the HEAD
MASTER, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI-
LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.
The last, most complete, and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-
Instruction.
Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.
Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 2 dol. 50 cents
American, 10s 6d. English. Post free.
Prospectus, with opinions of Educators, Scientific, Professional,
and Business Men all over the world, free.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 27, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
200, REGENT STREET, LONDON.
SOLD ONLY BY THE PUBLISHER.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO., ART REPRODUCERS.

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,
the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHURE now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes
in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their
Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.
Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

G. F. WATTS, R.A.,
SIR E. BURNE-JONES,
D. G. ROSSETTI.

An Extensive Selection of the Works of these Masters at prices ranging from Three Shillings and Sixpence to Three Guineas.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON.

This important Series of over Four Hundred Permanent Carbon
Reproductions of the chief Pictures in this magnificent collection includes representative selections from the Italian, Flemish,
Dutch, Spanish, French, and English Schools. By the aid of the most recent improvements in Photographic Science, absolutely
faithful and Permanent Copies have been secured, on a scale which adequately represents the Original Paintings. These are printed in rich brown pigments, on specially prepared paper, size
18 by 15 inches, and are sold at a uniform price of TWELVE
SHILLINGS EACH.

FAMOUS MASTERS in FOREIGN GALLERIES,

including the Masterpieces of the Louvre, Uffizi, Pitti, Dresden, Berlin, and other Collections. The same size and price as the above.

FRAMES specially designed and executed in oak and walnut.

Full particulars of Autotype Permanent Reproductions from the Old and Modern Masters sent post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

LONDON LIBRARY,
ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.
PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, the Very Rev
the DEAN of LLANDAFF, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq., Sir
HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B.

TREASURER—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF,
Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL
of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 170,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year. Life-Memberships, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room Open from 10 to half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 3 vols., royal 8vo price 21s.; to Members, 18s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER—PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO.
beg to announce that NEW POEMS, by FRANCIS THOMPSON, is now ready at all
Booksellers', price 6s. net.

2, WHITEHALL GARDENS, WESTMINSTER.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

EDITED BY W. L. COURTNEY.
JUNE.

A PLOT AGAINST BRITISH INTERESTS in the LEVANT. By VINCE.
THE QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE—
(i.) LITERATURE in the VICTORIAN ERA. By H. D. TRAILL.
(ii.) POSTAL and TELEGRAPHIC PROGRESS under QUEEN VICTORIA. By J. HENRIKSEN HEATON, M.P.
(iii.) AGRICULTURE during the QUEEN'S REIGN. By W. E. BEAR.
(iv.) THE COLONIAL EMPIRE of 1837. By E. SALMON, F.R.C.I.
THE MODERN FRENCH DRAMA—I. By A. FILOX.
CORSIKAN BANDITS. By HAMILTON ALDE.
CAPTAIN MAHAN'S "NELSON." By Judge O'CONNOR MORRIS.
THE NEW ERA in HYDERABAD. By JOSEPH ROCK.
NAVAL and COLONIAL POLICY of GERMANY. By H. W. WILSON.
IMPERIAL FREE TRADE. By Sir G. BAKER-POWELL, M.P.
THE PARIS SALONS. By H. H. STATHAM.
THE THESSALIAN WAR of 1897. By CHARLES WILLIAMS.

CHAPMAN'S MAGAZINE.

EDITED BY OSWALD CRAWFURD.
JUNE.—Price Sixpence.

VIOLET HUNT.—UNKIST, UNKIND! (Serial.)
ADA CAMBRIDGE.—A PAINFUL INTERVIEW.
ESTHER POLAND.—"COPY."
WILLIAM BEAUMONT.—RHONDA'S REVENGE.
MYRA SWAN.—IN BLISS and IGNORANCE.
F. BAYFORD HARRISON.—HUMDRUM.
LADY RIDLEY.—A TEMPERED WIND.
EDWIN PUGH.—CONSOLATION.
CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., London.

A PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT

Of unique interest is given with each
issue of "THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared this year:—

SAMUEL RICHARDSON ...	January	2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY ...	"	9
LEIGH HUNT ...	"	16
LORD MACAULAY ...	"	23
ROBERT SOUTHEY ...	"	30
S. T. COLERIDGE ...	February	6
CHARLES LAMB ...	"	13
MICHAEL DRAYTON ...	"	20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR ...	"	27
SAMUEL PEPYS ...	March	6
EDMUND WALLER ...	"	13
WILKIE COLLINS ...	"	20
JOHN MILTON ...	"	27
WILLIAM COWPER ...	April	3
CHARLES DARWIN ...	"	10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON ...	"	17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW ...	"	24
ANDREW MARVELL ...	May	1
ROBERT BROWNING ...	"	8
THOMAS CARLYLE ...	"	15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY ...	"	22

To-day's Issue.
CHARLES DICKENS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.
COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may unite in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,

30—34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

E P P S'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
C O C O A

A. & C. BLACK'S LIST.

THROUGH FINLAND in CARTS. By Mrs. ALICE TWEEDIE. With 18 Full-Page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, price 15s.

THE ASSUMPTION of MOSES. By Rev. R. H. CHARLES, Author of "The Apocalypse of Baruch." Crown 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

CARLYLE'S SARTOR RESARTUS.

Edited, with Notes and Introduction, by JAMES A. S. BARRETT. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

ZIG-ZAG GUIDE to the KENTISH

COAST. Written by F. C. BURNAND, and Illustrated by PHIL MAY. Crown 8vo, limp cloth, rounded corners, price 2s. 6d. [Ready for Whitenside.]

LONDON: A. & C. BLACK, SOHO SQUARE.

CARLYLE (THOMAS), MONTAIGNE, AND OTHER ESSAYS,

Chiefly Biographical, now first issued in book form, with Foreword by S. R. CROCKETT, and fine Photogravure Frontispiece of Sir J. K. Boehm's bust of Carlyle. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 8s. 6d. net.

May also be had in bindings similar to those of the Library and Ashburton Editions.

LARGE-PAPER EDITION.—75 copies on hand-made paper, royal 8vo, half-vellum, uncut, 15s. net.

Contents:—Montaigne—Lady Mary Wortley Montagu—Montesquieu—Nelson—Necker—The Netherlands—Newfoundland—Northumberland—The Pitts.

SECRET MEMOIRS OF NAPOLEON.

By ONE WHO NEVER QUITTED HIM for FIFTEEN YEARS (CHARLES DORIS, one of his Valets). With Photogravure Portrait of Napoleon. 8vo, 367 pp., cloth extra, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

JAMES GOWANS & SON,

13, High Street, St. John's Wood, London, N.W.

THE "QUEEN" CARTOONS FROM "PUNCH."

WILL BE PUBLISHED ON TUESDAY,
JUNE 1st,

THE QUEEN AND MR. PUNCH.

The Story of a Reign told in Mr. Punch's Queen Cartoons, with Historical Notes by Toby, M.P.

Making a handsome quarto volume of 128 pages, printed on fine paper, and stitched in a wrapper, in gold and colours, specially designed by LINLEY SAMBOURNE.

Price HALF-A-CROWN.

London:

BRADBURY, AGNEW & Co., 8, 9 and 10, Boulevard Street, E.C.

Price 2d., by post 3d.; yearly subscription (including Supplements), 2s. 8d.

THE LITERARY GUIDE:

A Rationalist Review.

Devoted mainly to Books and Publications which deal with Religion, Philosophy, Science, and Ethics from a Rationalist standpoint.

No. 12, JUNE, 1897, CONTAINS:

DEAN FARRAR'S NEW BIBLE.
MILL and the ETHICS of NATURALISM.
PROFESSOR KARL PEARSON'S STUDIES in EVOLUTION.
CHARITABLE DARWINISM.
THE GENIUS of the WORLD: Dr. J. R. CROZIER'S New Book.
THE FREETHOUGHT VALHALLA.
LIFE AMONG the ARYANS.
PSYCHOLOGICAL CONCEPTIONS and ETHICAL PROBLEMS.
A CHRISTIAN MANUAL.
RANDOM JOTTINGS.
OUR LIBRARY SHELVES: Mr. JOHN MORLEY'S "On Compromise."
SIGNS and WARNINGS (gleaned from the Religious Press).
RATIONALISM in the MAGAZINES.

London: WATTS & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

A SHORT POPULAR HISTORY OF
CRETE.

By J. H. FRESE, M.A., late Fellow of St John's College, Cambridge.

With Introduction by F. W. CLAYDEN.
Maps of Crete and Seat of War.Mr. GLADSTONE writes: "I hope this book may tend to enhance the public interest in the condition of Crete, which at present threatens to bring serious disgrace upon this country."
The Daily Chronicle says: "A useful piece of work...a singularly clear account of the origin of the present crisis in the island."

SIXTH EDITION OF

THE GREEN BOOK; or, Freedom

Under the Snow. By MAURUS JÓKAI. Sixth Edition. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top 6s.

"Altogether a great book and worth all the novels of native growth we are likely to see this season."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"In its panoramic width of outlook, its inexhaustible fertility of invention and barbaric splendour of colouring, Maurus Jókai's great novel challenges comparison with Tolstói's 'War and Peace.' There is a succession of brilliant tableaux. To read this remarkable book is like witnessing a magnificent Oriental pageant. It is of enthralling interest and takes rank with the great novels of the century."—Spectator.

LADY JEAN'S SON. By Sarah Tytler.

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.
"The glimpses of Edinburgh society with the Northern Athens was still the seat of fashion are life-like and clever." Lady Jean's Son "is from first to last a delightful story."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE WINDS OF MARCH. By George

KNIGHT, Author of "Dust in the Balance,"
"Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth."
Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

THE REJUVENATION OF MISS

SEMAPHORE: A Farical Novel. By HAL GODFREY. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls By

LEWIS MACNAMARA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

Now ready, the First 5,000 Copies of the Sixth Volume in
THE "DAFFODIL" LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS

BY AUTHORS OF THE DAY,

VOL. VI. ENTITLED

A TOMBSTONE TREASURE By

FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab." Crown 12mo, paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 3s.London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

The BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:

An Anatomy of the Disease and a
Theory of Curative Treatment.

By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

1. WHAT IS RESPECTABILITY?
2. THE PATHOLOGY OF THE DISEASE.
3. "LADIES" and "GENTLEMEN."
4. SPECIFIC SYMPTOMS OF THE MALADY IN WOMEN.
5. RESPECTABILITY AND MORALS.
6. CULTURED GENTILITY.
7. PLUTOCRACY.
8. VILLADOM.
9. THE TYRANNY OF RESPECTABILITY.
10. RESPECTABLE CIVILISATION AND AFTER.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE
AND FREE REVIEW:

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."

ONE SHILLING net.

Contents of the JUNE Number.

- NIETZSCHE'S INDICTMENT OF CHRISTIANITY. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON.
- AN ETHICAL EXCURSION. By HUGH MORTIMER CREIL.
- THE TEACHINGS OF THOMAS HARDY. By DUANE WILLIAMS.
- THE TORY PROFESSOR. By ROBERT DUNCANSON.
- MR. GLADSTONE'S LATEST POSTCARD. By ALAN STEPHENS.
- USURY AND THRIFT. By J. GREENVY FISHER.
- A SPECIMEN OF RELIGIOUS JOURNALISM By STANLEY BRUCE.
- IN EXTREMIS. By ALLAN LAIDLAW.
- THE LEGITIMATION LEAGUE. By A. GOLDWIN.
- NANCY. By ERNEST NEWMAN.
- CONVENTIONAL LITERATURE. By EASTWOOD KIDSMAN.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,
16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

NEW MAGAZINE

OF
GENEALOGY and HERALDRYPublished monthly, price One Shilling, in handsome imperial 8vo, tastefully printed in old-face type, and illustrated.

No. 2 NOW READY.

THE GENEALOGICAL MAGAZINE.

A JOURNAL OF

Family History. Heraldry, and Pedigrees.The GENEALOGICAL MAGAZINE combines interesting illustrated family histories with those accurate and detailed evidences which are the real value of genealogical writing.

Contents of No. 2 for JUNE.

GRAHAM, EARL OF MONTEITH. By WALTER M.
GRAHAM EASTON.SHAKESPEARE'S FAMILY. Part II. By Mrs.
CHARLOTTE OAKMICHAEL STOKES.THE EVOLUTION OF THE MEDIEVAL HELMET.
Part II. By F. R. EARLES.

WELSH PEDIGREES. By JOHN HOBSON MATTHEWS.

BOOKPLATES and their VALUE. By W. H. K. WRIGHT.

NELSON and his ENCHANTRESS (continued).

A LIST OF STRANGERS (continued). By Rev. A. W.
CORNELIUS HALEWY.

MR. HALL'S REPLY TO MR. HORACE ROUND.

QUERIES AND CORRESPONDENCE.

A GAZETTE OF THE MONTH: being a Chronicle of Creations, Deaths, and other Matters.

BY THE WAY.

"An excellent design admirably carried out. The typographical arrangements are all that can be desired."

Literary World."A welcome is due to the first number of the 'Genealogical Magazine,' which promises well both as to contents and general 'get up.'"—Guardian."A section of the magazine which is bound to be useful is a chronicle of all matters pertaining to the devotion and creation of titles and honours, changes of names, appointments, &c., and in addition to family histories and historical pedigrees, a feature is to be made of the serial publication of heraldic works."—Daily Chronicle.A Specimen Copy sent post free for One Shilling.
Annual Subscription, 12s.

In demy 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

THE HOUSE OF CROMWELL.

A Genealogical History of the Family and Descendants of the Protector. By JAMES WAYLEN, sometime
Secretary to Thomas Carlyle.

A New Edition, Revised by JOHN GABRIEL CROMWELL, M.A., Oxon., Hon. Canon of Durham.

"To those who are interested in such quaint lore Mr.
Waylen's book will yield a world of satisfaction."*Morning Leader.*In large demy 8vo, appropriately bound in art linen boards,
price 6s.GEORGE MORLAND'S PICTURES.Their Present Possessors, with Details of the Collections, by RALPH RICHARDSON, F.R.S.E., F.S.A.Scot., Author of "George Morland, Painter, 1763-1804."In crown 8vo, tastefully printed, and bound in parchment,
price 6s.

GLEANINGS from IBSEN.

(THE BEST AND CHOICEST IN IBSEN.)

Selected and Edited, by Permission, by EMMIE AVERY KEDDELL and PERCY CROSS
STANDING.

With a Preface on Ibsenism.

"The novelty ought to commend it to the general public. The compilers have also collaborated in a smart introduction, in which they refer to the beauty of Ibsen's poetical expression. The note of purely poetic quality is what they have been at pains to discover in compiling the Birthday Book."—Liverpool Daily Post.

In crown 4to, cloth, gilt edges, price 6s.

HUGO OF AVENDON.

A Drama in Four Acts. By E. L. M.

"The work reads well, and should be enjoyed by those who patronise the drama without leaving their own firesides."—Scotsman."There is good material in the play, and the climax is skilfully planned."—Dundee Advertiser.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 7s. 6d.

WREKIN SKETCHES.

By EMMA BOORE.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW,
LONDON, E.C.MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S
LIST.COMPLETION OF THE "EDINBURGH" EDITION OF LORD MACAULAY'S LIFE AND WORKS.THE LIFE AND WORKS OF LORD MACAULAY."Edinburgh" Edition. 10 vols., 8vo, 6s. each.
(Works, 8 vols.; Life, 2 vols.)

Vols. I.-IV. HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

Vols. V.-VII. ESSAYS; BIOGRAPHIES; INDIAN PENAL CODE; CONTRIBUTIONS TO KNIGHT'S QUARTERLY MAGAZINE.Vol. VIII. SPEECHES; LAYS OF ANCIENT ROME;
MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.Vols. IX. and X. THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF LORD
MACAULAY. By the Right Hon. Sir G. O. TREVILYAN, Bart., M.P.

8vo, 18s.

THE ANNUAL REGISTER:

A Review of Public Events at Home and Abroad
for the Year 1896.* * Volumes of the ANNUAL REGISTER for the
Years 1863-1895 can still be had, 18s. each.

4to, 10s. 6d.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE WORDSWORTH AND COLERIDGE
MANUSCRIPTS

IN THE POSSESSION OF MR. T. NORTON LONGMAN.

Edited, with Notes, by W. HALE WHITE.

Facsimile Reproductions:

"The Brothers" and Letter from W. Wordsworth to Humphrey Davy—Coleridge's "Love"—"The Ode to Immortality."

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

CROMWELL'S PLACE IN HISTORY.

Founded on Six Lectures delivered at Oxford.

By SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER, D.C.L.,
Ford's Lecturer, 1896.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

RAMEAU'S NEPHEW.

A Translation from Diderot's Autographic Text.

By SYLVIA MARGARET HILL.

In the "Miscellaneous Essays," Vol. V., "Diderot," Carlyle says: "Rameau's Nephew".....may pass for decidedly the best of all Diderot's compositions. It looks like a sibylline utterance from a heart all in fusion; no ephemeral thing (for it was written as a satire on Palisot) was ever more perennially treated. One day it must also be translated into English; but it will require to be done by 'head';
the common steam machinery will not properly suffice for it."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

SKETCHES IN LAVENDER:

Blue and Green.

A Collection of Short Stories.

By JEROME K. JEROME.

Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE WISDOM OF FOOLS.

Short Stories.

By MARGARET DELAND,

Author of "John War, Preacher."

* * This is a collection of four stories, the characters and scenes of which are those of a provincial town in the New England States. Each story is of the nature of a problem in some department of ethics or morals, but the author does not do more than enunciate and illustrate the problem.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

JUNE, 1897. Price 6d.

THE CHEVALIER D'AUBIAO. By S. LEVETT YEATS,
Author of "The Honour of Savelli." (Continued.)

THE U. E. LOYALISTS. By CLIVE PHILLIPS-WOLLEY.

THE LOVE-LETTERS OF A LADY OF QUALITY. Selected and Arranged by Miss GABRIELLE FRETING.

"THE 'ORSE." By MARY L. PENDERED.

A DREAM OF ELK. By FRED WHISHEW.

AN ATTA'K ON A TELEGRAPH STATION IN PERSIA.

By BASIL WILLIAMS.

LOVE AND SPORT. By MABEL MURRAY HICKSON.

AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
London, New York, and Bombay.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' PUBLICATIONS.

SIR HUGH GOUGH'S REMINISCENCES.
OLD MEMORIES. By General Sir
HUGH GOUGH, G.O.B., V.C. With Illustrations.
Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

NEXT WEEK WILL BE PUBLISHED.
THE WOODLAND LIFE. By
EDWARD THOMAS. With a Frontispiece. Crown
8vo, 6s.

DR. MUNRO'S NEW WORK.
PREHISTORIC PROBLEMS. By ROBERT MUNRO, M.A., M.D., F.R.S.E., Secretary of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland; Author of "The Lake Dwellings of Europe," "Rambles and Studies in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Dalmatia," &c. With numerous illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

THIS DAY IS PUBLISHED.
THE ETHICS of JOHN STUART
MILL. By CHARLES DOUGLAS, M.A., D.Sc.,
Lecturer in Moral Philosophy, and Assistant to the Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, Author of "John Stuart Mill: a Study of his Philosophy." Post 8vo, 6s. net.

NOW READY.
THE TEACHING FUNCTION of the MODERN PULPIT. By JAMES LINDSAY,
M.A., B.D., B.Sc., Author of "Recent Advances in Theistic Philosophy of Religion," "The Progressiveness of Modern Christian Thought," &c. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.

AT ALL LIBRARIES.
AUDREY CRAVEN. By May Sin-
CLAIR. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"A clever novel, admirably conceived and well written.....
A clever and well-written story."—Saturday Review.

THE KNIGHT'S TALE. By F. EMILY PHILLIPS, Author of "The Education of Antonia." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
"Told with notable power, vividness, and truth."
Pall Mall Gazette.
"The story is original, graphic, chivalrous, and thoughtful."—Bookman.

A PRINCE of TYRONE. By CHARLOTTE FENNELL and J. P. O'CALLAGHAN.
Crown 8vo, 6s.
"It is a powerful story, full of stirring, dramatic scenes, and there is not a dry page in the whole book."—Scotsman.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS'.
By GEORGE ELIOT.
ADAM BEDE 3s. 6d.
THE MILL on the FLOSS... .. 3s. 6d.
ROMOLA 3s. 6d.
FELIX HOLT 3s. 6d.
SILAS MARNER 2s. 6d.
SCENES of CLERICAL LIFE 3s. 6d.
MIDDLEMARCH 7s. 6d.
DANIEL DERONDA 7s. 6d.

By GRAHAM TRAVERS.
MONA MACLEAN. Twelfth Edition 6s. 6d.
FELLOW TRAVELLERS. Fourth Edition 6s. 6d.

By BEATRICE HARRADEN.
HILDA STRAFFORD. Tenth Edition 3s. 6d.
IN VARYING MOODS. Twelfth Edition 3s. 6d.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.
No. 990.—JUNE, 1897.—2s. 6d.

CONTENTS: RETRIEVERS, AND HOW TO BREAK THEM, by Lieut.-Colonel Henry Smith, C.B.—"A Gentleman of France": THE REAL MONSIEUR D'ARTAGNAN, by Sir
Herbert Maxwell, Bart.—DANIEL: A ROMANCE OF SURREY,
by R. D. Blackmore.—MARLBOROUGH'S UNOCCUPIED
TERRAIN, by Andrew Lang.—A DOUBTFUL ACQUISITION, by C. Grant Robertson.—ELMICK WALKS, by E. V. B.—JOHN
CABOT: AN ANNIVERSARY STORY.—AN INDIAN ROMANCE:
A LESSON OF THE FAMINE.—A CLOSE-TIME FISH TROUT IN SCOTLAND, by Sir James Forrest, Bart., of Comiston.—
HARCOURT AND CANNING.—22ND JUNE.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Mr. MACQUEEN
will publish this day,
MR. CHARLES HANNAN'S
New Novel, "THE
WOOLING of AVIS
GRAYLE." Crown
8vo, 6s.

NOW READY at all LIBRARIES and BOOKSELLERS'.
LORIN KAYE'S NEW NOVEL.

A DRAWING-ROOM CYNIC. By LORIN KAYE, Author of "Her Ladyship's Income." Handsomely bound in art canvas, gilt tops,
crown 8vo, 6s.

FIRST REVIEW.

"The adjective 'smart' is the one most appropriate to the book, which is rich in observation and alert with the rattle of sharp and continuous dialogue."
Daily Mail, May 25.

"Something absolutely new in fiction."

THE WORLD.

A RUSSIAN WILD FLOWER By
E. A. BRAYLEY HODGETTS, Author of "Round about Armenia," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The story is charming from every point of view; it makes the reader feel, when he closes the book, that he knows Russia as no other writer has ever enabled him to know the vast dim Empire of the Cæars in some of its most intimate social aspects, and to realise certain types among its strongly marked social varieties..... Princess Olga Obolenski is the most living and gracious heroine of fiction we have met for a dreary length of time, and her story inspires the liveliest sympathy."—The World, May 12, 1897.

MISS TUDOR: a Novel. By John
LE BRETON, Author of "The Sin of Father Baptiste," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE says: "I find your book to be of intense though most painful interest. Such double-eyed villains as Lamb are not, I hope, even in this evil world, to be found every day."

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

A FLIRTATION with TRUTH. By CURTIS YORKE, Author of "Once," "A Record of Discords," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A well-written novel of fashionable life..... The dialogue is essentially 'smart.'"—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Curtis Yorke has told the story well, brightly, humorously, and with a sufficiency of pathos."
Daily Chronicle.

"A clever, witty, 'Dodo' kind of book... It has grace and strength of style which it is impossible not to admire."
Freeman's Journal.

ABBÉ CONSTANTIN. By Ludovic
HALÉVY. Translated from the French by THÉRÈSE
BATBEDAT. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Very welcome is the English translation of Ludovic Halévy's 'Abbé Constantin.' The story is, as all the world knows, very charming, and should in its present shape find many English readers."—Globe.

"An excellent translation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The good old priest is a delightful literary study, while the style of the book is simply beautiful, even in the translation."—Western Morning News.

JOHN MACQUEEN, HASTINGS HOUSE,
NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S SELECTED LIST.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BY REEF AND PALM."
PACIFIC TALES. By Louis Becke.
1 vol., crown 8vo, green cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Just ready.]

SIXTH EDITION, WITH A NEW PREFACE.
MRS. KEITH'S CRIME. By Mrs.
W. K. CLIFFORD, Author of "Aunt Anne," &c. With an Imaginary Portrait of Mrs. Keith by the Hon. John Collier.
Crown 8vo, green cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Just ready.]

"FROM PAUPER TO PREMIER."
LIFE of SIR HENRY PARKES. By CHARLES E. LYNE, formerly Editor of the "Sydney Morning Herald," &c. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

"THE PARLIAMENT OF ISRAELI AND GLADSTONE."
THE INNER LIFE of the HOUSE of COMMONS. Selected from the Writings of WILLIAM WHITE.
With a Prefatory Note by his Son, and an Introduction by JUSTIN MCARTHUR, M.P. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

TWELVE BAD WOMEN. Edited by ARTHUR VINCENT. A Companion Volume to "Twelve Bad Men." Illustrated. Cloth, 16s.

The Volume is made up as follows:—I. Alice Perrers (the rapacious paramour of Edward III.)—II. Alice Arden (Shakespeare's chosen type of a bad woman)—III. Mary Frith ("Moll Cutpurse")—IV. The Countess of Somerset (Sir Thomas Overbury's murderess)—V. Barbara, Duchess of Cleveland—VI. Mary Young ("Jenny Diver")—VII.
Terencia Constantia Phillips (Walpole's "Coe Phillips")—VIII. Miss Chudleigh—IX. Mrs. Brownrigg (the cruellest of women)—X. Elizabeth Canning (impostor)—XI. Mary Boleyn ("The Yorkshire Witch")
XII. Mary Anne Clarke (the baleful genius of "the brave old Duke of York").

THE BEGINNINGS OF LITERATURE.
BARDS of the GAEL and GALL. A
Volume of Verse, Collected and Edited by Dr. GEORGE SIGERSON. With Photogravure Portrait of the Blind Irish Bard Carolan. Cloth, 10s. 6d. [Just ready.]

"CONSTANTLY WANTED."—VANITY FAIR.
RECIPES for the MILLION. Tenth
Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE SCIENCE OF THE APROPOS.
QUOTATIONS for OCCASIONS. Compiled by CATHERINE B. WOOD. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE SHADOW CHRIST: an Introduction to Christ Himself. By G. S. LEE. Paper boards, 2s. 6d.

The QUEEN'S REIGN for CHILDREN.
By W. CLARKE HALL. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

NEW EDITION.
INMATES of MY HOUSE and GARDEN. By Mrs. BRIGHTWEN. Many Illustrations. Cloth,
3s. 6d.

BY GUSTAVE LE BON.
THE CROWD: a Study of the Popular
Mind. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"THE OUTCOME OF A CLEVER MIND."—ATHENÆUM.
A POT of HONEY. By Susan
CHRISTIAN, Author of "Silhouettes." Cloth, 3s. 6d.

"DELIGHTFUL[LY] EPIGRAMMATIC."—WORLD.
A GREAT LIE. By Wilfrid Hugh
CHEESON, Author of "Name this Child," &c. Cloth, 6s.

A NOBLE HAUL. By W. Clark
RUSSELL. (The New "Little Novel.") Paper, 6d.; cloth, 1s.

A JUBILEE PRESENT FOR CHILDREN.
ENGLAND. By Frances E. Cooke.
(A Volume of "The Children's Study.") With Frontispiece.
Large 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d.

NEW VOLUME OF "THE STORY OF THE NATIONS"
CANADA. By Dr. J. G. Bourinot,
C.M.G. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s., with Maps and Illustrations.

LONDON:
T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Mr. Charles Booth's London	561
The First Modern Schoolmaster	562
Spitebergen the Uninviting	563
Mr. Lilly's Writings	564
Cakes and Ale	565
A Handbook of Literature	565
Mr. Wells's New Story	566
A People "Religious to Excess"	566
FROM CROWDED SHELVES	567
FICTION:
My Lord Duke—A Drawing-room Cynic—A Great Lie—The Captain of the Parish—A Rogue's Conscience—The Birthright—Sindbad, Smith & Co. ...	568
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books	570
New Books Received... ..	570
NOTES AND NEWS	571
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXIX., CHARLES DICKENS ...	573
SOME CHILD-CRITICS OF BROWNING	573
THE BOOK MARKET	574
ART	575
DRAMA	576
SCIENCE	577
MUSIC	577
CORRESPONDENCE	578

REVIEWS.

MR. CHARLES BOOTH'S LONDON.

Life and Labour of the People in London.
Edited by Charles Booth. (Macmillan & Co.)

SOME time about 1885 Mr. Charles Booth, a good citizen and a prosperous ship merchant, conceived the idea of making an analysis of social conditions in the East-end of London. We have before us the first-fruits of his efforts. It is a slender booklet on the "conditions and occupations of the people in Tower Hamlets," and is the substance of a paper read before the Statistical Society. The investigator had a distinct object in view and a purpose to serve:

"This piece of London," he said, "is supposed to contain the most destitute population in England, and to be, as it were, the focus of the problem of poverty in the midst of wealth which is troubling the minds and hearts of so many people."

That slender booklet has developed into the monumental work of nine volumes which Mr. Booth has just concluded. It forms the greatest social census and statistical inventory ever made of any people. For ten years Mr. Booth has had a great investigating agency at work. He has maintained a census bureau of his own, and engaged a staff of experts. Close upon five millions of people have been subjected to an analysis: they are classified according to material conditions, to social surroundings, to trades and occupations. We see the people as they work and live, as they go to and fro in their daily occupations. We watch them at their recreations, we peep into their homes, we examine their weekly budgets. Nothing, indeed, escapes the vigilance of Mr. Booth's investigators.

How has this colossal work been accomplished? Not solely by an able organiser with competent assistants. Every existing agency which could help has been utilised.

The army of school visitors who know the condition of every family in the poor districts has been called into service. New features were introduced into the last census at Mr. Booth's suggestion, and have formed the means for many tabulations and percentages. All sorts of associations gave assistance, and, under the skilful hands of experts, the physiognomy of the largest urban community in the world has been carefully described. For the benefit of those who have not seen the earlier volumes, and for the convenience of students who have followed the work, Mr. Booth introduces in this last volume a summary of the contents of preceding ones.

The reader is impressed by the stupendous character of the undertaking, and with the clear and systematic way in which the scheme has been executed. The first, not, perhaps, the most important of the series, was mainly devoted to an account of social conditions in East and Central London. The classification of the people brought out the terrible evils of overcrowding, and with map and diagram fixed the crime centres of the capital. In this respect Mr. Booth's work has been of incalculable service. Besides locating the plague spots, it showed the places and the classes where the pinch of poverty was most severely felt. Vol. II. began a special study of the Metropolis street by street, trade by trade, class by class. A special feature of the third volume was a record of the movements of the people—the influx from the country, the efflux to the suburbs. There was also a classification of children and schools, and a description of life in model dwellings. In this and in other volumes Mr. Booth adopted certain guiding standards; he held that a family who earned less than 21s. a week were living in poverty, and that people who were housed to the extent of more than two per room were overcrowded. A detailed analysis of the trades and occupations of the people was begun in the fourth volume. Tailoring, boot-making, furniture-making, and every other industry was taken in turn. The condition of the workers was laid bare—their ages, their wages, their customs and societies described. This went on with a multiplicity of details until the eighth volume was reached, when the public services and professional classes were brought under review. This section was necessarily less complete. There was greater difficulty in getting data as the inquirers carried their investigations into higher social conditions. This takes us to the present volume—the last of the present series, although not the finish of Mr. Booth's colossal undertaking. One chapter deals with the relation of poverty to overcrowding, and of overcrowding to earnings. The costers and general labourers are the most overcrowded. Milksellers are the worst paid class, 78 per cent. of them receiving less than 25s. per week.

One of the most surprising chapters deals with the proportion of people born in and out of London. Just one half of the heads of families are born in London, and the grocers just hit this average. The greatest proportion of Londoners are found among the bookbinders—no doubt a hereditary trade —who show 81 per cent. of natives. Next come the paper-making industry, brush-making—an ancient London industry—and lightermen, the great majority of whom are London born. The classes who contain a majority of Londoners include glass and earthenware workers, coopers, shopkeepers, printers, costers, dock-labourers, soap and candle-makers, leather-dressers, booksellers, hatters, carmen, boot and shoe-makers, and general labourers. Roughly speaking, one might say the greatest number of Londoners are found in the least skilled occupations and the easily learned trades. To a large extent they are the hewers of wood and drawers of water to the dominating "alien" element. The Londoner has to import his teachers, his ministers, his scientists, writers, doctors, and architects. The intellectual life of the capital is in the hands of people born "outside." Under the head of religion the percentage of the "born in London" is 27; under education, literature, and science the London born are 35 per cent.; the doctors show 37 per cent. of Londoners; the architects 40 per cent.; those engaged in art and amusement 49 per cent. Again, Londoners have to go "outside" for people to control them. All but 17 per cent. of the police are from "outside," the railway service is mainly in the hands of outsiders. Only 12 per cent. of the men of the Army and Navy living in London are of London. A majority of those engaged in civil and municipal service are from outside; the same is the case in regard to gaswork service, municipal labour, cab and omnibus service. In trades where physical ability is required, such as the masons and blacksmiths, Londoners are outnumbered. It would be interesting to trace the degeneration of Londoners, for it is obvious that if they were a vigorous race there would not be room for the preponderance of uitlanders. There is no doubt that the productivity of the town dweller is decreased and his vitality lowered, but the case of the Londoner is not quite so bad as Mr. Booth's figures indicate, for his book does not deal with the whole of the London people. There are two hundred thousand people in West Ham, a hundred thousand in Tottenham, many thousands in Enfield, Edmonton, Walthamstow, and other working men's colonies in the suburbs who are not covered by his statistics. They form part of London's great labour army, although not, according to the census, of its population.

This last volume contains chapters on the industrial characteristics of the capital, on trade unions, and on the fluctuations of trades, and it ends with a concluding survey which calls for some comment. The least satisfactory portion of the book is the concluding commentary. Mr. Booth's suggestions as to industrial remedies are far from conclusive. He has left statistics to fall into platitude. After volumes of searching analyses, clearly expressed statements of facts, we come across such meaningless commonplaces and generalisations as these:

"How far speculation should go, and the extent to which credit should be given, are, however, essentially questions of degree."

"When men earn largely, the world has usually benefited in proportion; and similarly, when they are paid very little, or are unable to earn anything at all, it is at least probable that what they contribute to the world is no less significant";

and

"beneficial regularity may be defined as that which combines social well-being with economic efficiency."

We are also told that "irregularity of employment" has its advantages as it "strengthens character under stress," and has a "direct effect on enterprise." We always thought that irregularity had a demoralising influence on the individual. One need not be disappointed at this lame ending, for Mr. Booth does not intend these tentative criticisms to be taken seriously. They do not represent his final judgment; they are not his review of reform forces or his own final suggestions. His great work is not yet finished; only a section of it—complete in itself—is disposed of. He has three other volumes in hand, in which he will deal with difficult and contentious subjects, such as drink and early marriages, the organisation of charity and the work of religious bodies. In these we may expect a more definite answer to the question, "What is the good of it all?" In the meantime no student of social conditions can afford to neglect Mr. Booth's great statistical and analytical encyclopædia on the life and labour of London.

THE FIRST MODERN SCHOOL-MASTER.

Vittorino da Feltre, and other Humanist Educators. By W. H. Woodward. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THIS timely and considerable contribution to our knowledge of mediæval education throws much light upon a comparatively unexplored region in the history of the Classical Revival in Italy. As its title indicates, Mr. Woodward's book deals mainly with Vittorino, but English versions of writings by other educators of the period have been added, and the whole is closed by a summary account of the aims and practice of the leading Humanist teachers of the quattrocento. The first part of the volume is devoted to Vittorino and his school—"the first great school of the Renaissance." If there were anything new under the sun, we might, perhaps, expect to discover it in the latest developments of public school management in our own land. Yet in this Ginnasio at Mantua we find in full swing many an enlightened method and many a cunning device such as are generally believed to be inventions of the last half-century. We find entrance scholarships carrying a portion of the fees; we find free scholarships subject to a poverty-test that really worked; we find that evasion of duty known as the superannuation system; we find a solution of the preparatory school question to an extent which enabled children of five and men of twenty-five to work together in the same establishment; we find playgrounds regarded as essential;

we find organised and compulsory games that reach their climax of vigour and ferocity in football. Verily, we may determine with Mr. Woodward that "the founder of the Mantuan school was the first modern schoolmaster." The origin of that time-honoured and well-hated institution, "rep.," is perhaps to be seen in the previously dictated "recitations," which necessarily occupied a large portion of the time-table in an age when books were scarce and costly, and most of the teaching was perforce oral. The contemptuous attitude adopted towards the vernacular Italian, which apparently was considered unworthy of a place in serious education, resembles the supercilious neglect of English in our own old classical schools. But with a difference: in the former case there was a better excuse. In Italy, on the one hand, Latin had never ceased to have a life as the language of the learned, and about it, moreover, remained the glamour of the might of ancient Rome; while, on the other hand, la lingua volgare was still more or less in the dialectal stage, and had not yet worked its way out into a generally accepted literary vehicle. Guarino and Vittorino would no more have thought of reading Dante in their schools than Busby would have thought of teaching Shakespeare at Westminster. Indeed, as Frederick Schlegel said, it is likely that the fifteenth century scholars wished to supplant altogether the vulgar tongue and to re-establish classical Latin as the common speech. The authors studied in form were much the same as those in vogue to-day; with the addition of some that have gone out of fashion. Among the latter were Valerius Maximus, Justin, Quintus Curtius, Florus, Seneca (Tragedies), Pliny the Elder, Solinus, and Pomponius Mela; conversely, Tacitus, who as yet was hardly known, and whose style was regarded as doubtful, is never mentioned. In Greek Apollonius Rhodius was included in the list of school-books, but not Æschylus and not Thucydides. With respect to Vittorino's conception of the aim of education, while holding letters to be a necessary preliminary to professional training, "his ideal was the patriotic and the well-equipped citizen rather than the self-contained scholar." Vittorino himself wrote nothing: it was quite enough for him to be a schoolmaster. One touch of nature makes all house-masters kin; and to the serious state of mind induced by perusing some seventy of Mr. Woodward's pages in laud of his hero, it came as a pleasing relief to learn that even he was human, that even he had his difficulties with his matrons. Of one of them he writes: "I can stand her no longer, nor would I if I could." "No characteristic," writes Mr. Woodward, "is more noteworthy in the true Humanist teacher than his persistent attitude of a student." What percentage of English schoolmasters realises the fact that when a man ceases to learn he ceases to be able to teach? Of the small percentage that does grasp this truth, what proportion acts upon it?

To turn to the second section of the book, Vergerius in his treatise De Ingeniis Moribus (circa 1393) makes several points that appeal to us at the present time. Among other things he maintains that "the education of children is a matter of more than private interest; it concerns the State, which, indeed, regards the right training of the young as, in certain aspects, within its proper sphere. I would wish to see this responsibility extended." Already in those early days the pedagogue suffered under the widowed mother: "One source of danger lies in the weak indulgence of parents, and this is often seen the more conspicuously when the father's stronger hand has been taken away." Against another enemy to education, the dame's school of the decayed gentlewoman, we have a note of warning—"we should be careful to go to the best teachers even for the rudiments." Vergerius was not of opinion that "anyone can teach little boys." The tractate of Lionardo D'Arezzo (circa 1405) is "the earliest Humanist essay on education expressly dedicated to a lady." In it we have a reminder of the opposition which, as Reumont points out, was offered by the Dominicans to the "paganism" of the New Learning, for it opens with a counter-denunciation of "that vulgar threadbare jargon which satisfies those who devote themselves to theology." It goes on to lay down the unimpeachable law that "the foundations of all true learning must be laid in the sound and thorough knowledge of Latin." Next follows the De Liberiorum Educatione, written in 1450 by the illustrious Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini, afterwards pope as Pius II. This discourse is largely based on Quintilian. We may commend to the attention both of parents and of governing bodies of schools his remark that "so important a matter, even in the earliest stages of education, is the choice of teachers, that we stand amazed at the carelessness which is daily exhibited in their selection." He cites Socrates and Plutarch on the propriety of visiting the negligence of the pupil upon the head of the master. A school in which the headmaster had the power of inflicting corporal punishment on the members of the staff would doubtless become a very perfect machine. High, however, as are the matters of which he treats, the unwitting writer now and again yields us an opportunity for a passing smile. As when he indicates his conception of the summit of hardihood—"a boy should so discipline his appetite that he may eat even beef." Or when he insists that "in speaking Latin, barbarisms of all kinds need to be avoided with great care," and on the same page perpetrates the decidedly useful but decidedly canine monetare. Or when he gallantly displays his indignation at the flippant guess which derived celebs from celum, as being the heavenly state of "one who is free from the heaviest burden of existence—i.e., a wife." Like his brother Humanists, he has a fling at mumpsimus: he warns his pupil that in the study of classical Latin he "will be confronted by the opposition of the shallow Churchman." It is impossible to refrain from comparing with this Colet's charge in the statutes of St. Paul's School:

"All Barbary, all corruption, all Latens adulterate which ignorant blinde foles brought into this worlde, and with the same hath dystained and poysonyd the olde Latens speche, and the veraye Romayne tonge. . . I saye that fylthyness and all suche abusion whiche the later blynde worlde brought in, whiche more rather may be called Blotterature then Litterature, I utterly abannyshe and exclude out of this Schole."

The last tract is that on The Order and Method of Teaching and Reading Classical Authors, by Battista Guarino, son of the celebrated Guarino Veronese. The mantle of the sire fell upon the son, for he succeeded immediately to the professorial chair voided by his father's death. This fact, doubtless, helped to preserve the continuity of the work of Guarino da Verona, and combined with the popularity of the well-known Compendium of the latter to render the name of Guarino the elder more generally familiar than that of Vittorino. This treatise "especially represents the doctrines of my father," says Battista. Among other tricks of the teacher, he mentions a speciality in minor tactics which, except in some manuals of English composition, has now, perhaps undeservedly, fallen out of use. This is the setting for correction of a piece of Latin in which errors have been purposely introduced. He naturally recommends the use of his father's Compendium, or Grammaticales Regule, originally published at Venice in 1470. A copy of this scarce book, picked up some years ago at a bookstall, lies before us as we write. It is largely composed of doggerel verses of the Propria quæ maribus type, intended to be learnt by rote. The Compendium of Guarino, who may be regarded as the Valpy of the fifteenth century, was probably the chief rival Latin grammar to the famous Antiquus Donatus, which figures in the statutes of Winchester College, though it does not appear ever to have succeeded in furnishing a generic name for elementary grammar books as did "Old Donat." As our own "Piers Plowman" can testify, a "Donatus," "Donat," or "Donet," had become practically a synonym for a primer long before Guarino composed his Regule.

Mr. Woodward concludes with an excellent summary of the foregoing essays and of the contents of other contemporary works on education. He points out that "a singular harmony is presented by our authorities both as to the general aims pursued and the methods advocated to secure them." Again:

"Latin and Greek grammar was still in the inductive stage; it could only be studied by the actual reading of the great writers; orthography, accidence, syntax, prosody and style were alike far from being crystallised in authoritative rule and usage. On the deductive side, as a practical art, grammar was still only in the making."

Finally, there is another aspect of the educational revolution effected by the Humanist teachers. "They rescued the function of the schoolmaster from the contempt in which it was proverbially held." It was no longer possible for scholars to write as Petrarch had written in the preceding century:

"Let those teach who like disorder, noise, and squalor; who rejoice in the screams of the victim as the rod falls gaily; who are not happy unless they can terrify, flog, and torture. How, then, can teaching—be it of grammar or of any of the liberal arts—be a fit occupation for honourable age? Quit so debasing a trade while chance offers."

And this change was due to the labours of Guarino the elder and Vittorino. The attention and interest attracted by Mr. Woodward's scholarly work will extend far beyond the circle of the professional educationist.

SPITSBERGEN THE UNINVITING.

The First Crossing of Spitsbergen. By Sir William Martin Conway. With Contributions by J. W. Gregory, A. Trevor-Battye, and E. J. Garwood. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

No one, after reading the title-page of this book, a title-page far from pleasing to the eye, will have any doubt as to its contents. They are set down with a lavish profuseness such as is rarely seen in these days, and might render what is told thereafter superfluous, were it not for the manner of the telling. The main title is imitated from the First Crossing of Greenland, and the book, from its bulk as well as in point of chronological appearance, seems to challenge comparison with Nansen's more recent volumes. Such a comparison would be to its disadvantage, for neither in point of continued interest nor in importance of material does it reach the same level, and there is about Sir Martin Conway's style (in this volume at any rate) a tendency to lapse into personal trivialities which was successfully avoided by Nansen, so far, at any rate, as it was likely to interfere with the proper course of his narrative. We do not for a moment suppose that any such comparison was intended; but Sir Martin Conway's readers may be excused for feeling that he has given them more than due measure in recording the events of a three months' summer excursion at considerably greater length than Nansen devoted to his famous sledge expedition, which occupied more than a year. There seems to be an increasing tendency for books of travel to become diffuse, and as they are at the same time growing rapidly more numerous, it might be well if all the small change of such expeditions, the individual "duckings," the comic appearance, the fugitive joke, and the personal "chaff," could be vigorously curtailed or buried in private correspondence. Want of attention to this maxim has somewhat interfered with Sir Martin Conway's admirable narrative. We lose ourselves in some engrossing tale of a pony's stubbornness, and totally forget what the expedition was supposed to be doing. Even now, after a careful perusal from end to end, we confess to a hazy impression of the various land manoeuvres, and looking back over the pages we can see nothing but "Garwood's cooking was invaluable," "Trevor-Battye made light of his discomforts," "Gregory took a well-earned nap," or "called for tea and victuals." Interspersed with this sort of thing is the scientific narrative, of which a clearer idea can be got from Sir Martin Conway's short paper published in the journal of the Geographical Society. However, people must write their books their own way, and reviewers are born captious.

The expedition, judged by the light of its original plans, was not an entire success. It failed, as pioneer expeditions must often do, from want of accurate knowledge concerning the country to be traversed. Accounts of previous explorers, and possibly the analogy of Greenland, led Sir Martin Conway to expect an interior plateau of vast level snowfields, easily negotiated by ponies and light sledges; an "unabsehbare weisse Flache," as one shortsighted observer described it. Instead he found, to his surprise, a wild chaos of crumbling mountains, separated by valleys of soft ooze, into which the ponies sank, or by torrents of icy water. Each pass was a laborious obstacle which they hoped would be the last, and each pass that followed was worse. It is mortifying on such occasions to reflect that a mere foreboding of the actual state of affairs would have led one to adopt entirely different plans and different equipment. The plans can be changed, not always with advantage; but the equipment is irremediable. Thus we can admire the cheerful way in which the explorers set themselves to the tedious work of dragging their ponies and flimsy sledges through the network of morasses and waterlogged snow that confronted them in the interior of Spitsbergen, and can do justice to the patience and skill which produced under such disheartening circumstances the complicated topographical map which illustrates the volume.

It had been the original intention of the explorers to make a series of examinations of the interior by crossing three or four times from west to east at different points of the island. As this proved manifestly impossible in the time given, they contented themselves with crossing once to Agardhs Bay, and with mapping in detail a single district lying between Sassen Bay, at the end of Ice Fjord, and terminating at Klok Bay to the southward. How difficult was the manipulation of the plane table in such a region may be gathered from the following broken fragments:

"The higher I rose the wilder and more furious blew the wind. . . I halted, leaning against the gale, and with difficulty set up the plane table, holding it with both hands and spreading wide the legs. . . One could not stay long at work in such a gale. It blew all warmth and feeling from the hands. On these occasions only habit enables a man to face working at all; mere will does not suffice. Each line drawn upon the map is won at a measurable cost of pain. When I could stand no more I hurried under the cliff's shelter and rubbed life back into fingers and arms."

Mingled with imprecations on the weather, the soil, and the foothold, come at each ascent such ecstasies of wonder at the beauty of the views that one is continually reminded of a philosophic passage near the beginning of the book:

"Such is the innate folly of man that when he sees a beautiful view he desires to be in the midst of it. . . But the beauty is not there, but here, whence it is beheld. Not on that golden surface of the rippled sea, not on that rose-tinted peak, but here. Tell a man this a thousand times; repeat it to yourself; it is useless."

Possibly the length of this volume, on which we have remarked, is due to Sir Martin Conway's all-round accomplishments. He is not only a scientific traveller writing a record, but a poet, a painter, a journalist, and a jovial companion as well. Each of these characteristics requires a separate outlet.

On returning to Advent Bay, the headquarters of the expedition, the party changed its plans once more. A circumnavigation of the island formed no part of the original scheme, which was confined to the interior. The summer of 1896 was, however, a remarkably open season, and the surrounding seas were free from ice. The chance presented was an exceptional one, and a small steamer was chartered to explore the coast and neighbouring islands. Cruising up northwards over the top of Spitsbergen, a dash was made down the treacherous Hinloopen Strait and as far as Barent's Isle, Wiche Land being observed and sketched to the westward. Then the course was retraced, and a visit was paid to Herr Andrée, who was patiently waiting at Dane's Gap beside his inflated balloon for the south wind which was to blow him over the polar region. The south wind did not come, and Herr Andrée was about to return in expectation of a better year. With this voyage the expedition terminated, and the party, with two exceptions, returned in time to witness Nansen's historic arrival. The exceptions were Messrs. Garwood and Trevor-Battye, who stopped to accomplish an ascent of the Hornsund Tind or Mount Hedgehog, the most respectable peak in Spitzbergen. Another diversion was also made by two of the party who explored Dickson's Bay, and wrote a separate record.

Whether each is also going to publish a separate book remains to be seen. If this is done, our information in regard to the district traversed will be tolerably complete. It is understood that Dr. Gregory and Mr. Garwood will give us the benefit of their geological observations, which were not unimportant, and to these we may safely look forward.

The last chapter in Sir Martin Conway's book deals with Spitsbergen as a summer resort. Nansen also recommended the North Pole, but Spitsbergen has the merit of comparative accessibility. Two or three lines of steamers have begun to run there weekly in the summer, and tourists may disport themselves in the perpetual daylight as only tourists can. There is a hotel at Advent Bay, and targets have been erected to console those who expect to find game, either by considerate members of a previous expedition or by someone whose life has been jeopardised by the free shooting which prevails. The weather is described as not unlike that of an English spring. Words, even Sir Martin Conway's, fail to fit themselves to the scenery, which, judging from Mr. H. E. Conway's sketches, is of a vividly polychrome description. The adventurous, with this book in hand, may follow Mr. Garwood in his risky ascents, and jeopardise the nine lives which climbers seem to have. Those more mildly inclined may accept the dictum of another member of the party who described the interior of Spitsbergen as a piece of work botched in the making and thrown aside. Certainly few will be tempted, except by an enthusiasm for science, to continue the cartography of this uninviting region.

MR. LILLY'S WRITINGS.

Essays and Speeches. By W. S. Lilly. (Chapman & Hall.)

THIS is a volume of vivid and various interest. The author has reclaimed certain contributions of importance to the leading magazines. And the result is a book which displays a veritable dubia cena—a feast of fat things full of marrow. Nor—to continue the metaphor—is the equipage—the supellex or "overlay"—of the banquet unworthy of the viands which compose it. The type, the paper, and the general get-up are here as good as can be, and the book is furnished with an admirably full index and an exhaustive summary of contents.

Of Mr. Lilly we may say, in all sincerity, what in this volume he has observed of Mr. Ruskin, that he is a noble and most ennobling teacher, whom we may always hear gladly, whether we assent or not. Impartiality—unflinching courage—loftiness and purity of motive: these are surely inspiring and uplifting qualities in the critic of life and literature, even where we may not be able to accept all his conclusions. In Mr. Lilly there is a remarkable consistency of aim; and consequently a strong vein of individuality—a well-defined and unmistakable idiosyncrasy—pervades everything that comes from his trenchant and indefatigable pen. Wherein this distinctive note lies he himself explains in his speech "On Literature and National Life." "In all the poor writings," he says, "which I have ventured to give to the world from time to time, the end that I have kept before me has been this, to translate into literature the moral and political philosophy which I hold." It is this unity and elevation of purpose which imparts to all that he has written an absolute homogeneity of character. In the volume before us he announces again and again, and in the clearest and most emphatic language, his attitude towards the ethical and political problems of the hour. (See pp. 168-172, 208, 215-223.) "You will, I know, agree with me in holding," he writes, in dedicating the book to Charles Stanton Devas,

"that the great issue in the world of thought at the present day—an issue which cannot be too plainly stated—is whether man is mere matter in motion, or a spirit robed in flesh—ἡ ψυχή ἐν σαρτί, as Aristotle expresses the alternative; whether he is a thing bound fast in fate, like the rest of nature, or a person endowed with true volition, and responsible for choice; that is to say, whether he is an ethical agent, whose one worthy spring of action is the moral law speaking to him through conscience, a law not the outcome of calculations of the chances of agreeable feeling, nor a deduction from experiences of utility; no, but a divine order, good and acceptable and perfect, as the expression of Supreme Reason . . . ruling by its mandates and its penalties over all intelligent beings, in all spheres of their activity, in all worlds."

And in the following passage from the essay on the "New Spirit in History" he expresses lucidly and impressively his personal convictions on this most momentous of all questions:

"Is man nothing more than 'a willy-nilly current of sensations,' or is he really possessed of true causality? To me, the Determinist view of the collective, as of the individual, life of humanity—the view which makes of it mere physiology and mechanism—seems clearly false. I so account it for this reason—to give no other—that it is flatly opposed to the testimony of consciousness. . . . In public life, as in private, the most important words are right and wrong. The moral law is the fundamental fact, not only of individual existence, but of the social order. It is the sun of righteousness illuminating the world of rational being."

Mr. Lilly is a philosopher and a transcendentalist; but philosophers, after all, are (it is consoling to reflect) but men—beings subject to toothache and other like passions with our undiscerning selves; in whom the θηρίον, though held in subjection by, has not yet been finally absorbed and swallowed up in, the θεός. For those who find it hard to tarry long in the rare atmosphere of the philosophic heights haunted by Mr. Lilly, it is pleasant to discover that even he can at times find it expedient to descend from the tenuous ether of those lofty pinnacles of thought to what Ben Jonson calls the "fatter air" (pinguis et concretus aer) of humble human passion. Mr. Lilly is the fairest, the most honourable of fighters—he never strikes below the belt; but where, consistently with the rules of fair play, he perceives his advantage, he will, we may rest assured, suffer no idle scruples to hinder him from pursuing it to the uttermost. Rather will he go for his antagonist like a man, and knock him out of time with the blithe serenity of self-satisfaction exhibited, on a famous occasion, by Sam Weller, when in the public street of Ipswich he "floored" Grummer, Dubbley, and the special division. Witness the pages of this volume on which he deals with the Rev. Whitwell Elwin, with Signor Crispi, and, above all, with Mr. Froude. Of the last-named Mr. Lilly writes:

"He was incapable of critically investigating facts. Nay, he was incapable, congenitally incapable, I believe, even of correctly stating them. A less judicial mind probably never existed. He is everywhere an advocate, and an utterly unscrupulous advocate. His predecessor in the Chair of Modern History at Oxford once said: 'When we have read Mr. Froude's account of any matter, we know, at all events, one way in which it did not happen.' I think this was too strongly said. According to St. Thomas Aquinas, the father of lies himself sometimes tells the truth: Interdum diabolus veritatem loquitur."

And he goes on to call Froude "a congenital pseudomaniac," and to compare him to Charles Honeyman in The Newcomes: "Charles," said Fred. Bayham, "you had, even from your youth up, a villainous habit: it's my belief you'd rather lie than not." Surely though this is written with a goose quill, there is gall enough in the ink. But Mr. Lilly's pen, while apt enough to drop gall at times, is more often and more happily employed in dropping honeyed words of praise and friendship. Let us take leave of him with a sentence or two from his touching eulogy of John Henry Newman :

"Cardinal Newman was something better than a great historian, a great philosopher, a great theologian: he was a great spirit. No such profound and keen intellect had been known among Catholics since the days of Pascal; no such master of language since the days of Bossuet. Style is one of the best indexes to character, and in Cardinal Newman's 'regal English'—to use Mr. Hutton's admirable phrase—we have a true revelation of his kingly intelligence. No other man, since the days of Shakespeare, has possessed his supreme dominion over our tongue. And he employed it in absolute fidelity to the law within; ever for him, through all that tract of years, 'the rule and measure of duty.' . . . In him we recognise one of those elect souls, 'radiant with ardour divine,' who as 'beacons of hope' illuminate, from time to time, the path of 'troubled and distressed mortality.'"

MADE TO ORDER.

Cakes and Ale. By Edward Spencer (Grant Richards.)

"It is impossible for any Author to please all people," Robert May, the "Accomplisht Cook," wrote some three hundred years ago, when he gave the world his famous treatise on cookery. Probably Mr. Edward Spencer (better known to the sporting world, we believe, as "Nathaniel Gubbins") realises that the same conditions prevail to-day, and will therefore not be discouraged when he learns that his book on Robert May's subject has not pleased us, whatever its fate with a less exacting public. At the very outset his preface destroyed our confidence in his judgment. There he tells us, with needless candour, that the work was undertaken simply because he wanted to write a book about something, and all the motives he suggested were disdained by his publisher, who could, however, "do" with "a good, bold, brilliant, lightly treated, exhaustive work on gastronomy." "I'm a bit of a parlour cook," Mr. Spencer then advanced as his qualification for the task. A bit of a parlour cook! It savours of sacrilege when we remember the knowledge and achievements of the long line of inspired writers upon the art, from our friend the "Accomplisht Cook," who wrote because "God and my own conscience"—as he explained to the "most worthy Artists," his fellow "Master Cooks"—"would not permit me to bury these, my Experiences, with my Silver Hairs in the Grave"; to Alexandre Dumas, whose Dictionnaire was to be the triumphant crowning of his life's literary work. A bit of a parlour cook, who could, so he says, manage a salad, a grill, an anchovy toast, or a cooling and cunningly compounded cup, to venture to compete with the mighty Vatel who have died for their art, the Carêmes who have heroically braved the charcoal fumes that might lessen their days but would increase their glory!

And the book itself is not much worse, not much better, than the preface led us to expect. "New humour," slang, funny stories, headlines after the fashion of the halfpenny paper; these are the attractions offered in the place of the stately language, the courtly style, the elegant seriousness of the authorities who were artists, not journalists. Our interest is supposed to be quickened when our eyes fall on these and similar headings: "Coloured Help," "No Cheques Accepted," "Such Larks," in all the pride and pomp of italics and single lines to themselves. We are presumably made to feel at home by free-and-easy references to the lodging-house "gal," and the landlady who has to be "squared," and the business-men who "gallop" through breakfast and luncheon, and put in their "best work" at dinner. And we are invited to laugh at the inevitable jest about "those who go down to the sea in ships," and the more personal joke of a salad made with colza oil by a drunken cook, or of the effects of an experimental vegetarian dinner, and so on and so on.

When we turn from the ornaments of style to the doctrine taught, we find Mr. Spencer to be a man of at least one strong belief—viz., that French cookery is an abomination not to be endured by right-minded and healthily constituted Englishmen. Mrs. Glasse, it is true, had her objection to French cooks.

"So much is the Blind Folly of this Age, that they—English gentlemen—would rather be impos'd on by a French Booby [that she was not writing in the 'high polite stile' she had already explained] than give Encouragement to a good English Cook!"

But clearly her objection was much the same as that cherished nowadays by the City clerk to the German. It was not French cooking that excited her indignation, but the French chef, who, by his "French tricks," was ousting honest English men and women from their rightful place. With Mr. Spencer, however, it is all the other way. The practices of the French kitchen are anathema to him. To introduce the two harmless little words A la on a menu is to incur his wrath for ever. Out of them, indeed, he has invented a wicked fairy Ala, whom he pictures for us waging terrible war against the "Roast Beef of Old England." Her "attendant sprites" are "Grease, Vinegar, and Garlic," he says: and this makes us fear that his experience of French cooking has been limited to the cheap French restaurant. It is a sad fact that the Paris restaurant is no longer what it was in the great days, when the most distinguished chefs of France left the palace of the noble to preside in the eating-house of the bourgeois. But there are still friendly little places, almost under the shadow of Notre Dame or the Bourse, where Mr. Spencer might enlarge his experience and be convinced of the truth, much to his own profit and that of his readers; though, we should add, the restaurant is neither the only nor the best school for the study of the art of cookery. However, even Mr. Spencer does not live on roast beef alone, and we are amused to note that his recipies sometimes have a distinctly French flavour, and that French terms prove very useful, almost indispensable.

His concluding chapters are devoted to the art, not of eating but of drinking. His cups and restoratives are sometimes as wonderful as Sir Kenelm Digby's Metheglins and Meaths and Hydromels—if never so picturesque—and often as alarming. But, perhaps, after we had eaten Mr. Spencer's breakfast of bacon and eggs, Calcutta jumble, reindeer's tongue, and other dainties, and his dinner—he is wise and objects to luncheon, even if not unwilling to make a menu for it—of roast beef and real English accessories, we might stand in need of his "Swizzles" and "Liveners." We have, however, too much respect for ourselves and for the noble art of Varenne and Beauvilliers to run any such awful risk.

A HANDBOOK OF LITERATURE.

Handbook of English Literature. By Austin Dobson and W. Hall Griffin. (Crosby, Lockwood & Son.)

THIS handbook, as Mr. Austin Dobson informs us in his preface, was published originally in the Sixties for the use of those who designed to enter the Civil Service examinations. But English literature, as he pathetically remarks, has never been a favourite subject with the candidates for the Civil Service. Accordingly, an attempt was made to extend it as a book for general reference; and now it is for the third time re-issued under the supervision of Prof. Hall Griffin, the teacher of English language and literature at Queen's College, who has brought it up to modern requirements. It is emphatically a book of reference, a book for students only; and a book for students desirous of having at hand compendious data, rather than a detailed introduction to English literature. But in its kind it must be pronounced excellent, and without any rival that we know of. It is arranged in chronological periods, without any attempt at philosophical order, as Mr. Dobson warns us. Where it is perhaps least satisfactory is in the notices of nineteenth century writers, and those immediately preceding the nineteenth century. It is very full and up to date in its list of modern writers, and this has somewhat cramped the space given to such modern writers of importance as Shelley and Keats. Without some previous knowledge of the important place occupied by these poets, the student would be liable to underrate their position—indeed, the plan of treatment would seem to expect some such knowledge on the part of the student. Nor is it quite satisfactory to find such a poet as Blake relegated to an appendix of minor writers, while Young and like small fry find a place in the body of the book.

But this ends our fault-finding. Mr. Dobson's share in the work obviously comes out most strongly where we should expect to find it—in the poets and prose-writers of the eighteenth century. The notices of Dryden, of Pope, of the essayists of that time, of Richardson, Fielding, and the other novelists of the eighteenth century, are delightful, and such as the youthful student will hardly find in any other handbook. Prof. Griffin's strength and special contribution are no less obviously to be looked for in the chapters dealing with the beginnings of English literature. No other handbook, we think, equally elementary, gives such a clear and knowledgeable account of our early literature, embodying with equal fullness, and at the same time brevity, the results of the most modern researches. One finds references made, for example, to such recent authorities as Prof. W. P. Ker. There is an admirable account of the principles of the great Saxon alliterative metre, most rare to find in a popular handbook, and of incalculable value for the youthful student. The chief early authors, from Cædmon up to Chaucer, are handled, and the evolution of Chaucer's English from Saxon and Norman French is traced. This difficult subject is further illustrated by a valuable appendix of passages from early English poems and prose-writings: the Saxon epic of Beowulf, Layamon, and various early authors, including a passage from Tyndall's Bible, are all quoted to illustrate the text. The treatment of the growth and establishment of our literature is so careful and valuable, that we can well afford to forgive the authors if a certain amount of knowledge is taken for granted in regard to the principal writers of our own century. It is a fault on the right side, and was doubtless necessary if the list of modern writers was to be brought so thoroughly up to date as has been done. This handbook is, we certainly think, the best brief compendium of reference for English literary students that we know. It aims not at extended exposition, but at being an advanced multum in parvo; and it certainly fulfils its object. So far as we have seen, all dates and biographical details embody the latest and most accurate results; making it a most handy and reliable compendium for the literary man as well as the student.

MR. WELLS'S NEW STORIES.

The Plattner Story. By H. G. Wells.
(Methuen & Co.)

THIS volume of short stories is very much what we have learned to expect—one might say, to hope for—from Mr. Wells. The author's range is unusually wide: it is a rare gift that can exhibit with almost equal conviction both real life and the life of an imaginary wonderland. There are some whose imagination answers to the stimulus and obeys the direction of an observation of things here and known, but stops short before the unexplored, and will not enter the kingdom beyond and unknown. There are others, fewer in number, poets and dreamers, madmen and men of genius, who will tell us stories of any world but this, and can never render the life around them: who pay, in short, for their creative power by the blindness of their eyes.

Dealing first with those stories or parts of stories in which Mr. Wells treats of life here and now, there are certain characteristics worthy of notice. The approach is always scientific and without prejudice; the grey life that he depicts is neither darkened to villainy nor illuminated to heroism; he describes the middle and lower-middle classes neither as if he held a brief for their defence nor with any air of superiority; he wants the truth and he gets it. Many authors describe their characters with a double purpose—that the reader may form an opinion of the people, and, secondly, that the reader may subsequently deduce an opinion of the author. It is a common and unpleasant form of egotism, and Mr. Wells is remarkably free from it. That his correct and impartial attitude never leads him to produce a cold report of real life instead of a story of real life may be assigned to the fact that he is an artist. There is no long analysis of a character where a word or two of dialogue would serve the purpose. "Wretched mumchaucer!" exclaims the headmaster, and we know the headmaster. "Rational 'njoyment'" pleads the struggling shopkeeper, and stands revealed. Similarly, Mr. Wells will get a whole scene by recording one or two suggestive details. For instance, an operation is to take place, and here is the picture: "Haddon moved the little octagonal table close to the bedside, and, with his broad black back to me, began taking things out of his bag. I heard the light click of steel upon steel." His sense of value is good, his sympathies are broad, his humour is dry and pleasant. Of his stories of real life "The Purple Pilens" and "A Catatrophe" are the best. Sometimes, of course, he fails: misses his effect or lets himself be seen trying for it; but, on the whole, the level is high and well maintained.

We pass to the stories of wonderland. Where is wonderland? On the moon, at the bottom of the sea, in the centre of the earth, on the outside edge of the hereafter? How do we arrive at it? In books, mostly by the mysterious powder or the fixed hypnotic stare; chloroform, plain sleep, or a newly invented machine will also serve the purpose. It has already been pointed out there are few authors who have been successful in what is often not quite accurately called purely imaginative work. In the story of real life the reader supplies something; he is in a state of expectant attention; the illusion is more easily produced. In the story of wonderland the author must supply everything; the reader must be told what he is to see instead of being reminded of something he has seen. Again, it is all very well for an author to say that he will let his imagination roam, but in almost every case the imagination refuses to avail itself of the permission. This imagination is no wild bird beating its heart out against the bars of the cage and pining to be free. It does not pine, it is reluctant to roam. An annexation of any part of wonderland that has hitherto been unexplored is a rare event; in the intervals we rediscover the already discovered, and, as a rule, no story is so trite and conventional as the story of wonderland.

In some of these stories Mr. Wells does rediscover the discovered; but if he takes a theme that has been used, he sees it from his own point of view, and handles it in his own way. And in other of the stories the idea seems to us quite new and fresh; some further annexation of the wonderful kingdom has been made. Very remarkable is the skill with which he makes the impossible seem, for the time being, like the inevitable. He knows just the moment when a description must be plain and prosaic if it is to be credible; it is the very moment where those that fail in this kind allow themselves fine writing. He is quick to see when the very incompleteness of the story may help the illusion and produce something of the air of a fragmentary human document. Two of the stories, "The Sea-Raiders" and "Pollock and the Porroh Man," are quite successful in producing the feeling of horror; and although it is perfectly easy to fill a story with all manner of ghastliness, it is quite a different thing and a very much more difficult thing to produce the feeling of horror.

No more interesting volume of short stories has appeared for a long time, and none which is so likely to give equal pleasure to the simplest reader and to the most fastidious critic.

A PEOPLE "RELIGIOUS TO EXCESS."

Religion of the Ancient Egyptians. By Alfred Wiedemann, Ph.D., &c. (H. Grevel & Co.)

A LAND divided into forty-two provinces, each possessing a god believed by his worshippers to be the creator and ruler of the universe; a people so obstinately conservative that they accepted new ideas only on condition that they did not abandon the old; and a history stretching over fifty centuries, during which the country was repeatedly conquered by foreign invaders, who brought their own gods with them when they came and left them behind them when they went away. If the reader can picture to himself the kaleidoscopic faith likely to result from these three causes, he will have some idea of the difficulty of producing a bird's-eye view of the religion of Ancient Egypt. Yet Prof. Wiedemann has performed this feat, and has performed it well. Wisely throwing aside any attempt to portray, as a whole, either the Egyptian Pantheon or the Egyptian creed, he has compressed into a volume of 300 pages an account which leaves little to be desired of the Egyptian religion as it affected the daily life of the people. Here, for instance, the uninstructed reader can learn in a pleasant and easy way the curious ideas of the Egyptians concerning the wanderings of the soul after death, their deification of the kings of the country, and the true reason of their worship of animals. If he chooses to go further, he will find in the same volume a sufficient description of their chief gods, of the gradual transformation of these last into solar deities, and of all the ceremonies of the Egyptian religion which have come down to us. Nor is this information imparted in the didactic or professorial manner. Everywhere Dr. Wiedemann gives us full translations of the texts on which his conclusions are based, and although he is, of course, obliged to take some things for granted, he most honestly warns us that "in the study of Egyptian religion, as in all other branches of Egyptology, our knowledge is as yet very imperfect." If any fault can be found with his work, it is that his translations do not always reach the high literary level of Prof. Maspero's.

The impression which the book will probably leave on the minds of most readers is that to the "plain man" of Ancient Egypt the worship of the gods was much less a religion than a sort of magic. Sublime and noble conceptions can, indeed, be found in many of the hymns here given; but there is no reason to suppose that they ever reached the ear of any Egyptian who was not either a king or a priest. For the rest of the nation the smallest action of daily life was presided over by some god or other, and the favour of this deity could be obtained with the certainty of a scientific experiment by the performance of the appropriate ceremony. Even in the next world the same theory held good. The path of the soul to perfect beatitude was supposed to be beset with terrible difficulties, but they could all be overcome by a knowledge of what may be irreverently called the rules of the game. At almost every step in the underworld the dead Egyptian found a well-guarded gate, which was only opened to him on the presentation of the proper amulet and the utterance of the proper password. Hence the best preparation for the world to come was thought to be, not good conduct in this life, but a map of the country and a good memory for its dangers as handed down by the priests. The power which this put into the hands of the priesthood can easily be seen, and the story of its abuse forms one of the saddest satires upon humanly invented religious institutions that can well be imagined. Well suited as the religion of Egypt was to a people who, as we are apt to forget, were, after all, Africans, in the outset it rendered great services to civilisation, and remained tolerant and kindly to the end. But the failure of Khuenaten's reform made it possible for the priests to grasp at political power, and from that moment it began to decay. At length it broke down under the intolerable weight of its own ceremonies and the idleness which it enforced on the greater part of the population, and when it finally vanished the backbone of the nation seems to have gone with it. Never since she abjured her old gods has Egypt been independent.

The volume before us is in every way an advance on the German edition with which scholars have hitherto had to content themselves. It contains some seventy well-chosen illustrations, has been brought up to date by the author, and has an excellent index. Dr. Wiedemann has also been lucky in his translator.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

FOUR BOOKS ON EDUCATION.

Aims and Practice of Teaching. By Frederic Spencer, and Others. (Cambridge: University Press.) This is a collection of papers by several hands on the teaching of Greek, Latin, French, German, English, history, geography, algebra, geometry, physical science, chemistry, botany, and physiology. The various chapters do not, and apparently are not intended to, constitute a harmonious whole. Considerable difference of opinion appears concerning the handling of those among the above subjects that lend themselves to somewhat similar treatment, and this variety probably adds to the usefulness of the book. In dealing with so heterogeneous an assemblage of essays comparisons would not be odious only because they would not be possible; but we may perhaps say that those on Greek, Latin, geography, geometry, and chemistry have struck us most. If, indeed, the teaching of chemistry in schools can ever be so ordered as to possess any real value as a mental gymnastic, it will probably have to be conducted on some such lines as those indicated in Mr. Armstrong's chapter. It is strange that botany should have been accorded a place in this scholastic Pantheon, while arithmetic was excluded. Taken in the aggregate, these articles do not contain much that is of startling novelty, but, old or new, the views set forth are sane, and the suggestions offered are practical. Secondary schoolmasters rarely trouble themselves to read books on education. Those of them who are least uninterested in their profession, and those of them who are least unconscious of their shortcomings through lack of training, might strain a point for once and glance through Mr. Spencer's volume.

Miss C. S. Bremner's Education of Girls and Women (Swan Sonnenschein) is introduced by some dozen pages of excellent preliminary matter from the pen of Miss E. P. Hughes, and, so far as nineteenth century developments and the existing situation are concerned, will be found a clear and succinct sketch of the subject. The Scottish section is particularly well done. The weak point of the book, apart from the occasional slipshod character of the English, lies in the historical summary contained in the earlier pages, which is thin and poor and evidently written from insufficient and inaccurate knowledge. The author herself very modestly and very properly styles this portion of her work an "imperfect survey." The book would have been better without it.

For fifty cents the Macmillan Company, of New York, provides an extremely serviceable Handbook of Courses open to Women in British, Continental, and Canadian Universities. All necessary information, including details as to fees, residence, curricula, &c., is given. Those professors and lecturers at Oxford and Cambridge who "have refused to admit women" are shown up for execration by the addition of asterisks to their names. The coy or misogynistic at the former University number seventeen; at the latter, five.

By those whose nervous organisation is proof against the repulsive grotesqueries of American spelling and phraseology Studies in Historical Method, by Mary Sheldon Barnes (Isbister), will be found to be a thoughtful and suggestive little volume. It contains tabulated records of some decidedly interesting and valuable experiments, which throw light upon the evolutionary stages of the historic sense in children at different ages and of both sexes. The matter, in fact, is as good as the manner is bad. The book being written by a lady, there is naturally a lavish use of the dash; and the note of interrogation flourishes like a whole forest of green bay trees. A curious and very ugly misprint, "for ever" run into one word—which, oddly enough, occurs several times—should have been corrected in the proof. The teacher of history who can stomach all this, and who can also bring himself to be a little kind to rickety grammar, should profit by reading what the writer has to say.

* * *

Robert the Wise and his Heirs. By St. Clair Baddeley. (Heinemann.)

THERE is no more interesting episode in Italian, or, indeed, in mediæval history, than the narrative of the rule of the Angevin sovereigns of Naples and Sicily, and of their struggles with their Suzerain, the Pope. Mr. Baddeley has already covered part of the ground in an earlier sketch of the career of Joanna I., Queen of Naples. In the present volume he returns to the topic, and retells with copious detail the romantic story of Joanna, together with that of her father and predecessor, Robert the Wise. Mr. Baddeley's work is painstaking and sufficiently picturesque; he has incorporated a considerable amount of new material, most of it drawn from those unexhausted quarries of modern research—the Papal archives at the Vatican. The history of Naples is, of course, a theme which tempts to wide divagations, and Mr. Baddeley has interpreted it in a liberal sense. He has much to say, and much that is worth saying, upon the condition of Italy in the fourteenth century, upon the degenerate Papacy, upon the strife of Guelph and Ghibelline, upon the early stages of the Renaissance. As might be expected from his connexion with the Neapolitan Court, no less a person than Boccaccio is much in evidence. His Fiammetta, according to the usual belief, was a natural daughter of King Robert; but as to this Mr. Baddeley is somewhat incredulous. A very interesting account is given of the rapid decay of the Minorite or Franciscan order of friars within a very few years after the death of the founder, of the schism between the Conventuals and the party of the stricter observance, and of the relations of either faction to the Popes. The character and personality of Robert the Wise himself are admirably summed up by Mr. Baddeley. He was not without learning and not without literary gifts; but though touched with the spirit of the Renaissance, he still belonged essentially to mediævalism, and just failed in catching the spirit of the new movement. Therefore he was doomed, as the new movement grew, to oblivion. Altogether Mr. Baddeley may be congratulated upon a noteworthy contribution of English scholarship to the elucidation of Italian history.

* * *

The Natural History of Marketable Marine Fishes of the British Islands. By J. T. Cunningham, M.A. (Macmillan & Co.)

Of late years organised attempts have been made both here and abroad to get an accurate knowledge of the habits, and especially the development, of marine food-fishes, in the hope that this knowledge may be turned to practical account in increasing the annual supply of fish. In Great Britain most of this work has been done, first under the auspices of the Scottish Fishery Board, and more recently by the Marine Biological Association. The amount of information thus collected, now for the first time put into book-form, is very considerable, and no small part of it is due to the personal observations of Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Holt, working as members of the staff of the Association, by whose direction the book is prepared. To the naturalist it will be welcome as forming a most useful supplement to the treatises of Jarrell, Couch and Day, bringing our knowledge of British sea-fishes up to date; and though parts of the book show signs of haste in preparation, on the whole it is certainly well done.

But the objects of the book are essentially practical. The work was meant to lead to increase in the supply of sea-fish brought to market, and as such it is supported by grants from the Treasury. The reader who turns to the chapter on "Practical Methods of Increasing the Supply" may, perhaps, be disappointed to find that the statement of results is not more encouraging. In spite of all that has been done, it is evident that we have still no ready means of turning scientific knowledge of marine fishes to practical effect. Yet the study is young and much progress has been made, if only in revealing the complexity of the problem. It is at least a gain to have prevented premature legislation. Take, for instance, the question of the destruction of immature fish. To the layman it seems sufficient to forbid the sale of fish below a certain size; but a study of the facts proves how futile such a measure would be. To protect, for example, the plaice, a staple food of the poor, Mr. Cunningham shows that it is the shrimp-trawl that should be stopped. Who suspects that in catching thirty-two quarts of shrimps at the mouth of the Mersey over 11,000 young fish, chiefly plaice, are destroyed? Many similar facts are given in this book, showing how the phenomena of marine life are correlated together in such tangled interdependence that to interfere with any great prospect of success is still impossible. Nevertheless, scarce fish have been known to become abundant from unknown causes. The useless boar-fish might have been referred to in illustration. Described by Couch as an excessive rarity, it has now become a pest of the Plymouth trawlers, being taken in countless thousands, overloading the trawls and injuring the men's hands with its spines.

Diseases of Plants induced by Cryptogamic Parasites. By Dr. Karl Freiherr von Tubeuf. English edition by W. G. Smith, B.Sc., Ph.D. (Longmans.)

THE popular idea that man "in a state of nature," that wild animals, and wild plants live healthy and happy lives, free from anxiety and disease, must be abandoned with the other illusions of our childhood. Civilisation, domestication, cultivation, no doubt bring their own special evils in their train; but the "state of nature" is anything but a state of perpetual health. In the case of plants, diseases abound resulting from insufficient nutriment, from overcrowding, from unfavourable atmospheric conditions, and, above all, from countless hosts of parasites always seeking for a favourable nidus for their propagation. In the volume before us probably not less than a thousand species of such parasites are described, belonging exclusively to the cryptogamic or flowerless section of the vegetable kingdom.

Far too little attention has been paid to this subject by our agriculturists and legislators. Besides numerous special works on plant-diseases, Germany has its Zeitschrift für Pflanzenkrankheiten, published monthly. In America, the publications of the Division of Vegetable Pathology of the Department of Agriculture, and the Bulletins of the various agricultural experimental stations, in connexion with local universities, are both numerous and important. With us, with the exception of valuable papers to be dug out of the Journals of the Royal Agricultural and Royal Horticultural Societies, and two small, but excellent, books of limited scope, Prof. Marshall Ward's "Timber and some of its Diseases," and Mr. Worthington G. Smith's "Diseases of Field and Garden Crops," our literature is almost as scanty as that of Irish snakes. In Switzerland the vine-grower is compelled, under heavy penalties, to use the prescribed means for keeping down infectious diseases. In the western United States the farmer, who allows his land to become foul with thistles or other rapidly spreading weeds is heavily fined. With us a farm may become a perfect nursery of weeds and their attendant infectious diseases, and the neighbours have no remedy.

An English edition of von Tubeuf's classical work is therefore a welcome boon to the English student; and we may as well say at once that, so far as can be judged without comparing with the original, the part of the translator (not to be confounded with the elder Smith with the same initials, of fungus-foray renown) has been admirably done. The work will rapidly find a place on the botanist's shelves as an indispensable book of reference.

The general facts in the life-history of parasitic and saprophytic fungi, the nature of the malformations and diseases which they cause in the host-plant, the predisposition to disease, and the remedies, are treated in detail; and two chapters are devoted to the singular phenomenon of "symbiosis," where a parasite takes up its abode in the root of the host, to the mutual benefit of both parasite and host.

FICTION.

My Lord Duke. By E. W. Hornung. (Cassell & Co.)

NOT the least of the benefits that we derive from Greater Britain is good stories. Colonial novelists are healthily disposed to put incident before psychology, plot before polish. On the skirts of the empire the yarn is still held in higher reverence than problems or philosophy; and art for art's sake has few followers. From Greater Britain, we need scarcely remind the reader, come Mr. Kipling, Rolf Boldrewood, Mr. Louis Becke, Mr. Fitzpatrick (whose promising South African tales we reviewed the other day), and Mr. E. W. Hornung; and the elementals and externals are the stuff of which their books are made. It is—for entertainment, for beguilement and the defeat of brooding care—the best stuff. Mr. Hornung is all for the story of action, and we honour him for his allegiance. He sets out to give his readers so good a time! Just as Jim Bludso saw his duty, so does Mr. Hornung see his reader's interest "a dead sure thing, and he goes for it thar and then." His every sentence is animated by this admirable purpose. With the volume before us Mr. Hornung has added another to his store of exhilarating, vigorous stories. Indeed, we cannot call My Lord Duke anything but one of the most agreeable novels that we can remember. It is not that it is conspicuous for penetration, or humour, or wit, or distinction of style: it is simply that it is so honest, so direct, so masculine, and so satisfying in its conclusion. Mr. Hornung once introduced us to a bride from the bush; this time he has set before us a bridegroom—uncouth, frank, gentle, sinewy, and entirely lovable. The man has our sympathies in five minutes, and thereafter My Lord Duke is not to be laid aside until the end is reached. So real has been our own interest in My Lord Duke, that we would not on any consideration tell the story here. Such attractive plots are too rare, and we are too kindly disposed towards readers of this book to spoil their pleasure; but we may say, without prejudice to anyone's enjoyment of the narrative itself, that My Lord Duke is a tale of to-day, and not, as might be premised from the title and the prevailing mode, an historical romance; that it is the story of a peerage and the heirs to it; that its hero, Happy Jack, is a man to wear in one's heart; and that the end is the completest of surprises. On the road to that surprise we are introduced to several characters who are firmly, if not subtly, drawn, and we witness, among other things, a fight in a good cause and the humiliation of a prig. Mr. Hornung has developed a happy narrative method. There is not a line of fine writing in this book, yet never does he misplace an incident or mar it in the telling. He gets the best service from ordinary work-a-day words. A plainer story than My Lord Duke we have rarely read. The dialogue is equally direct and "forwarding." In fact, we go forward with every line, as readers of stories are entitled to, ir.

12
=
t or m a st on fa
s ed
f w th v
no cl in k, t Cl na
b en up at fu al

—
is/n.
ir ed
l
is at b or fir e ne
oo
na av er-or'
no op
th
,
lo.
fu
T

s
a
“
ne
Mc
os
v
e ri
he ci ref
th
—
B
C
I
or un

SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1897.

No. 1308, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow in due course.]

IT is history that leavens the lump this week. Foremost in this kind comes the fifth volume, long expected and desired, of Mr. McCarthy's A History of Our Own Times. The first and second volumes appeared, and had a great success, in 1878; the third and fourth followed a little later, and brought the narrative up to the political crisis of 1880, when Mr. Gladstone took the reins of office as Prime Minister. The present volume continues the history of the Queen's reign from that date to these days, when the streets of London are resounding with the hammers of carpenters erecting seats for the Diamond Jubilee procession. It is interesting to see very recent events treated with the gravity which history demands, and to note in the contents table of this volume such chapter-headings as "Mr. Gladstone Resigns, Lord Rosebery Succeeds"—"The Cordite Explosion"—"Venezuela and South Africa"—"The Dongola Campaign"—"The Prince of Wales's Appeal"—and "Blondin; Nansen; The Penrhyn Quarries; The Education Bill." The prominence given to Blondin's name is surprising, but not more so than pleasing.

Older and more recondite events are the subject-matter of another historical work on our table: Spanish Protestants in the Sixteenth Century. This book is not so much the production of one author as of a crowd, for we gather from the title-page that it is written by C. A. Wilkens, who is doctor of theology at Kalksburg, near Vienna. It is translated by Mrs. Rachel Chalice. The late Lord Plunkett, D.D., has contributed an introduction, and Canon Fleming brings up the rear with a preface. The translation is an abridgment of the original. Glancing at Canon Fleming's tribute to the late Lord Plunkett, we can hardly repress a smile at the fervour of admiration with which he quotes Dr. Alexander's "most eloquent words on the death of Lord Plunkett in St. Patrick's Cathedral." Dr. Alexander said:

"What a man says—is something:
What a man does—is more:
What a man is—that is most."

"I venture to say," writes Canon Fleming, "that no living divine but Dr. Alexander could utter such an aphorism as that—one which I will predict will not die." But surely this is no such wonderful utterance, no such "trinity of wisdom" as Canon Fleming thinks it. The book, when arrived at, is a history of the struggles and sufferings of the Protestant reformers in the sixteenth century, and the narrative opens with the impact of Lutheran thought on religious belief in Spain.

The Literary History of the American Revolution is announced to be completed in two volumes, of which the first is before us. In this work the author, Mr. Moses Coit Tyler, turns from the doings of statesmen, generals, party leaders, and certain persons whom he is pleased to call "the ministerial agents of a brain-sick king," to set forth

"the inward history of our Revolution—the history of its ideas, its spiritual moods, its motives, its passions, even of its sportive caprices, and its whims as . . . uttered . . . in the various writings of the two parties of Americans who promoted or resisted that first movement."

Mr. Tyler is professor of American History in Cornell University. We may note, without prejudice, that he describes the words of the Declaration of Independence as "the most commanding and the most pathetic utterance, in any age, in any language, of national grievances and national purposes."

American, though published on this side also, is The God Idea of the Ancients on Sex in Religion, by Eliza Burt Gamble, whose aim is "to show the effect which each of the two forces, female and male, has had on the development of our present God-idea." The work is to some extent supplemental to the author's earlier study of the Evolution of Woman. Mainly historical are certain papers by Thomas Carlyle, now collected for the first time under the title of Montaigne, and other Essays. They include studies of Lady Wortley Montagu, Montesquieu, Nelson, the Netherlands, and the two Pitts. Mr. Crockett, who edits, tells us that these "bread and butter" essays were written at Mainhill in the summer and autumn of 1820. They were contributed to the Edinburgh Encyclopædia. The Selden Society publishes a second volume of Select Pleas in the Court of Admiralty. A new edition of the late John Addington Symonds's Renaissance in Italy is issued by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

An event of the week is the issue by Messrs. George Bell & Son of the first volume of a new edition of Swift. Since the second issue of Sir Walter Scott's edition of Swift, dated 1824, "there has been no serious attempt to grapple with the difficulties which then prevented, and which still beset, the attainment of a trustworthy and substantially complete text." But material for such a text has been greatly accumulated by such critics as Mr. John Forster, Mr. Henry Craik, Mr. Stanley Lane Poole, Mr. Churton Collins, Mr. Leslie Stephen, Mr. Elwin, Mr. Courthope, Col. F. Grant, and others. The present editor, Mr. Temple Scott, has availed himself of the results arrived at by all these critics, and he has had not a little direct assistance. The edition has the further advantage of a biographical introduction by Mr. Lecky. Among the contents of the first volume are "A Tale of a Tub," "The Battle of Books," "Thoughts on Various Subjects," and various pamphlets and parodies, including "A Meditation upon a Broomstick." Each work is introduced by a facsimile of the title-page it originally followed. An unfamiliar portrait of Swift as a student at Trinity College, Dublin, forms the frontispiece to this volume.

Most people are aware that Mr. Gladstone has for years been gathering his shorter literary productions into a series of books, entitled Gleanings of Past Years. We believe that these volumes have been permitted only a restricted circulation. But it is well known that Mr. Gladstone has long been in the habit of giving a complete set (complete, that is to say, up-to-date) of his Gleanings as a wedding present to his marrying friends. The eighth and final volume is now to hand. It is made up of thirteen theological and ecclesiastical papers. We have the famous paper on "Robert Elsmere," and the articles on "Ingersoll and Christianity," "The Lord's Day," and the interesting and important Introduction which Mr. Gladstone contributed to Sheppard's Pictorial Bible. The volume concludes with a reprint of Mr. Gladstone's paper on the question of the validity of Anglican Orders which was sent to the newspapers a year ago.

George Morland's Pictures: Their Present Possessors, by Ralph Richardson, is an attempt to catalogue, with their whereabouts, the works of George Morland. Mr. Richardson admits, however, that he has not overtaken Morland's industry, and he offers his book as a contribution only to its object.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

- HEAVEN: AN INQUIRY. By J. Hunt Cook. Baptist Tract Society. 2s.
THE SAVIOUR IN THE LIGHT OF THE FIRST CENTURY. By Rev. John Parker. J. G. Hitt (Edinburgh).
CHRIST IN THE HOLY LAND. By Rev. Alex. A. B. S.P.C.K.
BOOKS THAT HELP THE RELIGIOUS LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Reid, B.D. J. Gardner Hill.

BIOGRAPHY.

- OLD MEMORIES. By General Sir Hugh Gough, G.C.B., &c. William Blackwood & Sons.
NORMAN MACLEOD. ("Famous Scots" Series. By J. Wellwood, Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

HISTORY.

DIOCESAN HISTORIES: LINCOLN. By E. Venables and George O. Perry.—ROCHESTER. By Rev. A. J. Pearman, S.P.C.K.

Selden Society: SELECT PLEAS IN THE COURT OF CHANCERY. Bernard Quaritch.

SPANISH PROTESTANTS IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. Compiled from the German of C. A. Wilkens. William Heinemann.

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES: FROM 1880 TO THE DIAMOND JUBILEE. By Justin McCarthy. Chatto & Windus. 12s.

POETRY.

MAMMON: A SPIRIT SONG and "LADY" VERE. By Louis M. Elshamus. Eastman Lewis (New York).

THE CHILD OF THE BOWSWOMAN. By Jean Carlyle Graham. David Nutt.

BELLES LETTRES.

THE PROSE WORKS OF JONATHAN SWIFT. Vol. I., A TALE OF A TUB, &c. With a Biographical Introduction by W. E. H. Lecky, M.P. George Bell & Sons.

MONTAIGNE, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By Thomas Carlyle. Now first collected. With a Foreword by S. R. Crockett. James Gowers & Son.

THE TEMPLE DRAMATISTS: A WOMAN KILLED WITH KINDNESS. By Thomas Heywood. Edited by A. W. Ward, Litt. D. J. M. Dent & Co. 1s.

FICTION.

HELDAN'S TREASURE. By Frances Harriott Wood. S.P.C.K.

A DRAWING-ROOM CYCLO. By Lorin Kaye. John Macqueen. 6s.

THE WIDOW WOMAN: A CORNISH TALE. By Charles Lee. James Bowden. 2s.

THE PHILANDEPHERS. By A. E. W. Mason. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY MIRACLE. By Louis Zangwill. Chatto & Windus.

JACK HINTON, THE GUARDSMAN. By Charles Lever. Downey & Co., Ltd.

THE WINDS OF MARCH. By George Knight. Jarrold & Sons. 6s.

THE TRACK OF MIDNIGHT. By G. Firth Scott. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

PILGRIMS OF THE NIGHT. By Sarah Doufney. W. H. Addison.

THE MASSARENES. By Ouida. Third Edition. Sampson Low, Marston & Co. 6s.

ROGUES OF THE FERRY CROSS. By S. Walkey. Cassell & Co. 6s.

SOLDIERS OF FORTUNE. By Richard Harding Davis. William Heinemann.

A FOUNTAIN SEALED. By Walter Besant. Chatto & Windus.

HARVARD STORIES. By W. K. Post. Putnam.

IN THE CRUCIBLE. By Grace Denis Litchfield. Putnam.

LAZARUS. By Lucas Cleeve. Hutchinson.

BLIGHT. By the Hon. Mrs. Walter D. Forbes. Osgood.

STEPHEN LESCOMBE, B.A. By Julius H. Hurst. Putnam.

THE WISDOM OF FOOLS. By Margaret Deland. Longmans.

DRACULA. By Bram Stoker. A. Constable & Co.

RIE'S DIARY. By Annie Coates. Chatto & Windus.

DANAB'S WINE CUP, AND OTHER TALES. By Bart Kennedy. Sidney L. Ollif.

THE WICKED WOODS. By Rosa Mulholland. Burns & Oates.

THE REJUVENATION OF MISS SEMAPHORE. By Hal Godfrey. Jarrold & Sons.

SYMPHONIES. By George Egerton. John Lane.

TRAVEL.

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS. From a French Point of View. William Heinemann.

EDUCATIONAL.

CÆSAR'S GALLIC WAR. Book IV. With Notes by John Brown, B.D. Blackie & Son.

BLACKIE'S SCIENCE TEXT-BOOKS: A TEXT-BOOK OF GEOLOGY. By W. Jerome Harrison, F.G.S. Blackie & Son. 3s. 6d.

A SECOND GERMAN COURSE. By H. Baumann. Blackie & Son. 2s. 6d.

GERMAN STORIES FOR LOWER AND MIDDLE FORMS. By L. de Saumarez Brock. Blackie & Son. 1s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

GLEANINGS OF PAST YEARS. Vol. VIII. By Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. John Murray.

GEORGE MORLAND'S PICTURES: THEIR PRESENT POSSESSORS. By Ralph Richardson, F.R.S.E. Elliot Stock. 4s. 6d.

HOW TO GROW BEGONIAS. By C. A. Farini. Sampson Low, Marston & Co. 2s.

MEMOIRALS OF CHRISTIE'S. By W. Roberts. 2 vols. George Bell & Sons. 25s.

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF SPORT. Part IV. Lawrence & Bullen. 2s.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE understand that the task of completing Stevenson's romance St. Ives was offered first to Mr. Conan Doyle, who refused it.

THE circular which has just gone forth to 17,000 known admirers of the works of Robert Louis Stevenson, not only in Great Britain but in America and the Colonies, carries the memorial to that writer one step farther. It states that a meeting was held in December last, over which Lord Rosebery presided, and that it was then decided to erect a memorial of some kind, but the precise nature of the memorial cannot yet be described. The executive committee call it "a personal memorial, to consist of statue, bust, or medallion, with or without architectural or sculptural accompaniments"—no more. Questions of size, design, and position are held in reserve for the present. Meanwhile small subscriptions are asked, and a first list of subscribers is printed.

PROF. MASSON, who signs the circular, gives the following excellent reasons why Edinburgh should be chosen as the site of the monument, although the exact spot where it will stand is not yet decided upon: "Edinburgh was Stevenson's birthplace; Edinburgh and its neighbourhood are the scene of some of the most powerful parts of his best fictions; Edinburgh characters and traditions are worked into those fictions; it was to Edinburgh that his thoughts reverted most fondly in those wanderings of his over other parts of the earth to which he was compelled by quest of health; Edinburgh was at his heart to the last in his dying days in his island-home at Samoa. But, should it be thought, as it may be, that more than one memorial of Robert Louis Stevenson might well be in existence, is there not some significance in the fact that one other is already provided? While that mountain-top in far-off Samoa which contains his grave will serve for ever, whether by actual sight of it in chance ocean-passage thereabouts by some, or in the mere pictured dream of it by those that shall never see it, to remind future admirers of Stevenson of the large proportion of his life that was spent in wanderings over the earth, and of the habitual commerce of his imagination in so many of his writings with seas, ships, and solitary islands, may not the single proposed monument in Edinburgh suffice for recognition also of that other half of his genius which dealt so delightfully with the life and legends of the British mother-lands and of some neighbouring portions of our older, more historical, and more closely packed world?"

A WRITER in the New York Critic comes forward as the champion of Dr. George MacDonald, whom, with unpardonable ignorance of Galt, he calls the founder of the new Scottish school." Speaking of Mr. Barrie, Mr. Crockett and Ian Maclaren, he says: "The mark of George MacDonald is stamped unmistakably on their best and most distinctive work. Their great ideas are his great ideas, their noble realism, which idealises the realism of the bravery and pathos of humble life in the land of the heather, is his noble realism. Let any fair-minded reader compare Alec Forbes, Robert Falconer and David Elginbrod—the novels into which George MacDonald has put his vision and interpretation of Scotland—with A Window in Thrums or Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush. The result of the comparison will show clearly who has the most valid claim to the proud title of the founder of the Scottish school of to-day."

THE merits of Dr. MacDonald's work may well be pointed out, but there is little need to compare him with these younger writers. His range is wider and his purpose deeper. He is no more the inspiration of Mr. Barrie than the author of Cranford is.

MEANWHILE a new book by Dr. George MacDonald is in preparation by Messrs. Longmans & Co., entitled Rampollo: Growth on an Old Root; which contains a Book of Translations Old and New; also a Year's Diary of an Old Soul.

It is a little humorous to find Mr. Crockett introducing Carlyle to the reading public, for sheer "love" of him, and in his efforts falling into Carlylese. Mr. Crockett calls the author of Sartor Resartus "him of the burning stomach and the honest, forth-looking, irascible eyes." This description occurs in the preface—that is to say, the "Foreword"—to a collection of biographies contributed by Carlyle to Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopedia. One would like to hear "him of the burning stomach and the honest, forth-looking, irascible eyes" in reply.

IBSEN dissociates himself from Ibsenites rather neatly in the interview with Count Prozor, which is described in the preface to the Count's French translation of John Gabriel Borkman. His symbolism, he implied, is principally the work of his commentators: "I do not mean," he said, "that such ideas may not cross my own mind too as I write. But all that is of secondary importance. The great thing in dramatic work is action, life!"

IBSEN's method of work is described as follows: "I transfer to the stage certain people whom I have observed, certain events which I have seen or which have been related to me—I throw in a little poetry—and that's how it's done." He claims to have seen in real life every character that he has placed on the stage. Count Prozor mentioned the Rat Wife, to which Ibsen replied: "She was a little old woman who used to come to kill rats at the school where I was educated. She carried a little dog in a bag, and there were tales of children who had followed her and fallen into the sea. That was just what I wanted for bringing about the disappearance of Little Eyolf."

At the time of the production by Mr. Wyndham of "Rosemary" the critics were unanimous in considering the last act, wherein Mr. Wyndham appeared as a nonogenarian, an excrescence, but it was left for an American writer to put the situation with real neatness. "Mr. Drew," says the Chap-Book, in speaking of the play, "after the curtain had fallen on 'Rosemary,' gives a charming little 'sketch' of an old man, which he calls, somewhat inappropriately, Act IV."

THE existence of "The Committee for the Survey of the Memorials of Greater London" is probably unknown to ninety-nine Londoners in a hundred. Nevertheless, it is an influential body doing a most useful work. It has just issued a report, covering the last two years, in which the general objects of the Committee are usefully reiterated. These have been, and are, "to take up certain areas in London, and in them to register and record with drawings, photographs, and other records whatever may be deemed to be of historic or æsthetic interest. The work is not confined to buildings only; any valuable open space, any remnant of an old village green, any beautiful tree, any object of local life or custom that may have a definite external embodiment, or any interesting piece of handicraft, even if it be but a signboard or a wrought-iron gate, comes within the Committee's survey. The aim is to draw attention to these things, and . . . to encourage their maintenance, for public purposes, as national trusts."

THE Committee has already begun publishing operations. It has issued a monograph on the Trinity Hospital, in Mile End, and it has in preparation similar monographs on the Old Palace of Bromley-by-Bow, the Mile End-road (its external life and character), Aldgate Church, and other buildings and places. But the Committee is now ready and keenly desirous of beginning the publication of the Register, the formation of which is its chief care. The first volume, containing the record of some six or eight parishes, is practically completed in MS., together with the illustrations. There is some prospect that the London County Council may assist the Committee in the publication of this Register, for which a sum of £150 is required. This would be satisfactory; and the extension of the work to the whole of London under County Council authority seems to be just foreshadowed. We hope, however, that the Committee will receive a strong accession of members and subscribers. The monographs already referred to are issued free to every active member of the Committee and to all subscribers of £1 a year and upwards. The Committee has hitherto worked mainly on the eastern side of London, but the next area it will take up will be Chelsea.

THE King of the Belgians has just paid a special visit to the British Fine Art Section of the Brussels Exhibition. The King took great interest in the pictures, and discussed the progress of Art in England in recent years. He expressed himself extremely pleased with the collection sent to Brussels to represent the English School, which he characterised as "superb," and sent a warm message of congratulation by Mr. Spielmann, the honorary secretary, to the Fine Art Committee, and to those who had contributed their pictures.

If black and white were able to convey a true impression of an oil painting it would be unnecessary to visit the picture galleries at all, so numerous are the books of reproductions. But, fortunately (or unfortunately), they are not, although they serve well to recall to mind the paintings one has seen. Another has just been added to these little process exhibitions by the Studio, from whose offices three extra numbers will be published. The first is called Art at the New Gallery and the New English Art Club. The reproductions are good.

A LITTLE while ago we announced a work on London which is now in preparation by a poet and an artist. A smaller work, on somewhat similar lines, has just been published by Mr. Elkin Mathews. Its title is Thames Sonnets and Semblances. The sonnets are by Miss Margaret Armour, and though none is so fine as Wordsworth's "Westminster Bridge," with which, to some extent, they challenge comparison, they are interesting memorials of moods gathered by the river. The semblances, or, in plainer English, pictures, are by Mr. W. MacDougall, who, in "Morning at Lambeth," Lambeth, and "Looking East from Waterloo Bridge," has been most successful. There is room for such loving treatment of London as is displayed by these collaborators.

IT is so frequently and wrongly stated that Miss Kingsley, the traveller, is a daughter of the late Charles Kingsley, that this lady's true parentage may as well be recorded again. Miss Kingsley is not the daughter, but the niece of the late Charles Kingsley. She is the daughter of George Kingsley.

AFTER completing the History of the War of 1812, which will round off his series of books on "Sea Power," and bring the narrative down to the Peace of 1815, Capt. Mahan intends, at the suggestion of his publishers, to prepare a summary of the general subject on the same lines as those observed in the former works, but with a special view to its being used as a class-book in schools and colleges.

PROF. SULLY has revised his monograph on children—Studies in Childhood—to bring it more within the popular grasp. He has rewritten some chapters, added others, and introduced many new stories. The result, to be called Children's Ways, will virtually be a new work.

THE place of honour in Cosmopolis for June and July will be occupied by Mr. Joseph Conrad, the author of An Outcast of the Islands, who has written a characteristic two-part story, entitled "An Outpost of Progress." In the French section of the June number M. Bourget continues the tales of his "Voyageuses," with a sixth, called "Cyprès Toscans." This number will also be rich in reminiscences, among which may be mentioned an article by Mr. Felix Moscheles on Mazzini.

DR. SIGERSON has edited and compiled a collection of Irish verse called Bards of the Gael and Gall. Dr. Sigerson, who contributes a critical introduction of nearly a hundred pages, declares that "ancient Ireland was the mother of literatures." A photogravure portrait of the blind bard, Carolan will accompany the work, which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish on May 31.

MESSRS. FRANK HAES and I. ABRAHAM are about to publish the photographic reproductions of the illuminated MS. of the Passover Haggada in the possession of Lord Crawford. This MS. is not later than the fourteenth century, and is in many ways the finest specimen of its class. Lord Crawford has authorised the publication.

IN response to the demand for a cheaper edition of Butler's Analogy and Sermons, edited by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, the Clarendon Press is issuing a popular two-volume edition at half a guinea. This will be uniform in style with Mr. Gladstone's Studies Subsidiary to the Works of Butler.

MESSRS. MORISON BROTHERS, Glasgow, have for some time had in preparation a new History of the Cathedral and See of Glasgow. The subject has hitherto remained without adequate treatment, having been dealt with from time to time only in a partial and tentative manner, and in such essays as M'Lelland's and Pagan's. The new volume is under the general editorship of Mr. Eyre-Todd, and with a view to rendering the work a standard authority on the subject, each feature will be treated by a separate writer.

MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL & SON have in the press, and will publish early in June, a new literary reading-book, entitled The Temple Reader, which has been drawn up in such a manner as to render it serviceable for schools of all descriptions, as well as for home reading. The book has been prepared by Mr. Ernest E. Speight, and an introduction has been contributed by Prof. Edward Dowden, setting forth the aims of the volume and the advantages of an acquaintance with great writers as a most important part of education. Selections will be found from the literature of all times, ranging from Homer and Isaiah to Whitman and Ruskin, and including the chief names in English literature.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. will publish shortly a new novel, entitled Father Hilarion, by K. Douglas King, the author of The Scripture Reader of St. Mark's. The story depicts the struggle between asceticism and human passion.

MR. JOHN MACQUEEN will publish on June 1 Cabot's Discovery of North America by Mr. G. E. Weare.

CHARLES DICKENS

From the Picture by Ary Scheffer in the National Portrait Gallery

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXIX.—CHARLES DICKENS.

TO criticise Dickens adversely is easy. It is simple to bring against him, with all the damning proofs in array, the old charges of exaggeration and caricature. We may say again, for the thousandth time, that we did not quite understand the character of the gentleman (a point very interestingly discussed by the late R. L. Stevenson); that his women rarely are ladies; that his mannerisms become tedious; that his plots reek of the footlights; that his pathos is often false. All this is true enough; but when the mass of dross represented by these diminishes is cleared away, what a shining residuum of pure gold remains! What rich humour and lovingkindness, what sympathy and comprehension, what swashing blows against injustice and rapacity, what tender friendship for the poor and weak! What a man to thank God for! And then the splendour of Dickens's inventions, the lavishness of material that was his! It was the fashion in his day for novelists to be opious, but none can approach Dickens in the splendour of his generosity. He gave with both hands, recklessly. He poured forth his riches: he was a very cornucopia of plenty. Compared with one of his full-blooded stories, the most vigorous of our latter day novels is a poor, attenuated, anæmic thing. It may have more of art, it is true; but how much less of magnificent profusion? Dickens never offered his reader anything less than a banquet: the modern novelist asks them to dine frugally à la carte. That which he had, Dickens gave forth without thought of the morrow. To-day the novelist must keep something in reserve against his next commission.

For comic invention Dickens is never likely to be approached. That is his greatest triumph; verily to have created a new world of men and women, a comic world whose inhabitants are known to us more intimately than most of our real acquaintances. Many a man has passed Lord Salisbury in the street and has not recognised him; but who could meet Mr. Micawber without a sudden thrill of intimacy? Mr. Pickwick would be hailed as a friend in places where Sir Henry Irving's features are unfamiliar. The works of Dickens are a universe in little, in which the wise can instantly find relief from the stern realities of the larger universe in which they move. It is by his comic gifts that Dickens will endure. As years go on it is probable that he will be less and less read for the serious portions of his stories, and more and more for his humour.

The readers of the future will want their Dickens in smaller bulk. Even now it would not surprise us to see the announcement of an edition of the novels in which only the comic scenes were retained: a Martin Chuzzlewit pruned of everything but the sayings of Mrs. Gamp, the proceedings in the house of Todgers, and the more creamy of the Pecksniff passages; an Old Curiosity Shop in which Dick Swiveller and the Marchioness were the central characters, in place of Little Nell and her Grandfather; a Dombey and Son whose interest centres in the persons of Mr. Toots, Susan Nipper, the Game Chicken, Captain Cuttle, and the MacStingers; a Bleak House shorn of the Court of Chancery; and a Nicholas Nickleby whose essentials were Dotheboys Hall and John Browdie, Mr. Nickleby and Mr. Vincent Crummles, the Menwidges and Mr. Lillyvick. David Copperfield would probably stay almost as it is, for it has qualities as a story which in most of its companions are lacking: a convincing natural sequence of incident in place of the manufactured mosaic of events and character sketches which compose most the others. David Copperfield was so much more Dickens's own story: his invention was less severely taxed; hence David Copperfield alone of the Dickens novels can be read again for the story it tells. The others we read again and again, it is true; but we read them for the people in them rather than for the narrative. Pickwick also would stand as it was written. Pickwick is inviolable. In some future day an Oriental Max Müller will arise to include it in his edition of the sacred books of the West.

Our portrait is a reproduction of a painting made by Ary Scheffer when Dickens was forty-three.

SOME CHILD-CRITICS OF BROWNING.

A BOARD SCHOOL EXPERIMENT.

I HAVE before me some essays written by children in the Walworth Board Schools on the life and poetry of Robert Browning. They were prepared for a competition which culminated, less than a fortnight ago, in a distribution of honours, and my knowledge of the matter dates from the brief newspaper report of that ceremony. But it does not end with it. So much of Browning's mind had been hidden from the wise and prudent that it seemed to be worth while to discover how much had been revealed to babes; and I went to Walworth. There I found Mr. F. Herbert Stead in his large office in the Robert Browning Hall in York-street. With its rising shelves of books, its tables covered with papers, and its comfortable chairs for the committee, this room was alone an intimation of the work which Mr. Stead, the Warden of the Hall, and his fellow-workers of the Browning Settlement are carrying on in a dreary district. Mr. Stead spoke of working men who read "Abt Vogler" or "Paracelsus" with him, finding meanings that had escaped himself; of lectures and entertainments, of May Day festivals and summer outings, of Bible study, clubs, flower missions, and of many other agencies by which it is sought to let in light on the dark places of Walworth. And he said that the pivot, the magnet, the ever-useful pretext of it all was Browning's early connexion with the neighbourhood. Born in Camberwell young Browning came for years to worship with his parents in the Congregational Chapel which now, under the name of a hall, bears his name. Does not a placard—which the Warden hopes to convert one day into a marble tablet—point to the old Browning pew? Thanks to the Settlement the humblest folk in Walworth have learned the name at least of Robert Browning. It is true that many of them begin by taking the "Settlement" for a charitable fund, and coming forward to claim their "share," but their disillusionment is the beginning of good. And the children?

Mr. Stead explained this development. While taking a holiday in the Lake Country he discovered that the Rydal and Grasmere children are carefully instructed in Wordsworth's life and poetry, each child growing up with some knowledge and love of the poet. Why—he exclaimed to himself—not rear Walworth boys and girls on Browning? The idea dwelt with him, and on his return to Walworth Mr. Stead went round the Board schools and broached his idea to the teachers. "You are bound by the Code," he said, "to give a certain amount of instruction in English literature; why not take up Browning, who was born and bred in Walworth, and in whom, therefore, it will be easy to interest Walworth boys and girls?" The teachers saw the point, and the thing was done. One difficulty, that of expense, had disappeared in the nick of time. A capital selection of Browning's poems had just been included in Mr. W. T. Stead's "Penny Poets," and this became the text-book on which his brother's scheme depended. After many days, or, to be precise, a year, Mr. Stead wished to see if the bread he had cast upon the waters was still bread. He accordingly organised an essay competition, in which a large number of children in the various Walworth Board schools took part. The ages of the children so competing ranged from eleven to thirteen years.

Florence Legge, of the Sayer-street Girls' School, was awarded the prize. An idea of her essay will be gained in the following extracts from it: "Robert Browning," writes Florence, "... was born on May 7th, 1812, in Southampton-street, Camberwell. He was a handsome, fearless child, with a restless anxiety and a fiery temper. He clamoured for occupation as soon as he could speak. His mother could only keep him quiet by telling him stories (probably Bible stories) while holding him on her knee. He was very fond of animals throughout the whole of his life. He was very fortunate in having good parents. His mother was a Scotchwoman. Thomas Carlyle says that 'she was the type of a true Scottish gentlewoman.' Her son (Robert) said (with the honest pride of a good son) that 'she was divine,' while a gentleman friend of hers says that 'it was like heaven to be near her.'"

Florence's grasp of young Browning's home-life is quite equalled by her appreciation of his poetry.

"The poetry of Robert Browning is very different in style to that of any other English poet. He is very original. His poetry is real, and has entirely a new foundation. Browning's poems are difficult, and require a great deal of thought. . . . This great poet in all his poems teaches us to persevere and never to give up trying. . . . All great poets and writers are sent by God to deliver a message to us, which they do in the pleasant form of either poetry or prose. No poet or author is great unless he in his writings teaches the reader nobler ways of living. Browning, in his poems, teaches us to look after our souls, and not to let them die away. He teaches us to be cheerful, and to remember 'God's in His heaven, all's right with the world.'"

Florence deserved her prize, though, in her very last sentence, she jeopardised it by the statement that Mrs. Browning wrote three verses of poetry about her husband's death!

Nellie Redfern, of the King and Queen-street School, who is only eleven years old, puts down a number of simple facts very clearly and correctly. "The poet," she says, "received some of his finest inspirations while roaming through the Dulwich Woods."

A. Hollyman, who goes to school in Southampton-street, says that the poet "was a patriot of his country, and a great admirer of Italy for its arts." He also states that "Robert received some of his finest inspirations whilst roaming through the Dulwich Woods."

At the same school Edith Isard is studying the poet. She writes:

"We ought to be proud of having such a noble and clever man born in this district."

That is exactly what Mr. Stead wants every Walworth boy and girl to feel. Edith is strong on the local Browning; she says that the poet "loved to wander through the Dulwich Woods, where he composed several of his poems."

James Rawlings, of Victory-place School, fills in the story of Browning's boyhood with this interesting information:

"He was a very shy boy, and had been seen to run away and hide himself when he was not quite dressed. He always refused to drink his medicine unless he was bribed by a newt or a frog which was picked out of the strawberry bed in his garden."

Master Rawlings hardly touches on the grown-up Browning, but he, too, tells us that "some of his finest thoughts were received whilst roaming in the Dulwich Woods."

"'God's in His heaven, all's right with the world,' sang the poor mill-girl, and Browning truly believed this to the end of his life," writes Nita Laurie Drake, also of Victory-place School, Standard VII.; and she adds: "It was while walking through the fields and leafy lanes of Dulwich that many of his best ideas came into his mind." Browning's child-critics are doing more to bring out this fact than all the Browning Societies put together. W. W.

THE BOOK MARKET.

"WHAT HAST HERE? BALLADS?"

IT was in Endell-street that I asked, in a less Elizabethan form, the Clown's question to Autolycus. Endell-street is one of those curious nondescript streets which seem to exist to accommodate special buildings, shops, institutions. These streets repair the omissions of the district around them. They are not necessarily dedicated to lumber, but there is usually a lumber-room flavour about them. They are always interesting. You know Endell-street? It is almost, but not quite, in a line with Bow-street.

A little shop on the left side of the street, as you go north, has ere now attracted your eye by the display of old ballads which it makes in its window. Not old ballads only; for if you have an eye for shops and their meanings you must have smiled as you surveyed the stock which is here offered to the less affluent inhabitants of St. Giles's parish. It is a veritable village shop set down in the core of London. Here in little wire brackets eggs are peeping out among newspapers. Groceries, toys, and Eccles cakes mingle with penny fiction. Penny food and penny condiments dot the shelves, tiny bottles of sauce (the glory of a single dinner), and French capers, whatever they may be, in tiny quantities. Also there are pens and pencils, and stationery, and almanacs, and sweets for the youngsters; not town sweets, but sweets fit for a plough boy; none of your evanescent sugars, but great pebbly lolipops that require negotiating, aniseed bouncers, for instance, but—the Ballads!

The good woman of the shop was lading a pint of milk out of a great basin on the counter for a little girl, when I hinted that she had some old songs.

"Plenty," she said, and suspended the milk transaction to dump an irregular bundle of them, tied with old string, on the counter. They were a strange lot. They exhaled early Victorian jest and romance. I took them much as they came. The very top ballad of the bundle was sufficiently quaint. It was printed as a small broadside, with a large woodcut of a coach filled with the beaux and belles of fifty years ago. There were five beaux and five belles, the beaux all one side of the coach and the women on the other, all dressed alike, and sitting bolt upright without a sign that they were conscious of each other's presence. "Pleasure and Relaxation" was the title, and the merry thing opened with this verse:

"Oh, pomp and state bring nought but woe.
List to my song, and I will show
That all the high, as well as low,
Love pleasure and relaxation."

"The Duke of Wellington met one day
Sir Robert Peel, and said: 'I say,
I'm glad you, Bob, have come in my way,
To go to Greenwich fair so gay.'
Said Bob: 'Why, Arthur, just like you,
With long debates my brain's askew,
And so I don't care if I do,
For pleasure and relaxation.'
Oh, pomp, &c."

The Duke and Sir Robert did not go alone, for, by a happy accident:

"They had only got to Parliament Street
When Lord Broom they chanced to meet,
And he agreed to join the treat,
For pleasure and relaxation.
They got in a cart—began to joke—
Wellington with a short did smoke,
Which did Sir Robert much provoke.
'You're not in a campaign now,' said Peel,
'Though there you had smoke—a very great deal.
You should take a segar—'tis more genteel,
For pleasure and relaxation.'
Oh, pomp, &c."

How they went to Greenwich Fair—picking up Dan O'Connell and Joseph Hume on the way—how they "talked to the pretty girls fair and dark," and "did regale," aye, and danced, you shall know in Endell-street for a halfpenny. Hume didn't dance, but made a speech—"for pleasure and relaxation."

"And as his noise he would not cease,
And not for nobody keep the peace,
In walk'd some of the new police,
And walk'd him off without release;
Whilst Wellington hit out left and right,
Dan O'Connell slunk out of sight,
And said as he went 'I never fight.'"

There were more happenings, but another effusion had caught n. eye. It was "Sammy Slap the Bill Sticker." Sammy puts into rhyme his pride of calling, and enumerates his achievements to the chorus of

"With my paste, paste, paste,
All the world is puffing, so I paste, paste,
paste."

And there do not seem to have been many places where Sammy could not "paste, paste, paste."

"Round Nelson's Statty, Charing Cross, when
anything's the go, sirs,
You'll always find me at my post, a-sticking up the posters.
I've hung Macready twelve feet high, and
tho' it may seem funny,
Day after day against the walls I've plastered
Mrs. Honey

With my paste, &c.

"In search of houses old and new I'm always on the caper,
And wery kindly gives 'em all a coat or two
of paper;
I think I've kiver'd all the walls round
London, though I preach it,
If they'd let me kiver old St. Paul's so help me bob, I'd reach it.

With my paste, &c."

What a trial Sammy would have been to the Kyrle Society!

Customers still came in to buy small articles and prolong my leisure. I glanced through an old ballad called "The Comic Divan." For Divan read Museum. You have paid your penny and had your peep. Well?

"Did you e'er see the Lord Mayor sup on a mutton chop?
Did you e'er see a bull row a boat, Sirs?
Did you e'er see a Minister spinning a top,
Or Lord Brougham a-turning his coat, Sirs?
"Did you e'er see St. Paul's in a new pair of shoes,
Or a married man given to roam, Sirs?
Did you e'er see a donkey when reading the news,
Or Lord Melbourne dining at home, Sirs?
"Did you e'er see Wellington roasting a duck.
Or blind people leading the blind, Sirs?
Did you e'er see a Jew who was drawing a truck,
And a Quaker a-pushing behind, Sirs?"

It was a good-sized bundle of ballads that I at last stuffed into my pocket. "Do you mean to tell me," I said, "that you have a sale for these old-fashioned things?"

"Ah—old-fashioned—that's just it, sir. Yes, we have."

"Well, but who round here wants these ballads in preference to the latest music-hall songs?"

"Plenty, sir. Why, we have folks coming miles and miles for them. They will have 'em. We've had to send them to all parts of the world, and Hong Kong. People out abroad get writing to their friends: 'Will you get me that good old song?—whatever it is—something they used to hear when they were boys and girls in the old country, I guess; and, believe me, sir, their relations come miles to get 'em what they want."

"And who else buys?"

"Well, the clergy come and turn 'em over a lot."

"And do you see people who are really attached to these songs?"

"Attached! You've hit it, sir. Why, last evening I had a man in, a real white-haired old gentleman, with a hacking cough, and he wanted a song called 'The Big Meat Pie.' I never heard of it, and he looked for it a long, long time, but it wasn't there. 'The Big Meat Pie' was the title of it, sir, but I told him I never heard of it. He was disappointed. Daresay he did want it."

ART.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC ART AT THE GRAFTON GALLERY.

"DRAMATIC Art" (the rather ill-chosen description of the pictorial illustration of dramatic art) is, generally speaking, deplorable. It is all most interesting—as precious as an old play-bill, and with more to tell; but as art it sounds the depths of one of the most desperate of the many decadences that the history of painting and design have undergone. The downfall of everything in the first of the dark ages, and the childishness without a future that made strange paltry old age of the world before Christian art grew really young with Cimabue, was hardly a stranger sequel to the art of antiquity than the illustrations of the early century were to the art of Reynolds and Gainsborough. There are many savage nations that have more spirit and sense of design, more promise, and more observation, than England had in those days that were so near to her triumphs. Illustrations and current sketches of popular drama were not, we are well aware, practised by the painters of whom the country was like to boast; but all the more is such work a sign of the state of the general feeling and general criticism. The penny fan is not decorated by an artist of whom Japan makes much, but we take it as a national sign. There are extant little books giving portraits of the actors and actresses of 1825 and onwards, and nothing quite so bad is to be found among the uncivilised. Gross drawing, stupid feeling, the incapacity for character or beauty or humour, though there is an incessant illusion that what will pass for prettiness has been captured, and that what may be taken for fun abounds; these are only a few of the marks of English ordinary illustrations and character-portraits at one time of the nineteenth century. A great quantity of this art has been collected at the Grafton Gallery, and it is the most curious and distinctive part of the exhibition.

With regard to the serious art on view there, some few of the dramatic portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds give a high note, but it is not sustained. It is evident that the inevitable difficulties of a loan exhibition have hampered the collection over much; but where a famous picture was not to be had, shift has been made to show an engraving or a coloured sketch copy. In one way and another, and with the help of a great number of odds and ends, the exhibition has been made a delightful one, and old playgoers may remember their youth there and their fathers' stories of a youth before theirs. The exception to these records is perhaps Macready. There are two or three portraits—minor ones—of Macready, but there is little or nothing in the way of evidence as to what Macready did on the scene before he ran off and knocked people down in the wings on his way to his dressing-room. Macready filled the stage, if not in our fathers' eyes, in those of their fathers, and we are as credulous about him as children. We are not children in regard to Edmund Kean, nor in regard to Mrs. Siddons or to Garrick, for of these we have read and not heard.

Doubtless a man's contemporaries are important to him. But for Sir Joshua Reynolds we should never have had a glimpse of Garrick's eyes. For Zoffany, who painted him again and again, has rescued nothing of their fire. Nor would it be easy to imagine a more insignificant Macbeth than David makes in the large grasp of Mrs. Pritchard as Lady Macbeth (in the picture lent by Messrs. Colnaghi). And the famous Garrick of Hogarth, shown here by Lord Londonderry, is quite undramatic. This is the well-known sloping figure of Richard III. waking from his dream in camp; the accessories—especially the erected crucifix—slope in the same direction; Richard's hand is inexpressively thrust out; and, altogether, the composition, if one may say so of Hogarth, lacks a grip of the ground, and the expression does not go very far. The best Garrick portraits are the well-known Gainsborough, which shows the actor with his arm round Shakespeare's bust—the property of the Corporation of Stratford-on-Avon—and Lord Sackville's picture, in which Garrick is sitting over a prologue with the look of intelligence—not intellect—full in his vivid face. The "Garrick between Tragedy and Comedy" is represented by a copy. Of Mrs. Peg Woffington we get no very charming impression. All the portraits here and at the National Portrait Gallery agree in their report of a rather bleak, bald face, hard and unchangeable. Of Mrs. Abington we get all the presence and personality in Sir Joshua's beautiful picture (lent by Mrs. Hollins), showing the round, blunt features, very far from common and very far from dull. But no actress makes a better figure than Miss Mellon (Duchess of St. Albans) in Mr. Pawle's picture by Romney. Without rich and generous beauty Romney seems to have painted no woman, but to Miss Mellon he has given the character of her own fine and peculiarly well-contented face. "Mrs. Michael Angelo Taylor as Miranda," painted by Hoppner (Lord Londonderry), looks at the first glance like a fine Shannon; even in the refined devices of colour—the delicate blue in the powder-grey hair—some picture of Mr. Shannon's seems to be strongly recalled.

One of the loveliest of all Gainsborough portraits is the "Miss Linley (Mrs. Sheridan) and Her Brother," which the owner, Lord Sackville, has allowed to be seen more than once of late. Nathaniel Dance has painted the same beauty with her husband and child; this is not a fine picture, but it is interesting. The lenders are Messrs. Turner and Horsley. Actresses of our own day have been much less lucky as the sitters of Mr. Long, Mr. Sant, and Mr. Collier. Nor was Mme. Vestris fortunate whom Sir Thomas Lawrence sentimentalised. At the head of the pictures of our time stand easily Mr. Whistler's "Sir Henry Irving as Philip," Mr. Sargent's "Miss Ellen Terry as Lady Macbeth," the curiously characteristic and delicately coloured "Coquelin Cadet" of M. Dagnan Bouveret, that very well-known and brilliantly simple piece of work, "M. Coquelin as Don César de Bazan," Mr. Shannon's sensitive and charming monochrome of "Joseph Hoffman" in profile at the piano, and his seated full-face of "M. Hollman," of which the glass allows us to see not much except the large masses of the painting of the head and hair and the action of the expressive hands at the violoncello. Mr. Herman Herkomer's portrait of "Mr. Beorbohm Tree as Gringoire" is an outbreak of energy that would merit to be called violent but for the real sweep of gesture; at any rate, it nearly takes the unprepared spectator off his feet, and that is more than one asks even of "dramatic art." Mr. Herman Herkomer is a painter of talent, and his work is far from vulgar; which cannot be said of some too conspicuous full-lengths near at hand, painted as no man untrained and untaught could paint them, but as cheap, after all is done, as an image in a very common kind of looking-glass.

It is not among these Academy pictures, but in the further gallery, among the cases of autographs and the intrinsically valueless old sketches and illustrations, that most time is spent. Here you may see how exceedingly foolish the great Liston would have been if he had acted as he seemed to a contemporary artist to act, how entirely undramatic everyone on the stage appears drawn by the cleverest hands of the time, how vulgar Taglioni, how dreary the beauty, how dull the comedian, how lifeless the group in action, and how hideous a Vestris can be if a George Cruikshank should get hold of her. It is not "art" that makes the relic; and, after the grotesque grimaces on the walls, it is a pleasure to turn to the autographs, locks of hair, and cuffs of lace in the cases. "Admit two to the boxes" in Garrick's handwriting attempts no art, nor does the play-bill of the first performance of "A School for Scandal." A long letter of Edmund Kean's shows a hand impetuous enough to satisfy the experts in handwriting. The truth is, that character is written out at full in every letter, but that there is no one in the world who can read it. "Every line has its spirit." In the beautiful hand of Charles Dickens is a letter describing, in the usual tone of too much vivacity, how he cheered up Macready with a little acting in the sick room. Charles Dickens also describes his impression of the beauty of Miss Kate Terry's acting. The little green shoes of Miss O'Neill are here, and here the announcement, in 1812, that Mrs. Siddons would play no more, and the play-bill, in 1819, of what was in fact her last appearance. Perhaps the royal playbills, "printed on satin with bullion fringe," of recent and not illustrious plays might have been omitted. But the directors of this amusing exhibition are to be congratulated not so much on their selection as on the wise impartiality with which they have collected. There is nothing connected with the theatre that does not gain some charm from mere time—which may make amends for the dulness of the present.

A. M.

DRAMA.

ALTHOUGH Shakespeare is never long out of the bills, there may be something a little forced or fictitious in his present outbreak at the West-end theatres. The great Shakespearean characters are a standard to which the popular actor finds it convenient to resort from time to time to measure his artistic stature, to assure himself and perhaps his admirers that all is well with him, that his popularity has a substantial basis, and so on. Certain fossil plays like "The Hunchback" owe their occasional appearance to no other reason than that they enable a modern débutante to tread in the very footsteps of a Helen Faucit. Accordingly there is no need to look for a commercial explanation of Mr. Wilson Barrett's production of "Othello" for his last week's occupancy of the Lyric Theatre, or for Miss Janet Achurch's sudden transition from Ibsen to "Antony and Cleopatra." The demand for such revivals comes not from without, but from within, the theatre. Doubtless Mr. Ben Greet's season at the Olympic is an exception. It is an honest attempt to see whether Shakespeare will take at popular prices without "stars," without mounting, without music, without "editing," without new readings, without any of the artificial props and stays by which he is wont to be sustained at the Lyceum and other fashionable theatres. He has not always so taken. He "spelt ruin" to a famous management at Drury Lane. But every now and again the public conscience re-awakens with regard to the "national bard," as it pleases the profession to call him, and in that happy circumstance Mr. Ben Greet's enterprise may find its reward. They have also been playing "The Merchant of Venice," I see, with much acceptance, at the Novelty, which, of course, is only topographically speaking a West-end theatre. Apropos of this, a captious critic notes that when the music sounded to enable Bassanio to make a swan-like end, the band played "Onward, Christian soldiers." I was not there, but I am quite prepared to learn that this music produced the desired effect. Why not? It is no more modern than the accent and manner of the performers themselves, whose un-Venetian quality, even at the best theatres, never disturbs the erudite observer. Truly a great deal of nonsense is talked and written about place and period in the drama. What did they play in Venice in the fifteenth century as an intermezzo? And supposing that to be ascertainable, how would it appeal to a Cockney public in Great Queen-street?

Mr. Wilson Barrett's "Othello," like his "Virginius," is sufficiently strong and original to stand him, professionally, in good stead. He would not be the ambitious actor-manager that he is if he did not attempt something that the genius of Garrick, Kean, Macready, Fechter and the rest never dreamt of. If Sir Henry Irving as Iago can pick his teeth with his dagger, surely it is permissible in a brand-new Othello to destroy the popular delusion that Desdemona was smothered with a pillow! Mr. Wilson Barrett teaches us that the Moor finished off his luckless spouse with a dagger. Over Desdemona's end there hangs a certain amount of obscurity which is always admitted, on the stage, by its being compassed behind a curtain. The known fact is, that Othello visits his wife's bed-chamber with murder in his heart. Would he, therefore, come armed? Probably. And if so, what more natural than that his chosen weapon should be a dagger? Assuredly Desdemona, although apprehensive, sees no weapon. That her language attests. Then Othello's first onset is ineffectual, since Desdemona after a short pause gives signs of life—a circumstance favourable to the suffocation or choking theory. It is at this point that Mr. Barrett's novel interpretation comes in. Hearing his lady's groans, the new Othello resolves to put her out of pain, and flashing his dagger he again passes behind the fatal curtain. Nothing more natural, I repeat, than this business with the dagger, except that Desdemona, still not dead, after a pause, calls out again. "Stifling" or "smothering," according to the stage directions, which vary in the different editions, might be a doubtful sort of death, whereas a dagger in the practised hand of the Moor, and with his impelling vigour of jealousy, ought to be sure and swift. Up to this point the presumption is rather against the dagger. But then, Othello, being about to kill himself, speaks of having "another weapon" handy—a Spanish sword, which he forthwith produces, the dagger, we may suppose, being left sticking in Desdemona's bosom. On the whole, this dagger theory is plausible enough, especially as it does not in the least matter to the dramatic value of the play how the misjudged heroine meets her death.

Two more innovations in the performance call for notice: Mr. Barrett's Othello has a "counterfeit presentment" of Desdemona—in other words, an excellent portrait of Miss Maud Jeffries as Desdemona, to which he addresses himself in his paroxysms of love and jealousy, and which, in one vehement passage, he is on the point of slashing with his dagger. This is a piece of "business" that strikes me as lacking in sincerity. Would a jealous husband rave and gesticulate before his wife's portrait? Not, I fancy, unless, like Mr. Barrett's Othello, he were on the stage. The fond lover might certainly caress a portrait of the loved one, but in a fume, would his fancy play round it to the same extent? Hardly. There is more to be said for lightening Othello's complexion, as Mr. Barrett does, from the coal-black of the Christy Minstrel, which is the traditional hue of the Moor of Venice, to a chocolate brown. I am one of those who shudder at the thought of so fair and gentle a creature as Desdemona suffering the embraces of a blackamoor. I have never tolerated the negro Othello, whom so excellent a critic as the German Schlegel believed to be intended by Shakespeare. And this not on Desdemona's account alone. Would they have tolerated a negro generalissimo of the forces in Venice? Othello ought to be a shade or two darker than his fellow-officers, but we need not suppose him to be swarthier than a Saracen of the North of Africa, the hero of the tale upon which the play is founded; and this would justify the complexion adopted by Mr. Barrett. In dressing the Moor very simply, again, Mr. Barrett seems to me to be commendably rational. Lord Beaconsfield in one of his novels suggests that Othello's costume ought to be that of a Venetian magnifico of the fifteenth century, and this is also Sir Henry Irving's idea. But, for my part, I find a blaze of colour disturbing to the human interest of the character, while the Oriental draperies affected by the tradition-bound actor are certainly wrong, making of Othello, as they do, a sort of Bluebeard.

On its spiritual or moral side the embodiment is naturally limited by the actor's means—that is, by conditions of physique, manner, voice. It is always so; and that is why we have as many Othellos as there are actors essaying the part, and why they all differ from the critic's own particular Othello, which he, poor man, sets up as the best. Mr. Barrett's Othello is the lithe, active, excitable Southerner, with no sort of ponderosity about him. I have seen his prototype walking about in the streets of Seville and Granada, where after two centuries of incubation the Moorish blood is still strong. This rendering of the character gives us human interest, though it precludes greatness. The "calmness and grandeur" which the higher criticism has assigned to Othello in certain moods are difficult to attain in practice. Edmund Kean himself failed in Hazlitt's opinion to rise to the sublimest heights, and it need not be a reproach to Mr. Barrett that he has not done so. After all, tenderness is, in the main, a question of voice, accent, intonation; and nervousness is apt to rob an actor of his best effects in that respect on a first night. I have no doubt but that Mr. Barrett played Othello better in his study than he did on the boards, and that he has a still better conception of the part than he has been able to set before us, excellent as that is in the practical workaday aspect of human nature. The Iago of the cast is Mr. McLeay, a young American actor of marked ability in "character" parts. He gives us a dainty, mincing, elegant, dandified Iago, who appears to be actuated less by a deep fiendish hate than by a sort of feminine spitefulness.

I do not care for Miss Achurch's Cleopatra. It has been said that the Ibsen drama makes commonplace actors great. I am afraid it also spoils them for any other class of work, including the best. Miss Elizabeth Robins was a very useful actress in a general way until she took to Ibsen; and Miss Achurch is going the same road. The staccato utterance, the "pig's whisper," the soulful stare go very well with Ibsen. In Shakespeare, who is all nature and common sense, they put one out. J. F. N.

SCIENCE.

SCIENCE, as well as art, has suffered by the death of Sir A. W. Franks; and the nation has lost one of its most laborious and generous servants, as the long rows of admirably arranged cases in the British Museum show, with the ever-recurring label, "Franks Collection." On one occasion, it is related, when Sir A. W. Franks particularly wished the Government to effect purchases for the museum he loved so well, he offered to present works of art up to the value of what they expended. The anecdote has an unpleasant side to it. It shows how mean and parsimonious the Government is, in the eyes of those who are responsible for our art treasures, if such a bribe is necessary in order to induce it to spend money.

SIR A. W. FRANKS developed early in life the taste for mediæval antiquities on which he was such an authority. His own collections included rings, porcelain, pottery, enamels, Japanese and Chinese works of art, drinking vessels, gold ornaments, prehistoric relics and bookplates. The latter formed probably his latest love, and though he himself is credited with the finest collection in England, he has done much to foster one of the silliest crazes extant, poster-collecting always barred. In addition to the extensive and valuable contributions which Sir A. W. Franks continually made to the department of the museum under his charge, he had a talent for organisation which it will be difficult again to match. The rapidity with which he could arrange a new gallery was phenomenal, and once done it was complete in every detail, not needing to be revised and altered at intervals. The outside public, which is given to troubling on small pretext and addicted to silly questions, stood much in awe of Sir Wollaston Franks, who worked devotedly in its interests, but objected to come into personal contact with it.

A NEW exhibition of Silchester remains has just been opened at the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries, in Burlington House, representing the past season's excavations. A large number of interesting objects is to be seen, among other things some iron collars which were found laid in a cutting, and which had evidently formed the joints of a wooden conduit. A similar discovery was made more than a century ago in France, at a place called Chatelet, where an old Roman town had existed. Otherwise, this form of conduit is probably unique so far as present excavations have gone.

DETAILED announcements are now being made with reference to the forthcoming meeting of the British Association at Toronto. Canada itself is making special efforts to act up to the occasion, which it properly regards as a compliment paid by the mother country. Many American societies have also fixed to have their summer meetings in or near Canada, so as to allow of their members joining the British Association afterwards. The Governor-General and Lady Aberdeen will hold a reception for the members of the Association, and a public banquet will be given in honour of Lord Kelvin, Lord Lister the President, and Sir John Evans the President-Elect of the Association. Among the excursions will, of course, be one to Niagara, under the direction of Mr. G. K. Gilbert, of the U.S. Survey, and other places of interest which will be visited are the Muskoka Lakes, the Don Valley, with its remarkable geological formations, and Scarborough Heights, famous for fossil beds. The Canadian Pacific Railway have arranged to convey members to and from the Pacific coast at an extremely moderate rate. A handbook containing full information on the country and its resources will shortly be published.

THE Friday evening discourses at the Royal Institution afford a curious meeting-ground for science and fashion, the combination dating from the birth of the Institution, and carrying on the tradition which was started by its founder, Count Rumford. On Friday last an unusual number of people assembled to hear Lord Kelvin lecture on "Contact Electricity," a treat not often accorded nowadays—except in connexion with patent cases. Lord Kelvin's theme was a glorification of Volta, whose early experiments on the electrical charge produced when two dissimilar metals are brought into contact and then separated were, he said, both correct and correctly explained. The text-books had since done their best to stultify Volta by giving all sorts of absurd explanations of the phenomenon. Lord Kelvin also showed some photographs taken with the fluorescent light given off by uranium, and described some of the properties of this metal, which formed an interesting study in the hands of the late M. Becquerel.

H. C. M.

MUSIC.

OPERA AND CONCERTS.

SATURDAY was the first great night at the opera house. Lohengrin was performed under the direction of Mr. Anton Seidl, and with an exceptionally fine cast. It is usual to speak of the conductor last, but I must mention him first. Mr. Seidl has not appeared in London since—many seasons ago—he conducted the Ring des Nibelungen at the old, Her Majesty's, theatre. He was then well versed in Wagner's music; time and experience have, however, matured his gifts. He displays life, vigour, and marked intelligence; his beat is firm and clear; and he knows how to make his presence felt in the orchestra and on the stage. This is not the moment to compare him with other conductors who have made special study of Wagner; for the present it is sufficient to know that when he is at the head of the orchestra the Bayreuth master's music will be in good hands. Miss Eames sang well, and her acting, if not ideal, was certainly better than usual; the company by which she was surrounded probably exercised a stimulating influence over her. Miss Marie Brema's impersonation of Ortrud was exceedingly fine. Her declamation is powerful, her facial movements are most expressive, and her gestures always appropriate. The art may not always be perfectly concealed, but her natural gifts are great, and she will rise still higher. M. J. de Reske made his first appearance this season; he was in splendid voice, and achieved a brilliant success; his brother, as the king, was dignified as actor and impressive as singer. Mr. David Bispham impersonated Telramund with force and wonderful touches of realism; he must have made a deep study of the part.

MR. EUGEN D'ALBERT played last week at the Philharmonic a Concerto of his own composition, one which had already been heard at the Crystal Palace. This Concerto is not so dry as the Sonata of which I spoke last week, but the music leaves a very vague impression; and, curiously, so far as the solo part is concerned, it is certainly not highly effective. The pianist, however, afterwards performed Weber's Concertstück in F minor and major, and in this comparatively short piece he had a fine opportunity for displaying all his best qualities: there was delicacy without effeminacy, vigour without harshness, and intellect tempered by emotion. A truly magnificent rendering was, however, marred by a few virtuosic additions to Weber's text. If there was any gain in effect—which I much doubt—it was obtained by unlawful means. M. d'Albert is certainly one of the greatest pianists of the day; and he ought therefore to set a better example.

On the following afternoon he gave his second and last recital at St. James's Hall, when he played Beethoven's last two Sonatas (Op. 110 and Op. 111). His reading of both works was admirable, although I must confess I should have liked greater tenderness in the closing page of the C Minor, a Sonata, by the way, which sets one thinking of "The Tempest" almost as much as Op. 57.

THE programme of the first Richter concert last Monday included a Symphonic Poem by the young Capellmeister Richard Strauss, whose music has attracted considerable attention in his own country and abroad. As in his former tone-poems, so in the present one, entitled "Don Juan," the composer indicates the source whence he sought inspiration. The music is intended to illustrate a dramatic poem by Lenau.

No detailed programme, however is given, so that it must be judged from an abstract point of view. Some of the thematic material, if not strikingly original, is undoubtedly interesting, and the workmanship and orchestral treatment are, as one might expect, of a high order. But the work leaves one cold. It is scarcely fair to sum up new music after a first hearing, yet there is no harm in recording first impressions. This, indeed, is part of a critic's work; another part is to acknowledge any modification of opinion which he may experience later on. So far as I am acquainted with the music of Strauss, I feel that the manner is better than the matter.

The Tchaikowsky Pathetic Symphony—which, unfortunately for the novelty, was placed before it—was interpreted by Richter with his accustomed skill and earnestness; and again the work exerted its great power. During the second movement Richter ceased to conduct. It was a curious experiment, but it is to be hoped that conductors of lesser fame will not imitate him. Richter's men can be guided by eye as well as arm; the conductor always looks at his men, and they at him.

On Tuesday evening Saint-Saëns' third Violin Concerto was played at the Queen's Hall, and half an hour later at St. James's Hall. The first violinist was M. Emile Sauret, who interpreted the music with the skill and perfection of a master for whom difficulties have ceased to exist, and with the lightness and charm which it so imperatively demands. Miss Irma Sethe, the second interpreter, also displayed skill; she is, however, at the outset of her artistic career, and many excellent qualities which she possesses have not, as yet, been raised to their highest power. Then, too, she is, I am happy to say, exceedingly earnest, and the Concerto, a clever and often effective work, must not be taken too seriously. M. Sauret seemed to leave the music to speak for itself, Miss Sethe to be trying to get more out of it than was actually in it. German music at present suits her better than French; she is attracted by the subjective rather than by the ornamental.

MME. BLANCHE MARCHESI came, sang, and conquered. There may be points in her reading of this or that song with which one does not agree, but her pure singing, her fine declamation, her simplicity, her earnestness carry all before them. Whatever she sings is sure to give pleasure, though, of course, the finer the song the greater that pleasure. The way in which she adapts herself to various kinds of music is quite astonishing. She can interpret the light, graceful, or even humorous; also music which demands pathos and passion; it is, however, in the latter kind that I admire her most. At her first recital, on May 14, her programme was excellent, far better, indeed, than the one she gave the following week. Mme. Marchesi seems particularly fond of French songs, but her first selection was more effective than the second. "Le Rêve de Jésus," by Mme. P. Viardot, begins well, though it becomes melodramatic and weak. The Marie Antoinette song likewise did not prove attractive. Then in the matter of variety the second programme left, as the French say, something to desire. I am writing frankly, for with such an accomplished vocalist it seems a pity that the programmes should not be of the best. Could not Mme. Marchesi give us more of Schubert and Brahms? Herr Bramsen, a clever performer on the violoncello, played solos at both concerts, yet they did not offer the right relief.

Mr. Bird displayed great ability at the pianoforte, and Mme. Marchesi must be glad to have such support. In many items of the two programmes his task was something more than mere accompanying.

J. S. S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE FATHER OF THE PIANOFORTE.

London: May 22.

In the south walk of the beautiful old cloisters of Westminster Abbey there is a simple gravestone lying flat on the ground, bearing the following memorable inscription:

"Muzio Clementi, called
the Father of the Pianoforte;
his fame as a musician and composer acknowledged throughout Europe procured him the honour of a public interment
in this cloister.
Born at Rome 1752.
Died at Evesham 1832."

This tomb, which ought to be held dear and sacred by every true musician, and which I myself have reverentially visited on countless occasions, has now become so worn and dilapidated that it is with difficulty that one can decipher the inscription which I have just quoted. A complete renovation of this plain slab covering the remains of the immortal Muzio Clementi is therefore urgently needed, and I trust that the restoration may be taken in hand by the Westminster Abbey authorities without further delay.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

SHELLEY'S PORTRAITS.

Paris: May 24.

It would be of some interest to admirers of Shelley to know whether the portrait of the poet published in the last issue of the ACADEMY is that mentioned by Trelawny in his Recollections of the Last Days of Shelley and Byron as by Clint. The exquisite lithographic copy by Vintner of Clint's portrait in the volume before me does not coincide in every detail with the drawing photographed by H. H. Hay Cameron, but the general impression obtained from each is the same. As Trelawny says, Shelley never sat to a professional artist: "In 1819, at Rome, a daughter of the celebrated Curran began a portrait of him in oil, which she never finished, and left in an almost flat and inanimate state. In 1821 or 1822, his friend Williams made a spirited water-colour drawing, which gave a very good idea of the poet. Out of these materials Mrs. Williams, on her return to England after the death of Shelley, got Clint to compose a portrait, which the few who knew Shelley in the last year of his life thought very like him. The water-colour drawing has been lost, so that the portrait done by Clint is the only one of any value." Trelawny adds that Vintner's copy of Clint's portrait is published for the first time in the Recollections—namely, in 1858.

FREDERIC LEES.

HURST & BLACKETT'S LIST.

TO BE PUBLISHED IN A FEW DAYS.
In 1 vol., demy 8vo, with Portrait of Author, 12s.

AN OLD SOLDIER'S MEMORIES.

By S. H. JONES-PARRY, J.P., D.L.,
Late Captain Royal Dublin Fusiliers,
Author of "My Journey Round the World," &c.

NEW EDITION, CONDENSED, REVISED, AND WITH MUCH NEW MATERIAL.

Now ready at all Booksellers, in 1 vol., large crown 8vo, with Portrait of Lady Hamilton, gilt top, 6s.

LADY HAMILTON AND LORD NELSON.

AN HISTORICAL BIOGRAPHY.

Based on Letters and other Documents in the Morrison Collection.

By JOHN CORDY JEAFFRESON,
Author of "The Real Lord Byron," &c.

NEW SPORTING SKETCHES BY FINCH MASON.

Now ready, in 1 vol., large crown 8vo, with 6 Coloured Plates and Illustrated Title-Page drawn especially for this Work by the Author, extra cloth, 7s. 6d.

THE TAME FOX, and other

Sketches. By FINCH MASON, Author of "Flowers of the Hunt," &c.

"Mr. Finch Mason writes with equal facility and effect the pen and the pencil: his narratives are full of 'go' and spirit."—Globe.
"As enjoyable a book of horse stories as has been written for many a day."—Scotsman.
"To all with a turn for sport I say emphatically procure 'The Tame Fox.'"—Whitehall Review.

NEW WORK BY WALTER WOOD.

Now ready at all Booksellers' and Libraries, in 1 vol., large crown 8vo, with Frontispiece, gilt top, price 6s.

FAMOUS BRITISH WARSHIPS

and their COMMANDERS. By WALTER WOOD,
Author of "Barraclough and Battlefield," &c.

"The author has been minutely careful about what he tells us that the three hundred pages are crammed with facts to which anyone may refer with confidence. The book is a capital and stirring one, and reflection upon it fills us with hope in our naval future."—Admiral Colonel in the Sea-faring Service.

NEW and POPULAR NOVELS.

NEW NOVEL BY DR. GEORGE MAC DONALD.

Ready on Tuesday next, June 1st, in 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.

SALTED with FIRE. By George MAC DONALD, LL.D., Author of "Robert Falconer," "Sir Gibbie," &c.

A FLAME of FIRE. By Mrs. H. R. HAWES, Author of "The Art of Beauty," "Chances for Children," "The Bride's Garland," &c. 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"A Flame of Fire" deserves commendation for a certain picturesque and vigour of writing, for strongly-conceived incident, and for the bold incisiveness of its descriptive passages."—Globe.

BROKEN THREADS. By Compton

READE, Author of "Take Care Whom You Trust," "Who Was Then the Gentleman," &c. 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"There is bright comedy all through Mr. Compton Reade's story, with just so much serious incident as is necessary to keep the book from being frivolous or trifling."—Scotsman.

THE SILENCE BROKEN. By G. M.

ROBINS (Mrs. BAILLIE REYNOLDS), Author of "The Ides of March," "Her Point of View," &c. 1 vol., small crown 8vo, 2s.

"An interesting little character-sketch, involving a ghost story of real charm and pathos. Mrs. Robins's style has distinction and force, and does lay her colours on too thickly."—Pall Mall Gazette.

WITHOUT ISSUE. By Henry Cress-

WELL, Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine," "A Willy Widow," &c. 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"A well-constructed plot, involved, but never passing the limitations of probability; a very excellent piece of work in every respect."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The writer well understands the value of an interesting chapter to a work of fiction, and, having aroused the attention of the reader at the outset, Mr. Cresswell holds him absorbed to the end."—Dundee Advertiser.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET, W.

The Doom of the Cedar Pencil Fountain Pens and Stylos :

The objections to them, and how they have been met.

The cedar pencil, it appears, has received its death-blow. We are so accustomed to regard it as one of the things which are a matter of course, that for many years no attempt was made to improve it, until the other day there appeared on the market something which so obviously excels the cedar pencil in every possible way that the extinction of the latter can only be a matter of time.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Paper Pencil is of the same size and presents the same appearance as an ordinary pencil, the only difference is that the cedar-wood is replaced by tightly rolled paper, divided off into sections by little round marks down the side of the pencil. When the latter wants sharpening, all you have to do is to pick up the edge of the paper-covering with a pin, or the point of a knife, and unravel a section of it, until it breaks off itself, by which time a fresh piece of lead is exposed, and the pencil ready for continued use. The advantages of the Blaisdell Pencil are so obvious, that nobody who has ever seen it will ever use a cedar pencil again. To begin with, it lasts about three times as long as a cedar pencil, none of the lead being broken in cutting. Then the point is always perfectly conical—can't be otherwise: the fingers are not soiled with blacklead nor the place littered with chips in sharpening it, and the latter operation takes but five seconds to accomplish. The Blaisdell Paper Pencil is already being sold by many stationers; it costs twopence, which makes it much cheaper to use than any penny pencil on the market; and the lead is much better than any twopenny pencil ever sold. The blue and red Blaisdell Pencils (which cost 3d.) are even more superior to cedar ones than the black, because ordinary coloured pencils are more prone to break in sharpening. A set of specimens can be had (post free in the United Kingdom) for a shilling from the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL COMPANY, Limited, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C., on application.

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

THE ANCIENT HEBREW TRADITION as ILLUSTRATED by the MONUMENTS. A Protest against the Modern School of Old Testament Criticism. By Dr. FRITZ HOMMEL, Professor of the Semitic Languages in the University of Munich. Translated from the German by EDMUND MCCLURE, M.A., and LEONARD CROSSLE. With Map. Large post 8vo, buckram boards, 5s.

Deals from an entirely new point of view with the Graf-Wellhausen position, and shows that it is utterly untenable.

OUTLINES of the HISTORY of the THEOLOGICAL LITERATURE of the CHURCH of ENGLAND from the REFORMATION to the CLOSE of the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. The Bishop Paddock Lectures. By JOHN DOWDEN, D.D., Bishop of Edinburgh. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s.

DIOCESAN HISTORIES.—LINCOLN. By the late Rev. Canon

R. VENABLES and the late Ven. Archdeacon PERRY. With Map. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

DIOCESAN HISTORIES.—ROCHESTER. By the Rev. A. J.

PEARMAN, M.A. With Map. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

CHRIST in HIS HOLY LAND. A Life of our Lord, Written during and after a Journey through the Holy Land. By the Rev. ALEXANDER A. BODDY, F.R.G.S. With Map and several Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

ADDRESSES to LADS. By the Rev. Professor H. C. Shuttle-

WORTH. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

CHURCH CATECHISM, with Notes. Illustrated by 12 Coloured

Plates and 36 Cuts in the Text, with Notes. By E. M. New Edition. Small post 8vo, paper boards, 1s.

THE DESOLATE SOUL. Poems by Maria Monica. Fcap. 8vo, limp cloth, 1s.

"In such poetry as this the religious world has a possession of which it cannot long be unaware."—Academy.

THE QUEEN, her EMPIRE, and the ENGLISH SPEAKING

WORLD. The "Diamond" Jubilee, 1837-1897.

This Volume, specially prepared for the approaching celebration of the "Record Reign," consists of—

I. A LIFE of QUEEN VICTORIA. By Mrs. ISLA SITWELL. A short but comprehensive Sketch of Her Majesty's Life, illustrated by a recent Portrait of the Queen.

II. THE BRITISH EMPIRE. Selected Views of the Colonies and Dependencies of the Crown, including the following countries:—India, Australasia, Africa, Egypt, Canada, Bermuda, Jamaica, Bahamas, &c., &c.

III. THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING WORLD. Fifty Views selected from those of the most interesting places in America.

Over 130 Illustrations carefully reproduced from copyright photographs, constituting the most complete set of views on the subject ever published. Large portfolio size, cloth boards, 5s.

LIFE of her MAJESTY the QUEEN. With Sketches of the Royal Family. A "Diamond" Jubilee Memoir. Copiously Illustrated. Fcap. 4to, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE CHURCH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

These Publications are issued under the auspices of the Church Historical Society, of which the President is the Right Rev. M. CREIGHTON, D.D., Bishop of London.

XXII. THE ELIZABETHAN BISHOPS and the CIVIL POWER.

Statute 8 Elis. c. 1 (A.D. 1556-58). Small post 8vo, paper cover, 2d.

* A Complete List of the Church Historical Society's Publications may be had on application.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.
BRIGHTON: 129, NORTH STREET.

"Extremely popular."

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"Clever."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"Brilliant, if daring."

SCOTSMAN.

"Thoroughly interesting."

GLASGOW

HERALD.

QUIDA'S

New Novel

"THE MASSARENES"

6/-

THIRD EDITION READY.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.

"Excellent."

PUNCH.

"Incomparably her best."

NATIONAL OBSERVER.

"Extremely interesting. A brilliant picture of a contemporary mania."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

The First Edition having been exhausted on day of Publication, a SECOND EDITION is now ready.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MORRICE BUCKLER."

THE PHILANDERERS.

By A. E. W. MASON.

DAILY MAIL.—"The three pages of the prologue are the most stirring three pages of any sort of fiction that we have read for some months past. There is no weakness here, no shallowness, no compromise. Built up with strength and sincerity, and finely written. The story braces the mind as much as it captivates the taste."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROBBERY UNDER ARMS."

MY RUN HOME.

By ROLF BOLDREWOOD.

THE SECRET of ST. FLOREL.

By JOHN BERWICK.

SCOTSMAN.—"A thoroughly healthy and well-told story, with plenty of stirring incident and variety of scene and situation, and it is not wanting in study of character and knowledge of life, savage, semi-savage, and civilised."

THE FALL OF A STAR.

A NOVEL.

By SIR WM. MAGNAY, Bart.

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS.

NEW VOLUME.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.; "Peacock" Edition, gilt sides, back and edges, 5s.

SNARLEY YOW.

By Captain MARRYAT.

Illustrated by H. R. MILLAR.

With an Introduction by DAVID HANNAY.

Globe 8vo, 6s.

POEMS. By Horace Smith.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

NOTES on POLITICAL ECONOMY from the COLONIAL POINT OF VIEW. By A NEW ZEALAND COLONIST.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

THE INDUCTION COIL in PRACTICAL WORK, including the Röntgen X Rays. By LEWIS WRIGHT, Author of "Light: a Course of Experimental Optics," &c. With Illustrations.

JUNE NUMBER. Price 1s.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS.

1. THE HOUSE by the HOWFF. By W. L. WATSON. Chapters V.—VII.
2. NELSON and his BIOGRAPHERS. By DAVID HANNAY.
3. AMERICANS at PLAY.
4. IN and ABOUT the WEST INDIES. By JOHN R. DAWSON, C.B.
5. JACK and JILL.
6. ON the ABUSE of DIALECT.
7. A CHAPTER of ACCIDENTS. By Mrs. FRASER. Chapters VI.—VIII.
8. LANDSCAPE in POETRY. By Professor TYRRELL.

JUNE NUMBER NOW READY.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d.

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles:

- QUEEN VICTORIA. By the Hon. T. F. BAYARD.
QUEEN VICTORIA'S "CORONATION ROLL." By FLORENCE HAYWARD. With Portraits and Facsimiles.
HOME LIFE among the INDIANS. Records of Personal Experience. By ALICE C. FLETCHER.
THE LAST FIGHT. By L. FRANK TOORER.

Illustrated. Price 1s.

ST. NICHOLAS MAGAZINE

For JUNE

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles:

- THE RISKS of a FIREMAN'S LIFE. By C. T. HILL.
A CITY in a VOLCANO. By A. H. VERRILL.
WHAT is TOLD by the BELL. By Lieut. JOHN M. ELLICOTT, U.S.N.
A HOUSE-MOVING HOLIDAY. By W. S. HARWOOD.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1309.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1897.

PRICE 3d.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied
promptly to order.
Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.
LATEST CATALOGUES :—
No. 51 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
„ 52, 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (762, 732 lots.)
„ 53 PHILOSOPHY. (840 lots.)

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE
LIBRARIES.—The JUNE CATALOGUE of Valuable NEW and SECOND-HAND WORKS, offered at prices greatly reduced, is
Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H.
SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 115, for JUNE), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT of LITERA-TURE. No. 965 (Double Number), just published, consists of a very large and varied selection of Books in Literature and Science, including many important sets and special collections.—Post free from H. SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers, 14, Strand, W.C.; or 37, Piccadilly, W.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLI-CATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS and EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.
Telegrams: MURUSIL, LONDON. [Established 1819.]

TO AUTHORS.—Messrs. DIGBY, LONG & CO.
(Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net, eighth
edition) INVITE AUTHORS to FORWARD their MSS. (Fiction,
Travel, Poetry, &c.) suitable for Volumes for prompt consideration.—
Address 18, Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING and PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, BELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast
folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER.—PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)
Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

ROYAL SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 54, Pall Mall East, S.W.
126th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIXFRIED H. HERKOMER, JUN., Secretary (pro tem.).

THE LIBER STUDIORUM of
J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.,
And NEW MEZZOTINTS by FRANK SHORT.
TO COMPLETE THE BOOK,
ON VIEW at ROBERT DUNTHORNE, the REMBRANDT GAL-LERY, 5, Vigo Street, W. Admission, including Catalogue, 1s.

McGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL,
CANADA.

CHAIR of ZOOLOGY.
The Governors of McGill University are prepared to receive APPLI-CATIONS for Appointment to the newly founded PROFESSORSHIP
of ZOOLOGY. Salary, 2,500 Dols. per annum. Candidates from
Great Britain are requested to forward applications, with any testimonials and references they may desire to submit, on or before
15th June, addressed, "PRINCIPAL," Office of the High Commissioner
for Canada, 17, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

GREEK PLAY at UNIVERSITY COLLEGE,
LONDON.—The "IPHIGENIA in AULIS" will be given in the original Greek on THURSDAY, 10th JUNE, and FRIDAY, 11th
JUNE, at 8.30 p.m., and on SATURDAY, 12th JUNE, at 3 p.m.
For tickets and particulars apply to the Secretary, University College, Gower Street, W.C. J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

TO LECTURE SOCIETIES.
MR. R. WALLACE, M.P. (Edin.), is now making
his Lecturing arrangements for the Season 1897-98. Subjects:
"Cant," "House of Commons," "Mrs. Grundy," and "Shams." Details
on application.—9, Edith Villas, London, W.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—FORTHCOM-
ING EXAMINATION.—DRAUGHTSMAN in the HYDRO-
GRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT of the ADMIRALTY (17-25), 7th
JULY. Expertness in Hydrographical Chart Drawing essential.—The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received.
They must be made on forms, to be obtained, with particulars, from
the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

SALES BY AUCTION.

Pall Mall.—The Carlton Hall Heirlooms—Pictures.—In the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division: Mr.
Justice Kekewich. 1894, C. No. 1,694.

MESSES. FOSTER respectfully announce for SALE BY AUCTION, by direction of Mr. Justice Kekewich, at the GALLERY, 54, PALL MALL, on WEDNESDAY, the 16th JUNE, and following day, at 1 o'clock precisely each day,
The valuable collection of PICTURES formed by the late John Cowper, Esq., of Carlton Hall, Penrith, Cumberland, including a chef d'œuvre by George Romney, life-size portraits of two beautiful children, believed to be the artist's daughters; also a number of Early English, Dutch, and French pictures, including works ascribed to Barry, R.A. Luny Sir J. Reynolds Van Loo
Broughel Ostade Ryckaert Van Woorrell
De Louthembourg Pynaker Teniers Zoffany
Also a number of landscapes by Knox, and some water-colour drawings.
May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.
Note: The George Romney Picture will be on view until the Sale at 54, Pall Mall.

EDUCATIONAL.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.
1897.—EXAMINATION, JULY 6th, 7th. One of £20, two of
£20, and Minor Scholarships of £15 to £20. Candidates to be under 15 years of age.
For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An EXAMINA-
TION will be held in July next to fill up not less than FIVE
RESIDENT FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS,
and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the HEAD
MASTER, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Pashmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI-
LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.
The last, most complete, and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-
Instruction.
Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.
Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 2 dols. 50 cents
American, 10s. 6d. English. Post free.
Prospectus, with opinions of Educators, SCIENTIFIC, PROFESSIONAL,
and Business Men all over the world, free.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 237, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
200, REGENT STREET, LONDON.
SOLD ONLY BY THE PUBLISHER.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

WANTED. BOOKPLATES.—Any good Plates, or parcels, purchased for cash.—HENRY HIGHAM, 84, Tytherton
Road, London, N.

WANTED, BOOKPLATES of Bozman, Walker,
Giles, Reverley, Cabot, Parr; also any Old Specimens. Very best prices will be paid.—MOORE, 6, Trelawn Road, Leyton, Essex.

B. H. BLACKWELL, 50 and 51, Broad Street,
Oxford.—Abbott's (E. A.) The Good Voice, 1871—Bacon's
Opera Moralium, Rawley, folio, 1638—Boile's Trans. Gidley—Beesly's Cassius, Clodius, and Tiberius—Digby's Plays, New Shakespeare Society.—Lewis's Astronomy of the Ancients.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of

PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS

OF

FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH
SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproductions of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSES. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,
ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of

HERR HANFSTAENGL of Munich,

the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processers in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

The Doom of the Cedar Pencil Fountain Pens and Stylos :

The objections to them, and how they have been met.

The cedar pencil, it appears, has received its death-blow. We are so accustomed to regard it as one of the things which are a matter of course, that for many years no attempt was made to improve it, until the other day there appeared on the market something which so obviously excels the cedar pencil in every possible way that the extinction of the latter can only be a matter of time.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Paper Pencil is of the same size and presents the same appearance as an ordinary pencil, the only difference is that the cedar-wood is replaced by tightly rolled paper, divided off into sections by little round marks down the side of the pencil. When the latter wants sharpening, all you have to do is to pick up the edge of the paper-covering with a pin, or the point of a knife, and unravel a section of it, until it breaks of itself, by which time a fresh piece of lead is exposed, and the pencil ready for continued use. The advantages of the Blaisdell Pencil are so obvious, that nobody who has ever seen it will ever use a cedar pencil again. To begin with, it lasts about three times as long as a cedar pencil, none of the lead being broken in cutting. Then the point is always perfectly conical—can't be otherwise: the fingers are not soiled with blacklead nor the place littered with chips in sharpening it, and the latter operation takes but five seconds to accomplish. The Blaisdell Paper Pencil is already being sold by many stationers; it costs twopence, which makes it much cheaper to use than any penny pencil on the market; and the lead is much better than any twopenny pencil ever sold. The blue and red Blaisdell Pencils (which cost 3d.) are even more superior to cedar ones than the black, because ordinary coloured pencils are more prone to break in sharpening. A set of specimens can be had (post free in the United Kingdom) for a shilling from the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL COMPANY, Limited, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C., on application.

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the *BESTENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the
houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,
and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30—34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.CARLYLE (THOMAS), MONTAIGNE,
AND OTHER ESSAYS,Chiefly Biographical, now first issued in book form, with Foreword by S. R. CROCKETT, and fine Photo-gravure Frontispiece of Sir J. E. Boehm's bust of Carlyle. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 8s. 6d. net.May also be had in bindings similar to those of the Library and Ashburton Editions.LARGE-PAPER EDITION.—75 copies on hand-made paper, royal 8vo, half-vellum, uncut, 15s. net.CONTENTS:—Montaigne—Lady Mary Wortley Montagu—Montesquieu—Nelson—Necker—The Netherlands—Newfoundland—Northumberland—The Pitts.SECRET MEMOIRS OF NAPOLEON.By ONE WHO NEVER QUITTED HIM FOR FIFTEEN YEARS (CHARLES DORIS, one of his Valets). With Photogravure Portrait of Napoleon. 8vo, 367 pp., cloth extra, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

JAMES GOWANS & SON,

13, High Street, St. John's Wood, London, N.W.

E P P S'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
C O C O ATHE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULARAND
BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS,
BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COL-
LECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE
AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—

ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—
NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CON-
TINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS
ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW
BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF
BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND
AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—
BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED,
AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO
PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE
CHANGES.The characteristics of the Literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE*	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven
Shillings.N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS,
the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS
NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line
Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print
Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the FULL TITLEWith Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequentlyThe Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by over 80 pages,

whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES."The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News."Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum."We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph."The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.
"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.... The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

JAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LIMITED,
St. Dunstan House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.A PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTOf unique interest is given with each issue of "THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared this year:—

SAMUEL RICHARDSON	...	January	2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY	...	"	9
LEIGH HUNT	...	"	16
LORD MACAULAY	...	"	23
ROBERT SOUTHEY	...	"	30
S. T. COLERIDGE	...	February	6
CHARLES LAMB	...	"	13
MICHAEL DRAYTON	...	"	20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR	...	"	27
SAMUEL PEPYS	...	March	6
EDMUND WALLER	...	"	13
WILKIE COLLINS	...	"	20
JOHN MILTON	...	"	27
WILLIAM COWPER	...	April	3
CHARLES DARWIN	...	"	10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON	...	"	17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONG-	...	"	24
FELLOW	...	"	24
ANDREW MARVELL	...	May	1
ROBERT BROWNING	...	"	8
THOMAS CARLYLE	...	"	15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY	...	"	22
CHARLES DICKENS	...	"	29

To-day's Issue.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

WORKS BY DR. ALEX. MACLAREN

Most Recent, crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s., post free.

THE BEATITUDES,
AND OTHER SERMONS."Dr. Maclaren's new volume will be received with special warmth, as containing an excellent exposition of the Beatitudes. Dr. Maclaren's work is always full of thought and knowledge and power, intensely evangelical, and unfailingly fresh."—British Weekly.

Uniform with the above, price 5s. each, post free.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons."Dr. Maclaren is our ideal preacher."—Expository Times.
"Masterly, beautiful, inspiring."—Methodist Recorder.THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons."The work of a master of pulpit oratory."—Freeman.THE HOLY of HOLIES: a Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John."Every sermon glows with unction, and shows intense power."—Methodist Recorder.THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons."They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, and the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons."For more than a quarter of a century he has held almost an unchallenged position as the prince of pulpit orators....
The back pews of Dr. Maclaren's church are in the nooks and corners of the earth."—Methodist Times.LONDON: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, 21 AND 23, FURNIVAL STREET, E.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"The Publishers rightly claim that Royal Academy Pictures, 1897,"* forms the MOST PERFECT REPRESENTATION of the ACADEMY ever placed within reach of the public. Not only is the best work on exhibition represented, but the SCALE of REPRODUCTION is UNIQUE."

Westminster Gazette, May 4, 1897.

* Parts 1, 2, 3, and 4 now ready of CASSELL'S "ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1897," price 1s. each. To be completed in 5 Parts, 1s each; also published in One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, price 7s. 6d.

N.B.—The publication of the complete volume and of Part 5 have been postponed till June 11th so as to ensure that same perfection of production which is the distinguishing characteristic of this unique fine art work.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

The FIRST LARGE EDITION OF

The Magazine of Art

For JUNE (price 1s. 4d.),

Containing the opening article on the

QUEEN'S TREASURES OF ART IN THE ROYAL PALACES

(by Her Majesty's Gracious permission), has already been exhausted, but a Second Edition having been prepared, copies can now be obtained by order at any bookseller throughout the Kingdom.

N.B.—The JUNE PART is enlarged (without increase of price) in order that special prominence may be given to the important contribution announced above.

Now ready, price 9s.

PICTORIAL ENGLAND and WALES.

With upwards of 320 Beautiful Illustrations prepared from Copyright Photographs.

COMPLETION OF "SOCIAL ENGLAND."

Vol. VI., ready shortly, price 18s.

SOCIAL ENGLAND.

Edited by H. D. TRAILL, D.C.L.

Vol. VI. contains—From the Battle of Waterloo to the General Election of 1885.

Also supplied in Sets, price £5 15s. 6d.

A SUPERB ALBUM OF PHOTOGRAPHIC VIEWS.

Now ready, complete in 1 vol., 9s.

THE QUEEN'S LONDON.

Containing nearly 400 Exquisite Views of London and its Environs. (Dedicated by permission to Her Majesty the Queen.)

"The artistic finish displayed places this publication immeasurably above any other work of the kind. A unique record of the metropolis and its surrounding neighbourhood."—Public Opinion.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED,
Ludgate Hill, London; Paris and Melbourne.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

FIFTH THOUSAND just ready, demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES

From 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee.

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P.

"It deals with events in the author's old inimitable way. His hand has lost nothing of its cunning.... The touch is still as light and as sure as ever.... Nothing can surpass the ease of Mr. McCarthy's narrative style—his way of winding into his subject, and taking the reader with him in sustained interest to its close."—Daily News.

"That he has produced a brilliant and interesting record none will deny."—Manchester Courier.

"The new volume has most of the merits which have made the preceding volumes a standard work. The interest never flags."—Westminster Gazette.

HISTORIC STUDIES IN VAUD. BERNE, and SAVOY. By General MEREDITH READ. With 31 Full-Page Illustrations. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth extra, 25s.

"One is grateful for so vivid a peep into the past. It illuminates our knowledge of the lives of Gibbon and Rousseau and Voltaire."—Manchester Guardian.

"General Read has spared no pains or labour.... Three great literary names stand out from this record, and have fresh light thrown upon them.... An admirable series of silhouettes."—Scotsman.

"It is a most learned, conscientious performance."—Echo.

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN!" a Tale of '37. By ALLEN UPWARD, Author of "A Crown of Straw," &c. Crown 8vo, decorated cover, 1s. (Immediately.)

A FOUNTAIN SEALED. By Sir Walter BESANT, Author of "All Sorts and Conditions of Men." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"It is one of the most delightful love stories which we have read this year. The grace of the minutest is in its stately and yet gay and easy style. Dainty and sweet in itself, the tale is also daintily and sweetly told.... It is altogether a beautiful story."—Daily Mail.

NULMA: an Anglo-Australian Romance. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED, Author of "Mrs. Trengaskie," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"We can recommend 'Nulma' as a thoroughly enjoyable story. Mrs. Praed, possibly as the result of her collaboration with Mr. Justin McCarthy, has learned to give a very pretty flavouring of actuality to her stories by introducing a semi-political background into her romance."—Fall Mall Gazette.

CARLTON PRIORS. By John Stafford, Author of "Doris and I." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. "It contains a very pleasing and interesting story, and one that promises better things from the same pen."—Athenaeum.

HIS DEAD PAST. By C. J. WILLS, Author of "An Easy-going Fellow," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

RIE'S DIARY. By Anne Coates. Crown 8vo, silk cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THE INNOCENTS ABROAD. By Mark TWAIN. With 234 Illustrations. (Uniform with the other volumes of the new CHEAP UNIFORM EDITION.) Crown 8vo, blue cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE LAST ENTRY. By W. Clark Russell. With a Frontispiece by MAX COWPER. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. "The Last Entry" is a rattling good salt-water yarn, told in the author's usual breezy, exhilarating style."—Daily Mail.

THE MYSTERY of JAMAICA TERRACE. By DICK DONOVAN. Post 8vo, picture boards, 2s.; cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE CHRONICLES of MICHAEL DANE-VITCH of the RUSSIAN SECRET SERVICE. By DICK DONOVAN, Author of "A Detective's Triumphs." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Dick Donovan has produced a much better detective story than any that we have previously had from his pen.... some excellent puzzles and mysteries.... As a sequel to the Danevitch tale he gives us a longer story, 'The Clue of the Dead Hand,' which is exceptionally strong."—Speaker.

OLD CORCORAN'S MONEY. By Richard DOWLING, Author of "The Mystery of Killard." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. "There is not a dull page in the book."—Sporting Life.

A NINETEENTH-CENTURY MIRACLE. By "ZZ" (LOUIS ZANGWILL). Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

HIS EXCELLENCY (Eugene Rougon). By EMILE ZOLA. Preface by E. A. VIZETELLY. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

"While its human interest is absorbing from first to last, it has also much of the importance of an historical document."—Scotsman.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane.

FROM WALTER SCOTT'S LIST.

UNIFORM WITH PREVIOUS YEARS' ISSUES.
NOW READY. Crown 8vo, paper boards, 3s. 6d.

THE THEATRICAL WORLD of 1896.

By WILLIAM ARCHER. With an Introduction on "The Need for an Endowed Theatre," and a Synopsis of Playbills of the Year by HENRY GEORGE HIBBERT.

Copies may still be had, uniform with the above, of THE THEATRICAL WORLD 1893. With an Epistle Dedicatory to Mr. Robert W. Lowe. By WILLIAM ARCHER.

THE THEATRICAL WORLD of 1894. By WILLIAM ARCHER. With an Introduction by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, and a Synopsis of Playbills of the Year by HENRY GEORGE HIBBERT.

THE THEATRICAL WORLD of 1895. By WILLIAM ARCHER. With a Prefatory Letter by ARTHUR W. PINERO, and a Synopsis of Playbills of the Year by HENRY GEORGE HIBBERT.

THE CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES.

Edited by HAVELOCK ELLIS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each; some volumes at 6s.

NEW EDITIONS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. With Numerous Illustrations. SECOND EDITION.

MAN and WOMAN: a Study of Human Secondary Sexual Characters. By HAVELOCK ELLIS.

"Mr. Havelock Ellis belongs, in some measure, to the Continental school of anthropologists; but while equally methodical in the collection of facts, he is far more cautious in the invention of theories, and he has the further distinction of being not only able to think, but able to write. His book is a sane and impartial consideration, from a psychological and anthropological point of view, of a subject which is certainly of primary interest."—Athenaeum.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

FOURTH EDITION, COMPLETELY REVISED.

HYPNOTISM. By Dr. Albert Moll.

The new edition of this work—which is the most authoritative on the subject—has been revised throughout, and a considerable quantity of new and important matter added.

TWO NEW VOLUMES.

READY SHORTLY, crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s. HALLUCINATIONS and ILLUSIONS.

A Study of the Fallacies of Perception. By EDMUND PARISH.

This work deals not only with the pathology of the subject, but with the occurrence of the phenomena among normal persons, bringing together the international statistics of the matter. It discusses fully the causation of hallucinations and the various theories that have been put forward; and, further, it examines and adversely criticizes the evidence which has been brought forward in favour of telepathy.

READY SHORTLY, crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s. The PSYCHOLOGY of the EMOTIONS.

By Prof. TH. RILOT.

The latest and most important work of Professor Ribot, editor of La Revue Philosophique, and the chief living French psychologist. The work contains a very full exposition and defence of the physiological theory of the emotions, which has lately caused much discussion. This theory regards all emotions, from the most elementary to the most exalted and refined, from—to quote one of the author's examples—the pain of a corn to the grief of unattained ideals of Michael Angelo's sonnets, as of identical nature, in the sense that they are the effect and not the cause of bodily changes, and that it is, therefore, incorrect to speak of the "expression of the emotions," the emotion itself being the consciousness of what we call its expression. In the course of his wide ranging exposition the author deals with the social and moral feelings, the sexual instinct, religion, art, the psychology of laughter, the morbid emotions, the classification of characters and temperaments, &c.

THE TWO CYCLING BOOKS OF THE SEASON. Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, elegant, price 2s. 6d.

LADY CYCLING. By Miss F. J. ERSKINE.

An eminently practical handbook, which all women cyclists will find invaluable. It deals with the health and social aspects of cycling, cycling dress for town and country, with makes of machines, correct and incorrect methods of riding, with riding in towns, touring, hill-climbing, with bicyol gymkhanas, with the care of machines, &c. The book is not only practical, but is issued in an elegant form which should adapt it for ladies' libraries or tables.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, elegant, price 3s. 6d. ALL-ROUND CYCLING. By Sir

B. W. RICHARDSON, G. LACY HILLIER, EVELYN EVERETT GREEN, J. RIVERS VINE, JOHN WATSON, F.L.S., and P. A. THOMAS, B.A.

"A little book that cyclists will know how to value, of whatever description they may be."—National Observer.

"A useful and entertaining volume."—Daily Mail.

"Bound to interest all cyclists."—Black and White.

COMPACT AND PRACTICAL. ARRANGED FOR IMMEDIATE REFERENCE.

In limp cloth, for the pocket, price 1s. Invaluable to Tourists.

THE EUROPEAN CONVERSATION BOOKS. FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN, NORWEGIAN.

COMMEMORATION VOLUME.

Crown 8vo, cloth elegant (the cover specially designed), price 2s. 6d. With 35 Full-Page Illustrations.

"DIAMOND" JUBILEE EDITION. OUR QUEEN: the Life and Times of Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, &c. By the Authors of "GENERAL GORDON," &c. An Edition of this Work on large paper, demy 8vo, with Coloured Illustrations, price 6s., is also published.

London:

WALTER SCOTT, LIMITED, Paternoster Square.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
The Novelist and the Apostle	585
Cromwell's Place in History	586
The Inner Life of the House of Commons	587
Thomas Wakley	588
The Makers of the Macedonian Empire	589
FROM CROWDED SHELVES	590
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books	591
New Books Received... ..	591
NOTES AND NEWS	592
PARIS LETTER	593
GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO'S "TRIUMPH OF DEATH"	594
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXX., JONATHAN SWIFT	595
THE BOOK MARKET	595
For a Village Library	596
DRAMA	596
MUSIC	597
SCIENCE	598
CORRESPONDENCE	598
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED	599
FICTION SUPPLEMENT	1-8

REVIEWS.

THE NOVELIST AND THE APOSTLE.

A Study of St. Paul. By S. Baring-Gould.
(M. A. Isbister & Co.)

TO the jaded palate of the age such an incongruity as the life of an Apostle by a popular novelist should be stimulating. If it should fail to be so, it will be because the book does not fulfil the promise held forth by the bizarre association of ideas; not because it is not an able and interesting book, with certain limitations in its ability which might easily be foreseen. Mr. Baring-Gould explains in a preface what were his intentions in undertaking a life of St. Paul. He designed to regard the Apostle solely from the standpoint of a novelist and man of the world, a man necessarily having some acquaintance with the main-springs of human character and motive; a man, in fact, such as Mr. Baring-Gould undeniably is. But, in the first place, he cannot keep his limitations. A man is all that he thinks and writes, as well as all that he does; therefore, Mr. Baring-Gould has inevitably to devote a prominent space to St. Paul as a thinker, where the special advantages which he claims for himself avail him nothing. Moreover, he truly remarks that St. Paul the man was more than St. Paul the man; that he had a mystic side, and this mystic side is like the hidden side of the moon. In relation to a novelist and man of the world, it undeniably is. Apparently he feels only the embarrassment to which it puts him in his consideration of the man. But in truth it is thrice as fatal to him in considering the writer. Nor is his aim at all so original as he conceives, and as the reader is at first disposed to hope. It soon becomes evident that Mr. Baring-Gould has read Renan, and Renan's Life of St. Paul, and that we have here an attempt to adapt the methods of Renan for English readers—as our playwrights adapt the methods of the French stage for English audiences—minus the infidelity, though with a considerable infusion of the naturalism of Renan. Mr. Baring-Gould's announced aim, moreover, is not single and dominant enough to unify the temper of his book. He has many sides, and they so intercross each other as to make of his work a very mingled yarn. There is Mr. Baring-Gould, the man of the world, and much of the book is very man-of-the-worldly; there is Mr. Baring-Gould the novelist, and not a little of the book smells strong of the novelist; there is Mr. Baring-Gould, the student of Renan, and we sniff now and again a distinct whiff of Renan. But such a phrase as "When I was a curate" reminds us that there is also Mr. Baring-Gould the clergyman of the Church by law established, and we are not suffered to forget that we must allow for yet another idiosyncrasy.

When we find the subject of the "Petrine" claims insisted upon with great cleverness and subtlety from the orthodox Anglican standpoint; when we find the writer rejoicingly strong upon St. Peter's wife, and St. Paul's lady-friends, and St. Paul's alleged marriage with Lydia, we are aware of the Anglican clergyman. The novelist comes to the front in a certain method of filling-in recorded facts with supposed details. When St. Paul is rescued from the Jewish rioters by the Roman soldiery, he is represented by the author as hoisted on their shoulders. "Then the Apostle, leaning down to the tribune, said in his ear, 'May I speak?'" Is this a passage from an intended historical romance? It has no foundation in fact. The same (we cannot but think) cheap manner of imparting colour by imaginary details is carried yet farther in the account of the riot at Ephesus. Here it is:

"Alexander, thrusting, elbowing his way through the crowd, scrambled on to the stage, signed with his hand that he desired to be heard, and gained an audience. But no sooner did the mob recognise that he was a Jew than their howls broke out again: 'Great Artemis of Ephesus!' At last, when they had yelled themselves hoarse, a lull ensued, and the magistrates seized their opportunity to send forward the chief municipal officer, the chancellor, who kept the town archives and was treasurer for the wealth of the Temple of Artemis. He came out from behind the side-scenes, and, stepping to the front of the stage, ordered silence."

Mr. Baring-Gould's account of the speech which followed, adhering for the most part to the Biblical language, concludes with this even ludicrously incongruous piece of modernism: "Since we are wholly unable to give any rational account of this mass meeting." There are some who will admire this kind of "picturesqueness." But there is either too much of it in the book or too little. If it was to be done at all, it should have been a main feature of the style, instead of cropping up spasmodically in unexpected places. When, again, St. Paul retires to Arabia after his conversion, we are told that it is possible he retired to an Essene community. There is not a fact alleged in support of it. It seems likely to the author's imagination, for reasons he gives. That is all. This method of padding a history where facts are meagre by "It is possible," and "We may well imagine," is one which cannot be rebuked too strongly. The culmination was reached some years ago in a French ecclesiastic who gave us a Life of the Good Thief (the penitent thief crucified with Christ). It only remains for someone else to give us a "Life of Balaam's Ass," and the historical imagination will have reached its climax as a book-making faculty. Connected with this, but also with a savour of Renan, is Mr. Baring-Gould's way of emulating Falstaff's evolution of men in buckram. For instance, we have the moderate and unimpeachable statement that Christian writers have admitted certain grave disorders as having happened sometimes at the Agapes of the early Christians. But on the next page these certain grave disorders have swelled into "orgies." It looks as though his own moderation were every now and again pricked in the flanks by a resolve prepossessed to be original and tradition-breaking, to go as near the example of the French iconoclast as his reputable English orthodoxy would allow.

But we have done with picking of holes. This book is an interesting and valuable performance none the less. St. Paul's journeys are made vivid to us by skilfully realised descriptions of the countries and places through which he passed. Only once, in the author's desire to introduce modern vivacity, does he fall into such a slip as where he describes Corinth resounding with the voices of singers "running up and down the chromatic scales," as they no doubt would have done, only that chromatic scales were not then invented. Very felicitously he sets before us the way in which circumstances gradually forced on St. Paul the apostolate of the Gentiles. He does not repeat the common error of supposing that a great man sees his objective from the beginning, and that all his actions are dictated by a constant regard for it. In one respect, however, he ascribes a set and far-sighted plan to St. Paul; and his suggestion is at any rate original and valuable. He believes that the Apostle had conceived the design of stringing a set of Christian communities along the great trade-route between Syria and Rome, which ran through Southern Asia Minor. This, at any rate, he points out, is what the Apostle effected. Derbe, Lystra, Antioch, Colossæ, Laodicea, Ephesus, Corinth, and the communities established along the Egnatian road, followed this route, and secured the great highway for Christianity. Very clearly, also, he shows us the special nature of the difficulties with which St. Paul had to contend. He enters thoroughly into the standpoint of the orthodox Jews and Judaizing Christians who formed his adversaries. This is not surprising. Their standpoint was that of a man of the world, and a man of the world Mr. Baring-Gould proclaims himself. Indeed, one feels that had he lived in the Apostolic era he would infallibly have regarded the Apostle as an imprudent fanatic. But there is room for all diversities of temper; and we can be thankful for the disposition which enables Mr. Baring-Gould to put with such sympathetic insight the case of those whom others—wise after the event—represent as stupid or purely malicious.

Nor is he less successful in doing justice to the wisdom and forbearance of St. Peter and the other Apostles at Jerusalem, which allowed full scope to the fiery Paul, without disconcerting their own more centralised designs. He shows, we think truly, the vast importance at the outset of having a central body such as the Apostles at Jerusalem, influencing the Jews through their metropolitan synagogue, and sending forth, as from a heart, a constant pulsation of Christian influence to all the peripheral Jewish communities. Owing to their wise action in regard to St. Paul and the work among the Gentiles, this did not interfere with the extension of the Christian body at its peripheries. Again, Mr. Baring-Gould shows that St. Paul did not, except at Athens, preach to the heathen directly. He acted through the local Jewish community in each place he visited.

St. Paul the man is Mr. Baring-Gould's declared object of study. He presents us with a sufficiently vivid picture, in which he has thought for himself to an extent even aggressive. But because of this very determination to be original, to break through traditional modes of view, we doubt whether he quite knows the impression he creates. It is not exactly a pleasant impression—speaking for ourselves. This St. Paul of Mr. Baring-Gould's is zealous, self-devoted, absorbed in one idea—the propagation of the Gospel among the Gentiles; much-enduring, persuasive, patient with neophytes and submissive disciples; but masterful, overbearing, hot-tempered, impatient of opposition, ready to quarrel with all who thwart his will in the slightest degree, harsh and unconciliatory to all who do not see as he sees; a man more for respect and fear than love; having, moreover, a kind of pious penchant towards women, ripening on one occasion into a love-affair, and on another leading him to let a girl go about with him in man's clothes. It would seem that this is not the author's own view. In the close of his book he observes:

"It is the humanity of Paul that meets us and makes us cling to, listen to, and love him. In his wonderful epistles he had a word for everyone in all times—a word that went deep into every heart, met every experience, comforted in every sorrow, cheered in every discouragement, that braced every tired soul."

This comes upon the reader as a surprise. One is forced to the conclusion that Mr. Baring-Gould (after a manner very familiar to critics) in his desire to protest against and make his points against the routine view, has neglected to emphasise the points in which he agrees with the routine view; determined not to paint the Apostle smug and smooth, he has unconsciously turned out a portrait in which chiefly the unpleasant lines are marked. It remains that, having given us a study of St. Paul, he should give us an historical novel on St. Paul. We think he would develop his negative more according to his intention.

Many points in a book necessarily full of matter for controversy we have unavoidably omitted. Yet one point we must touch. Mr. Baring-Gould has been compelled to deal with St. Paul the thinker, and here his limitations become marked. The man of the world and the novelist, even with the clergyman superadded, do not form a combination adequate for this portion of the task. The good-natured scorn with which he condemns the Apostle or sets him to rights, the air of "Hannibal, sir, was a very pretty fellow in his day," remind us of the superior Britisher in foreign parts. The tendency which produces the "damned nigger" attitude is a little too manifest, accentuated, it may be, by a wish to be daring and original. St. Paul's method, he says, is Oriental, not Occidental. Most true. What was needed, then, was for Mr. Baring-Gould to have entered sympathetically into the Oriental mode of thought and interpreted it, or else to have left this side of St. Paul alone as beyond his view.

But who says "Oriental," says confused and puerile, according to Mr. Baring-Gould's idea, says "damned nigger" in fact, though in a polished and cultivated way. He criticises the intellectual side of the Epistles from the standpoint of Western dialectics, regardless of his own admission, which is the very sign-post to those who would study St. Paul the thinker. His typical Western mind has no capacity to follow the Eastern mind. In one important case, as a result, he quite misses St. Paul's meaning—following a throng of Western critics in doing so. But for the most part he simply misunderstands the Apostle's aims and methods. He looks for dialectical proof, after the Western fashion, where the Apostle intends exposition and illustration. He finds St. Paul adopting the "textual method," and thinks that it must mean the reasoned proof from Scripture which it would mean in European controversy. Whereas it is an attempt to illustrate and develop the "lie" (so to speak) of the Apostle's position, from a mystical standpoint, by means of images and parallels from Scripture mystically interpreted.

This mystical use of Scripture was a thing universally accepted in St. Paul's day, based on certain defined principles, and handed down to the early Christian Church; from which it long survived in the Roman Church, and has, of late, begun to show a curious revival in modern sects which Mr. Baring-Gould has not, we should think, studied. The whole method, as is characteristic of the East and inherent in the mysticism beloved of the East, is poetical rather than dialectic. Indeed, the profoundest admirer of St. Paul as a thinker that we ever met was a distinguished modern poet.

On this aspect of St. Paul Mr. Baring-Gould is an unsafe guide; though we admire his boldness in saying so outspokenly what most Englishmen, it is likely, have thought about these subtle, difficult, and most un-English utterances. But, on the whole, he has written an interesting, picturesque book, in which he has thought for himself, often with very suggestive results. The value of the book, we may add, is increased by two clear maps of St. Paul's journeys, and by a complete index.

PROF. GARDINER ON CROMWELL.

Cromwell's Place in History. By Samuel Rawson Gardiner. (Longmans.)

THE historian and the biographer have been busy during the last few years with the name of Oliver Cromwell. Prof. Gardiner's slim little volume is a notable addition to the growing literature of a stirring subject. It is interesting also as the firstfruits of that curious monument of human vanity, the Ford Lectureship of English History at Oxford. In the autumn of 1896 Prof. Gardiner gave half-a-dozen lectures upon that foundation, and although they were delivered without manuscript, he has been enabled, through notes kindly put at his disposal by two girl students, to recast the argument of his discourse in book form. It need hardly be said that Prof. Gardiner is the greatest living authority upon the period of which he treats, and his deliberate judgment of Cromwell comes accordingly with great weight and significance. Of Cromwell, the member of Parliament, the captain of horse and the tactician, he has indeed already dwelt in detail in the volumes of his History of the Civil War; with Cromwell the statesman and the dictator he has still to grapple in the same thorough and exhaustive manner. In the present sketch he fore-shadows conclusions and appreciations which he will hereafter find opportunity to develop and support in a more substantial way. What Prof. Gardiner has now to say of the Cromwell of the Protectorate comes roughly to this, that in the end the reasoned verdict of history can only jump with the less judicious estimate of the popular imagination. The ordinary man thinks of Cromwell as the strong, often the somewhat lawless and uncompromising man of his hands. He was the victor of Marston Moor and Naseby and Worcester. He was the executioner of Charles. He held down Scotland and Ireland, not without brutality. He turned the Rump out of the doors of Westminster Hall. He gave the English arms a prestige by land and sea. And in effect, says Prof. Gardiner, this is about what he did do. In these "swift decisive hammer-strokes" his effectiveness lay. They were mostly negative in character and intention, emphatic Nays:

"Hostile armies were not allowed to be victorious. Kings were not allowed to wield absolute power in disregard of the conditions of the time or the wishes of their subjects. Parliaments were not allowed to disregard public opinion. Irishmen were not allowed to establish a government hostile to England. Foreign Powers were not allowed to disregard the force of England."

But Cromwell was not always negative, nor always, it must be added, swift and decisive; it was laid upon him to build up, to construct, as well as to destroy and to forbid. And about this statesmanlike task he set himself with a deliberation, a hesitation that forms a curious contrast to his swashing blow in the hours of action. He had great, and, as it proved, insuperable difficulties to contend with. Professor Gardiner is not of one mind with those who think that with twenty more years of rule Cromwell would have succeeded in establishing his ideas permanently in England. There were seeds of disaster inherent in the attempt. Cromwell's authority rested on an armed force, and the English antagonism to armed authority he never did live, and never could have lived, down. Moreover, troops which had won their laurels against their own countrymen were personally unpopular, and no amount of successes abroad could give them popularity. Again, the rule of the Commonwealth was irrevocably bound up with Puritanism, and Puritanism, admirable as an engine of revolt, was not fitted permanently to direct the destinies of a growing, an expansive people. The divine right of the congregation, like the divine right of the king, was a principle incompatible with liberty; it could never become comprehensive. Prof. Gardiner concludes by pointing out that although Cromwell failed for the time in establishing his ideas, they were not, for this, condemned to perpetual infertility; one by one, they have returned, and have been taken up, under happier auspices, into the frame-work of the national life.

Prof. Gardiner has the reputation of a fluent and lucid lecturer; but we could wish that he would condescend to put his admirable subject-matter before us with a little more graciousness of expression. It is not really necessary, because you are learned to the finger-tips, to refrain from all attempt to throw your learning into inviting and picturesque form. And the career of Cromwell admits, nay, surely claims, an artistic treatment which Prof. Gardiner is careless to render it. It has its vivid contrasts, its electric moments. Prof. Gardiner, indeed, is careful to lay down in the beginning that not the biography of Cromwell, but his relation to the political and ecclesiastical movements of his time, is the theme before him. But surely this antithesis biography and politics, the inner life of character and the outer life of action, is a false and exploded one. They are inseparable, interacting in a thousand ways. And the one may fairly yield some of its glamour to light up the sober abstractions of the other. Prof. Gardiner diversifies with one good story his account of the curious relations of friendship between the Puritan Cromwell and Catholic Spain.

"The explanation is, after all, not far to seek. It is said that when, in the present century, Marshal Narvaez was on his deathbed, his confessor urged him, as in duty bound, to forgive his enemies. 'Enemies,' answered the dying man, 'I have none.' 'No,' he continued, when the priest had expressed astonishment, 'I have shot them all.' Even so Spain, in the middle of the seventeenth century, had no Protestants to persecute. She had burnt them all."

Prof. Gardiner's book is not—it does not profess to be—a complete or adequate account of Cromwell; but it is a luminous and masterly contribution to the final summing-up of one whom he believes to have been "in the world of action what Shakespeare was in the world of thought, the greatest, because the most typical, Englishman of all time."

THE HOUSE.

The Inner Life of the House of Commons—1860-1870. By William White. Edited, with a Preface, by Justin McCarthy, M.P. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

THE two volumes of this book give us in diary form a keenly observed picture of the House of Commons in the fifteen years which ended with the clash of arms between France and Germany. Mr. White, who died in 1882, was the doorkeeper of the House. Himself a good speaker, and a student of human nature and of literature, he could not but find in the progress of each Session a drama of men and forces well worth his study. He wrote down his impressions, and they appeared as a series of articles in the Illustrated Times and the Illustrated London News. There has been no unwise attempt to edit the sketches into less journalistic shape. The picture is printed, so to speak, from the original plates, and is the more convincing on that account. But, indeed, Mr. White's clear, serviceable style, and the significance of the scenes which he describes, are sufficient to lift his book to the level which his son claims for it—that of "a real contribution to the history of the times."

It is more than that; it is a contribution to our knowledge of personal dynamics in the contest of life. Here are success and failure in the making. The success is not always to be envied or the failure to be pitied, but these considerations only deepen the lessons of the book. As a record also of the great moments of a great assembly—and what makes better reading?—Mr. White's papers have a living interest. They contain a great deal of sound criticism of oratory. They preserve the personal traits of many remarkable men in bright, delicate descriptions. Nor is the play unworthy of a fine critic. The years covered by these volumes were great years; they were the years in which Palmerston, Disraeli, Bright, Cobden, John Stuart Mill, and Bulwer-Lytton occupied the seats of the mighty; and they were the years in which Sir William (then Mr.) Harcourt, and the Duke of Devonshire, then Lord Spencer Cavendish, delivered their maiden speeches. The hurly-burly of politics which these names recall may be conveniently evaded. Mr. White's is a book to which it is permissible to apply a selective method of review; and it will be neither unfair nor inappropriate to limit our attention to the careers of those literary men who were in Parliament in Mr. White's time and whose careers were narrowly observed both by him and by Mr. Justin McCarthy, whose supplementary recollections are of great interest.

It happens that Mr. White has drawn no member of these mid-Victorian Parliaments more lovingly than him whom he delights to call Sir Edward George Earle Lytton, Bulwer-Lytton. We meet the author of Pelham wandering about the lobbies in April, 1856, in his stooping, abstracted way, "his hat on the back of his head, his hands thrust into his trouser pockets, and his eyes cast downwards—looking for all the world as if he fancied that he had lost something and was searching on the ground and feeling for it in his pockets at the same time." At this time Sir Edward's remarkable appearance was accentuated by his complete neglect of the hair on his face. It spread and waved over his features, hiding them, and producing "probably the most astonishing human face in the world." Later, Sir Edward took kindly to the scissors, and his features were discovered to be quite good. It was in his period of trimness and office (as Colonial Secretary) that Sir Edward rose to deliver his speech on the abortive Reform Bill introduced by Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli in 1859. This was a great speech, and when Sir Edward sat down "the cheering was beyond everything that we ever heard in the House or indeed elsewhere." A pleasant note in Mr. White's book is the vividness with which he recalls the gales of cheering and laughter that he weathered. On this occasion "it was literally a tempest of applause . . . rendered more effective by the members rising just then to go to dinner, and cheering as they rose." But Mr. White tones down the picture with the statement that the orator could not be properly heard in the Gallery, and he illustrates his criticism thus:

"On looking over Sir Edward's speech as reported in the Times, we find the following passage, than which few things finer have been uttered in the course of the debate: 'The popular voice is like the grave; it cries Give, give! but like the grave, it never returns what it receives.' Well, the condition in which this remark came up to us was something like this: 'The popular yah! is like the grah! it cried yah! yah! but like the grah! it never returns.' At the close of the sentence Sir Edward dropped his head so low that the last word or two went under the table."

Kinglake—"Eothen" Kinglake—entered Parliament in 1857. Mr. White writes him down a failure. His first speech was a breakdown, and another "completely wearied the House." Mr. McCarthy, however, declares his matter to have been excellent, but he had a wretchedly feeble voice and poor articulation. Mr. McCarthy has a good story about these defects. In a debate on foreign policy, which took place early in the sixties, Kinglake made a speech, but, as usual, it was smothered on his lips. A really fine peroration was simply thrown away. However, Sir Robert Peel, who had been able to hear it, was loth that it should be wasted. He had the bright idea to ask Kinglake to allow him to use his peroration as the concluding portion of a speech he was himself to deliver. Kinglake was sweetly willing, and Sir Robert, speaking on the following night, "brought the House down with the sentences which, delivered by their real author the night before, had fallen dead upon the audience."

Another literary man, Samuel Warren, the author of Ten Thousand a Year, is dismissed by Mr. White as "a good fellow, nevertheless, and clever too," the nevertheless referring to a previous account of Warren's general ineffectiveness in the House.

"Tom Brown" Hughes, as members called him, did better in his representation of Lambeth. This might have been expected in a man whose literary work was, after all, rather instrumental in his career than essential to it. Mr. White admired the temerity of Hughes in his "tilt at the great railway interest."

"Mr. Hughes might as well attempt to overthrow the great pyramid of Gizeh with his puny lance as to move this compacted, formidable, we had almost said omnipotent, railway interest. Like the Leviathan of Job, 'Darts it counteth as stubble. It laughs at the shaking of the spear.' Generous, kindly, impulsive, sanguine, is Mr. Thomas Hughes, but let him not attempt the impossible."

Mr. White's general belief seems to be that literary men are ineffective in Parliament. He pooh-poohs their literary aspirations more than once, and this despite the fact that Disraeli and Lytton loom so magnificently on his canvas. But with the data before us which the present and recent Parliaments supply, it is to-day hard to generalise on the performances of literary men in the House other than favourably.

The case of John Stuart Mill stands somewhat apart in Mr. White's pages, and we cannot do better than quote the spirited passage, long though it be, in which Mill first appears. On February 24, 1856, Mr. White wrote:

"Mr. John Stuart Mill has not failed, nor can he fail. To ascertain whether a man is a failure we must ascertain what he aims at. Mr. Mill never thought to startle and dazzle the House by his oratory as Disraeli did when he first rose to speak. Mr. Mill has no oratorical gifts, and he knows it; nor can he be called a rhetorician. He is a close reasoner, and addresses himself directly to our reasoning powers; and though he has great command of language, as all his hearers know, he never condescends to deck out his arguments in rhetorical finery to catch applause. . . . Mr. Mill did not succeed as an orator; but then he did not attempt oratory. He did not excite a furore of cheering; but then he neither expected nor wished for applause. Mr. Mill, we should say, cares very little for applause. Rapturous cheering, such as that which Mr. Horsman and Mr. Lowe can evoke, would, we venture to think, be an offence to Mr. Mill. He would perhaps ask with the old Roman orator, 'What foolish thing have I said that these people applaud?' And, indeed, we ourselves have, after long experience, come to think that applause in the House of Commons is often uproarious in proportion to the foolishness of the sentiment which calls it forth. Deep attention, broken only by significant murmurs, is, to our mind, far more complimentary to a speaker than fierce and uproarious applause. What Mr. Mill intended to do was to reason calmly with his opponents, and this he succeeded in doing."

Mr. McCarthy heartily endorses this view of Mill's Parliamentary performances, and says: "Many of his phrases still vibrate in the memory of the House, and are quoted again and again by people who have forgotten to whom the phrases owe their authorship."

Mr. Disraeli appears in these pages as a politician only; even the incidental mention of his novels here and there leaves us pre-occupied with the romance he brought to politics, not with the politics he brought to romance.

THOMAS WAKLEY.

The Life and Times of Thomas Wakley, Founder and First Editor of the "Lancet."
By S. Squire Sprigge. (Longmans.)

It is difficult to transport oneself back to the time, recent as it may be chronologically, when the medical profession was tyrannised over by a corrupt, greedy, and unscrupulous corporation, sodden with ignorance and addicted to nepotism in its fullest form. The life of Wakley, the founder of the Lancet, takes us back to that time, and is interesting chiefly from the vigorous conflict which went on for so many years between that reformer and the heads of the old system. The story of how Wakley was led into this track is curious. Trained himself in one of the hospitals, and under one of the great surgeons whom he afterwards attacked with such success, he had settled down as a prosperous practitioner in Argyll-street, when the Cato-street gang of conspirators were brought to trial and executed. The heads of the defunct criminals were condemned to be severed from their bodies, and from the skill with which this brutal act was performed rumour got about that a medical man had allowed himself to be employed. Mr. Sprigge establishes the real identity of the operator, but is unable to explain precisely how suspicion fell upon the innocent Wakley, or who were the perpetrators of the terrible outrage upon him, when his house was burnt down and he himself was stabbed and left for dead. An unfortunate lawsuit against the insurance office which covered his loss surrounded the affair with a halo of slander, and Wakley emerged from the trial with fury and bitterness in his heart. The first object of his reforming zeal was his own profession. He started the Lancet, which, owing in some degree to a plentiful crop of libel actions and suits to restrain, soon acquired as wide a circulation as it did notoriety. The hospitals in those days were a hotbed of abuses. People who raise complaints now on the slenderest provocation, and often enough on none, can have no idea of what went on in hospitals under the benevolent rule of the great surgeons who lectured while their less intelligent nephews hacked at the patients committed to their care. Wakley's outspoken comments on each bad case of malpraxis that came to his ears—and very few did not—soon caused him to be excluded from all the leading hospitals. But the Lancet was well served by a body of staunch volunteers, who sympathised with its objects, and reported for its columns. Often enough the attacks were scurrilous, for no epithet was spared on either side, and Wakley lost as well as won his actions; but the cause prospered in the main, and at last the Lancet came to grips with the chief offender in all this evil—the College of Surgeons itself. One of his principal grievances arose out of a by-law just passed, making it compulsory for medical students to attend the lectures of certain hospital officials.

"The hospital surgeons were also the authorities at the College of Surgeons—that is, they were the men who decided that the lectures of certain gentlemen should be compulsory for all medical students. The compulsory lectures were delivered by themselves, their relatives, or their apprentices. It was this corrupt arrangement against which Wakley worked."

We have not space to follow the warfare into all its ramifications, and can but stop in passing to mention two salient episodes: the violent attack on Wakley's person, which was instigated by the Council, and the reformer's heroic but futile attempt to found a rival institution free from the taint of chartered impunity.

One result of Wakley's experience throughout this campaign was the conviction that no reform could be driven home except by force from a higher vantage ground, and with characteristic impetuosity he flung himself into politics. Twice he stood for Finsbury, and at the third effort was successful. The House expected a firebrand, but found in him, to the general surprise, a moderate and tactful advocate for such reforms as came within his scope. His biographer has taken the pains to rake out their details from oblivion, but we need not follow him. It is interesting, however, to note that he championed the abolition of the newspaper tax and earned the glory of promiscuous lampoons for a contemptuous attack upon writers of poetry. His real chance came with the appointment of a commission to inquire into the alleged abuses of the medical profession, and his biographer does full justice to the feelings of satisfaction with which he heckled his old antagonists the hospital surgeons and lecturers.

The joint occupations of a fighting editor and a laborious M.P. might well have satisfied a less thorough-going man than Wakley, but there was a third field of ripe abuses in which he desired to reap. The post of coroner in those days (1830-40) was usually held by men of little competence in ordinary affairs and no medical knowledge whatever. As a consequence there were frequent miscarriages of justice and suppressions of guilt. Wakley for a long time collected such cases in the Lancet, but was finally driven to put his preaching into force by standing for the coronership of West Middlesex. His strenuous methods were ill-appreciated, and for a time were the object of much misrepresentation. An inquiry into them, however, revealed the true nature of his reforms, and Wakley became a "strong" coroner. He rose to his zenith in the part over the pitiful case of a soldier who was flogged to death at Hounslow Barracks under the system which used to prevail. Flogging in the army was an old grievance with Wakley, and he had to run the gauntlet of endless accusations of bias. In spite of these he stood to his guns, and had the satisfaction of starting a movement which led to the abolition of this degrading practice.

"Great modifications were almost immediately introduced into this method of punishment. So great that when, in 1881, the Army Act formally abolished the practice, few knew that it was still sanctioned by the law of the land."

The case has an additional interest from the fact that it brought forward Erasmus

Wilson, then a young man of thirty-seven, who successfully controverted the necropsy undertaken by the army surgeons who reported upon the fatality.

Mr. Sprigge records two other remarkable cases which came under Wakley as a coroner, and in which his strong personality played a decisive part. One was the suicide of Mr. Sadleir, M.P., whose sensational frauds and reported escape to the Continent formed a theme for Miss Braddon's novel, The Trail of the Serpent. The other case was remarkable only for the fact that Charles Dickens sat on the jury and has recorded it with a characteristic mixture of humour and pathos. His tribute to Wakley's humaneness and impartiality, written after Wakley's death, is as strong a testimony as such a man could need.

Wakley's death, it need hardly be mentioned, came by overwork. Such men always die in harness. To the last he was conducting all his multifarious duties at once, and on the day of his first collapse had attended no fewer than seven inquests without taking food, and had wound up the day by an arduous evening in the House. He left this to attend to the Lancet, but was picked up on the pavement in a dead faint. An accident incurred during his convalescence did the rest, and Wakley died on May 16, 1862, at the age of sixty-seven. His biography is one that should certainly have been written, though the personalities in which he was involved all his life made earlier publication inadvisable. For the way in which Mr. Sprigge has carried out his work we have little but praise. It is well written, simple, and graphic. The minuteness of detail with which every episode is garnished becomes rather trying to the reader, for whom the facts themselves are obsolete, and we feel that Wakley's part in them might have been made clear with less. Still, it is easy to err on the other side, and Mr. Sprigge's narrative was doubtless shaped by the serial form in which it first appeared within the pages of Wakley's own organ, the Lancet.

THE MAKERS OF THE MACEDONIAN EMPIRE.

Philip and Alexander of Macedon. By David G. Hogarth. (John Murray.)

It is certain that we ought to feel more interest in Alexander's history than any other nation; for we alone among European peoples have followed in his footsteps, have made war as he did on the savage tribes of Afghanistan, Beluchistan, and Chitral, and have subdued Scinde and the Punjab. Yet the number of eminent English writers who have told the story of his conquests is markedly small, nor have their efforts always added much to the world's knowledge. Grote, whose authority in such matters was for long supreme in England, has persistently minimised the genius of the Macedonian kings—apparently because they were men of action instead of Parliamentary "hands" of the Manchester type. Prof. Mahaffy has, indeed, done them more justice, but has dealt with them very slightly, having preferred to reserve himself for Alexander's successors. Hence, when we first heard of Mr. Hogarth's enterprise, we hoped that he, a scholar who in his capacity as explorer has been over a great part of the ground covered by Alexander's armies, was about to give us what should hereafter be the classic work on the Macedonian Empire. But a glance at his title-page destroyed these patriotic hopes. There he confesses only to "Two Essays in Biography," and the exhaustive history is still to be written. Let us hope he will become more ambitious as time goes on.

After this preliminary grumble, it may be said that Mr. Hogarth's essay on Philip is a very creditable piece of work. The first maker of Macedon has been so overshadowed by his glorious son that, in Mr. Hogarth's words, he "hardly lives outside the world of scholars." Yet it was plainly no ordinary man who in the space of a short life—he was only forty-six when he died—enlarged the frontiers of a Macedonia hardly bigger than Ireland until he held the whole of modern Greece, Bulgaria and Roumelia, with the greater part of Roumania and European Turkey, in the hollow of his hand. How he did this, working "by fraud when possible, but always by force at the last," Mr. Hogarth tells very clearly and well, and, when he has brought his hero down to the fatal marriage feast of the Epirote prince, there to perish "at the whisper of a woman and by the hand of an androgyne," there is very little left to be said. Nor does his estimate of Philip's character command our confidence less than his history. Without adopting the extreme views of Droysen and Holm as to the date and extent of Philip's designs, he tells us that "Philip's claim to rank among great creative statesmen is not that he foreknew all the results of his action, but that he seized in their inception and directed successive developments. Both his ideal, and his knowledge of the means to attain it, grew with the growth of events. If, in 358, it did not rise above the consolidation of the military strength of Macedonia, and chance in the main made him the creator of Macedonian political unity, it is [not?] very certain that he had come to be possessed by a clear conception even of the unification of all Hellas, when he spent his last two years in enlisting the Greeks for common service with Macedonians in a great war."

That he never intended to enslave Greece, as the Athenian orators asserted, but to be her captain and leader in the great revenge against Persia which he was plotting at the moment of his death, Mr. Hogarth has no doubt. He probably is right, too, as to the almost passionate desire which Philip evinced throughout his life to obtain the good word of Athens—a fact which the eloquence of Demosthenes has led earlier historians to blink. For his military genius Mr. Hogarth has less to say; but, when we consider that the weapon which Alexander afterwards wielded was really forged by Philip, and that only before Byzantium did he meet with a serious reverse, it seems to have been inferior only to his son's.

Mr. Hogarth is less happy in dealing with the character of Alexander, perhaps, because he has not fully made up his mind in regard to it. In the earlier part of his essay he credits him with perfections which have never at one time graced any human being, save in the imagination of a school-girl. Wise, prudent, chivalrous, continent, brave, it is difficult to recognise in Mr. Hogarth's fairy prince the furious reveller who slew his foster-brother in a drunken brawl, and owed his own death to the undue prolongation of an orgy. The eulogist himself seems to feel the inconsistency, but his way of accounting for it is an extraordinary one.

"His many hurts," he says, "had not been suffered for nothing—the stroke on the neck and head in the Balkans, the fever at Tarsus, the stab in the thigh at Issus, the almost fatal bolt-wound at Gaza. Every change in such a character as Alexander's makes for intensification; insensibility to pain becomes positive cruelty, impetuosity grows to foolhardiness, and diplomacy to deceit. . . . The cool deliberator of Arbela is become the almost suicide of Mooltan. . . ."

But this, as Mr. Hogarth must see on reflection, comes very near nonsense. A blow on the head may sometimes cause insanity, but that is plainly not the impression which he intends to convey. For he tells us in actually the next passage to the one quoted that Alexander's mental force was not abated, and later, after defending him with much skill from the charge of insanity, he asserts that he "was never in fuller possession of bodily and mental vigour than in his last two years." He must therefore mean, if he means anything, that Alexander allowed the pain of his many ailments to goad him to fury, which is quite inconsistent with everything he has before said as to the strength of his character. With regard to his deliberateness at Arbela, he again contradicts himself, for he tells, with some dramatic force, Quintus Curtius' story how Alexander led the pursuit after that battle with such impetuosity and with so few attendants that the flying Persians turned upon him in the night, and did not resume their flight until he had killed three with his own hand. A likelier explanation of the violence shown by Alexander on that and other occasions is that, like Nicholson, Hodson, and many other heaven-born leaders of men, he had a Berserk or wild-beast vein in him, which, although generally kept concealed by his iron will, was yet apt to show itself under extreme provocation and in certain circumstances.

This, however, is almost the only serious fault that we have to find with Mr. Hogarth. His account of Alexander's doings in India, of his plans for the conquest of the world—not half so unreasonable as they seem if the erroneous geography of the age be taken into consideration—and of the supreme effect which his work had in paving the way for the Roman Empire, are alike excellent, and the book in these respects can be ungrudgingly praised. But Mr. Hogarth would do well to rid himself of his striving after fine writing and bizarre verbal effects. "Aggressed" and "Hellenisticism" are not pretty words, and such expressions as "more than conqueror" and "erecting his tiara" have an odd sound. The book contains many portraits, a good map, and a sufficient index.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The Yellow Book. April, 1897. (John Lane.)

THE contents of the new number of the Yellow Book are more diversified than distinguished. Mr. Sidney Benson Thorpe's story, "An Immortal," is sad and squalid enough, but very well done; Miss Evelyn Sharp's variant of Mr. Aldrich's Marjorie Daw is clever, although lacking in lightness; Mr. Harland has another bright comedy in porcelain, as his very unreal studies in raillery might be called; and Mrs. Cunningham Grahame's treatment of an old legend is interesting. Among the essayists we like best Mr. Le Gallienne on Beauty. Mr. Francis Watt offers two examples of turpitude, or, as Mr. Charles Whibley would call it, scoundrelism. Mr. J. M. Robertson criticises Mr. Meredith with more outspokenness than that great writer is accustomed to, and Mr. R. V. Risley meditates somewhat jerkily upon Forgetfulness. The poets include Mr. W. B. Yeats, who might be more simple—the word "Rose," for instance, has for Mr. Yeats many meanings that are strange to the non-political mind, Mr. H. W. Nevinson, Mrs. Marriott-Watson, Mr. Douglas Ainslie, and Mr. J. A. Blackie, who offers scholarly, but what we might call cul-de-sac, verse. Indeed, the Yellow Book literature generally is cul-de-sac—it leads nowhere. Dr. Garnett's translations from Anthero de Quental have dignity; but it was unwise of the editor to remind us of Mrs. Browning by calling them "Sonnets from the Portuguese." The poem by Mr. Stephen Phillips is chiefly remarkable for its thoroughly Ibsenian subject. Altogether, we cannot but feel relief to think that the contributors of the Yellow Book have no hand in the control of this planet, so much in love with greyness are they, and so lacking in humour. If it were not for Mr. Le Gallienne and Mr. Harland there would not be a gay note among them. The "art" of the Yellow Book grows steadily worse. Once, whatever might be said of its subject-matter, it had distinction and it had merit; but the good things now are so rare that they astonish before they please. In the current number we find a drawing by Mr. E. J. Sullivan, called "The Mirror"; one by Mr. Patten Wilson, called "An Eastern Town"; one by Katherine Cameron, called "The Black Cockade"—and these alone seem to us worthy of their reproduction. Mr. Charles Conder is unintelligible in black and white, and the drawings by A. Bauerle and Ethel Reed are of the poorest. In the design for the cover Miss Mabel Syrett has manipulated two fighting cocks very deftly.

Ibsen on his Merits. By Sir E. R. Russell and Percy Cross Standing. (Chapman & Hall.)

THE authors of this book have attempted moderation and achieved confusion. They cavil at the rampant abuse, scarce worth quoting to-day, of Mr. Robert Buchanan and Miss Marie Corelli; they plead eagerly for Ibsen's morals or maintain that "where work is great you cannot ostracise it"; they rejoice that young women have been awakened by Nora, young men by Ghosts. A curious detail of misplaced appreciation is Mr. Standing's discovery of rest and optimism, as opposed to the interrogative ending of the earlier plays, in the mission to poor children of Little Eyolf, and the handshake of the twin sisters over John Gabriel Borkman's corpse. He refers also to Borgheim as Asta's "true lover"!

This whole restatement of the "Ibsen formula," it may be seen, then, is elementary and unoriginal; it is supported by inconsequent analyses of several plays, and supplemented by the astounding admission that Ibsen is crude and provincial in his stage-craft, an "awkward youth" in workmanship, an artless artist!

We had certainly supposed that if there was one thing Ibsen did understand it was the mechanical construction of a play, the daring manipulation and masterly concentration of stage effects. This may be seen from the grip which he invariably maintains, when acted, over audience and performers alike. Whatever our feelings may be as the curtain falls, however hostile our temperament or our convictions, boredom is never the dominant note. The plays go from beginning to end.

Mr. Standing has also confronted his readers with an appalling suggestion for the founding of an Ibsen Society—for studying the master's works! We may be reduced to that.

A Short Popular History of Crete. By J. H. Freese, M.A. With an Introduction by P. W. Clayden. (Jarrold.)

FROM Mr. Freese's timely little book may be learned all that is necessary for most of us to know about this distressful land, from the days of the semi-mythical Minos to the present time. In spite of the Dorian colonisation more than a thousand years before the Christian era, we hear little of it in the days when the gallant little toy-states of Greece flourished. Even the Persian invasion awoke no sense of kindred blood. The island passed under the protection of Philip of Macedon; it formed the complement of the Roman dominion in Europe; it was conquered by the Saracens; for nearly five hundred years it was subject to the Venetians; and, finally, in the middle of the seventeenth century, it was won by the Ottoman forces after a campaign which lasted over twenty years, during which the victors lost over 20,000 men. The island's present conditions of trade and political aspiration are treated at length, and a score of pages are devoted to the Ethniké Heteria. The volume concludes with a collection of Cretan songs and legends, indifferently translated. Mr. Clayden's introduction gives a philhellene account of the events which have occurred during the last six months, in the course of which the writer maintains that "the political superstition of 'the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire' has now its headquarters at St. Petersburg," since "a strong Hellenic kingdom would not only bar Russia's progress to warmer seas, but might compete with her for the old capital of the Byzantine empire." We have no view whatever upon the subject: but we humbly suggest that if Russia has indeed been timorous of the military spirit and organisation of the Hellenic kingdom, the events of the last few weeks may serve as an agreeable sedative.

The Consolation of Philosophy of Boethius. Translated into English Prose and Verse by H. R. James, M.A. (Elliot Stock.)

ALTHOUGH nearly a dozen English translations of Boethius have been made Mr. James can justly plead the necessity for another. The translations of the last century, by Lord Preston, Causton, Ridpath, and Duncan, are necessarily scarce; and a work which could hold English readers from the days of Alfred the Great to Dr. Johnson will hardly fail of them now. Not that Boethius' book can be the chosen guide of the modern man, whose shattered faith it will not repair, and whose attention it cannot long arrest. Masterful actualities are our teachers now; teacher and lesson are one, and worship is passed into work. But if our consumption of philosophy is small, the demand keeps up, for we like the words of the wise to be at our hand. And a book like this of the unhappy Boethius is one to lay by against an hour not foreseen. Then we shall have a refreshing vision of this man of the sixth century who, after enjoying all that is best in life, came, like Bunyan, to a place where there was a den, and there, after some natural weakness, collected himself and attuned his mind to the eternal fitness of things.

To Boethius, stripped of honours, wealth, office, separated from his family, and sitting, a lonely prisoner of Theoderic, in his cell in Pavia,

"there appears the divine figure of Philosophy, in the guise of a woman of superhuman dignity and beauty, who by a succession of discourses convinces him of the vanity of regret for the lost gifts of fortune, raises his mind once more to the contemplation of the true good, and makes clear to him the mystery of the world's moral government."

Here, then, we have these discourses in modern English. To his readers of many centuries these rules have been more than they could be to Boethius. For Boethius had no sooner bethought him how life should be lived than he was led out to die. They put a cord round his forehead and tightened it till his eyes started. The wonder is that his scheme of life outlived him. But at the moment when the body of Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius fell at Theoderic's footstool, a petty thing, his MS. had passed into the care of the wise world. And it is not trivial to remember that the book which a Roman king scorned an English king translated.

Mr. James's new rendering of Boethius, and the pleasing dress given to it by the publisher, are things to be thankful for. Our one complaint is, that Mr. James's account of the philosopher is somewhat meagre. He might have discussed the sources from which Boethius drew his ideas. A table of quotations and a few very brief footnotes indicate these too baldly.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

Uncle Bernac: a Memory of the Empire. By A. Conan Doyle.
(Smith Elder & Co.)

The adventures in Mr. Conan Doyle's books go with so much swing, the air blows so bravely through his chapters, that I, for one, am always an eager reader of his novels. The construction of "Uncle Bernac," his latest, is curious. It is a melodrama and a spectacular play fused together. The spectacular section might be called "A Week in the Life of Napoleon"; the other, "Louis de Laval: the Adventures of his Twenty-first Year." To Mr. Conan Doyle the Napoleonic chapters probably made the strongest appeal, although he delays introducing the Emperor till half-way through the book; but, once arrived, the portrait of Napoleon, and the panorama of his court, are vivid, enthusiastic, and interesting. Nothing particular happens; everybody, everything is auxiliary to the little conqueror of thirty-six—his moods and his whims—during an inactive week in 1805, when the French army lay at Boulogne awaiting the psychological moment to attack England. The story is told by Louis de Laval, the son of a French Royalist émigré, who returns to France to offer his sword to the Corsican. Louis is made very welcome, promoted, and—well, that is about all. Oh, there is Uncle Bernac, a man cursed with quite a superfluity of naughtiness, over whom in the end Louis triumphs. His death was awful, even for a wicked uncle.

"He had never risen from his chair—perhaps he had been too paralysed by fear—and he still sat with his back to the door. But what struck the colour from our cheeks was that his head had been turned completely round, so that his horribly distorted purple face looked squarely at us from between his shoulders."

The scene where Louis first makes his uncle's acquaintance (it was in a ruined cottage on the waste French littoral) has movement, and a clean, wholesome horror that is not disagreeable. Louis has dropped into a nest of conspirators. Suddenly they know that they are being followed. They hear

"a clear, rising cry, beginning on a low note, and thrilling swiftly up to a keen, sharp-edged howl. . . ."

"As to Toussac, he stood before the fire, a magnificent figure, with the axe held down by his leg, and his head thrown back in defiance, so that his great black beard bristled straight out in front of him. . . . Lessage cowered up against the table, with his agonised eyes fixed upon the blue-black square of door. . . . And suddenly I became conscious that they could all see something which was invisible to me; I read it from their tense faces and staring eyes. Toussac swung his axe over his shoulder and poised himself for a blow. . . . There was a moist pattering of feet, a yellow streak shot through the doorway, and Toussac lashed at it as I have seen an English cricketer strike at a ball. His aim was true, for he buried the head of the hatchet in the creature's throat; but the force of his blow shattered the weapon, and the weight of the hound carried him backwards on to the floor. Over they rolled and over, the hairy man and the hairy dog, growling and worrying in a bestial combat. He was fumbling at the animal's throat, and I could not see what he was doing, until it gave a sudden sharp yell of pain, and there was a rending sound like the tearing of canvas. The man staggered up with his hands dripping, and the tawny mass with the blotch of crimson lay motionless upon the floor."

The chapters devoted to the camp at Boulogne are like a procession scene in a Drury-lane pantomime. Historic characters shoulder and jostle one another. They range from Talleyrand to Joseph Linden, who eased the Emperor's boots by wearing them beforehand; from Murat, with the black whiskers, the red, thick lips, and the brown of Egypt upon his face, to the cook, who, never knowing the hour when the Emperor might dine, was always roasting pullets that one might be ready for the royal appetite.

Here is a picture of Talleyrand:

"A singular-looking person was shuffling in our direction. He was a man about fifty years of age, largely made about the shoulders and chest, but stooping a good deal, and limping heavily in one leg. He walked slowly, leaning upon a silver-headed stick, and his sober suit of black, with silk stockings of the same hue, looked strangely staid among the brilliant uniforms which surrounded him. But in spite of his plain dress there was an expression of great authority upon his shrewd face, and every one drew back with bows and salutes as he moved across the tent."

Every member of this brilliant company is subsidiary to the figure of the Emperor, who broods over his warriors and courtiers like a thunder-cloud over a field of harvesters. With Louis de Laval the Emperor is much pleased, and exemplifies the Royal favour by pulling his ear. Here is a fragment of conversation:

"Do they seem frightened in England about my approaching invasion?" he asked suddenly. "Have you heard them express fears lest I cross the Channel?"

"I was forced in truth to say that the only fears which I ever heard expressed were lest he should not get across."

"The soldiers are very jealous that the sailors should always have the honour," said I.

"But they have a very small army."

"Nearly every man is a volunteer, sire."

"Pooh! conscripts," he cried, and made a motion with his hands as if to sweep them from before him. "I will land with a hundred thousand men in Kent or in Sussex. I will fight a great battle, which I will win with the loss of ten thousand men. On the third day I shall be in London. I will seize the statesmen, the bankers, the merchants, the newspaper men. I will impose an indemnity of a hundred millions of their pounds. I will favour the poor at the expense of the rich, and so I shall have a party. I will detach Scotland and Ireland by giving them constitutions which will put them in a superior condition to England. Thus I will sow dissensions everywhere. Then, as a price for leaving the island, I will claim their fleet and their colonies. In this way I shall secure the command of the world to France for at least a century to come."

The minor characters are modelled firmly and broadly, save Uncle Bernac's daughter. I am not interested in Mr. Doyle's heroines. But his men are men. Still, he should be careful not to give way too much to the temptation, so fatal to Dickens, of over-describing his puppets. Some novelists do their describing for once and for all at the outset. Mr. Doyle does it perpetually. Take Uncle Bernac, for example, the rascal with "the gentle voice." He is introduced as "a very ascetic-faced, yellow, hollowed-eyed man of fifty, with prim lips and a shrunken skin, which hung loosely over the long jerking tendons under his prominent chin." Further on there are references to "the thin man," "my thin friend," "his lean smiling face," "this little yellow flintstone of a man," "his dry chuckle," "that stern emaciated face," "the cold grey eyes," "his skinny brown hand," "his death's-head face," "my uncle's grim face," "the little yellow face," "his sibilant whisper," "his jaw muscles that still throbbed with that stealthy rhythmical movement," and so on till the type is so fixed in your mind's eye that you are inclined to say to every man of your acquaintance who has a lean smiling face and a dry chuckle: "You are like Uncle Bernac! You are a rascal!"

Soldiers of Fortune. By Richard Harding Davis.
(W. Heinemann.)

Mr. Richard Harding Davis is that admirable and uncommon combination of forces—the journalist-novelist. As journalist he knows what is interesting, as novelist he knows how to present it to best effect. Moreover, Mr. Davis has vigorous ideals—he is in love with strength and cleanness, with "grit" and resource, with heroism and courage, in men; with beauty and frankness, with freshness and

[ADVERTISEMENT.]

Rheumatism, Gout, Gouty Eczema, &c. (Uric Acid Diathesis).

The diseases under consideration are caused by an excess of uric acid in the system. This acid is a product resulting from waste and superfluous matters in the blood. If the system becomes generally deranged, plethoric, and adipose, uric acid is generated in excess, and unless the system is relieved from it disease results as a natural consequence. It also accentuates any existing tendency or predisposition to other disease. It is probably within the knowledge of the reader that both acid and alkaline treatments have their vogue in the treatment of gout and rheumatism, and uric acid diseases generally, and it is a matter of certainty that they have all more or less failed in attaining the end aimed at—viz., a curative or specific result by such treatment.

The best method of treating these diseases has hitherto been the resort to certain mineral springs, mainly on the Continent. Here the patient drinks several tumblers daily of more or less nasty-tasting mineral water. The water only holds a limited quantity of the salts in solution, necessitating very large quantities being drunk to obtain sufficient dosage.

But what of the man or woman who cannot afford the expense of a Continental health resort anyhow, and what of the wealthier and busier patient who can only afford the necessary time at the holiday season of the year? Naturally enough, resort is had to the mineral waters bottled at the various springs, and these are, and ever must be, subject to many disadvantages. At the best, a very large quantity must needs be drunk to obtain sufficient dosage.

They are unstable in composition, and subject to deterioration from the action of micro-organisms. Owing to the large dose they are dear in practice, and they are, moreover, either nauseous or unpalatable to the taste, while being generally drastic and griping in action.

The invention of Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder now remedies all these disadvantages. By the desiccation and concentration of valuable mineral-spring salts, and the addition thereto of certain simple ingredients, the virtues of the most famous Continental mineral springs are reproduced plus several additional advantages. Kutnow's I. E. C. Powder is neither nauseous to the taste nor drastic in action, but, on the contrary, palatable, gentle, and effective. The dosage is always uniform, and the efficacy always the same. One bottle of Kutnow's Improved Carlsbad Powder represents the mineral spring salts contained in several flasks of the bottled waters.

In Uric Acid diseases, Kutnow's I. E. C. Powder acts by dissolving the uric acid and alkaline formation, and then eliminates the dissolved products from the system by the excretory processes. The system being thus relieved, and the production of uric acid retarded by the stimulative and lubricant action of Kutnow's I. E. C. Powder on the liver and digestive functions, the patient speedily finds relief in Gout and Rheumatism, because the cause of the disease is removed, or its growth retarded.

In Gout, by means of Kutnow's I. E. C. Powder and the carrying out of a physician's directions as to diet, the patient may so regulate and restore the functions of normal tissue formations, and so regulate the action of the bowels, as to ward off, mitigate, or even prevent an attack.

Kutnow's Powder is a natural remedy in Brain Fag and Weariness. It corrects the evils of sedentary habits, stimulates the liver to healthy action, whilst facilitating and lubricating the intricate processes of digestion, thus ensuring natural habit of body with return of healthy appetite and its consequent recuperative properties. "Hunger is the best sauce," so the old saw runs: and assuredly the best restorative to an overworked literary man is a healthy feeling of hunger and its attendant gratification, coupled with after easy digestion of the food eaten. Nourishing food, a good appetite, and healthy digestion are the surest and most natural stimulants to the brain, and Kutnow's Powder prompts the appetite and aids the digestion, and is thus advantageous to brainworkers.

"This is very strongly recommended," says Land and Water, "by many acknowledged medical authorities for use by sufferers from rheumatism, gout, and disorders of the stomach, liver, and kidneys. It is also highly spoken of as a corrective medicine most suitable for people leading sedentary lives. We are informed that Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder has been prescribed for HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS the PRINCE of WALES and other members of the Royal family, which affords an indication of the opinion of the remedy entertained by the medical profession. We have seen a letter from the dispenser of the City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest requesting further supplies of Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder, which had 'been used in the wards with success.' Having also seen autograph letters from the late Sir Morell Mackenzie to brother physicians of the highest standing, in which Messrs. Kutnow's preparations are spoken of in the most laudatory terms, we have no hesitation in bringing them to the notice of our readers."

A FREE TRIAL.

A FREE TRIAL.—For Seven Days from the date of this paper, Messrs. S. Kutnow & Co. (Ltd.), 41, Farringdon Road, London, E.C., will send of Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder a SAMPLE FREE and POST PAID to every adult applicant who names THE ACADEMY when writing.

Kutnow's Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder may be obtained in capsuled bottles, of all Chemists and Medicine Vendors throughout the world, price 2s. 9d.; or post free (in the United Kingdom) for 3s. from the London Office. See that the Registered Trade Mark, "Hirschensprung" (or Deer Leap), and the autograph facsimile signature, "S. KUTNOW & CO.," is on the label and carton. These ensure genuineness.

Sole Proprietors: S. KUTNOW & CO., Limited, 41, Farringdon Road, London.
New York House: KUTNOW BROS., 13, Astor Place, New York City, U.S.A.

youth, in women; and liking these qualities he also likes writing about them. Hence to those who are of Mr. Davis's mind (as I am for one) Mr. Davis's books are always welcome; because, although he is not subtle, although he lacks the genius of his master in the craft, Mr. Kipling, Mr. Davis is a good fellow and a very delightful writer, and he has the art of making his stories "hum," as his countrymen say. "Gallegher" is one of the best short stories that we have, the Van Bibber episodes are a continual joy, and "The Princess Aline" has more charm than hundreds of more pretentious fictions. In the present volume, "Soldiers of Fortune," Mr. Davis has given us his first long romance, and I thank him for it unreservedly.

The hero of "Soldiers of Fortune" is Robert Clay, a young civil engineer of extraordinary force of character, cool, brave, long-headed, humorous, in every way admirable—the kind of man whom the boys, old and young, that Mr. Davis writes for will adopt as an ideal. Add to Clay two youths, MacWilliams and Ted Langham, both full of enthusiasm and nerve; Reginald King, one of the Four Hundred of New York, a yachtsman; Mr. Langham, an American financier; Alice Langham and Hope Langham, his daughters; and then transplant them all to a Spanish dependency in South America in a state of revolution, where Mr. Langham has acquired half-a-dozen mountains of iron ore, which are being worked under Clay's supervision. Then involve them in the civil war raging in the State, and after hairbreadth escapes and some good fighting, bring them safely through, with Clay as the accepted lover of the irresistible Hope. That is what Mr. Davis has done, and done excellently well, it seems to me. Now and then he strains a point. Clay, for instance, is a shade too near perfection, especially for a writer who laughs at Ouida's Crichtons (he was brought up before the mast on an ocean tramp, and quotes "The Last Ride Together"); but Mr. Davis's faults are all for the reader's benefit. He never gives short measure.

The principal characters of the book are so attractive that one parts from them with sorrow. This is how, in the words of the intrepid MacWilliams, Hope is described:

"'Fine, sweet girl!' growled MacWilliams. 'I should hope so. She's the best. They don't make them any better than that; and just think, if she's like that now, what will she be when she's grown up—when she's learned a few things? Now, her sister—you can see just what her sister will be at thirty, and at fifty, and at eighty. She's thoroughbred, and she's the most beautiful woman to look at I ever saw; but, my son, she is too careful. She hasn't any illusions, and no sense of humour. And a woman with no illusions and no sense of humour is going to be monotonous. You can't teach her anything. You can't imagine yourself telling her anything she doesn't know. The things we think important don't reach her at all. They're not in her line; and in everything else she knows more than we could even guess at. But that Miss Hope! It's a privilege to show her about. She wants to see everything, and learn everything, and she goes poking her head into openings and down shafts like a little fox-terrier. And she'll sit still and listen with her eyes wide open, the tears in them too, and she doesn't know it—until you can't talk yourself for just looking at her.'"

One of the finest scenes in the book is that in which when the three men—Clay, MacWilliams, and Langham—after the escape of Madame Alvarez, are exposed in the open to the fire of a band of soldiers, Hope rescues them.

"As he spoke they saw the carriage plunging out of the shadow of the woods, and the horses galloping toward them down the beach. MacWilliams gave a cheer of welcome. 'Hurrah!' he shouted, 'it's José coming for us. He's a good man. Well done, José!' he called.

"'That's not José,' Langham cried doubtfully, peering through the moonlight. 'Good God! it's Hope!' he exclaimed. He waved his hands frantically above his head. 'Go back, Hope!' he cried, 'go back!'

"But the carriage did not swerve on its way toward them. They all saw her now distinctly. She was on the driver's box and alone, leaning forward and lashing the horses' backs with the whip and reins, and bending over to avoid the bullets that passed above her head. As she came down upon them she stood up, her woman's figure outlined clearly in the riding-habit she still wore. 'Jump in when I turn,' she cried. 'I'm going to turn slowly; run and jump in.'"

Mr. Davis has the dramatic gift: he carries you along with him. One need not wish for a better story of action than this. It may not quite be life, but that is one reason why I like it.

A Fountain Sealed. By Sir Walter Besant. (Chatto & Windus.)

Sir Walter's taste for love-making is incorrigible; he confesses as much himself, or, which is, I suppose, the same thing, makes his autobiographical heroine confess it.

"This is a love story; for my own part I do not believe that any others are worth reading. I am indeed sincerely sorry for all poor women who have no love story of their own. One must not magnify the passion of love, but certainly there is no other passion that plays so important a part in this transitory life, especially for my sex."

In "A Fountain Sealed" the ideal society is that of the Quakers, represented by the heroine's brother, in whom religious fervour and shameless pursuit of worldly wealth go hand in hand. Sir Walter has not hit upon a very original treatment of his theme this time. The heroine breaks away from Quakerism to the outer world of London, and becomes the "divine Nancy," whom rumour assigned as an early flame to George the Third. Sir Walter reconstructs the story as he conceives it must have happened, and puts it in the mouth of the lady. This is her description of her lover.

"I declare that if any young man (whatever his rank) bestowed upon me his affections in the springtime of my days, when I possessed some charms of face and form, it was not on account of any allurements or snares, but solely on account of those perfections which a generous and noble soul (all out of his own nobility) imagined in a woman all imperfections. The more noble the lover, the more heavenly becomes the woman of his imagination. Such a young man sees in the woman he loves a Living Well of Virtue, a Sealed Fountain, a soul all beautiful within and without. Happy is the woman who is loved by so great a heart; for even before her death she may be led upward so as to become an angel of heaven."

I am bound to say that this does not fit in with my conception of George III.; the Hanoverians do not lend themselves readily to romance and sentimentalism. And it does not fit in with the conduct of the story either. The Prince woos Nancy, who is ignorant of his identity. Everybody else knows, but nobody has the decency to tell her. A marriage is on the very point of being celebrated, when the Prince learns the death of the old king, his father.

"My lover, my bridegroom, who was never to be my husband, stood with his face turned upwards—alas! away from his bride. And his face was changed. There was in it a new authority—a new majesty—that of the Sovereign: a new expression—that of Kingship.

"Love had gone out of that face. It was filled with a new emotion. The young king saw suddenly before him the vastness of his responsibilities, the burden of empire, the vast duties. What was the simple girl beside him, in presence of these kings? War and peace, prosperity and adversity, the happiness of millions or their misery, the sovereignty of a great, proud and free people, their love and loyalty, or their hate. How could love survive that sudden shock? In a moment the passion died out in his heart, though the memory of it might afterwards return. He was the king. Needs must that he marry in his own class.

"... 'Dei Gratia,' he murmured, 'By the grace of God.'

"Then he turned to me, and his brother rose. 'Nancy,' he said solemnly, 'Fate calls me. I am now the King—unworthy. Pray for me. My brother will see thee. What has passed I pray thee to forget. Thou art all goodness, Nancy. Farewell. Be happy.' He stooped and kissed my head—and I fell back."

Of course, the story is put in the mouth of a love-sick woman; but I should have been glad of a sign from Sir Walter Besant that he personally agreed with me in thinking that his hero behaved throughout, prince or no prince, as a common cad. But, alas! no. Sir Walter is capable of irony, but in this book irony is reserved, not for the lover, but for the Quakers. The historian has his somewhat heartless comment in the preface:

"Youth is attracted by beauty of whatever rank: it must be pleasant for a Prince to step outside his rank, and for a time to be treated as an ordinary gentleman."

A Story-Teller's Pack. By Frank R. Stockton. (Cassell & Co.)

If one had in a single phrase to describe Mr. Stockton's work one would say it was inspired nonsense. His characters are such idiots, but such attractive idiots. They do impossibly silly things in so earnest and matter-of-fact way. They are such slaves of precision, so simple-minded and imperturbable, so far removed from any life save that of an asylum. Over and over again one is tempted to throw away the records of them with the determination to give no more time to such rubbish, but one is always prevented by curiosity to know what after all happens, for Mr. Stockton is never uninteresting. He is a master of circumstantial narrative, and though his style is as undistinguished as it can be, and his matter merely an agglomeration of trivialities, yet all the time (and one knows it) he is unfolding a whimsical idea which can be laid before us in its fulness only with the end of the tale. Hence we are bound to finish a story if once we begin it. And whimsical ideas are to some of us so diverting that we also are bound to begin the story. Mr. Stockton gives us what no one else can. He is the sole worker in his little field. That is his strength.

I cannot consider that "A Story-Teller's Pack" contains anything worthy to rank with Mr. Stockton's best. The level of "The Casting Away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine," "The Dusantes," "Rudder Grange," "Negative Gravity" and "Asaph" is never reached. But this new book is good fun. Its idiots bear the old well-known brand: one man dwells in a hillside house which in the night slides down into the valley below, and is stopped only by another house in which (of course) dwells the girl whom he will marry. Another sees a balloon approaching, and catching it with the assistance of a kite, finds a letter in it imploring aid for an incarcerated heiress in a distant state; which he, of course, gives. Another lets his country mansion to a family of strangers at a ridiculously small rent, and then visits the place every morning in the small hours in order to deck out the garden for the eyes of the only daughter. And such is Mr. Stockton's gift for verisimilitude that we believe in all three. The most engaging of the ten stories in this book is, to me, "Captain Eli's Best Ear," which is salted with the quiet humour that Mr. Stockton keeps for his tales of seafaring men. The most quotable is "The Widow's Cruise." In this piece of broad farce we are introduced to the Widow Duckett and Dorcas, her satellite, who are shown entertaining four elderly captains to tea. After tea the captains smoke their pipes in the porch, and offer to tell of the strange things that happen at sea. The Widow Duckett says that they may, on condition that their yarns are truthful. This is the first yarn:

"There's nothing happened to me and my mates that isn't true," said Captain Bird, "and here is something that once happened to me: I was on a whaling v'yage when a big sperm whale, just as mad as a fiery bull, came at us, head on, and struck the ship at the stern with such tremendous force that his head crashed right through her timbers, and he went nearly half his length into her hull. The hold was mostly filled with empty barrels, for we was just beginning our v'yage, and when he had made kindling wood of these there was room enough for him. We all expected that it wouldn't take five minutes for the vessel to fill and go to the bottom, and we made ready to take to the boats; but it turned out we did not need to take to no boats, for as fast as the water rushed into the hold of the ship, that whale drank it and squirted it up through the two blow-holes in the top of his head, and as there was an open hatchway just over his head the water all went into the sea again, and that whale kept working day and night pumping the water out until we beached the vessel on the island of Trinidad—the whale helping us wonderful on our way over by the powerful working of his tail, which, being outside in the water, acted like a propeller. I don't believe anything stranger than that ever happened to a whaling ship."

The other yarns being like unto this the Widow Duckett retaliates with a story of a voyage that she herself once made: a fragment of perfect Stocktonese, which I recommend to all who are willing to be led into the pleasant paths of frivolity by this delightful writer.

The Last Entry. By W. Clark Russell. (Chatto & Windus.)

It is not difficult to understand the attraction which Mr. Clark Russell has for many, even adult, readers. A good deal of it—all the part about belaying-pins and cabooses—is double Dutch to me. When I hear that "the luffs of the jibs were trembling," or when the captain shouts, "Brace forward the topsail-yard! Ease away the weather braces! Get a drag on your jib-sheets!" I remain unmoved, because I do not know what the emotions appropriate to the situation are. Also I am pretty sure that the conversation of the sailors is as artificial as it is coarse, and that the characters and sentiments of all parties concerned come straight out of Adelphi melodrama. But, after all, there is a yarn spun; and a yarn with plenty of vigorous incident, and some good knock-down blows will have its fascination to the end of time. This is the way a mutiny begins. The pork in the mess-kids is uneatable:

"Now, bullies, are we ready?" exclaimed Jones, in a voice of thunder; and he put the kid upon the deck. Dabb did likewise.

"Hurrah for a hot male of mate for the cabin!" shouted Simon Toole. "The boatswain and Dabb, each man in his boots, kicked. They kicked at the kids with all their might, and the wooden vessels rushed aft to the very feet of Captain Glew and Vanderholt, scattering their precious contents of pork and pea-soup over the smooth planks. Never was an uglier affront offered to the master of a ship. Never had mutinous insolence been carried to a greater height. Captain Glew turned white as milk, but not with fear. Well for him had he felt fear. Mr. Vanderholt was ashy pale. He called to his daughter to go below. She sprang up, but, instead of going below, went and stood right aft, beside the helmsman, to whom she said:

"What do these men want?"

"Their rights!" he answered, with a diabolical leer."

Besides the narrative faculty, Mr. Clark Russell has a breezy, wholesome love of the open seas and of the ships that ride thereupon. Some of his bits of seascape are almost literature:

"How dismal, flat, and gaunt looked the treeless Tilbury shore in that sad light! The very stars shining over it seemed to tremble with the spirit of mud and cold desolation. Shadowy shapes of ships went by, sometimes to a sound of music, as of concertinas and the like; tall phantasmal shapes, lifting spires as delicate as needles to the stars, loomed anear and afar. In the main silence lay upon that river, with its burden of living freights."

I should very much like to know what Mr. Rudyard Kipling thinks of Mr. Clark Russell.

East End Idylls. By A. St. John Adcock. (James Bowden.)

A not very fortunate binding, and a not very fortunate preface (contributed by another hand), nearly deterred me from reading "East End Idylls." But I found them much to my taste. These stories and sketches are clever, touching transcripts of East End life. They are not all "idylls," except as truth and irony may vary the meaning of the word. "Bob Harris's Deputy" is an idyll, and a rather touching one. Bob lived with his mother in a basement, and he was the best of friends to Dave Kirk, who lived in a room above. Dave had lost his legs in a gas explosion, and Bob, out of pure friendship, used to wheel him between Whitechapel and Dalston Station morning and night. Dave cleaned boots. I shall not tell how they both nursed a slow, silent love for Nell Wyatt, a sweet-minded work-girl, who lived under the same roof as these honest fellows, or how Bob asked Dave to sound Nell for him, or what came of it. It is, perhaps, the best story in Mr. Adcock's book. But "Salvation: His Holy War" is the strongest. It is the story of a coal-yard man who had joined the Salvation Army, and so won his nickname. Yet he gloried in his strength, and his ability to apply it scientifically.

"It's abart the on'y talent as has bin give me," was his way of regarding it, "an' I ain't goin' to git into trouble by wropping it in a napkin, like the man in the parable."

"Withal, he was perfectly sincere. He would sing hymns over his work, and take advantage of his mates being gathered together in the dinner-hour to harass them with extempore addresses, simply from a rooted conviction that it was his duty to do so. They relieved their feelings by chaffing him, and he bore it all good-humouredly; nevertheless, when Scotty, one of the gangers, took umbrage at a personal reference in one of his sermons, and proceeded to take off his coat, Salvation showed a very cheerful readiness to oblige him.

"Religion's give me a noo 'art," he explained, "but it's as plucky a 'art as the old one. I used to fight fast enough for the devil, an' I ain't agoin' to make no bones now abart fightin' fer the Lord. The child'en o' grace ain't goin' to sit out the dance when the child'en o' sin opens the ball. O Lord, strengthen Thou Thy servant's arm! Hallelujah! Come on, Scotty!"

"Scotty was much the bigger man of the two, but at the conclusion of the fourth round he declined to stand up again, saying he was more than satisfied with what he had already received.

"Shake 'ands, then, Scotty," cried Salvation genially. "I don't bear no malice; not me! Only let us understand—all of us—that religion ain't goin' to be made a fool of down this yard while I'm here."

But a doughtier champion of godlessness than Scotty, one Dick Fenby, who, from the elephantine caresses he bestowed on his children when they brought him his noonday meal, was called Fawther, appeared on the scene. The fight between Salvation and Fawther was a graver matter. Yet it wasn't this fight that revolutionised Fawther's way of life. Something else it was that conquered his healthy, heathen heart. One day he said to Salvation:

"'I s'pose there's nothin' as I ken do for yer, 'cept to join your dam army."

"That's abart the size on it, Fawther."

"Then blarse my bloomin' eyes, Salvation, I give in. You've licked me, you hev, matey, an' I'll join it."

"And he did."

Some of Mr. Adcock's stories are only episodes or sketches, but all are racy of East End brick, and most of them of East End squalor. "Helen of Bow"—the story of a young dressmaker who had to choose between Wat Bolter and his timid rival, George Amer—is capital.

Harvard Stories. By W. K. Post. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

Mr. Benson has recently attempted to portray modern undergraduate life at an English university, and his book, "The Babe B.A.," has, I believe, been very popular in America. Mr. Post, in his "Harvard Stories," attempts to perform a similar feat with the American Cambridge, and does it, I think, with some success. That it is possible for any man to give a complete picture of so many sided a thing as university life in a single story cannot, I think, be maintained, and perhaps, therefore, Mr. Post was wise to try to do so rather by a series of independent sketches, in order to show as many phases as possible of the life of the Harvard undergraduate, but the net result seems to me to give a somewhat one-sided impression of that life. There is too much of bull dogs and bets and practical joking, especially the last; while one gets only an occasional hint of a different sort of life, less careless and light-hearted and irresponsible, perhaps, but one by no means to be passed over in any picture of university life on either side of the Atlantic. At the same time there is a fair amount of amusement and some instruction to be derived from Mr. Post's sketches, and university men in England will find pleasure in noting the points of contrast and resemblance between Harvard and our own Oxford and Cambridge. This, for instance, is interesting as a picture of Summer Term as enjoyed on the other side of the Atlantic:

"June, June, beautiful, glowing, fascinating June, no doubt thou art tired of hearing thy charms sung by lovers more eloquent than I, but forgive this outburst from one who has known thee in the shades of Cambridge. Never art thou more seductive than where the old walls and stately elm trees trace their cool outlines on the turf of the Yard, where the earnest, eager students, prone on the green sward, blow upon blades of grass between their thumbs, and bet on sparrow fights and caterpillar races. The tennis-courts are alive; there are ball games on Holmes's Field, and the river winding through the green-flowing meadow (the tide being high and the mud covered) is dotted with swift gliding shells. In the long-fading twilight the bright-beflannelled and straw-behatted groups sit upon the fences and lounge about the streets, trying to screw up enough energy to disperse to their rooms and study for the FINALS."

Allowing for differences of detail, this is very much the impression one gets of Oxford or Cambridge at the beginning of June. Presumably youth is pretty much the same all the world over. Mr. Post's style is vivid, if slangy, but he occasionally runs the risk of being somewhat unintelligible to English readers, which is a pity. Here, for example, is a slightly cryptic passage about a visit to Yale:

"'I beg pardon,' said Burleigh. 'When you get back, I suppose you will refer to the Porc as your "spot," and if any of us who are not members asks you anything about it you will cut him dead.'

"Don't make any breaks down there about queer pins and extraordinary buildings," said Stoughton.

"They are funny about those things, aren't they?" replied Rattleton. 'But I have no doubt they can laugh just as much at us about lots of things.'

"Of course they can," asserted Holworthy: 'vide the Dickey. That institution is quite as absurd as anything they do down there.'

"'Nonsense, Hol,' protested Stoughton; 'whoever thinks up here of taking the Dickey seriously. . . .?' &c.

This kind of thing would be all the better for a few explanatory notes. But I think the book worth dipping into none the less for those who would like a glimpse of American university life.

The Wisdom of Fools. By Margaret Deland. (Longmans & Co.)

"The Wisdom of Fools" is the general title of four short stories, each of which deals with some problem of life and conduct. The first story held me. It is called "Where Ignorance is Bliss 'tis Folly to be Wise." In it the author searches—she does not solve—the old recurrent doubt as to how far a man who is engaged to a good woman ought to confess the errors of his past. William West was a hard-working clergyman, but "men felt that he was a man before he was a clergyman." Amy Townsend had come on a visit to the village, and had plunged into church work with the cousins she was visiting. "She found life too interesting not to meddle with it." They were to be married on Thursday, Monday afternoon had come, and William found time to look into the drawing-room of good Mrs. Paul, who had made the match, or thought she had. They talked of wedding presents, but the talk took its own way, as talk does, and ran brightly into a discussion in the laws of truth-telling—the obligation to confess certain things at certain times. Amy enjoyed it, as she sat scribbling acknowledgments of wedding presents.

It was a stricken man who sat alone in the rectory study that night. "It must be five years since I've thought of it," West said to himself. To be married on Thursday, and to be thinking like this in the early hours of Tuesday morning was his rueful fate. But he arose at last, and said: "It is nothing now. A repentant man has no more to do with his sin, for which he has repented and made reparation, than a well man has to do with the disease of which he has been cured." William West decided not to tell Amy. Then like a lover he went and told her, and a pretty mess he made of it. "The things I could not forgive you could not do!" said Amy to him, not knowing where she stood. For she stood on the edge of an abyss. West said:

"This happened long ago, Amy; when I was nineteen. I forged a cheque for five hundred dollars."

"Forged!" Her lips fell apart; she sat staring at him."

There were no wedding bells on Thursday. Two years later John Paul walked home one night with a fellow-vestryman, and they fell to talking on the story of those withered nuptials.

When at last they parted at John Paul's door, they wrestled with each other for a solution of the crucial question:

"You mean, abstractly, is it right or wrong, under circumstances like these, where no third person is to be cleared or benefited, to tell? Does honour demand confession?"

"Yes," said the vestryman; 'was it a duty to speak, or a duty to be silent?'

"There was a moment's silence."

"Was West a fool or a saint?" insisted the young man."

"I'll be hanged if I know," said the senior warden."

And there Mrs. Deland left me to my own cogitations. I fear I have told more of the story than I ought. But there are a dozen reasons why you should read it. And the three other stories are as pregnant.

Only an Angel. By Francis Gribble. (A. D. Innes & Co.)

This is a story of a man who was rejected by a girl because he was not one of the World's Workers. He declines to become one, moreover; and retires to Switzerland, while the girl gets engaged to a Balliol man with a mission—the Toynbee Hall kind. The Balliol man also proves unworthy, and by the time she also gets out to Switzerland the girl has moderated her expectations. While her lover is climbing the Dent Blanche she discovers that ideals are not necessary to happiness.

"I don't ask you any more to do things to prove that you are worthy of my love. I know that you are worthy of my love, because I love you, and I want no other reason. I should not really love you if I wanted reasons. And I do love you, and I want you to love me—to hold me tight and say that I am your darling little girl. You would have said it, dear. Were you not longing to say it all the time those people were cheering you up the village street? I knew you were. At that very moment of your triumph you were thinking that it was a poor thing to have climbed the Dent Blanche if, when you came back, you could not put your arms around your little girl.

"And all the while your little girl was longing for you, and crying for you, and could not let you know it. You thought that that other girl who stepped out boldly to meet you was the only girl in Zermatt who would be troubled if you slipped and fell, and the guides had to go and look for your body on the glacier."

Mr. Gribble puts his case plausibly enough, but I think I am on the side of the angels all the same.

CONCERNING THE SHORT STORY.

And by the short story, one does not mean the story that is merely short. The usual short story to be met with in the usual magazine is really a long story. Its author is a man of business, a manufacturer. He cannot afford to waste his raw material, he is concerned to make the very utmost of it. His raw material consists of things known in the trade as "ideas." Now when he is about to manufacture a short story he searches among the scraps, the odds and ends, the refuse of his "ideas," for the smallest and most worthless scrap that can, by hook or crook, be forced to serve his purpose. He picks up a meagre little incident, a meaningless little coincidence, a lifeless little invention; an "idea" of which, in conversation, he could give us the whole gist and substance in two minutes. But he must manufacture a short story from it. No, he must manufacture a long story from it. He must attenuate it to the length of twenty or thirty pages. And that, by dint of strenuous labours, by spelling out the obvious, by dragging in the extraneous, by insisting upon the irrelevant, he contrives—good man of business that he is—to do. Peace be with him; but the method of the short story, in the sense to which we will here make bold to confine the term, is a very different method.

You begin by taking not what they call an "idea" in the trade; not an incident, nor a coincidence; above all, not an invention. You begin by taking an impression. That is to say, you look about the universe, and you see something; and the thing you see produces within you a certain state of mind and a certain state of emotion. That state of mind and that state of emotion constitute between them an impression. But here is a curious circumstance: if you are a normal man, you are content with having got your impression—you stop there; while if you are an artist you are constantly possessed by a desire to give your impressions expression in the particular form of art it is your joy and your despair to cultivate. We are assuming that your particular form of art is fiction. Very good: that story is a short story, no matter how many pages it may cover, in which you have expressed your impression with the greatest possible economy of means. The manufacturer's economy was an economy of matter; the artist's economy must be an economy of means.

You start with an impression. But an impression is never a simple thing, which can be conveyed in two minutes' conversation. It is never an obvious thing. It is always a complex thing, it is always elusive. It is a thing of shades and niceties and fine distinctions. It is a thing in its very nature intensely personal; it is an intimate thing. And the artist who wishes to incarnate his impression in the form of a short story has a task of infinite delicacy before him. He has already felt his impression, but now he must understand it. He must study it, analyse it, dissect it, until he knows exactly of what elements it is made, exactly what elements they are that give it its peculiarity, that differentiate it from other impressions. He must dissect it, and study it, and understand it; and then he must put it together again. He must vivisection it, indeed; and then he must heal it, and see that it is still alive and whole. All this he must do before he begins to write. And now, when he does begin to write, his pre-occupation must be—the precise opposite of the manufacturer's pre-occupation. The manufacturer's difficulty was to make a small "idea," by dilution and adulteration, fill a large vessel. The artist's difficulty will be, by distilling and purifying his impression, to present it to us in a phial. Or, to drop metaphor, his difficulty will be, by selecting the essential, the significant, by rigidly excluding the unessential, by trusting as much as ever he may to the experience and imagination of his reader, and, finally and chiefly, by bestowing unstinted pains upon his manner of writing, so that each phrase, each word, each comma, shall be indispensable and right and effective—his difficulty will be to present his impression in the briefest space in which it can be presented without losing any of its significance or any of its beauty.

It is common in England to speak of Guy de Maupassant as "the prince of short story writers"; and a prince of short story writers Guy de Maupassant in all truth was. But we have princes in our own country; we do not need to go to France; we have in England the supreme prince of short story writers—we have Mr. Henry James. It takes two to make a masterpiece in every art; in the art of fiction it takes a writer and a reader. But if master-writers are few in this weary world, neither do master-readers grow on every bush. Mr. James's work is not to be approached by people whose interest in literature is superficial or unenlightened. It is not work to be taken up when we are tired or feeble-minded, it is not work to be recommended either to the man in the street or to the man in the train. But it is work which, if people who are authentically and intelligently interested in literature will bring their best minds to it, besides all the pure æsthetic pleasure it must give them, will illustrate better than any other work the special character, the special qualities, and the special artistry of the short story. Besides the humour of them and the pathos of them, besides their immense thoughtfulness and insight, besides the extreme beauty and felicity, the constant delightful surprises, of their style, Mr. James's short stories, as models of structure, as living specimens from which the anatomy and physiology of the short story can be learned, are certainly the best we know in any language.

You start with an impression, and you endeavour to express your impression with the greatest possible economy of means. All impressions, as we have said, are necessarily complex. Mr. James's impressions are especially complex; they are especially elusive, especially marked by fine shades and distinctions; and they are, moreover, especially personal, intimate. His method of presenting them must therefore logically be a method of especial refinement, especial sensitiveness; just as his style must be especially flexible and sympathetic, inevitable, and right. He has two ways of achieving the requisite brevity. One way is to throw his story into perspective, to remove it a certain distance back in point of time; then to tell it as one speaking from memory, who sees his vision through a softening medium, which blurs what is trivial and unmeaning, but heightens all that is salient and suggestive. This is a very charming way of treating the short story, and very beautiful examples of it (to cite but a few) are Mr. James's "The Solution," "The Death of the Lion," "The Coxon Fund." Another very charming way of treating the short story (and at the same time of achieving brevity) is that pursued by Mr. James in "The Lesson of the Master," and in "The Altar of the Dead." Here he represents his drama as passing contemporaneously before us; but he omits, he leaves tacit, he trusts to our imagination, everything that is not absolutely requisite to its elucidation; so that what we get is the very soul of the matter, in a series of intensely vivid, immensely telling glimpses.

The short story has never been, and probably never will be, popular in England. This for a multitude of reasons—some of which are obvious, some of which may be divined, and some of which must be classed among the ultimate mysteries. One very obvious reason is the vis inertia of the British mind. 'Tis the first step that costs, the initial effort; and the honest British reader having taken that step, made that effort, loves to go jogging placidly on for an indefinite time, and feels that he is being trifled with if suddenly called upon to halt. For his taste, the short story comes to a termination too early and too abrupt; its end shocks him as untimely. But another, a deeper reason, is perhaps this: the beauty of the short story is a beauty not so much on the surface as in the fibre. It is not a beauty that "springs at the eyes." Das Schöne muss gelernt sein, say the Germans; and the beauty of the short story is a beauty that one must learn to see. But the average man—and it is he who, in England, determines the immediate vogue of works of art and forms of art—the average man naturally enough prefers surface-beauty to fibre-beauty, prefers the beauty he can perceive with half an eye to the beauty which he must learn to see. No wonder, then, that he does not take kindly to the short story. The short story is no doubt a compliment to his understanding, but it is a compliment which he would rather do without than seek to merit. Of course, from the author's point of view, the short story is distressfully unremunerative. If you have got a "good subject," it will pay you better (and it will likewise be easier) to write a whole long book about it.

HENRY HARLAND.

BRUNETIÈRE ON ZOLA AND HIS SCHOOL.

M. Brunetière, editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, and the dominant literary force at present in the French Academy, has been delivering a series of lectures in America. His discourse on novels was the one most expectantly awaited by his audience in Columbia University. We extract from the Literary Digest what the speaker had to say about the naturalistic school in France. The development of the school he attributes chiefly to Taine. He said:

"About 1875 the naturalistic tendency, by the aid of Taine, began to dominate. Zola knew his real origin, while Taine helped him, but as soon as he saw that Taine had ceased to be entirely wrapped up in helping him he turned against his critic, and took every occasion to attack him, while, on his side, Taine became somewhat startled at the kind of disciple he had produced, and his last years were poisoned by Zola's success.

"On the whole the school has produced more disciples than masters, more promises than fruit, and has been more fiery than fertile.

"I cannot protest too strongly against the picture of French society given in the novels of Zola. His dominant quality is force or vigour of imagination, especially constructive imagination, but it must be added that never was any observer less accurate, less conscientious, less true.

"The peasants of M. Zola are not French peasants, his working men are not French working men, his middle classes are not the French middle classes, nor are his soldiers and officers French officers and soldiers. We have faults in France, but we have not this sustained grossness, this absolute lack of morality, this perfect cynicism which Zola depicts.

"His French people are caricatures, pessimistic and calumnious caricatures. He has neither literary conscience nor æsthetic sense. I do not deny him talent, but it is difficult for me to value talent when it lends itself to such ignoble tasks.

"A pathetic example of Zola's malign influence was given in the last years of Edmond de Goncourt, when the old man, wishing to be famous as Zola was, turned away—sensitive, Japanese, genteel man of letters that he was by nature—to force himself to write novels which are among the coarsest in the language, and among the most tiresome in the literature of France. Some of us protested. Style, good style, the only real style, has nothing in common with this alternation of brutality and nervousness that makes the style of Zola and Goncourt.

"Those who mocked us began to see about 1880 that we were right. Sarcey himself—who never sacrifices in the slightest degree his own opinion to the beliefs of his fellow critics, but who gives up at once any belief if he but sees that the mob has changed its mind—Sarcey abandoned Zola, his own disciples left him, and the severest blow of all was dealt to him in the rising fame of three new novelists.

"Guy de Maupassant began his career with coarse works of a rather puerile pessimism, rather dangerous but less bold than displeasing, for there is no courage in putting immorality before the public, there is only bad taste. Happily for Maupassant, he was a true artist, and he became naturalistic in the genuine sense.

"Pierre Loti, happily, perhaps, for us, is a wholly different man. The first of his novels passed unnoticed, but the last three, Le Mariage de Loti, Le Roman d'un Spahi, Pêcheur d'Islande, restored to us what I may call the poetic novel. His descriptions are incomparable, and they are never inventories, like the description of Zola and Balzac, and to this gift of description he adds the gift of genuine feeling. To see his descriptions equalled we must go as far back as Chateaubriand. Naturally, he was the kind of man to make us tired or sick of Zola.

"The career of Paul Bourget is the opposite of the other two. He is in cultivation and in curiosity among the foremost observers in contemporary literature. His two greatest faults are that he is too Parisian and at the same time too cosmopolitan. He does not know the French provinces, and even in Paris all that he knows well are the intellectual world and the fashionable world. Although he has travelled a good deal, he hardly comes any nearer than Zola to knowing what a peasant or a working man is; but he is superior to Zola in this, that he does not try to put them on his stage.

"His novels belong to the fashionable world, but they have psychology which gives them their originality. In that they are the exact opposite of Zola, whose personages have no thoughts, no reason, no conscience, and, while they may have physical appetites, have no other human characteristics."

[ADVERTISEMENTS.]

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's
SWISS
MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely proof against Carrying Disease.

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes:
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c, &c.

Neglected Indigestion.

The Evils wrought by Indigestion are so numerous and varied that to notice each and every one would occupy as many volumes as those constituting the Encyclopædia Britannica. We therefore content ourselves by pointing out some of the most prominent.

Thus we may name Heartburn, Flatulence, Water Brash, Vomiting, Loss of Appetite, Gastralgia, Gastric Catarrh, Constipation, alternating with Diarrhoea, Cramps, Colic, Torpidity of the Liver, and other more serious Affections of that Organ, Inactivity of the Pancreas (Sweetbread); all of which Affections of the Alimentary Canal are among the Earlier Symptoms.

Next we have the Diseases of Malnutrition—Anemia, Chlorosis, Leucocythemia, and other Disordered Conditions of the Blood, which, lacking in nutritious elements, can no longer supply the needs of the Tissues.

The Excretory System becomes affected and functionally deranged, and we find Gout, Rheumatism, Scrofula, Diabetes, Bright's Disease; various Disorders of the Lungs and Skin, such as Chronic Bronchitis, Pulmonary Congestion, and even Chronic Phthisis, Eczema, and a host of papular, pustular, and scaly Skin Affections too numerous to name here.

Nervous Disorders distinctly referable to Indigestion are very many, thus Neuralgia, Migraine, Chorea (St. Vitus' Dance), Hysteria, Hypochondriasis, Atrophy, and Degenerations. The Muscular System wasted through want of pabulum, and the "whole Head is sick, the whole Heart is faint." Such are a few of "The Results of Indigestion."

To arrest Indigestion at its source, and on its first indication of its approach, and to successfully combat it when fully developed, is, after all, a very simple matter.

Treatment: Take a dose of Guy's Tonic thrice daily after food. Continue taking Guy's Tonic until the Appetite returns, and all unpleasant Symptoms have passed away. Plenty of exercise in the open air is indispensable to a perfect cure.

Pay great attention to Diet, and follow the Instructions regarding this given in the Pamphlet which is wrapped around each Bottle of Guy's Tonic.

The faithful carrying out of these simple directions will assuredly result—in the vast majority of instances—in permanent recovery; or, in cases where the System has been irretrievably undermined, in relieving the more severe Symptoms, and making life at least endurable.

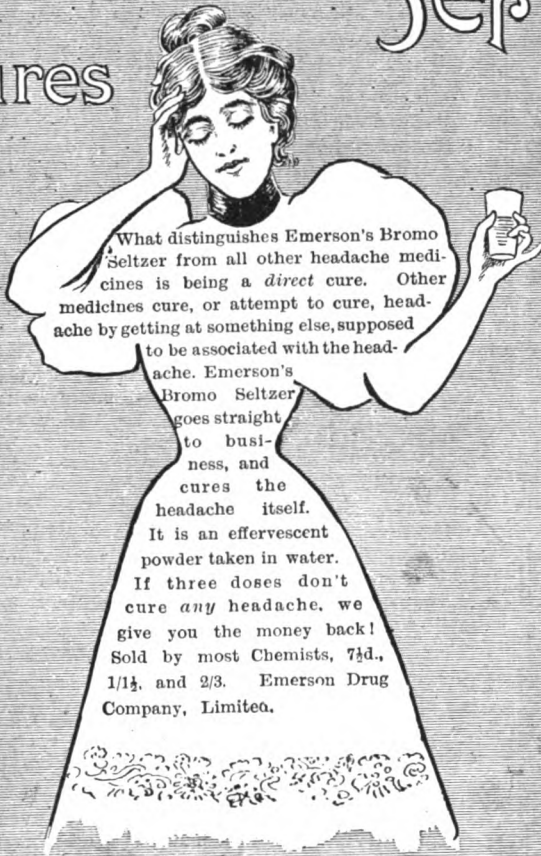

All Chemists and Stores sell Guy's Tonic.

[ADVERTISEMENTS.]

Emerson's Bromo Seltzer

Cures

HEADACHE

What distinguishes Emerson's Bromo Seltzer from all other headache medicines is being a direct cure. Other medicines cure, or attempt to cure, headache by getting at something else, supposed to be associated with the headache. Emerson's Bromo Seltzer goes straight to business, and cures the headache itself. It is an effervescent powder taken in water. If three doses don't cure any headache, we give you the money back! Sold by most Chemists, 7½d., 1/1½, and 2/3. Emerson Drug Company, Limited.

TALKS ON THE TEETH.--No. 1.

The teeth are not cleaned healthfully and properly by attending merely to the part that you can see. Almost anything will keep that right—even plain water. It is the spaces between the teeth that gather stray pieces of food, which decompose and inevitably lead to tooth-ache and destruction of the teeth by decay.

Only one thing in the world properly cleanses the spaces between the teeth, and that is SOZODONT, the fragrant liquid dentifrice.

It is so important to health to have, and keep, sound teeth, and so great a personal attraction to have a sweet, clean breath, that it seems a small matter to be punctual in the use of SOZODONT, which is sold everywhere (in neat Toilet Case) at 2/6. No one who, having a sound set of teeth, uses SOZODONT regularly has ever had the tooth-ache or lost a tooth by decay.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors, New York.

SOAP

is scientifically defined as the neutral compound of fatty acids with an alkaline base. Neutral is the important word.

Eeckelaers'
Toilet Soaps

alone fulfil the conditions perfectly. Excess of alkali renders soap caustic: super-fatting renders it greasy and disagreeable. A really skilful soap manufacturer makes soap neutral.

ASK the Perfumer (or Perfumery Department at "the Stores") for the following, in boxes of three tablets:—

EECKELAERS' BROWN WINDSOR SOAP	1s.
EECKELAERS' SPRING ROSE SOAP	1s. 6d.
EECKELAERS' OPOPONAX SOAP	1s. 9d.
EECKELAERS' BOUQUET DE VIOLETTES SOAP	2s.

The exquisite perfume and dainty boxing of these soaps peculiarly recommend them. Unrivalled in the nursery.

Mends Everything. LE PAGE'S LIQUID GLUE

Is used by Pullman Palace Car Co., Mason & Hamlin Organ and Piano Co., and by thousands of first-class manufacturers and mechanics throughout the world, for all kinds of fine work on Wood, Ivory, Leather, Paper, Glass, Marble, &c.

Awarded GOLD MEDAL at World's Exhibition, London, 1883. Pronounced the STRONGEST ADHESIVE KNOWN.

Sold in tin cans for mechanics and amateurs, and in bottles for family use.

IT MENDS EVERYTHING.

Wood, Leather, Paper, Ivory, Glass, China, Rubber, Stone, Jewellery, Metals, Shoes, Books, Card Albums, Toys, Musical Instruments, Statuary, Farmers' Implements, Furniture, Bric-a-Brac, &c.

Strong as Iron.

Solid as a Rock.

No Heating. No Preparation. Always Ready. Indispensable in every Family. Sold in tin cans for Mechanics and Amateurs. Half-pints, 2s.; Pints, 3s.; and Quarts 4s. 6d. each; and in bottles for family use at 6d. and 1s. Samples free by post on receipt of stamps or postal order. Sold by the Wholesale Trade generally, and retailed by Stationers, Fancy Goods Dealers, Grocers, Ironmongers, Chemists, &c., &c.

SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1897.

No. 1309, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow in due course.]

THE week's arrivals cannot be described as important. Neither are they many. The Jubilee is producing much literature and stifling much. But one book which it has helped to call forth would be welcome at any time. This is Mr. Percy W. Ames's edition in facsimile of The Mirror of the Sinful Soul, as translated from the French of Queen Margaret of Navarre, by Princess (afterwards Queen) Elizabeth when she was eleven years of age. Her Majesty the Queen has accepted the dedication of this interesting work by her great predecessor. Mr. Ames gives us a facsimile of Princess Elizabeth's translation in her own writing, which is the bold unsophisticated hand of a child. The MS. is in the Bodleian, where Dr. Furnivall pointed it out to the editor. Mr. Ames gives us this pretty account of the Princess's effort.

"This translation, made by Queen Elizabeth during her early childhood (which is in some respects the most attractive period of her life), constitutes an interesting illustration of her precocious ability. It is rather remarkable that this, her first literary work, should have received so little attention. It is not even mentioned by the majority of her numerous biographers, and in Strickland's Lives of the Queens of England it is incorrectly referred to as 'her elegant translation from the Italian.' The translation was undertaken during one of the many clouded periods of Elizabeth's youth. Some time in the year 1543 the little Princess had the misfortune to fall into disgrace at Court, and her royal father's displeasure occasioned her banishment for an entire year, during which time, as she mentions herself, she 'had not dared to write to him.' In the summer of 1544 King Henry went to Boulogne, and Elizabeth, on being informed that her step-mother, Queen Katherine Parr, had remembered her every time she had written to the King, wrote to her one of her earliest letters thanking the Queen, and beseeching her to recommend her to His Majesty, praying for his sweet benediction. Shortly afterwards, in September, the King intimated his forgiveness in a general blessing to all his children, and at the close of that year Elizabeth sent her translation, in all probability bound with her own hands, as a New Year's gift to the Queen. It may therefore be regarded as an offering of grateful affection."

It should be mentioned that the translation is in prose, whereas the Miroir of Margaret of Navarre is a poem.

Another book, which is composed partly of print and partly of facsimiles of handwriting, is A Description of the Wordsworth and Coleridge Manuscripts in the Possession of Mr. T. Norton Longman. Mr. W. Hale White, who edits the collection, hopes that these facsimiles of "The Brothers," Coleridge's "Love," and a portion of "The Ode to Immortality," will be useful to students, who will find that "the intermixture of handwritings, for example, is remarkable evidence of the intimacy of the relationship between Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Dorothy, and shows how much the Lyrical Ballads of 1800 owed to love and friendship."

The third volume (for March) is issued of the new edition of Mr. S. Baring-Gould's Lives of the Saints. In this volume will be found the lives of St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Gregory the Great, St. Patrick, St. Cuthbert, and St. Benedict. The frontispiece is "The Annunciation," after Francia, in the church of St. John Lateran in Rome.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

- THE PRAYER-BOOK ARTICLES AND HOMILIES. By J. T. Tomlinson. Elliot Stock.
WHO WAS JESUS CHRIST? AND OTHER QUESTIONS. By F. W. Aveling, M.A. Kegan Paul. 6s.
THE LIVES OF THE SAINTS. Vol. III. New edition. By Rev. S. Baring-Gould, M.A. John C. Nimmo. 5s.
HELPS TOWARDS BELIEF IN THE CHRISTIAN FAITH. By C. G. Griffinhoofe, M.A. Ward & Downey.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- LADY HAMILTON AND LORD NELSON. By John Cordy Jeaffreson. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.
FOUR GREAT RELIGIONS. By Annie Besant. Theosophical Publishing Society. 2s.
GABRIELLE VON BULOW: DAUGHTER OF WILHELM VON HUMBOLDT. Translated by Clara Nordlinger. Smith, Elder & Co. 16s.
THE MEMOIRS OF LORD EDWARD FITZGERALD. By Thomas Moore. With a Preface by Martin MacDermott. Downey & Co. 6s.
THE MISSION OF ST. AUGUSTINE TO ENGLAND, ACCORDING TO THE ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS. Edited by Arthur James Mason, D.D. Cambridge University Press. 5s.
THE RISE OF THE EMPIRE. By Sir Walter Besant. Horace Marshall & Son.
AN OLD SOLDIER'S MEMORIES. By S. H. Jones-Parry, J.P. Hurst & Blackett. 12s.

POETRY.

- THE SONG-BOOK OF BETHIA HARDACRE. By Ella Fuller Maitland. Chapman & Hall. 6s.
IN LONDON, AND OTHER POEMS. By C. J. Shearer. Elliot Stock.
ENGLISH MINSTRELRY. Vol. VII. Edited by S. Baring-Gould, M.A. T. C. and E. C. Jack (Edinburgh).

BARDS OF THE GAEL AND GALL. Done into English after the Metres and Modes of the Gael. By George Sigerson. T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d.

ART, BELLES LETTRES, DRAMA, ETC.

ESSAYS FROM THE CHAP-BOOK. By many Writers. Gay & Bird.

L'ART ANCIEN À L'EXPOSITION NATIONALE SUISSE. Genève. A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE WORKS OF WILLIAM MORRIS. Geo. Bell & Sons.

GLEANINGS FROM IBSSEN. Selected by Emmie A. Keddel and Percy C. Standing. Elliot Stock.

THE TEMPLE CLASSICS: THE ESSAYS OF MICHAEL LORD MONTAIGNE. Translated by John Florio. J. M. Dent & Co. Book II. Vol. I. 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

DREAM TALES, &c. By Ivan Turgenev. Heinemann.
THE FOLLY OF PEN HARRINGTON. By Julian Sturges. Constable.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS. By John Sinjohn. T. Fisher Unwin.

A STORY-TELLER'S PACK. By Frank R. Stockton. Cassell & Co.

HIS DEAD PAST. By C. J. Willis. Chatto & Windus.

THE WHITE HEATONS. By W. C. Scully. Methuen. 6s.

THE TOMBSTONE TREASURER. By Fergus Hume. Jarrold & Sons.

THE WAY OF A WOMAN. By L. T. Mead. F. V. White & Co.

THE WOOING OF MAY. By Alan St. Aubyn. F. V. White & Co.

MRS. KEITH'S CRIME. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford. New edition. Fisher Unwin.

PACIFIC TALES. By Louis Becke. Fisher Unwin.

SALTED WITH FIRE. By George MacDonald. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

A ROSE OF YESTERDAY. By F. Marion Crawford. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

TWO SINFERS. By Lily Thickness. Downey & Co. 6s.

A FLEETING SHOW. By G. Beresford Fitzgerald. Digby Long & Co.

SHARLETTOWN. By Captain Marryat. Illustrated by H. R. Millar. New Edition. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF GEORGE DRIFELL. By James Payn. New Edition. Smith, Elder & Co. 2s. 6d.

SCIENCE AND EDUCATION.

A GEOGRAPHY OF EUROPE. By Lionel W. Lyde. A. & C. Black. 1s.

LESSONS IN ELEMENTARY PRACTICAL PHYSICS. By C. L. Barnes, M.A. Vol. III. Part I. Macmillan & Co. 4s. 6d.

DYNAMOS AND ELECTRIC MOTORS: HOW TO MAKE AND RUN THEM. Edited by Paul N. Hasluck.

THE STUDY OF FRENCH. By Alfred F. Eugène and H. E. Durian. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

THE OUTLINES OF PHYSICS: AN ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK. By Edward L. Nichols. The Macmillan Co. 7s. 6d.

TRAVEL AND GEOGRAPHY.

SIAM ON THE MEKONG: FROM THE GULF TO AYUTTHIA. By Maxwell Sommerville. Sampson Low. 14s.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO THE TROSSACHS. Edited by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. A. & C. Black. 1s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MOLIÈRE AND HIS MEDICAL ASSOCIATIONS. By A. M. Brown, M.D. The Cotton Press. 6s.

FROM OUR DEAD SELVES TO HIGHER THINGS. By Frederick James Gant. Baillière, Tindall & Cox. 3s. 6d.

NAVAJO LEGENDS. Collected by Washington Matthews. American Folk-lore Society.

THE LONDON HANDBOOK: JUNE, 1897, TO MAY, 1898. The Grosvenor Press. 1s.

THE MIRROR OF THE SINFUL SOUL. A Prose Translation from the French of a Poem of Queen Margaret of Navarre, by Princess (afterwards Queen) Elizabeth. Edited by Percy W. Ames, F.S.A. Asher & Co. 10s. 6d.

SOME OBSERVATIONS OF A FOSTER PARENT. By John Charles Tarver. Archibald Constable & Co. 6s.

THE DOLMENS OF IRELAND. By William Copeland Borlase, M.A. 3 vols. Chapman & Hall. 5s.

RAMEAU'S NEPHEW: A TRANSLATION FROM DIDEROT'S AUTOGRAPHIC TEXT. By Sylvia Margaret Hill. Longmans, Green & Co. 3s. 6d.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE WORDSWORTH AND COLERIDGE MANUSCRIPTS IN THE POSSESSION OF MR. T. NORTON LONGMAN. Edited, with Notes, by W. Hale White. Longmans, Green & Co.

A SHORT GRAMMAR OF THE BULGARIAN LANGUAGES. By W. B. Morfill, M.A. Kegan Paul. 5s.

THE REAL HISTORY OF MONEY ISLAND. By Michael Flürscheim. Clarion Office.

A DOCTOR'S IDLE HOURS. By "Scalpel." Downey & Co. 6s.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IN honour of the Diamond Jubilee, the New Review becomes, with true loyalty, an illustrated magazine. By way of frontispiece, Mr. Henley offers a coloured drawing of the Queen from life by Mr. W. N. P. Nicholson. The world just now is full of portraits of Her Majesty, but nothing that we have seen so convinces the spectator of its truth to ordinary life as this tour de force. The Queen is walking out, accompanied by a Skye terrier; there is a hint of a back ground; and that is all. It is a perfect symphony in black and brown, and a work of very exceptional skill.

OXFORD's official ode, in honour of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, has been written by Prof. W. J. Courthope, who holds the chair of Poetry. It will be issued directly from the Clarendon Press. The publication will follow, in point of topography, Prof. Palgrave's Jubilee Ode in 1887.

MR. STEPHEN CRANE's account of his deliverance from the shipwreck of the Commodore, which is printed in the June Scribner, is a marvellous piece of narrative. The author and three other men—the captain, who was wounded, the cook and an oiler—escaped in a dingy. Mr. Crane begins his narrative on the afternoon of their third day. They were washed ashore the next morning. Mr. Crane's story is a remarkable study in impressionism.

IN referring to Prof. Sully's forthcoming book, Children's Ways, we said that it would be virtually a new work distinct from Studies in Childhood. This is not the case. It should properly be described as selections from Studies of Childhood with new matter. There is an amusing juxtaposition of announcements in Messrs. Longman's list which contains this intimation. Thus Children's Ways, by Prof. Sully, is followed by: "In the Press—The Professor's Children."

MESSRS. BELL have in preparation two historical works on architecture. The more advanced of the two, the publication of which will probably take place in September, is A History of Renaissance Architecture in England, by Mr. Reginald Blomfield. He takes up the subject from the first infusion of Italian influence into the sixteenth century Gothic, and brings his history down to the end of the eighteenth. The volume will be profusely illustrated with pen drawings by the author as well as by facsimiles of drawings by Inigo Jones, Wren, and others, preserved at All Souls and Worcester Colleges and at the Soane Museum, and also by reproductions from photographs of noted examples of building. The other volume is a history of English Gothic architecture by Mr. Edward S. Prior. Beginning with the transition from Norman architecture, it will exhibit the genesis of English Gothic and its relations to, and differences from, that of Northern France, vindicating its claim to originality and to independent development. The illustrations will consist entirely of drawings executed purposely for the work by Mr. Gerald Horsley.

MR. THOMAS HARDY is said to be meditating a return to his earlier methods, as some concession to that section of the public which is opposed to the treatment of sex problems in fiction. For his forthcoming novel, which is nearly completed, Mr. Hardy is still seeking a title.

SOME Scott MSS. of great interest are to be sold by Messrs. Sotheby during the month. There should be spirited bidding for The Lady of the Lake holograph. With it will be offered the MSS. of Tales of a Grandfather, Old Mortality, Castle Dangerous, and other writings of less interest. The authenticity of the MS. of The Lady of the Lake is attested by the statement, written in Scott's hand on the fly-leaf: "This is the original MS. of The Lady of the Lake." It contains notes in the handwriting of his wife.

THE announcement that a "Kailyard" version of the Song of Solomon is about to be issued by a North-country firm of publishers does not excite our enthusiasm. The charm of the old Scotch psalms is not likely to be repeated in this violent attempt to bring the Song of Songs into line with The Stickit Minister. A verse in the last chapter will read, we understand, as follows: "Mony waters canna slochen luv', neither can the spates droon it; gin a man wad gie a' the haudin's o' his hoose for luv', they wad be althegither scorned."

MRS. OLIPHANT's new book, The Ways of Life, which has been praised in the highest terms, seems to us notable rather for its preface than its fiction. The two stories of which it is composed are not in the best manner of this sagacious writer, but the words which introduce them and endeavour to justify them have much interest. Mrs. Oliphant thinks it time that more attention was paid by novelists to the sere and yellow stage of life: to what she calls the ebb. The conventional novel is concerned with the flood; but the ebb is as rich in material. She does not necessarily mean "the decline of life, the approach of age, or any natural crisis, but something more poignant—the wonderful and overwhelming revelation which one time or other comes to most people, that their career, whatever it may have been, has come to a stop." This is, indeed, a moment which makes a good starting-point for a story; and if it has been so much neglected by novelists, we must suppose that the reason does not lie in any poverty of the subject, but in the difficulty of treating a period of decline with vivacity.

"I HAVE often felt," adds Mrs. Oliphant, "while sick or sorry, and craving a little rational entertainment and distraction—which, in my opinion, it is one of the highest aims of the novelist to supply—that the everlasting treatment of the primary problem of youth, as if there was no other in the world, was at once fatiguing to the reader and injudicious on the part of the writer. When we want to be taken out of ourselves by the lively presentment of other people's difficulties and troubles, it is tiresome to be always turned back to the disappointments or the successes of eighteen, or—in deference to the different standard of age held to be interesting by this generation—let us say five-and-twenty."

"SINCE the public is fond of such small revelations," says Mrs. Oliphant, after a discussion on happy endings, "I may here confess that I have often begun a story with the determination to be high-minded—to treat my young lovers without indulgence, and either kill them or part them in deference to the rules of Art. But my heart has generally failed me, and I have rarely found courage to do them any harm."

IN the interview with a ballad-monger, which we published last week, mention was made of the rather pathetic search of an aged man for "The Big Meat Pie," a song published many years ago. The world proves too small for a song to be lost in it. For G. E. D. writes: "I remember the song alluded to, in 1850, and it was probably then rather new. The title was, I think, 'The Stunning Great Meat Pie.' It began, 'You've heard of the wonderful crocodile.' The song is very stupid, and has no merit whatever, either literary or musical."

TO-DAY will be published Dr. Copinger's exhaustive work, The Bible and its Transmission, on which he has been engaged for many years. Mr. Sotheran, the publisher, issues only 220 copies, of which only 150 are for sale. The book is enriched by twenty-eight facsimiles.

MR. E. F. BENSON's story of the Greek War of Independence is to bear the title The Vintage.

A NEW volume of poems, by "A. E." author of Homeward: Songs by the Way, will be published by Mr. John Lane under the title, The Earth's Breath.

AMONG the anthologies which the autumn is to bring forth is one by Mr. Frederick Wedmore, which will have for title, Poems of the Love and Pride of England.

Pearson's Magazine, which published Mr. Kipling's Captains Courageous, has secured a new short story, by the same writer, entitled The Tomb of his Ancestors, for its Christmas number.

Pre-Reformation Worthies is the title of a new book of biographies by Mr. William Cowan, announced to be published by Messrs. Elliot Stock very shortly. The volume will, among others, contain Lives of Bishop Grossetete, Thomas à Kempis, and John Staupitz, and it will have a Preface by the Bishop of Derry.

THE lady who has taken the pen-name of "George Fleming," and has written under it some clever novels, has collected from the old National Observer and New Review a number of short stories, which Mr. Grant Richards is to publish. Little Stories about Women is the title.

It is Mr. Unwin's intention to issue a set of ten volumes in which the whole story of the expansion of the Queen's Empire will be adequately narrated. Major M. A. S. Hume will contribute the first of these, a biography of "Sir Walter Raleigh." Other volumes promised are "Sir Thomas Maitland: the Mastery of the Mediterranean," by Mr. Walter Frewen Lord; "John Cabot and his Sons: the Discovery of North America," by Mr. C. Raymond Beazley, M.A.; "Lord Clive: the Foundation of British Rule in India," by Sir A. J. Arbuthnot, K.C.S.I., C.I.E.; "Edward Gibbon Wakefield: the Colonisation of South Australia and New Zealand," by Dr. R. Garnett, C.B., LL.D.; "Rajah Brooke: the Englishman as Ruler of an Eastern State," by Sir Spenser St. John, G.C.M.G.; "Admiral Philip: the Founding of New South Wales," by Mr. Louis Becke and Mr. Walter Jeffery; and "Sir Stamford Raffles: England in the Far East," by the editor, Mr. H. F. Wilson.

A NEW series, entitled the "Sylvan Series" will be inaugurated almost immediately by Mr. Grant Richards with a new volume by Mr. R. Murray Gilchrist, author of A Stone Dragon, &c., entitled A Peakland Faggot: Tales Told of Milton Folk. It deals entirely with the lives of the peasantry round the Peak of Derbyshire.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS have completed an arrangement with the City of New York for printing in their Knickerbocker Press a limited edition of the Records of the City of New Amsterdam. The set will be issued under the editorial supervision of Mr. Berthold Fernow, and will be comprised in six volumes of text and one volume of index. The records cover the entire period of the municipal life of New Amsterdam during the control of the Hollanders—that is to say, from 1653 to 1664 and from 1673 to 1674. The first volume is expected to be in readiness for delivery to subscribers in the course of May.

MESSRS. HENRY & Co. will issue at once a new holiday library, to be entitled "The Random Series," in twenty-six volumes, in which they propose to include a number of their most popular publications in fiction. The series will be published at two shillings per volume, in a uniform binding.

THE third part of the late George John Romanes' Darwin and After Darwin is in the press. The subject-matter consists of post-Darwinian questions, Isolation and Physiological Selection.

MRS. HODGSON BURNETT is making a further experiment with the eighteenth century manner. Her new novel, which bears a close relation to A Lady of Quality, will be called His Grace, the Duke of Ormonde.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. EDMOND DEMOLINS, in A quoi vient la supériorité des Anglo-Saxons, in his searching study of English superiority over the unhappy Gauls, betrays a fierce contempt of all the things the French, with lamentable levity, have hitherto been content to shine in: the elegant arts, cookery, the vaudeville, and the genius of dressmaking. M. Lemaître is eloquently remorseful of his appreciation of these futilities, which did not impede the German invasion, and have not prevented the incontestable superiority of the proud Saxons in all the sterner resources of a nation. To possess in the extremest perfection the art of writing will not, alas! stem the current of national disaster and incompetence, and while the vaudevillists are making us laugh at the traditional and undignified mishaps in marriage, and teaching husbands and wives the adequate measure of faithlessness they are to expect mutually, the enterprising English, M. Demolins proves, are marching across the face of the world, atrociously strong and flourishing and successful. They dominate Europe and the universe in commerce, industry, and politics. Meanwhile the frivolous Gaul wastes his youth in a vain search of pleasure, and middle age in a mean search of a dot. The dot is the real root of the evil. Poor or rich, a Frenchman demands of his wife not beauty, distinction, breeding, charm, talent, but a fortune equal to or greater than his own, with the result of an indescribable sordidness in family life. How can parents live decently with the future grasping son-in-law to satisfy? M. Lemaître would suppress military service as well, and the entire method of administration, and then plaintively asks, would all that suffice to transform a poor devil of a Latin or Celt into a fine Anglo-Saxon ogre? The book is a sort of political Sandford and Merton, or a tale of the idle apprentice and the good boy. One's sympathies, with an elasticity born of distrust and indignation, go naturally to the "bad subject," the unlucky poor devil who has the art of pleasing and of making us laugh, while the "good subject" quotes the Bible and seizes the gold mines of Golconda.

A new book by M. Paul Hervieu is an event of sufficient importance in this world of letters. Unhappily, his latest, La Bêtise Parisienne is but a collection of papers more or less fugitive, and only of relative value. There is, of course, the distinctive touch of Paul Hervieu to arrest attention; his mordant irony and original observation to procure us something new. The first slight essay, L'Artiste Rouge, comes appropriately from the author of La Loi de l'Homme, as strong and fierce a piece of work as ever has been written on the sex question in favour of trodden woman, which so recently took male Paris by the throat. It is a grim comment on the 11th Article of the French Penal Code: "In the case of adultery, the husband's murder of his wife, as well as of the accomplice, is excusable." Such a murder he qualifies as "a crime, a cowardice, an abominable self-fanaticism," scouting the middle ages, the jungle and alcohol, Visigoth and Ostrogoth. These brilliant little essays, more or less subtle and odd, show M. Hervieu at his clearest and lightest in style. The sentences are not overpacked and dense, as in his sterner novels. Their form is considerably less complicated, and here and there he yields prettily to a taste for colour and flow in phrase.

On matters of love and society, as might be expected, he has not yet exhausted his capacity for astonishing the amiable bourgeois. This peaceable and uninteresting personage seems to be the torero's cloak—for the modern French writer; and like the irritated and frantic bull, he must charge for the object. Every irregular situation finds him lenient, which, after all, is a reversion to the unpractised theory of Christianity. Christian law is nowadays on the side of the scribes and Pharisees, and the sinners and publicans are out of favour. M. Hervieu wages a fast war against the Pharisees, and holds the hand of brotherhood out to the feminine sinners. This is as it ought to be, according to the New Testament. Unfortunately, the average reader who goes to church or mass, and imperfectly understands, or does not even read the New Testament, will pronounce M. Hervieu to be a shockingly immoral writer. After literary art, a sense of justice is the last thing the average reader looks for in a writer; and both of these qualities are flagrantly evident in M. Hervieu's work. Subtlety, too, will be found an irritant, but the satire, being more obvious, and a grosser appeal to our judgment, will secure a fair attention. His definition of those two exciting new words, musferte and rosserie; vices as old and vulgar as society itself, will be useful to the English reader curious about modern fashionable slang. Musferte, according to M. Hervieu, is specially masculine; rosserie, feminine. There is more grossness in one, more malice in the other, but our own hideous word "cad" may fitly be applied to the "mufte" and the "rosse."

Writing of woman's conquest of the bicycle and the divided skirt, he says:

"Besides, women are in the habit of getting the best of public ridicule and of laughing it down. In the eighteenth century it was their initiative that determined the use of the umbrella. This invention—of a genius as simple as that of the bicycle—was adopted by them and then imposed by them, while its inventor died crushed beneath invectives, jeers, and all the enraged and defensive manoeuvres of the conservative instinct."

From every point of view M. Hervieu is a "feminine."

Forçats et Proscrits, by Paul Mimande, is an extremely bright and interesting account of a visit to the French penal settlements in South America. Whatever may befall one, there is some alleviation of the worst prospective misery in the knowledge that one is never likely to be sent to Cayenne. It is amazing that even in this cravatted and civilised period of humanity any portion of the inhabited globe should be able to gather such an accumulation of horrors about it as French Guiana. There is apparently not much to choose between the fate of underpaid official, proscribed, or prisoner. All enjoy the privilege of unlimited discomfort. One dreams of tropical splendours below the equator, but M. Mimande very lucidly and ruthlessly dispels all such naïve illusions. Filthy little towns, abominable prisons, the home of every foul disease, abject populations, burning and desert isles, miserable officials, leprosy, malaria—every evil odour of man and nature, scarce and pestiferous water, snakes and serpents! The book would be a just and kindly one but for the spiteful and needlessly cruel pages about Dreyfus, who reached Cayenne for deportation to the Isle of Salvation, one of the worst of the group in Guiana waters, while M. Mimande was making his tour of the settlement. The unfortunate man has surely been cruelly enough punished. A compatriot might pass that dark and silent figure condemned to such solitude at least in silence. But the arrival of Dreyfus is a dramatic and powerful touch in a series of bright descriptions.

H. L.

NEW BOOKS.

La Bêtise Parisienne. Paul Hervieu.Forçats et Proscrits. Paul Mimande.A quoi vient la supériorité des Anglo-Saxons. Edmond Demolins.La Macédonie. Victor Bérard.Madame Geoffrey et sa Fille. Pierre de Ségur.GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO'S
"TRIUMPH OF DEATH."

WITH the quality of this young Italian as a literary artist, English criticism will have to deal seriously before long. In Paris his works meet enthusiastic appreciation, while at Boston the social Puritan has demanded, but not obtained, their prohibition. Evidently an English translation exists, but it does not appear to have found its way into this country. Our information is mostly drawn at second-hand from reviews, notably the eloquent and interesting article by Ouida in the March Fortnightly, wherein D'Annunzio's work finds an effusive welcome such as she does not always extend to promising youth of her own nationality.

It was in complete freedom from any prepossession that the present writer attacked Trionfo della Morte in the original. The impression left after a fairly careful reading is on the whole one of tedium and monotony. Not many of the qualities essential to a great novelist are to be discerned in it, and those which we miss are of a kind which no amount of toil and travail can supply. There is complete want of constructive power, of ability to "tell a story" and make it move; and the character-drawing is weak. That the art of its author has been slowly built up—a thing of pains and labour—is manifest without the evidence furnished in the introduction. This last is extremely well worth reading for its discussion of the possibilities of Italian prose, and the statement of the author's aspiration to bring about a renaissance. With its exquisitely selected words and carefully modulated rhythms, this prefatory essay presents itself as a model of beautiful, if slightly self-conscious, prose.

But, indeed, no words are strong enough to express the seriousness with which D'Annunzio takes himself. The book, he tells us, is concerned with but one dramatis persona and his "individual vision of the universe." It must be admitted that by sheer piling up of detail a certain picture is achieved of the "hero" and "heroine." No great exploit surely for the painstaking artificer of a narrative in which the remaining characters avowedly are neglected! In the last catastrophe and in one or two situations which serve as foretaste of it, there is evidence of considerable dramatic power. The scenic accessories are worked up with picturesque vividness, if usually at excessive length. The evening scene with Ippolita and the tortured moth is overlaid with poetic glamour and with a weird symbolism. That D'Annunzio is accomplished in "realistic" scene painting might be expected, this trick being common to his school. In the elaborate study of a wonder-working sanctuary in South Italy, with its exhaustive cataloguing of foulness and disease, not one noisome sight or smell which belongs to sick and swarming humanity is spared us.

As psychologist, practised in minute and searching analysis of intellect and emotion, D'Annunzio stands high. But his appeal to us is clearly meant to be that of artist rather than scientist. And from an artistic standpoint we are justified in demanding more varied—we had almost written a less uniformly revolting—material for his masterly talent. From the main theme—an adulterous intrigue, culminating in murder and suicide, a case common in the annals of crime—the only distraction consists in a series of tedious and disjointed episodes quite insufficiently justified by the sidelights they throw upon the character of the "hero." Rarely, if ever, is situation or character illumined by graphic touch or flash of insight such as we meet in Stevenson or Kipling. The effect is mainly the result of accumulation, a heaping up of epithet and detail and analysis. Of humour there is absolutely not a trace. Any strong sense of it would be fatal to appreciation of this work. The picture which the introduction suggests of the artist burning his midnight oil through four and a half years over the architecture of his mellifluous periods, takes a grotesque hue as we realise that the subject of it all is practically the amours of a lunatic and an epileptic! Or, putting the case less coarsely, let us say that the minute dissection of the mind of a "degenerate"—a young man under thirty, hovering on the ill-defined boundary between reason and insanity—is not, whatever its philosophical or pathological merit, in itself sufficient to constitute an epoch-making novel. While avoiding the vulgar habit of confusing a writer's personality and opinions with those of his characters, may we not fairly ask that these should sometimes appeal to other than emotions of contempt or loathing? From the first page to the last, not one sign of courage or generosity or unselfishness is traceable in the character of G. d'Aurispia, no, nor of the energy, the useful attributes, which, according to the theory of his master, Nietzsche, alone are worthy to be praised. How can one even pity less sympathise, with the selfish, potent, despicable voluptuary, who only whine and cry and retire to bed when the mother appeals to him in her bitter distress and finally bolts without any real effort to give her help and redress? All the artistic and philosophical sensibilities with which this "hero" is credited are insufficient to win us. We have a conviction that these are mere drapery, garments which belong to Gabriele D'Annunzio, if loaned to a temporary purpose to Giorgio d'Aurispia.

The real tragedy of the narrative is the fate of poor Ippolita. Health had been taken back to her, she had begun to drink deeply of the joy of life, when she is forced out of it by the brute who had brought about her moral corruption. His grotesque obsession by the notion that Ippolita had corrupted him is probably an accurately observed feature of mental derangement. It is curious that Ouida should describe Ippolita who has but partially recovered from her serious maladies, as a woman of "splendid vitality"!

The disproportionate space given in the book to what may be called scenes of "chambering and wantonness," and the importunate obtrusion of their nauseating details, have driven even the French literary public to demand an expurgated translation. To an average Anglo-Saxon, nothing is more surprising in the imaginative literature of the Latin races than the assumption that these things can supply engrossing occupation to normal people during long tracts of their lives.

It is to be wished that D'Annunzio would turn to other purposes his remarkable mastery of prose. As critic and essayist he should rank very high. Embedded in the Trionfo are several critical essays, the subtle and suggestive thought of which is clothed in language of surprising felicity and charm. The best of these deal with music and metaphysics and the borderland between them. On mysticism, too, he evidently has much to say. The chapter on "Bayreuth and its Orchestra" and on "Tristan und Isolde" is a masterpiece of Wagner criticism, full of insight and intelligence.

Disquisitions like these are quite justly condemned by Ouida from the standpoint of one who credits D'Annunzio with the capacity to produce first-rate imaginative work. Her knowledge of his writings as a whole entitles her opinion to respect. But judging from this one romance, which is evidently regarded as a supreme effort by his admirers, the present writer can view him only as a critic who has mistaken his vocation. Is it possible that other readers of The Triumph of Death may have felt an impulse to destroy their copy, after extracting two chapters to be bound separately—the chapter on Bayreuth, and that which deals with antique custom and religion, their changelessness throughout the ages and their abiding impenetrable mystery?

JONATHAN SWIFT

From the Picture by Charles Jervas in the National Portrait Gallery

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXX.—JONATHAN SWIFT.

OF some authors it may be said that they and their books are one: their books are themselves. Of others, that they are less than their books; and of still others, that they are greater. Swift was greater; he was all that his books are—independent, fearless, straightforward, plain, a friend of liberty, a champion of the oppressed, witty, caustic, harsh. He was all this, and he was more besides: he was tender, he was pious, he was playful. "I love only individuals," he once said, and such individuals as he loved he loved with all his might. The "animal called man" roused him to such heights of hatred that he could write Gulliver; yet all the time his affection for a few men and women steadily grew. In the biographical introduction which Mr. Lecky has written, or more correctly, has rewritten, for the new edition of Swift which Messrs. Bell & Sons are adding to Bohn's Library, we are glad to find the humaner side of Swift insisted upon. It is too common to dismiss the great satirist as a black hater of his kind, unilluminated by any gentle ray. Mr. Lecky, in the small space at his command, accumulates testimony to Swift's fidelity as a friend, scrupulousness as a clergyman and the head of his household, generosity as an almsgiver, and thoughtfulness as a patron. Personal facts concerning Swift are few in number, and it is, after all, from one of his writings—a work, however, not intended for the public eye, and not, strictly speaking, literature at all, and therefore not, in the true sense, one of Swift's books—that we obtain much of what we know of his tender, playful, loving side. In the Journal to Stella, that running account of his life in London, of public affairs, of statesmen and wits, which for three years he kept for the entertainment of Esther Johnson and Mrs. Dingley, this side is uppermost. Swift put into the journal everything likely to interest its two readers, and with it the kindest part of himself. Without it our conception of him would be dark indeed; but with it we know him in his completeness, a man capable of rare sweetness and gaiety. Mr. Lecky, we might remark, disbelieves the story of the marriage of Swift and Stella, and he is severe upon Swift for his treatment of Vanessa.

It is pleasant to dwell on the sunny side of Swift's private life. So gloomy was it in the main, so darkened by moods of depression, so poisoned by misanthropy, that the bright days may well be given disproportionate attention. For a man of his temperament it can often have been no small effort that was required to bring him to the task of making merry for the enjoyment of Stella and her friend. Mr. Lecky, we are glad to say, also places himself between Swift and those who attack him over-zealously for obscenity. Swift's coarseness, says Mr. Lecky, is not the coarseness of vice.

"He accumulates images of a kind that most men would have regarded as loathsome, but there is nothing sensual in his writings; he never awakens an impure curiosity, or invests guilt with a meretricious charm. Vice certainly never appears attractive in his pages, and it may be safely affirmed that no one has ever been allured to vicious courses by reading them. He is often very repulsive and very indecent, but his faults in this respect are rather those of taste than morals."

Faults of taste and faults of morals are too frequently confused.

After a clear and concise account of Wood's Halfpence and the Drapier Letters, Mr. Lecky comes to this summary of Swift's literary style:

"Swift," he says, "was admirably calculated to be the leader of public opinion in Ireland, from his complete freedom from the characteristic defects of the Irish temperament. His writings exhibit no tendency to rhetoric or bombast, no fallacious images or far-fetched analogies, no timid phrases in which the expression hangs loosely and inaccurately around the meaning. His style is always clear, keen, nervous, and exact. He delights in the most homely Saxon, in the simplest and most unadorned sentences. His arguments are so plain that the weakest mind can grasp them, yet so logical that it is seldom possible to evade their force. . . . It has been often remarked that his very wit is a species of argument."

These remarks, although they bear upon all of Swift's work, have special reference to the pamphlets written for the benefit of the Irish people, of which to-day less is, of course, known than of Gulliver and the writings of more universal interest.

"Few things in the Irish history of the last century are more touching," says Mr. Lecky, "than the constancy with which the people clung to their old leader, even at a time when his faculties had wholly decayed; and, notwithstanding his creed, his profession, and his intolerance, the name of Swift was for many generations the most universally popular in Ireland."

So it is to be a misanthrope! On one occasion, it is told, Swift gave a guinea to a maid-servant to buy a new gown, bidding her to be sure it was "good Irish stuff." When he afterwards reproached her with not having spent the guinea as he directed, the girl produced a set of his own writings, saying that she had used the money for them—the "best Irish stuff" she knew. It is a good story to associate with Swift.

THE BOOK MARKET.

A PUBLISHER FOR BOYS.

CROWN-COURT, in Chancery-lane, has a very small entrance, but by asking people the way, and not taking their advice, I found the court at last. The editor of "The Boys' First-rate Library" was in.

"You publish a great many boys' books," I said.

Mr. Bubb looked as though he knew it. "Yes," he said, "we have several large libraries in hand. Here are some of our 'Boys' First-rate Library.' It is a penny series, and is our most popular stock."

"And is the demand for these stories as large as ever? Do boys really still revel in stories like this one, say, of Don Diablo, the Planter Corsair; or, Denver Doll, the Detective Queen?"

"Oh, dear, yes; they revel in them. But we cannot now print such large editions of these books as formerly. That is not so much because the demand for such reading has fallen off, but because we are obliged to be continually producing new stories which, when they begin to compete with each other, lower the average demand for single stories. We used to print editions of eighty thousand copies of the Deadwood Dick stories, of which there are many, but now we print only forty or fifty thousand copies of any new story."

"And do you have to reprint?"

"Well, we might do so in many cases. But our practice is to have one large edition and let it run out. A great many of our stories do run out of print; but we supply their places with new ones."

"And at what rate are you producing these penny—penny shockers, Mr. Bubb?"

"Well, we publish eight at a time; we publish eight stories about every six weeks. Here are eight new ones we are issuing to the shops. They are numbered, you see, 321 to 328, and they are Old Weasel Top; or, Sandy Andy's Life Run; The Land of Pirates; The Sierra Shadow; Powell's Pard, or, the One-Armed Giant, &c., &c."

"Who writes these stories?"

"Well, so many of them come from America that we do not always know. But we have our own writers. One, who is very useful to us, is a barrister. Mr. Harcourt Burradage, too, is very popular with our boys as a writer of school stories."

"And the covers, Mr. Bubb, who turns out these wonderful covers?"

"They are the work of one artist, and we know of no other man who understands the work so well."

"He must produce pictures which will make boys flatten their noses against shop window-panes?"

"That is the test, no doubt."

"I see. Now tell me, What is the prevailing taste just now among boys? What kind of thrill does it pay you best to transmit to them, if I may put it so?"

"Well, Frank Reade is the hero now. You have, perhaps, not heard of him, but he vies with even Deadwood Dick and Buffalo Bill in popularity. He is far ahead of them in resources, being an inventor who out-Vernes Jules Verne. All the Reade stories open at Readestown where Frank Reade, jun., has his great factory. Here, with the aid of a staff of scientists, he invents extraordinary vehicles, and then mans them, equips them with a pneumatic dynamite gun—his own invention—and goes off on some expedition. For instance, he builds an electric air canoe, and starts in search of the Valley of Diamonds, which is in the heart of Brazil, but is so beset with perils from savages, pythons, and gorillas that no one dares approach it. Yet it is known to be 'literally strewn with diamonds in the rough.' Here is the description of the start of the air canoe from the factory yard:

"A sort of ovation was given the young inventor in honour of his departure. The band played, salutes were fired, and cheers given."

"Barney and Pomp were already aboard the air canoe. Barney was in the pilot-house with his hand upon the lever which was to set the rotascopes in motion. He waited only for the signal."

"Frank Reade, jun., now lifted his hat to the crowd, and stepped over the rail. He motioned to Barney. Down went the lever, there was a whirring of machinery, the hissing of the rotascopes, the air-ship trembled for an instant, and then leaped into space. A mad yell went up from the crowd, cannons boomed, and Frank Reade, jun., fired a dynamite projectile from his gun, which exploded in mid-air. Then the electric air canoe set a course to the southward, and half-an-hour later Readestown had entirely disappeared from view. The great journey was begun. The air canoe was sailing like a bird through the air."

"And the boys like that?"

"Like it! I have letters from boys every week congratulating me or asking questions. They are just now much interested in a story which is concerned with a 'New Electrical Terror' called The Thunderer, on which Frank Reade sets out to rescue a beautiful girl from the hands of Mardo Turgi, a Tartar brigand. Well, you can guess boys like it. Open it anywhere. Here is a fight going on:

"But all to no avail. The voyagers with their Winchesters kept up a fusillade, and Frank once was able to sight the electric gun. A dynamite projectile piled the Tartars up in a heap, and then Frank essayed new tactics."

"He let the Thunderer forge ahead at lightning speed."

"Through the ranks of the foe it tore its way with irresistible force."

"They might as well have tried to hold a cyclone."

"Clear of the gang, Frank let the Thunderer run ahead for three hundred yards. Then he sent a projectile back from the pneumatic gun. It created havoc in the ranks of the Tartars, and they fled into the darkness, cowed and whipped."

"The battle was won."

"And does Frank Reade keep on inventing these terrific things?"

"Well, yes! His Steam Horse of the Great American Desert; or, the Sandy Trail of Death was a success; and his kite with which he performed a six weeks' flight over the Andes was distinctly appreciated."

"How many copies of cheap books of adventure do you issue in a year?"

"Oh, taking everything, that is to say, love stories and adventures in paper covers, ranging from a penny to sixpence in price, I should say between three and four millions."

"One word more, Mr. Bubb. What may I conclude regarding the—er—well, my editor might press a question, you know, as to the moral effect of these stories on the minds of—"

"Oh, that is all right. We are careful to see that vice is punished."

"Yes; but there is so much of it."

"And virtue rewarded."

"But there is so little of it."

"The proportions are much better than they used to be. Why, in the old Deadwood Dick days—"

"Deadwood Dick is alive still?"

"No, no; Deadwood Dick is dead; it is his son who now holds the field. Deadwood Dick—the old man—was a bit of a highwayman. I admit we had to get rid of him."

"And Deadwood Dick, jun., is moral?"

"He is a detective."

FOR A VILLAGE LIBRARY.

AMERICAN SUGGESTIONS.

LAST January the New York State Library, situated at Albany, issued a list of 489 of the leading books published during 1896. This list, which we extract from Current Literature was submitted to 800 librarians, with a request for an expression of opinion respecting the fifty which would be the most valuable for a village library. The lists thus marked were to be returned by March 1. About 200 librarians complied with the request, and the fifty books, divided into groups, are as follows:

FICTION.

Barrie. Sentimental Tommy.
Mrs. Ward. Sir George Treasady
Gilbert Parker. Seats of the Mighty.
Hopkinson Smith. Tom Grogan.
Kate Douglas Wiggin. Marm Lisa.
John Watson. Kate Carnegie.
S. O. Jewett. Country of the Pointed Firs.
Stimson. King Noanett.
Clemens. Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc.
Felix Gras. Reds of the Midi.
Robert L. Stevenson. Weir of Hermiston.
Frank R. Stockton. Mrs. Cliff's Yacht.

JUVENILE.

E. S. Brooks. Century Book of Famous Americans.
Andrew Lang. Animal Story Book.
Norah Perry. Three Little Daughters of the Revolution.
W. J. Rolfe. Shakespeare, the Boy.
E. O. White. Little Girl of Long Ago.
Crockett. Sweetheart Travellers.
G. A. Henty. At Agincourt.

BIOGRAPHY.

Morse. Life and Letters of Oliver Wendell Holmes
Barrie. Margaret Ogilvy.
F. C. Lowell. Joan of Arc
Woodrow Wilson. George Washington
P. L. Ford. The True George Washington

DESCRIPTION AND TRAVEL.

R. L. Stevenson. In the South Seas
Mrs. Earl. Colonial Days in Old New York
R. H. Davis. Three Gringos in Venezuela and Central America.
Lascadio Hearn. Kokoro

SOCIAL SCIENCE.

F. A. Walker. International Bimetallism
Herbert Spencer. The Principles of Sociology.
E. L. Godkin. Problems of Modern Democracy
M. P. Pollett. The Speaker of the House of Representatives

AMERICAN HISTORY.

Edward Eggleston. Beginners of a Nation.
E. B. Andrews. History of the Last Quarter Century in the United States.
J. G. Bourinot. Story of Canada.

RELIGION.

Andrew D. White. History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom
Lyman Abbott. Christianity and Social Problems
John Watson. Mind of the Master.

BELLES LETTRES.

Kipling. Seven Seas.
Eugene Field. Songs, and Other Verse
George Saintsbury. History of Nineteenth Century Literature.
Hamilton W. Mabie. Books and Literature

OTHER BOOKS.

Mrs. F. T. Dana. Plants and Their Children
E. A. Martin. Story of a Piece of Coal
C. M. Skinner. Myths and Legends of Our Own Land.
N. S. Shaler. American Highways
H. E. Krehbiel. How to Listen to Music.
D. C. Beard. Outdoor Games for All Seasons.
Poultney Bigelow. History of the German Struggle for Liberty
N. T. Peck. Harper's Dictionary of Classical Literature and Antiquities.

DRAMA.

FROM the elaborate preparations made for the production of Mr. Sydney Grundy's adaptation of the elder Dumas's play "Un Mariage sous Louis XV.," at the Haymarket, it is clear that romantic drama is going to have one more favourable opportunity of proving its alleged hold upon the public. At the Haymarket they do these productions excellently well. Moreover, Mr. Sydney Grundy, if not a creative genius, is an expert craftsman, and the dramatic material that he has to work upon in this instance is the work of the stupendous "Alexandre." If in such circumstances the romantic drama does not assert itself to some purpose, then it is, indeed, as its enemies allege, moribund. Mr. Henry Arthur Jones compares its dramatis personæ to so many pink dolls, from which the sawdust trickles as they walk. Notoriously, the author of "The Dancing Girl" and "The Physician" is also the author of a theory of the renaissance of the drama which has not been realised. Hence the tears that he sheds in after-dinner speeches and book prefaces at the contemplation of the drama in its present phase. For my part I am not disinclined to apply the puppet theory to all plays, including Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's. The immortal Punch and Judy drama, which has maintained its hold upon the public ever since its importation from Italy, hundreds of years ago, is carried on by avowed puppets, from which the sawdust does occasionally trickle; but that circumstance has not affected the popular patronage of the show, which still, in a humble way, competes with the Lyceum and the Haymarket. All stage characters must be, more or less, of the puppet order, and it matters little in principle whether the puppets are pink or drab—i.e., romantic or realistic. Nevertheless, it is quite possible that we are nearing the end of the romantic régime, though it is still too early to say what will follow it. The unvarying law of the stage is change. School succeeds school, and style style; the one thing certain being, that when the public are tired of one genre they turn to another, regardless of theory. Mr. Henry Arthur Jones had the good fortune to enter the dramatic calling at a time when the play of modern character was coming into vogue, and it was natural enough on the part of that vigorous and ambitious young author to fall into the same error as the fly on the wheel. Despite his efforts (and those of Mr. Pinero in his later or didactic vein) the play of modern character was ousted, to a great extent, by musical comedy and romantic drama, both being manifestations of a popular taste for colour, or what in one word may be called the picture drama with a musical accompaniment. This, too, in its turn is showing signs of going. To be succeeded by what?

Time will show. So excellent a judge as Mr. George Edwardes thinks the popular taste is veering round in the direction of comic opera. It is certainly contrary to experience that the drama of modern character with which Mr. Jones's reputation is bound up should so soon come into favour again. That the drama will in due time "renascé" as before, one need not doubt, but, probably, several of its familiar phases will be traversed first.

Meanwhile, one incidental form of drama that has been struggling for a foothold during the past few years may be dismissed as among the unfit: I refer to the wordless play. Now that "Chand d'Habits," the latest specimen of pantomime, has been brought, presumably, into perfect working order at the Haymarket, where it was an avowed failure on its first performance, I looked in upon it again the other night; and I do not imagine that this sort of drama, at its best, can ever be more than a succès de curiosité, of which the curiosity is soon exhausted. Thanks to certain accessories, which are rightly deemed inadmissible in this country, the piece enjoyed a considerable degree of popularity at the Folies-Bergère and elsewhere in Paris. The original Pierrot's dalliance with the operadancer would assuredly have been cut out by the Lord Chamberlain (whose authority, contrary to the general impression, is not confined to the spoken word), and the murderer's sufferings in hell (last scene of all!) would have come at least into the category of bad taste. All the essentials of M. Catulle Mendès' little drama remain in the Haymarket version. The murder of the old clothesman by Pierrot for the sake of a fancy ball outfit, the murderer's constant remorse, his visions of his victim armed, his subsequent scenes of gaiety, and finally his death at the hands of his ghostly persecutor—all these episodes are told clearly enough. But the effort on the part of the players to be understood, and on that of the public to understand, is too great. The dumb-show artistes indulge in a prodigious amount of pother with very little result; the spectator's attention is strained to catch the purport of a situation which a word would make clear. In fact, the most obvious feature of the wordless play is the shocking waste of energy that it involves. Consulting the "argument" afterwards, one is always made painfully aware of how much of the intention of both author and actors the most assiduous watchfulness has failed to detect. At all events, that is my experience of the pantomimic art. The playgoer who visits a wordless play is like the pugilist who goes into a fight with one hand tied behind his back. He voluntarily deprives himself of one of his most useful faculties, hearing; and a curious effect of this is, that he dare not take his eyes off the performer, even to exchange a word with his neighbour, on pain of losing the thread of the wordless discourse. Finally, there is the headache to reckon with that the unwonted strain upon the attention inevitably produces. No; the wordless play can never be aught but a curiosity. It is no vital section of the drama, and can only be tolerated when, as in the ballet d'action, it is supplemented with dancing and music.

WHAT with Mlle. Jane May, who is already giving her French repertory at the Royalty, and Mme. Sarah Bernhardt and Mme. Réjane, who are presently coming—the one to the Adelphi (of all places in the world) and the other to the Lyric—there will be something like a surfeit of French plays at the latter end of the season. There is also an Austrian Company expected, with a repertory of German plays. Added to which we have the excellent American Company playing in "Secret Service," and Daly's Company, also hailing from New York, who are about to put in an appearance. "Something too much of this," surely! The Diamond Jubilee is bringing crowds of strangers to London; but if their taste is for the theatre, it must be English plays more than any other that they wish to see. And so far the Jubilee seems to be taking public attention away from the theatre. On all hands the cry is raised that theatrical business is bad. This is probably the result of permanent causes as well as of the interest excited by the celebration of the sixtieth year of the Queen's reign. The craze for bicycling and other kinds of athletics now withdraws from the theatre nightly thousands of people who ten or fifteen years ago would have sought their amusement there. For many years past the theatrical season has sought to keep pace with the fashionable season. Presently, theatre managers may be constrained to revert to the custom of thirty or forty years ago, when in summer and autumn the shutters were put up for months at a stretch at all the higher class houses. J. F. N.

MUSIC.

"L'ATTAQUE DU MOULIN" was performed at Covent Garden on Saturday evening. When M. Bruneau's earlier work, "Le Rêve," was produced here, now some seasons back, few admired it, while many abused it. The composer, carried away by his story, certainly wrote, regardless of all musical grammar, chords and progressions which caused capellmeister hair to stand on end, and which offended even critics of very liberal views. But the dramatic power of the music was great. "L'Attaque du Moulin" is an exceedingly clever work, although, in spite of its many interesting points, it does not appear to me so spontaneous, so entrainant as its predecessor. The mystic story of "Le Rêve," as one would imagine, lends itself more directly to music than that of the Mill, with its sights and sounds of horrid war. The one tends towards the ideal, the other towards the real. Whatever one may think of the "Attaque du Moulin," as the work of an earnest, able composer, it well deserves to be heard. The performance on Saturday, with M. Scaramberg as Dominique, M. Noté as Merlier, Miss Palliser as Françoise, and Miss Brema as Marcelline, was under the careful direction of M. Flon, but it did not come up to the high standard reached when the work was produced here three years ago. I wonder when "Le Rêve" will be heard here again. The fact that it originally caused such diversity of opinion seems to argue in its favour. Why should the work not have another trial?

DR. RICHTER gave his second concert at St. James's Hall on Monday evening. The announcement, even of a new Cowen Symphony and a pianist hailing from the north, would not have tempted me from "Die Meistersinger," announced at Covent Garden for that evening. But Mr. Jean de Reszke was indisposed, and the opera changed to "Tannhäuser"; and thus, after all, I heard the new Symphony and the new pianist. To the latter was assigned an earlier place in the programme, and I therefore deal with him first. There are so many pianists nowadays, and so many good ones, that a new comer must really be something quite out of the way to attract general attention. M. Gabrilowitsch, a pupil first of Rubinstein and afterwards of Leschetitzky, played Tchaikowsky's Concerto in B flat minor in so intelligent and brilliant a manner that he at once took his audience; as it were, by storm. The Concerto itself, with its characteristic thematic material, its ruggedness, fire, and, at times, pathos, is highly interesting, and yet in the piano-forte solo part the bravura element is so conspicuous that it is no true test of a player's intellectual and emotional powers. In all matters relating to technique, M. Gabrilowitsch, although quite young, is a master. He performs great difficulties with surprising ease, while to agility he unites precision. He is not lacking in power, and yet plays at times with extreme delicacy. So far, his success is great, and it only remains to be seen whether he will give as good an account of himself in music of a severer stamp. Mr. F. H. Cowen's Symphony is his sixth, and it bears the title "Idyllic." The composer has given no programme. Mr. C. A. Barry, the analyst, has, however, suggested a line of thought more or less in keeping with the music. Mr. Cowen can write gracefully, and he has good feeling for tone-colour, yet these qualities do not go far in the making of a symphony. His material is not strong enough, his developments are not rich enough, for music of this kind. I feel convinced that if Mr. Cowen had entitled his work a Suite, had written with greater freedom, and condensed the third, and especially the closing movement, the result would have been far more satisfactory. The performance under Richter's direction was only moderately good. On the other hand, the conductor's rendering of Dvorák's three overtures—"In der Natur," "Carneval," and "Otello"—was excellent. Richter's programmes are, as a rule, of reasonable length; this one, however, was too long. It is better, to say nothing of quality, to give too little than too much.

THE last Symphony Concert of the present season was given on Saturday at the Queen's Hall. It is not a fortnight back since Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" was performed under Richter's direction. Mr. Wood has, of course, studied the German conductor's rendering, and to such good purpose that, if I had never heard Richter's reading, I should be exceedingly pleased with that of Mr. Wood. On Saturday, however, the comparison was too close to be altogether comfortable. If Mr. Wood considers Richter so good a model as regards reading—and certainly he could not have a better one—he might at the same time try and copy his quiet, dignified manner. Earnestness may excuse Mr. Wood's mannerisms, but the sooner he gets rid of them the better. With such a man plain speaking is the only course; he is highly gifted, and has a splendid opportunity, of which he ought to make the best possible use. Mme. Marchesi sang Saint Saëns' "La Fiancée du Timbalier." This fine setting of Victor Hugo's famous ballad, composed nearly twenty years ago, was heard for the first time in London. The admirable declamation of the vocalist, and the effective rendering of the picturesque accompaniment, were fully appreciated by the audience. Mme. Marchesi was less successful in a Recit and Aria from Berlioz' "Les Troyens," but this is music which loses much apart from the stage. M. Gregorowitsch, a clever, though somewhat impulsive player, gave a highly successful performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

MR. SEVADJIAN is a pianist of considerable attainments. He has a sympathetic touch, also good technique, though by his peculiar style of playing he scarcely does justice to himself—to say nothing of the masters whose music he interprets. His reading, for instance, of Schubert's B minor Menuet, at his second concert on Tuesday, was altogether spoilt by jerky movements of the hands and by over-refinement. He played a very long Liszt piece entitled "Après une Lecture de Dante," which, were the poet unknown, would scarcely tempt anyone to study his works. Liszt at his best is highly attractive; at his worst he is most aggravating. M. Sevadjian played some "Airs Arméniens," arranged for piano. The melodies and rhythms, thoroughly Eastern in character, proved interesting; but one cannot properly judge of national music thus presented in transcription form.

MISS CLARA MAISEY and Mr. Alfred Maurice gave a concert at the Steinway Hall, on Tuesday evening. The lady, who studied at the Royal Academy of Music, and who won a gold medal, has a contralto voice of good, sympathetic quality. She sings with much taste, and her clear enunciation of words certainly deserves mention, for it is a quality none too common. Mr. A. Maurice has a sonorous voice, which was heard to advantage in Allitsen's "Song of Thanksgiving." Miss J. Crompton opened the concert with short pianoforte solos. She has good execution, but her playing lacks warmth.

SCIENCE.

BY an oversight I alluded last week, in speaking of Lord Kelvin's discourse, to M. Henri Becquerel as "the late M. Becquerel." I regret that I did not become aware of the slip until it was too late to correct it.

THE report of the medical superintendents to the Metropolitan Asylums Board, on anti-toxin, which was issued last week, has been looked for by many to whom the results of the previous year (1895) had appeared promising, but not entirely convincing. In the words of the superintendents themselves, the results go to show that in anti-toxin "we possess a remedy of distinctly—we might now say much—greater value in the treatment of diphtheria than any other with which we are acquainted." As compared with 1894 (the year immediately preceding the introduction of the serum treatment in the hospitals belonging to the Board) the total percentage of mortality in diphtheria cases has fallen from 29.6 to 20.8, and the infant mortality alone from 47.4 to 30.2. The most remarkable diminution, however, lies in the cases following scarlatina, where the mortality which has stood for five years prior to 1894 at 50 per cent. drops suddenly to 5. There is only one hospital out of all those governed by the Metropolitan Asylums Board in which the diphtheria mortality shows no improvement, and that is one in which the serum treatment is little employed. The report is distinctly encouraging, and leads one to hope that with still more experience, and greater facilities for grappling with cases in the earliest stage, this deadly disease will in time be shorn of its terrors. As Mrs. Garrett Anderson, speaking to the East Anglian branch of the British Medical Association, said,

"it does not need much imagination to realise how the world would be helped and its sorrows lightened if cancer, consumption, and diphtheria could be brought under control in the same measure as small-pox, thanks to Jenner, has been brought."

There are many ways of forwarding this end, but one of them is not to rail at and abuse the men who with their lives in their hands are working out its accomplishment.

THE case of the Western congregation which sued and recovered damages from a preacher, for injury to lambs caused by his praying for rain, is a rare instance of contact between human professions and practice. It is paralleled in a sort of way by the action of a local government auditor in declining to pass the fees paid by the Urban District Council of Amptill, in Bedfordshire, to a professional "water-diviner." Most people, probably, are inclined to believe that there "is something in water-divining," because it is so ancient, and because it sounds so absurd that if there were nothing in it it could not possibly exist. The proceedings of the medium in question were

"to spread his arms out, and walk slowly over the ground. Suddenly he would stop as though he felt a shock, and it was there that he located a spring. He would then step backwards and forwards to ascertain the depth of the spring, and the volume of water."

We miss the familiar peeled rod which waggles and bends automatically when water is reached, but doubtless the outspread arms are a good substitute, especially as the diviner "guaranteed his business to be genuine." Unfortunately the objectors produced stern geological plans and sections to show that if the diviner's recommendations were carried out the council would have bored into a stratum of Oxford clay, of which the depth had never been ascertained before 700 feet, and then without finding water. The auditor's ruling, however, was based on simpler grounds than this: he objected to speculative experiments, and quoted judgments to the effect that "the pretence of power, moral, physical, or supernatural, was intent to obtain money, was sufficient to constitute an offence within the meaning of the law."

ONE more refractory gas has yielded to the liquefying influence of extremely low temperatures. In a communication made this week to the Académie des Sciences at Paris, M. Moissan announced that he and Prof. Dewar had succeeded in liquefying fluorine at about minus 185 degrees centigrade. The fluorine is first passed into an apparatus kept by means of liquid oxygen at a temperature of minus 180 degrees. At this point it will not liquefy; but when a lower temperature still is reached by exhausting the gas above the liquid oxygen, liquefaction of the fluorine sets in, and a clear yellow mobile fluid is obtained. This fluid lacks many of the distinguishing characteristics of fluorine gas. It does not attack glass, silicon, sulphur, or phosphorus. It retains, however, its affinity for hydrogen, and attacks carburetted hydrogen. Prof. Dewar may be congratulated on being able to assist M. Moissan in the really remarkable investigations which have won for him a Royal Society medal, and which henceforward no doubt will bear the joint names. In the same way his apparatus has proved most useful in enabling Prof. Fleming to extend his valuable researches on the electrical behaviour of metals at different temperatures. H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. FRANCIS THOMPSON'S "NEW POEMS."

In his wish to display Mr. Thompson pre-eminently as a teacher, your reviewer, it feels, was tempted to pass over qualities of the young poet's work which some of his admirers consider of higher importance than his "essential Christianity." After all, a poet's first message is beauty. It is beauty, either of thought or form, which the reader of poetry desires, and which carries the poet into our hearts and homes. Mr. Thompson's mysticism is for the few: his noble phrases and swift similes are for the many; and I cannot but wish that your reviewer had pointed to more of these. Here and there in reading Mr. Thompson's New Poems one is struck by extraordinary subtleties of vision, and exquisite or tremendous collocations of words—a circumstance which, taken with the too poetic and consciously architectonic character of his spiritual verse, makes him for the present, a poet of lines and passages rather than a poet of poems (if this distinction is clear). It is because I want him to be also a poet of poems, haunting or helpful, that I regret that so much was said in your critic in praise of his mystical and personal side, to the exclusion of any words urging him to a more universal utterance.

What we want from a poet—the anointed man—is poetry touching experiences that are common to us all. Mr. Thompson gives us glimpses of his power to supply this need. Here are in this book a few lyrics, simple in conception and treatment, of a kind with which his name is not usually associated. I cannot help regretting that your reviewer gave no attention to these poems. For example, there is a wonderful love fragment, fit to be remembered with the famous scene of Sebald and Ottima in Pippa Passes, called “Love Declared,” of which these are the opening lines:

I looked, she drooped, and neither spake, and cold,
We stood, how unlike all forecasted thought
Of that desired minute! Then I leaned Doubting; whereat she lifted—oh, brave eyes
Unfrighted:—forward like a wind-blown flame
Came bosom and mouth to mine!

That falling kiss

Touching long-laid expectation, all went up
Suddenly into passion; yea, the night
Caught, blazed, and wrapt us round in vibrant flame.”

There is a charmingly fanciful “Nocturn,” perfect in its daintiness, wherein the poet shows all nature mated save himself:

“The heaven hath the earth
Its own and all apart;
The hushed pool holdeth
A star to its heart.”

There is a matter of twenty-two lines, delicate as point-lace—a miracle of workmanship—called “To a Snow-flake.” There is a “May Burden,” with the very pulse of May in it. Compared with the altitude to which Mr. Thompson soars in his “spiritual” poems, these pieces are lowly indeed; but they are universal, and I wish that your reviewer had counselled Mr. Thompson to clip his wings a little, and stoop oftener to this humbler plane. He needs such a stimulus; the temptations of resonance and metaphysics combined may be too much for him; and we, moreover, are in want of another true poet!

L.

SCOTS DIALECT.

Your critic of to-day is good enough to tell me that Mr. Ross's speech in A Rogue's Conscience may be Choctaw but is not Scotch. He cites certain words in which the short e is substituted for the short i, and one in which the short a is broadened into ah. That these are among the commonest characteristics of Scottish speech everybody whose ears are of the average length and delicacy knows. If your reviewer has been hurled into his London exile by a catapult, and has had no time to note these matters in his too rapid progress southwards, I shall be glad to instruct him. I phoneticise his dialect as it sounds to a cosmopolitan ear. It is excusable in him to be ignorant, but it is not worth his while to display ignorance publicly, or to be complacently insolent in its manifestation.

DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY.

Our Reviewer, to whom we submitted Mr. Christie Murray's letter, writes in reply:

To the delicate humour of Mr. Christie Murray's criticism I have but one word in reply. The writing of dialect, and especially of a classical dialect like the Scots, has been conventionalised—that is, certain words are spelled in a half-phonetic way, and the broader pronunciation of the other words is assumed. To carry the phonetic principle to the extreme is not only to exaggerate the dialect, but to apply a principle which would be ludicrous if used in ordinary English. The dialogue of Scott and Stevenson is a more accurate presentment of the Scot tongue than Mr. Murray's, simply because they recognise the convention. I say nothing of the plain fact that Scots words have acquired a certain fixed appearance to the reader's eye from his familiarity with them in literature, and every educated man, whether or not he be a “cosmopolitan,” must be offended by such an ugly barbarism as “tahnlged.” Finally, such an effort as Mr. Murray's “rizzonable” does not represent even the phonetic spelling of the word as it is pronounced to-day in any part of Scotland.

THE REVIEWER.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

In the pages of the Saturday Review Mr. Frank Danby opines that “insignificant as was the impression produced upon the public mind” by the publication of Miss Stisted's

Real Life of Sir Richard Burton, “Mr. Wilkins has done his cause [i.e., Lady Burton's] harm rather than good by recapitulating the ‘three specific charges.’” The critic thinks that he has erred in denying bad faith in the matter of Burton's alleged conversion to the Catholic religion, “for many of his efforts to illuminate the character of his heroine would have been assisted by his boldly admitting her incontestable spiritual fervour for the Romish Church. Of the autobiographical fragments incorporated in the volume he writes: ‘For years she had nothing but dreams to feed upon, yet her diary during this time is worth a hundred of Marie Bashkirtseffs.’ ‘Hers was a poor nature, perhaps, to begin with; she had but little education; she was narrow and prejudiced, but she loved grandly, and the grandeur of her love, and the big brain of the man that fed it, swelled hers from a limpid little stream into a vast flowing river. . . . The story of the ‘Evolution of Isabel’ . . . is a fascinating one; it is a human document of great value and interest. . . .” “Though eclipsed by . . . her husband,” writes the Pall Mall, “Lady Burton, as the story of her life, told in part by herself, and in part by a biographer of rare sympathy and judgment, convinces us, was a woman whose strong and beautiful character . . . might boldly have faced the judgment of posterity alone. . . . Her story . . . was a love idyll, which stood the stern test of thirty years of married life, a life chequered by glowing sunshine and sombre shadows, by great achievement and chilly disappointment. . . . As the story of a brave Englishwoman, of a clever woman of the world, of a high-minded Christian, tolerant yet sincere, but the devoted wife of a man to whose greatness . . . we are learning to pay a tardy recognition, this biography of Lady Burton is as fascinating as it is ennobling.” As to the destruction of The Scented Garden, “whether her decision be justifiable or not, fair-minded people will, with her biographer, honour her motives.” A provincial journal applies to this act a phrase used by Bentley of a lady who burnt a trunkful of the famous Lord Rochester's letters: “‘for which,’ he used to say, ‘her soul is now burning in heaven.’” “It is a life-history,” says the World, “which, being once read, will be turned to again and again for pleasure; for from end to end it exhales an atmosphere of romance, and between the lines . . . one catches glimpses . . . of the rare personality, the brilliant resource, and indescribable courage of this remarkable wife of a remarkable man.”

HAVING praised the magnanimity which distinguishes Mr. McCarthy's treatment of his opponents, the Pall Mall writes: “Superficial though the earlier volumes . . . were, they contained many bright and clever passages, and they fairly covered the ground under review. But, alas! Mr. McCarthy's style has been attenuated, and he has been guilty of some almost incomprehensible omissions.” The critic concludes: “. . . The thing is not history: it is merely the calves-foot jelly of journalism.” The Westminster adds a list of omissions to the Pall Mall's, but “the interest never flags, the style is fluent and agreeable, and the impartial attitude is heroically maintained.” “The book of the season,” thinks the Chronicle, but “he does not look sufficiently below the surface of things, and he altogether ignores movements which have done much to mould the thoughts and control the actions of men during the time covered even by this volume.” It is a history “written too exclusively from the point of view of a mere politician and man of letters.” Though his book displays the journalistic instinct for selection, “he has none the less given us an imperfect record. For instance, he devotes three or four pages to the performance of Mr. Blondin, but he does not consider the lifework of men like Huxley and Robertson Smith worth notice.” But “though his horizon is limited, he sees clearly all within it, and is as impartial as it is possible for a man of known strong political convictions to be.” The Daily News bestows unstinted and unqualified praise: “The touch is still as light and sure as ever. It is history from an arm-chair by the very inventor of the method—table-talk with a beginning, a middle and an end, by a man of culture and a man of the world. Nothing can surpass Mr. McCarthy's narrative style—his way of winding into his subject and taking the reader with him in sustained interest to its close. . . . Mr. McCarthy has elevated tolerance to a fine art. . . . The touch of his controversial weapon is so light, and yet so sure, that it falls like the sword of Siegfried, which could dismember without leaving its victim conscious of a wound. This is an indispensable qualification for a writer who has to draw a series of characters.” “The present volume,” writes the Manchester Guardian, is quite equal to its predecessors.”

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.
A SHORT POPULAR HISTORY OF
CRETE.

By J. H. FREESE, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.

With Introduction by P. W. CLAYDEN.
Maps of Crete and Seat of War.Mr. GLADSTONE writes: "I hope this book may tend to enhance the public interest in the condition of Crete, which at present threatens to bring serious disaster upon this country."
The Daily Chronicle says: "A useful piece of work... a singularly clear account of the origin of the present crisis in the island."SIXTH EDITION OF
THE GREEN BOOK; or, FreedomUnder the Snow. By MAURUS JÓKAI. Sixth Edition. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top 6s.
"Altogether a great book and worth all the novels of native growth we are likely to see this season."—Pall Mall Gazette.

LADY JEAN'S SON. By Sarah Tytler.

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.
"The glimpses of Edinburgh society while the Northern Athens was still the seat of fashion are life-like and clever. 'Lady Jean's Son' is from first to last a delightful story."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE WINDS of MARCH. By George KNIGHT, Author of "Dust in the Balance," "Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth."

Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.
"Cannot but add to his already considerable reputation. Told with a vigour, a pathos, and a wealth of poetic sympathy with all that is beautiful that make the book admirable from first to last."—Star.

THE REJUVENATION of MISS SEMAPHORE: a Farceical Novel. By HAL GODFREY.

Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls. By LEWIS MACNAMARA.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"There is a strong literary charm in the tales. So genuine is the artistic touch of the writer, so true his command of the springs of human pathos and passion, that these tales will take their place among the best of those short sketches of simple country life that form a feature of the literary products of the last ten years. The book is the work of a hand that may yet make a strong mark in the fictional literature of the day."—Scotsman.Now ready, the First 5,000 Copies of the Sixth Volume in
THE "DAFFODIL" LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELSBY AUTHORS OF THE DAY,
VOL. VI. ENTITLED

A TOMBSTONE TREASURE. By FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab."

Crown 12mo, paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 2s.
London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

The BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:

An Anatomy of the Disease and a Theory of Curative Treatment.

By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

1. WHAT IS RESPECTABILITY?
2. THE PATHOLOGY OF THE DISEASE.
3. "LADIES" and "GENTLEMEN."
4. SPECIFIC SYMPTOMS OF THE MALADY IN WOMEN.
5. RESPECTABILITY AND MORALS.
6. CULTURED GENTILITY.
7. PLUTOCRACY.
8. VILLADOM.
9. THE TYRANNY OF RESPECTABILITY.
10. RESPECTABLE CIVILISATION AND AFTER.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE
AND FREE REVIEW:

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."

ONE SHILLING net.

Contents of the JUNE Number.

NIETZSCHE'S INDICTMENT OF CHRISTIANITY. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

AN ETHICAL EXCURSION. By HUGH MORTIMER CREIL.

THE TEACHINGS OF THOMAS HARDY. By DUANE WILLIAMS.

THE TORY PROFESSOR. By ROBERT DUNCANSON.

MR. GLADSTONE'S LATEST POSTCARD. By ALAN STEPHENS.

USURY AND THRIFT. By J. GERRVZ FISHER.

A SPECIMEN OF RELIGIOUS JOURNALISM By STANLEY BRUGH.

IN EXTREMIS. By ALLAN LAIDLAW.

THE LEGITIMATION LEAGUE. By A. GOLDWIN.

NANCY. By ERNEST NEWMAN.

CONVENTIONAL LITERATURE. By EASTWOOD KIDSON.

NEW BOOKS.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,

16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

THE ROMANES LECTURE, 1897.
MACHIAVELLI.

The Romanes Lecture delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre, June 2, 1897.

By the Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P., Hon. D.C.L. Oxon., Hon. LL.D. Camb.
8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.
BY THE AUTHOR OF "MORRICE BUCKLEY"

THE PHILANDERERS.

By A. E. W. MASON.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"The charm of the lies in the clear, sharp outlines and delicate shading which the chief characters are limned and the grace and ease of the style and of the dialogues.... All Mr. Mason's 'Philanderers' are convincing—neither children nor men but men and women in a world of afternoon tea—thoroughly entertaining."

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

A ROSE OF YESTERDAY.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROBBERY UNDER ARMS"

MY RUN HOME.

By ROLF BOLDREWOOD.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SECRET of ST. FLOREL

By JOHN BERWICK.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

SCOTSMAN.—"A thoroughly healthy and well-told story, with plenty of stirring incident and variety of scene and situation, and it is not wanting in study of character and knowledge of life, savage, semi-savage, and civilized."

THE FALL of A STAR

A NOVEL.

By Sir WM. MAGNAY, Bart.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

DAILY MAIL.—"A brightly written story, in which high life, mystery, tragedy, and science are cunningly blended."

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS.

NEW VOLUME.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.; "Peacock" Edition, gilt sides, back and edges, 5s.

SNARLEYVOW. By Capt. Martyn

Illustrated by H. B. MILLAR. With an Introduction by DAVID HANNAY.

With Illustrations, 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A RIDE THROUGH WESTERN ASIA

By OLIVE BIGHAM. Part I. ASIA MINOR. Part II. PERSIA, NORTH to SOUTH. Part III. TURKISH ARABIA. Part IV. PERSIA, WEST to EAST. Part V. CENTRAL ASIA.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"It is told in simple and straightforward language, with sufficient detail as to the machinery of travel to be useful to other travellers who may be following the same route, but without any tedious insistence on the incidents of each day's routine."

Globe 8vo, 6s.

POEMS. By Horace Smith.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

NOTES on POLITICAL ECONOMY

from the COLONIAL POINT OF VIEW. By A. NEW ZEALAND COLONIST.

Globe 8vo, 4s. 6d.

LESSONS in ELEMENTARY PRACTICAL PHYSICS (STEWART and GEE SERIES).

By C. L. BARNES, M.A., F.C.S., late Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford. Vol. III. Part I. PRACTICAL ACOUSTICS.

Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE STUDY of FRENCH ACCORDING to the NEWEST and BEST SYSTEMS.

By ALFRED F. EUGÈNE, Professeur Officiel de l'enseignement Secondaire (Université de France), and H. E. DUBIAUX.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

SEELEY & CO.'S BOOKS.

SOCIAL TRANSFORMATIONS of the VICTORIAN AGE. By T. H. S. ESCOTT, Author of "England: its People, Polity, and Pursuits." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Everyone who knows anything at all of Mr. Escott's work will welcome the appearance of his latest book." Publisher's Circular."A very excellent and comprehensive survey" Daily Mail."Eminently readable and racy."—Leeds Mercury."As trustworthy as it is undoubtedly readable." Manchester Guardian.

TWO SIX-SHILLING BOOKS by C. J. CORNISH.

LIFE at the ZOO. By O. J. Cornish.

With Illustrations by Gambier Bolton. 6s.

"Without a single dull page."—World.

ANIMALS at WORK and PLAY:

their Emotions and Activities. With Illustrations. 6s.

"Full of fresh matter about animals and birds."—Times."A charming bit of leisure reading."—Pall Mall Gazette.

PORTFOLIO FOR APRIL. 3s. 6d. net.

OROME and COTMAN. By Laurence BINYON.

"Extremely interesting."—World."The number is admirably illustrated." Manchester Guardian.

THE MOUNT: Narrative of a Visit to the Site of a Gaulish City on Mount Beuvray. With a Description of the Neighboring City of Autun. By the late P. G. HAMERTON. 3s. 6d.

"Some delightful chapters from the pen of one who knew every inch of the country and understood the art of imparting its charm to others."—Athenaeum.

THREE STORIES BY MRS. MARSHALL

Price 3s. 6d.

CASTLE MEADOW: a Story of Norwich a Hundred Years Ago.

"The story is admirably planned and admirably related." Scotsman.

THE WHITE KING'S DAUGHTER

3s. 6d.

"Out of Mrs. Marshall's many stories we do not remember one more pleasant than this."—Church Times.

AN ESCAPE from the TOWER.

3s. 6d.

"Mrs. Marshall never disappoints us. Her pen shows no sign of failure."—Church Bells.

EVENTS OF OUR OWN TIME.

THE WAR in the CRIMEA. By Sir EDWARD HAMLEY. 5s.

THE INDIAN MUTINY. By Colonel MALLESON, C.S.I. 5s.

THE AFGHAN WARS. By Archibald FORBES. 5s.

THE REFOUNDING of the GERMAN EMPIRE. By Colonel MALLESON, C.S.I. 5s.

THE LIBERATION of ITALY. By the Countess EVELYN MARTINENGO CESARESCO. 5s.

ACHIEVEMENTS in ENGINEERING. By L. F. VERNON HARCOURT. 5s.

THE DEVELOPMENT of NAVIES. By Captain S. EARDLEY WILMOT, R.N. 5s.

London: SEELEY & CO., LIMITED, 38, Great Russell Street.

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 43, Chancery Lane, W.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1310.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.
Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.
LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.
LATEST CATALOGUES:—
No. 51 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
.. 52, 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (782, 732 lots.)
.. 53 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 115, for JUNE), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 57, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 28 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24 BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-
TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS.—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.
Telegrams: MUFUSIL, LONDON. [Established 1819.]

TO AUTHORS.—Messrs. DIGBY, LONG & CO.
(Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net, eighth
edition) INVITE AUTHORS to FORWARD their MSS. (Fiction,
Travel, Poetry, &c.) suitable for volumes for prompt consideration.—
Address 18, Boulevard Street, Fleet Street, London.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, High-class Printers and
Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.,
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast
folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 6512. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

HIGH-CLASS SIXPENNY JOURNALS at One-fourth Published Price.—"GRAPHIC," "SKETCH,"
"QUEEN," and "GUARDIAN" (or any other four selected from our List) for Sixpence per week, to post on.—Apply for particulars of supply to the Secretary, the Holborn Literature Club, 259, High Holborn, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.
(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)
WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

WANTED, BOOKPLATES of Bozman, Walker,
Giles, Roverley, Cabot, Pace; also any Old Specimens. Very best prices will be paid.—MORRIS, 6, Trelawn Road, Leyton, Essex.

BOOKS FOR SALE.
(Advertisements are inserted under this heading at 4d. per line, prepaid)
USEFUL PRESENTS.
CHARLES LOWE Offers 100 volumes picked items (Travels, Biographies, Tales, &c.), all single works, and suitable for Libraries, £3 (pub. £30).—Casell's useful illustrated large Works, 10 vols., royal 8vo, nice as new, 30s. (cost £12).—50 vols. various Magazines (Graphic, London News, Arctica, Chambers's Journals, Quiver, Fun, Judy, Leisure Hour, &c.), the lot all sound and well bound, £3 10s. (cost £30).
CHARLES LOWE, Baskerville Hall, Birmingham.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY.
(Incorporated by Royal Charter.)
Patron—HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.
President—The Right Hon. Sir M. E. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.
THURSDAY, JUNE 17th, at 5 p.m., at the MUSEUM of PRACTICAL GEOLOGY, Jermyn Street, S.W., the following Paper will be read:—"AN ENGLISH ECOLE des CHARTES," by Professor YORK POWELL.
HUNTER HALL, Director and Hon. Secretary.
115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 51, Pall Mall East, S.W.
129th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIR EDWARD H. HENKOW, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

MCGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL,
CANADA.

CHAIR OF ZOOLOGY.
The Governors of McGill University are prepared to receive APPLI-CATIONS for Appointment to the newly founded PROFESSORSHIP
of ZOOLOGY. Salary, 2,500 Dols. per annum. Candidates from
Great Britain are requested to forward applications, with any testimonials and references they may desire to submit, on or before
15th June, addressed, "Principal," Office of the High Commissioner
for Canada, 17, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

ENGINEERING AND CHEMISTRY.
CITY AND GUILDS OF LONDON INSTITUTE.

SESSION 1897-1898.
The COURSES of INSTRUCTION at the Institute's CENTRAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE (Exhibition Road) are for Students not under 16 years of age; those at the Institute's TECHNICAL COLLEGE, FINSBURY, are of an Intermediate Grade for Students not under 14 years of age. The Entrance Examinations to both Colleges are held in September, and the Sessions commence in October.
Particulars of the Entrance Examinations, Scholarships, Fees, and Courses of Study may be obtained from the respective Colleges, or from the Head Office of the Institute, Gresham College, Basinghall Street, E.C.

CITY AND GUILDS CENTRAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE.
(EXHIBITION ROAD, S.W.)
A College for higher Technical Instruction for Students not under 16 preparing to become Civil, Mechanical, or Electrical Engineers, Chemical and other Manufacturers, and Teachers. Fees for a full Diploma Course, £25 per annum. Professors—
Civil and Mechanical Engineering W. C. URWIN, F.R.S., M.Inst.C.E.
Physics and Electrical Engineering W. E. DALBY, F.R.S., Past Pres.
Inst. E. E.
Chemistry H. E. ARMSTRONG, Ph.D., LL.D.,
F.R.S.
Mechanics and Mathematics O. HENRICI, Ph.D., LL.D., F.R.S.
CITY AND GUILDS TECHNICAL COLLEGE, FINSBURY.
(LEONARD STREET, CITY ROAD, E.C.)
Provides Courses of Intermediate Instruction for Day Students not under 14 years of age, preparing to enter Engineering and Chemical Industries. Fees, £15 per annum. Professors—
Physics and Electrical Engineering S. P. THOMPSON, D.Sc., F.R.S.
Mechanical Engineering and W. E. DALBY, M.A., B.Sc., Mathematics M.I.M.E.
Chemistry R. MELDOLA, F.R.S., F.I.C.
JOHN WATKIN, Hon. Secretary,
City and Guilds of London Institute,
Gresham College, Basinghall Street, E.C.

JONES' WEST MONMOUTHSHIRE SCHOOL, PONTYPOOL.
THE GOVERNORS INVITE APPLICATIONS for the HEAD
MASTERSHIP of the above Boys' School, to be opened in January next.
The Head Master must be a Graduate of an University of the United Kingdom; previous teaching experience is desirable.
Salary £100, with a Capitation Fee of 2s. per scholar. The school will accommodate 200 boys. The Head Master is also permitted to take boarders.
Copies of the Charity Commissioners' Scheme, or sufficient extracts therefrom, can be obtained from the undersigned (price 6d.).
Applications and testimonials, stating age, qualifications, and experience (30 copies, printed or typewritten), must be sent so as to reach my office not later than the 17th day of July next.
JOHN HURCHINS, Clerk to the Governors.
County Court Chambers, Newport (Mon.),
9th June, 1897.

TO LECTURE SOCIETIES.
MR. R. WALLACE, M.P. (Edin.), is now making
his Lecturing arrangements for the Season 1897-98. Subjects:
"Cant," "House of Commons," "Mrs. Grundy," and "Shams." Details
on application.—9, Edith Villas, London, W.

WANTED.—Position as JUNIOR or ASSISTANT
LIBRARIAN, by Lady (age 23). Good certificates. University education.—Address Miss WATKIN, 14, Warwick Grove, Surbiton

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(THE LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)
Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

SALES BY AUCTION.

The ASHBURNHAM LIBRARY OF PRINTED BOOKS.
FIRST PORTION.

MESSRS. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE will SELL BY AUCTION, at their HOUSE, No. 13, WELLING-TON STREET, STRAND, W.C., on FRIDAY, JUNE 25, and Seven Following Days, at 1 o'clock precisely the FIRST PORTION of the Magnificent LIBRARY of excessively Valuable and Rare PRINTED BOOKS, the Property of the Right Hon. the EARL of ASHBURN-
HAM. This Portion comprises the Letters A-J only, and includes a Large Number of Books, both English and Foreign, of the highest degree of rarity and interest, amongst which may be mentioned the First Ten Editions of Dame Juliana Barnes's Book of Hawking, Hunting, &c. from 1486 to 1586—Ten Books printed by William Caxton—Thirty-eight Books printed upon Vellum, including the First Latin Aristotle (beautifully decorated), the Gutenberg and 1482
Bibles, and the Durandus of 1459—a splendid Series of the Rarest Bibles in various Languages, but chiefly English—Rare Editions of Aristotle, Boccaccio, and Dante—the Earliest Editions of Chaucer to the End of the Sixteenth Century—the Chronicles of St.
Albans, Arnold, Caxton, Froissart, and Fabryan—Fine and Rare
Special Breviaries—First Editions of the Writings of Aeschylus, Lord
Bacon, John Bule, Hugh Broughton, Cocker, Cramer, Defoe, Gawin, Douglas, Drayton, Fletcher, Fletcher, John Foxe, Fuller, &c.—some exceedingly Rare Books by the First Printers in the City of London, St. Albans, Ipswich, Oxford, Cambridge, and other Localities—a Fine Series of Bible Illustrations, and Books with Engravings and Woodcuts—some Rare Books on America—14 other Remarkable Items too numerous to particularise. Many of the Books have additional interest and value attached to them from the fact of their being either Presentation Copies from the Authors or from having belonged formerly to Celebrated Families, and some are in Splendid Bindings done for Royal, Noble, and Famous Personages.
May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had, price Half-a-Crown each. Copies, illustrated with Nine Facsimiles in Gold and Colours of some of the remarkable Bindings, may be had, price 5s. each.

Pall Mall.—The Carleton Hall Heirlooms—Pictures.—In
the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division: Mr.
Justice Kekewich. 1894, C. No. 1,694.

MESSRS. FOSTER respectfully announce for SALE BY AUCTION, by direction of Mr. Justice Kekewich, at the GALLERY, 54, PALL MALL, on WEDNESDAY NEXT, the 16th JUNE, and following day, at 1 o'clock precisely each day.

The valuable collection of PICTURES formed by the late John Copper, Esq., of Carleton Hall, Penrith, Cumberland, including a chef d'œuvre by George Romney, life-size portraits of two beautiful children; also a number of Early English, Dutch, and French pictures, including works ascribed to
Barry, R.A. Luny Ryckaert Van Worrell
Breughel Ostada Stephenoff Wilson
De Louthembourg Peters Teniers Zoffany
Gainsborough Fynaker Van Loo
Also a number of landscapes by Knox, and some water-colour drawings.
May be viewed Monday and Tuesday next, when Catalogues may be had.
Note.—The George Romney Picture will be on view until the Sale at 54, Pall Mall.

EDUCATIONAL.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.
1897.—EXAMINATION, JULY 6th, 7th. One of £80, two of
£60, and Minor Scholarships of £15 to £30. Candidates to be under 15 years of age.
For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—AN EXAMINA-
TION will be held in July next to fill up not less than FIVE
RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS,
and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the Head
Master, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI-
LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.
The last, most complete, and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-
Instruction.
Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.
Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 2 dols. 50 cents
American, 10s. 6d. English. Post free.
Prospectus, with opinions of Educators, SCIENTIFIC, PROFESSIONAL,
and Business Men all over the world, free.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 257, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
200, REGENT STREET, LONDON.
SOLD ONLY BY THE PUBLISHER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums o deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars pos
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT Mans

CHAPMAN & HALL'S PUBLICATIONS.

THE DOLMENS of IRELAND.

Their Distribution, Structural Characteristics, and Affinities in Foreign Countries; together with the Folk-lore attaching to them, with Plans and Illustrations, and an Introduction dealing with the Anthropology of the Irish Race. By WILLIAM COPELAND BORLASE, M.A., late President of the Royal Institution of Cornwall, and a Vice-President of the Society of Antiquaries of London. With 4 Maps, 800 Illustrations, and 2 Coloured Plates. 3 vols., royal 8vo, £5 5s.

[Ready.]

THE NATURALIST in AUSTRALIA.

By W. SAVILLE-KENT, F.L.S., F.Z.S., &c., Past President Royal Society of Queensland; formerly Assistant in the Natural History Departments of the British Museum; Author of "The Great Barrier Reef of Australia." "A Manual of the Infusoria," &c. Illustrated by 48 Full-Page Colotypes, 7 Coloured Plates by Keulemans and other Artists, and numerous smaller illustrations in the Text. Royal 4to, £3 3s. net.

[Ready.]

THE EASTERN CRISIS of 1897

and BRITISH POLICY in the NEAR EAST. By G. H. PERRIS. With a Poem by WM. WATSON, a Cartoon by WALTER CRANE, and a Sketch Map. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

[Ready.]

OUR TRADE in the WORLD

in RELATION TO FOREIGN COMPETITION, 1895. 1895. By WILLIAM G. H. GASTRELL, Commercial Attaché to H.M.'s Embassy at Berlin, and to H.M.'s Legation at Copenhagen and Stockholm. Royal 8vo, 6s.

[Ready.]

TWO NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

LYRICS of LOWLY LIFE. By

PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR. With Photogravure Portrait of Author. Small crown 8vo, 5s.

THE SONG-BOOK of BETHIA

HARDACRE. By ELLA FULLER MAITLAND. Author of "Pages from the Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre." Large crown 8vo, 6s.

"To read it is like going through an anthology of classical verse.....The book is never without charm." Scotsman.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

A TALE of TWO TUNNELS.

By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

[Just ready.]

The GIFT of LIFE: a Romance.

By JAMES CASSIDY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A somewhat amazing story is this. Its central figure is a scientific doctor who, in a garret, succeeds in wresting from Nature the secret of a lymph inoculation with which he makes mortals immortal."—Daily Graphic.

CAPTAIN KID'S MILLIONS.

By ALAN OSCAR. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Sheffield Telegraph says: "Mr. Alan Oscar gives us some fine fighting with plenty of outclass play and pistolling, boarding of prizes, mutinies, and marooning, and the scene at Execution Dock, when Kid goes to see himself hanged by proxy, is realistic and bloodcurdling."

SYBIL FOSTER'S LOVE STORY

By Lady WATKIN WILLIAMS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Very charming.....The tale is a peaceful and pleasant one, reflecting the refined taste and healthy judgment of the writer."—Manchester Guardian.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED, LONDON.

MR. MACQUEEN'S LIST.

JUST PUBLISHED.

CABOT'S DISCOVERY of NORTH

AMERICA. By G. E. WEARE, Author of "Edmund Burke's Connection with Bristol," &c. With numerous Maps and Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"A most careful and painstaking account of everything which can be known or guessed at in reference to Cabot's life. Mr. Weare's account is the most complete which England has yet produced of the remarkable adventures of whom she owes so much solid profit and immense fame."—Daily Chronicle, June 3.

"A good popular account of geographical knowledge up to the end of the fifteenth century, and an easily grasped estimate of the character of the Cabots, père et fils, are very useful just now, and Mr. Weare manages to combine both....Mr. Weare's notebook is often charming."—Saturday Review.

"A novel for 'The Season.'"—Vanity Fair.

A DRAWING-ROOM CYNIC.

By LORIN KAYE.

A DRAWING-ROOM CYNIC.

Author of "Her Ladyship's Income," Art canvas, gilt top, crown 8vo, 6s.

A DRAWING-ROOM CYNIC.

"Lorin Kaye makes a bid for the success of the season in 'A Drawing-room Cynic,' and it will be surprising if it does not carry off one of the prizes at least. This book is just the one to read between routes, and discuss at dinner. Its atmosphere of unflinching smartness puts it in tune with the London of the moment."—Vanity Fair.

"Lorin Kaye chatters delightfully about chignons; she knows all about the feminine side of ambassadorial circles; smart London and smart Paris have no secrets for her....The story is well told, and the dialogue especially is of the crisp and smart character."—Saturday Review.

"The dialogue is a strong point, easy, of the moment, and often sparkling. Without harassing you by constant epigram, it never loses the epigrammatic crispness and flavour. A together a fresh and entertaining book."—Academy.

MISS TUDOR.

A Novel.

MISS TUDOR.

By JOHN LE BRETON.

MISS TUDOR.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE writes: "I find your book to be of intense though most painful interest. Such double-eyed villains as Lamb are not, I hope, even in this evil world, to be found every day."

"There is no question that Mr. Le Breton's novel is extremely interesting. Its qualities mark it out as an exceptional piece of work."—Newcastle Leader.

"The undoubted skill with which the author treats his subject prevents it from becoming repulsive, and invests it with considerable interest."—Globe.

"The book is pitilessly realistic, nobly conceived, powerfully executed, and is also, we trust, the forerunner of books no less excellent."—Librarian.

A RUSSIAN WILD FLOWER By

E. A. BRAYLEY HODGETTS, Author of "Round about Armenia," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SECOND EDITION in the press.

"Something absolutely new in fiction. The story is charming from every point of view: it makes the reader feel, when he closes the book, that he knows Russia as no other writer has ever enabled him to know the vast dim Empire of the Czar.... Princess Olga (holodski) is the most living and gracious heroine of fiction we have met for a dreary length of time, and her story inspires the liveliest sympathy."—World.

"Mr. Brayley Hodgetts is evidently well acquainted with his ground. 'A Russian Wild Flower' is a story of the rousing times of the Bulgarian revolution....Very charming glimpses of Russian society of the upper strata are given."—Glasgow Herald.

THE WOOING of AVIS GRAYLE

By CHARLES HANNAN, Author of "Chin Chin Wa," "The Captive of Pekin," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A very good story which, as it stands, is sufficiently striking and interesting."—Scotsman.

"At length a Scotch story which does not savour of the kailyard."—Weekly Sun.

A FLIRTATION with TRUTH. By

CURTIS YORKE, Author of "Once," "A Record of Discords," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A well-written novel of fashionable life....The dialogue is essentially 'smart.'"—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Curtis Yorke has told the story well, brightly, humorously, and with a sufficiency of pathos."—Daily Chronicle.

"A clever, witty, 'Dodo' kind of book....It has grace and strength of style which it is impossible not to admire."—Freeman's Journal.

ABBÉ CONSTANTIN. By Ludovic

HALÉVY. Translated from the French by THÉRÈSE BATBEDAT. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Very welcome is the English translation of Ludovic Halévy's 'Abbé Constantin.' The story is, as all the world knows, very charming, and should in its present shape find many English readers."—Globe.

"An excellent translation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

JOHN MACQUEEN, HASTINGS HOUSE, NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

With Illustrations, 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A RIDE THROUGH WESTERN ASIA

By CLIVE BIGHAM.

Part I., ASIA MINOR. Part II., PERSIA, NORTH & SOUTH. Part III., TURKISH ARABIA. Part IV., PERSIA, WEST TO EAST. Part V., CENTRAL ASIA.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"It is told in simple and straightforward language, with sufficient detail as to the machinery of travel to be useful to other travellers who may be following the same route, but without any tedious insistence on the incidents of each day's routine."

THE ROMANES LECTURE, 1897.

MACHIAVELLI.

The Romanes Lecture delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre, June 2, 1897.

By the Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P., Hon. D.C.L. Oxon., Hon. LL.D. Camb. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MORRICE BUCKLER."

THE PHILANDERERS.

By A. E. W. MASON.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

DAILY MAIL.—"The three pages of the prologue are the most stirring three pages of any sort of fiction that we have read for some months past....There is no weakness here, no shallowness, no compromise. Built up with strength and sincerity, and finely written. The story braces the mind as much as it captivates the taste."

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

A ROSE OF YESTERDAY.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

SCOTSMAN.—"It has a mature imaginative power which stamps it as a novel of a high order."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROBBERY UNDER ARMS."

MY RUN HOME.

By ROLF BOLDREWOOD.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

12mo, 6s.

THE CHOIR INVISIBLE.

By JAMES LANE ALLEN,

Author of "Summer in Arcady," &c., &c.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE.—"This is the longest, strongest, and most beautiful of Mr. Allen's novels."

THE SECRET of ST. FLOREL

By JOHN BERWICK.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

SPEAKER.—"A book not merely to be read, but to be enjoyed. It is full of interest....There is a sustained excellence about it by no means common in modern fiction....A book to be unreservedly recommended."

THE FALL OF A STAR.

A NOVEL.

By Sir WM. MAGNAY, Bart.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

OBSERVER.—"Contains some exciting and amusing incidents, and the tragic climax is decidedly novel."

12mo, 3s. 6d.

THE PORT of MISSING SHIPS, and other Stories of the Sea. By JOHN R. SPRENS.

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS.

NEW VOLUME.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.; "Peacock" Edition, gilt sides, back and edges, 5s.

SNARLEYWOW. By Capt. Martyn

Illustrated by H. R. MILLAR. With an Introduction by DAVID HANNAY.

THE MODERN READER'S BIBLE

NEW VOLUME.

EZEKIEL. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by RICHARD G. MOUTON, M.A. (Oxon.). The Text is that of the Revised Version. It is used by special permission of the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

y
E
1
X
n
C
7
8
X
e
C
Y 30
OC
3, n
e ic
n
n r
e n d in y

v u ac
a j r

-
h o
i
e
is
L
r
c tl
m ti re
r n
h e ic
E ic

h
of al
o n
n
c i h
s i u it u v

d
b fo
v

which forms the basis of philosophy and religion for over a thousand years, and, indeed, is not yet extinct. In the hands of Philo, Plotinus, and the other neo-Platonists, it is elaborated into a semi-religious, semi-philosophic system which goes back to Plato for its statical elements, and then expands into a theory of the world as the emanation of an omnipresent activity, soul or intelligence diffused throughout the universe. This vital principle is in its turn the emanation

"of the pure Reason which united in itself the entire system of Platonic Ideas; and this Reason, again, or Logos, as it was called, the emanation of the Eternal One, the Good, the Primitive Unity, which was neither Reason nor World-Soul, but included them both, and was itself the Unthinkable, the Unspeakable One" (p. 70).

We are here already on the threshold of Christianity, which is now easily reached by transforming this philosophic Trinity of essences into the three persons of the Christian Trinity. In a word, the vague abstract essences of philosophy become the living concrete personalities of the Fourth Gospel.

A mere reference must suffice to the process by which the primitive Hindu religion passes through Brahmanism to Buddhism. But here a protest must be raised against the long chapter devoted to "Modern Theosophy," which cannot but be regarded as a mistake. There is no kind of historical or logical connexion between Sakya Muni and the "Mahatmas," who, strange to say, seem to be here accepted as real personalities. Dr. Crozier makes "no apology for treating the matter seriously, ridicule of the system having already had its day"; and he is apparently unaware that the system has been killed, not merely by ridicule, but by a crushing exposure of the charlatanism and rank impostures with which it is inextricably associated, and which are all directly traceable to a notorious Russian adventuress. And is it not somewhat preposterous to speak in the same breath of Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophic writings and Mr. Sinnett's Esoteric Buddhism?

In following up the natural development of Judaism and Christianity the author also commits himself to several statements to which exception will certainly be taken. Thus, it seems to be assumed that "the Jewish people were destined in the order of Nature or Providence of God to be the organ of introducing a new and higher religion and morality into the world" (p. 167); the overthrow of Sennacherib is "foretold by the Northern prophets" (p. 169); after the dispersion of the ten northern tribes, the two others can be reformed "only by removing them bodily and once for all from the polluted soil, and giving them a fresh start elsewhere" (p. 173); hence the Exile, and so forth. In the Christian system "science is directly stimulated and encouraged for the sake of its practical results; and would be more so, indeed, were it not for the fear of its speculative effects on the Mosaic Cosmogony with which Christianity happens [sic] to be bound up" (p. 118). What will the "Higher Criticism" say to this? And the shades of Galileo, Giordano Bruno and Huxley? By some unaccountable slip the human embryo is described (p. 82) as passing "rapidly through the lower stages of fish, vegetable [sic], and mammal," and again (p. 85) "through the lower stages of a dog or pigeon." It is noteworthy that there are no references to authorities beyond general lists of names at the beginning of the several sections. Among misprints attention may be called to vovs for voûs; ψυχη for ψυχή; ἀπειρον for ἀπειρον; entrée; être; and stolidity obviously for solidity (p. 50). In a revised edition the index might be advantageously enlarged.

JOURNALISTIC HISTORY.

A History of our Own Times. Vol. V., From 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. By Justin McCarthy, M.P. (Chatto & Windus.)

THE History of our Own Times is known now exactly for the Irish pamphlet that it is; but the very defects apparent in the work prevent the author from recognising this. He cannot sufficiently detach himself from his surroundings to trace out the true tendencies and characteristics of his time, or fix upon the men who are really making history. We give him the fullest credit for good intentions, but a writer needs strength of mind and imagination as well as rectitude to take a wide and impartial view, and our author is hopelessly bogged in Irish mud.

What is the historical value of this Home Rule movement that bulks so largely in Mr. McCarthy's pages? In the eighties it brought to Westminster a contingent of Irishmen who distinguished themselves by producing rowdy scenes and all-night sittings in Parliament. Their watchword was obstruction, their line of policy to embarrass the Government and belittle England. Those of us who were proud of Mr. Gladstone, as we are proud of every great Englishman, were unfeignedly sorry to behold his later and failing days clouded by alliance with such a party—a party, too, without cohesion and torn by internecine squabbles. It brought temporary ruin on the Liberal party; and the General Election of 1895 was the death-knell of Home Rule. We would not have touched on the matter here if Mr. McCarthy had not chosen to call his narrative of this abortive movement a History of our Own Times, and to represent Messrs. Parnell, Dillon, and Davitt as the heroes of the last seventeen years. Nor can we praise the trustworthiness of an account that describes the outrages in a sentence or two, and to the extent of many pages enlarges upon coercion. The man to whom Ireland owes her present content is not the uncrowned king, but Arthur James Balfour.

In his previous volumes Mr. McCarthy wrote with a certain cleverness and vivacity, although even at his best you never felt with him that you were under the guidance of a strong, elastic mind, whose natural sparkle cheered the journey, but rather that the writer had the mechanical liveliness of a public performer. Still there was a brightness that carried many a one through a first reading. It makes no show in this volume. Here garrulous and monotonous journalism is at its worst; and one would think that Mr. McCarthy had not waited to see how the incident that bulked so largely in the morning paper would look at a little distance. There is no proportion observed. "The Bradlaugh episode" occupies a chapter to itself, and might have gone into a paragraph to make room for some of the things not mentioned at all in the book. "Parnellism and Crime," too, which is important only in the Irish imagination, has a still larger space devoted to it. On the other hand, the author is steadily oblivious of such a characteristic feature of the last decade as the labour movement. He has much to say on the Irish Land Question; that there has been an English Land Question, a crisis in agriculture, and an Agricultural Commission, does not appear from his pages. Of the Parish Councils Bill he has nothing to say, except that it afforded Mr. Gladstone occasion to warn the House of Lords—we have not a word of the agitation leading up to it. He has not gratified Mr. Cunningham Graham and Mr. Stead by so much as mentioning Bloody Sunday and Trafalgar Square. One would have thought that a political historian would have had a word to say or a theory to offer about a phenomenon so striking as Scotland's rightabout from Gladstonism to Unionism; but no, this is no part of the History of our Own Times. Even the cry for Scottish Home Rule has no interest for Mr. McCarthy! But it would be tiresome to recount the things he has left undone in this truly astonishing tome. As an illustration of his judgment, we shall quote this from the last page of his book: "Greece is at the present moment thrilling to complete what she not unnaturally thinks her national destiny." This, we may assume, was written just after Mr. McCarthy had appended his signature to a certain famous document. Poor Greece!

Weary of Mr. McCarthy's politics we turn to his literature, only to find a falling away here also. In the earlier volumes he managed, with no little dexterity, to present in a tolerably lively manner the commonplace views of writers to be gathered from the chatter of clubs and society. But he has since grown more careless as well as more prolix. Why should he hold forth to the extent of two pages on Mr. Freeman and utterly ignore as historians Mr. Froude, Mr. Lecky, and Mr. J. R. Green? Mr. McCarthy's criticism of the poets is still more palpably undistinguished. From his obituary notice of Browning we select one sentence: "If it were possible to suppose that one did not know who he was, one might have met Browning again and again without having the faintest idea that he was meeting a great poet." What we would like to know is, whether this compliment is intended for the poet or for "one"? From that on "R. L. S.," extending to several pages, it is impossible to extract a phrase that is worth the attention of a moment. And of the development of new ideas in the last two decades, of the evolution of new tastes and tendencies, of the new men rising to fill the places of the veterans, he is silent.

To proceed were only to enumerate more omissions, the sum total of which proves that here Mr. McCarthy has undertaken a task far beyond his powers. Indeed, there is absurdity in the attempt. The task is not for a man inclined to retire from the fray; one, too, whose nature, not uncommonly sympathetic at any time, is out of touch with what is young and fresh in life. What Mr. McCarthy could have done was to compose a record and chronicle of his time, but his pre-occupation with the Irish question has been in the way of his doing even that. A history will be satisfactorily written only by those whose plastic minds are capable of not only recognising facts, but of being impressed by the greatness and peculiar romance of our time, a romance not of genii and wizardry as in the Arabian Nights, not of battle and adventure as in days of chivalry, but of labour and wealth and science and machinery.

A FRENCH CRITIC ON THE ENGLISH STAGE.

The English Stage: being an Account of the Victorian Drama by Augustin Filon. Translated from the French by Frederic Whyte. With an Introduction by Henry Arthur Jones. (John Milne.)

THIS book deserves to be widely read, and has everything in its favour. It is excellently printed on good paper, agreeable both to eye and hand. M. Filon's criticism is not only sympathetic and interesting, but brilliantly written and lucidly arranged; lastly, it is singularly well translated. Mr. Whyte, perhaps, overstrains the licence of retaining French idioms: à bout portant and n'est-ce pas un comble? for instance, might have been easily rendered. One phrase, at least, le drame noir, needs explanation; but upon the whole he has kept the spirit of the French style, without failing to write English.

M. Filon does not notice in his text anything later than the "Masqueraders." Since then, as Mr. Jones laments in his spirited introduction, there has been a marked change. It must frankly be said that M. Filon's cheerful predictions do not seem in any way to be fulfilled. Since "Mrs. Tanqueray," which he regards as the one finished masterpiece that our modern stage has produced, there has been nothing of equal merit. That, perhaps, is natural enough; masterpieces do not come every season; but the awkward thing is, that since then certain plays, by general consent much above the ordinary run, have obtained less than the ordinary measure of success. The most notable instance was Mr. Jones's "Michael and his Lost Angel"; another, to which this book should really contain some allusion, if only in a footnote, was Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Arms and the Man"; add to this the fact, sufficiently notorious, that Mr. Shaw, about whose brilliancy there can be no question, has written several other plays, none of which has found a manager to produce it. Obviously, then, something is wrong. The drama, instead of progressing from the point to which it had attained three years ago, is stationary or retrograde. Is it the fault of the public? as Mr. Jones seems to think, or is it the fault of the dramatists? It is a pity that M. Filon's book, though appearing now, makes no comment on this stagnation; but possibly from his acute criticism one may infer the opinion that he would give.

Was the success of "Mrs. Tanqueray" a good thing for English drama? It was undoubtedly a success on French lines. Mr. Pinero's method in that play resembled the method of Dumas filé rather than of anyone else. The French ideal is an ideal of logic. In a good play of Dumas, actions follow inevitably from the relation of the characters; arbitrary coincidences, and the force of external circumstances, play a very small part in the drama. In "Mrs. Tanqueray" all that happens might have been foretold, except the collision which results when the daughter's fiancé proves to be the step-mother's old lover. But, after all, some such collision, some such resurrection of the past was inevitable for a woman with that history; Mr. Pinero merely put the contingencies in an extreme form. The whole drama was a logical development of the situation. Naturally, a crop of imitations, more or less explicit, more or less conscious, followed; all of them going back, through Mr. Pinero or directly, to the French. Now M. Filon says, and it is a remarkable view for a Frenchman to take, that the French influence has been harmful to English dramatists though excellent for actors; and the thing is natural enough. A modern play must turn on the sex interest, on the attraction between man and woman; and between the French and English views of sex relations there is an irreconcilable difference. They have the Latin ideal, we have the Teuton. One sees the discrepancy in Tacitus's comment upon the position of German women, one sees it in Taine's stupefaction at Shakespeare's heroines. Study of the French drama inevitably leads to the result that problems and circumstances present themselves to the English dramatist as they would to a French one; he begins to see through French spectacles. Grant the original position in "Mrs. Tanqueray," and there is nothing to object to; but it is very difficult to conceive of any Englishman doing what Tanqueray did. On the other hand, Ibsen's psychology is, as M. Filon sees, perfectly intelligible to us. Allmers in "Little Eyolf," Torvald in the "Doll's House"; Borkman in the last play, are recognisable at once by us. It does not strike us as unnatural that Rita Allmers should put her husband before her child, though it is inexplicable to the French. There are many things in Ibsen's psychology that we cannot accept; but the virtue of the English drama has never been logical consistency. Imagination, not analysis, has been its principle; and the French ideal is hostile to imagination. Mr. Jones, who, as M. Filon shows in an excellent passage of criticism, is far more English and far more in touch with contemporary thought than Mr. Pinero affords plentiful examples. If you want him at his best, one would say, take the third act of the "Middleman"—the scene in which the old potter burns his chairs and tables to keep the furnace going. That is an imaginative conception of character, much nearer to poetry than prose; but if you analyse the "Middleman," the plot is a mere piece of stage carpentry. Mr. Jones has progressed since then, but unhappily he suffers for his models. He wants to concentrate the mind of his audience upon problems which do not naturally engage their attention as problems. The conflict between inclination and the marriage tie exists everywhere, but it is nowhere so much the subject of discussion as in France. If you force it on English audiences you either bore or shock them. The English mind has always craved realism in details, but not truth in analysis or probability in construction.

The public will not decide anything, or, rather, will not dictate beforehand what it requires, for it does not know. But dramatists might learn something from studying the successes of novelists. Stevenson's morality was surely not what Mr. Jones calls a "wax doll morality," neither is Mr. Kipling's, yet they are read. The Saga spirit is strong to this day in our literature, and it is a pity to decide that the drama of adventure, the romantic drama if you will, is an impossible form. Why does not M. Filon notice Dr. Conan Doyle's play, "A Story of Waterloo"? It is small and slight, but so is one of Musset's proverbes, and most of us would as soon have written it as Il faut qu'une porte soit ouverte ou fermée. One is perfectly English, the other perfectly French, each a little masterpiece. But if English critics decide, on the one hand, that romantic drama is necessarily fustian, while, on the other, the public will not allow the representation of sexually immoral persons or motives on the stage, there is nothing for it but to choose between farce and Ibsen. The virtue of the French mind has always been clearness of outline and logical thoroughness; qualities which it is hopeless to engraft upon so national a product as drama. The English have always excelled in the imaginative presentment of character and, if we must have plays of modern domestic life, Ibsen is, with limitations, the congenial model.

A PASSING WORLD.

A Passing World. By Bessie Rayner Parkes. (Ward & Downey.)

It is long since Mme. Belloc wrote Vignettes under her maiden name of Bessie Rayner Parkes; then, after a long lapse of years, she lately published In a Walled Garden; and now, in A Passing World, she appeals again to her world of readers—a passing world, no doubt, but one not likely to be past, in her case, with the moment of publication. For Mme. Belloc—who is a granddaughter of Dr. Priestley—has a very pretty knack of reminiscence-writing. Her new book contains eleven papers, varying in character and also, we must say, in interest. It has been hastily put together perhaps, but some of the materials are of enduring excellence. The first paper of the series gives its title to the volume: Mme. Belloc looks back on the world of English life as she knew it when she first had opportunity to become an observer, very shrewd yet very indulgent. That was forty years ago, when Vanity Fair and Jane Eyre suggest to Mme. Belloc comparisons with the present-day works that are in all readers' hands:

"Seldom," she says, "has there been such an extraordinary outburst of many-sided human ability as in the earlier days of the Victorian era. Nor was this true only of the literary or political spheres; Millais and Leighton were beginning to be famous before Turner laid down the brush."

And so on. "Say not thou that the present times are worse than those that went before." That is an injunction of ancient wisdom which no writer of Reminiscences ever can be expected to observe. The reason, perhaps, is on the surface. What is seen and heard in youth comes to us more vividly than any later impression comes—for us, at any rate, those times of revelation appear better than their successors of mere confirmation. So that the generation now young will be inhuman indeed if, forty years hence, it does not defy the young men of that day to show forth a Sargent among painters, a Stevenson or a Kipling among men of letters. The talk of palmy days will go on for ever—palmy days, nevertheless, that have no date.

Great are the memories of Mme. Belloc, for all that. She knew Rossetti and she knew Browning, and from each of these poets a characteristic letter appears in her pages. That from Browning deals with the publication of the Froude memoirs of Carlyle:

"I do, indeed, regret deeply the conception, execution, and publication of those Memoirs, equally unwise in their praises and unworthy in their blame; but I knew the extraordinary limitations of my dear old friend and of his 'woman,' too, just as well fifty years ago as to-day. His opinions about men and things one inch out of his own little circle never moved me with the force of a feather—or I should hardly have lived five minutes of my whole life as I have done, and, for the remainder of it, please God, shall do. But we must not ourselves prove ingrates for a deal of love, or at least benevolence, in deed and wish; I must not anyhow; so I am on the committee for erecting a monument to 'True Thomas'—whose arm was laid on my shoulder a very few weeks ago."

That is a very interesting piece of autobiography, wholly creditable to Browning's purpose as a man and his tolerance as a friend. It is followed by a passage akin to it in this respect, but with an added interest for the student of human inconsistency:

"He confessed once to me," continues Mr. Browning, "that, on the first occasion of my visiting him, he was anything but favourably impressed by my 'smart green coat,' I being in riding costume; and, if then and there had begun and ended our acquaintanceship, very likely I might have figured in some corner of a page as a poor scribbling man with proclivities for the turf and scamphood. What then? He wrote Sartor, and such letters to me in those old days!"

He wrote Sartor, but he judged, and misjudged Browning straight off by his clothes!

Of that almost impersonal woman to the present generation—Mrs. Dante Rossetti—Mme. Belloc has something to tell. Her face has been an influence on a school of English painting. It lives, not only in Rossetti's pictures and Sir B. Burne-Jones's but in Millais's "Ophelia." The circumstances of her death and burial have their place in the history of the great English poetry of this generation. Those who have written most of Rossetti, though they dwell on the interment of his MSS. in his wife's coffin, and the subsequent recovery of them, did not personally know, as Mme. Belloc did, the shop-girl whose face was her only introduction to Rossetti, but who was received "by the ladies of her husband's family with a sweet welcome which did honour to all parties." So, indeed, you would suppose of Miss Christina Rossetti and the rest; but you are glad, in a world in which living act and written word are so often at war, to know of their household charity as a fact. Of Miss Siddal, Madame Belloc says:

"She was not of his own rank of life, and I did not think her in the least like 'a countess'; but she had an unworldly simplicity and purity of aspect. She had the look of one who read her Bible and said her prayers every night, which she probably did."

The letter from Rossetti to Mme. Belloc is concerned with the health of Miss Siddal during the term of their long engagement, health that filled him with alarm even then. It is couched in those terms of old-world courtesy, rather stiff in expression, which mark most of the letters of Dante Rossetti, whose amazing mobility is all in his poetry and never in his prose.

Of the other chapters, that on Dr. Samuel Parr is the best. It is so good, indeed, that we regret the appearance in the same volume of anything so inconsequent as "The Two Fredericks." At her best Mme. Belloc is very good indeed; and the reader has within himself the power—almost an intuition in some cases—of judicious selection.

"CHRISTIE'S."

Memorials of Christie's: A Record of Art Sales from 1766 to 1896. 2 vols. By W. Roberts. (George Bell & Sons.)

We make it our duty to point to the publishers' share in the production of these splendid volumes. For splendid they are—not with gold and ornament, but in sheer quality of paper and print, in their illustrations, in the simple dignity of their binding, and in the unity and fitness which do not fail once between their covers.

Particularly happy is the frontispiece of the first volume, a reproduction in colour of a portrait of James Christie the First, by Dighton, leaning over his rostrum in a blue coat and white lace neckerchief and cuffs, his spectacles pushed up on his high, straight forehead, his hammer held delicately in one hand—a keen, bland, and businesslike figure. "The Specious Orator" the artist calls him, and puts in his mouth the words: "Will your Ladyship do me the honour to say £50,000—a mere trifle—a brilliant of the first water—an unheard of price for such a lot, surely." Rowlandson's drawing of "Christie's" is reproduced, and shows us the mart about the time when its first picture sale took place—i.e., 1767. Also a photogravure of the picture by Gebaud of the sale of Sir Joshua Reynolds's "The Snake in the Grass." Gebaud's work, which was purchased by Messrs. Christie in their own sale room in 1875, contains portraits of Sir Robert Peel, the Marquis of Stafford, Prince Paul Esterhazy, Lord Morgan, and others. The reproduction, however, is reversed, and hence in the description of it quoted from Mr. Humphry Ward "right," should read "left," and vice versa. Sir Robert Peel, said to be in the right, must be looked for in the left corner. He was the purchaser of the picture, which is now in the National Gallery. Most of the illustrations are photogravure reproductions of famous portraits, vases, and pieces of furniture which have come under that hammer—tiny, but a very Nanny in its effects—which has been wielded by successive hands at Christie's.

Mr. Roberts has been able to write an interesting biographical sketch of James Christie the First. He was a Scot, and left the navy for the auction room before he was twenty to assist an auctioneer named Annesley in Covent Garden. In 1766, or maybe earlier, he set up for himself in Pall Mall as an auctioneer, devoting himself at first to the sale of estates and houses. Pictures hardly entered into his transactions. James Christie seems to have been liked and honoured by a large circle of friends and customers. There are stories about him. One of them says that he called all his porters together, and, arming them with sticks, sallied out at their head to disperse a mob that was attacking the house of Admiral Sir Hugh Palliser in Pall Mall. The mob dispersed like chaff. James Christie's social tact and courtesy were powerful aids to his success in business. Once when he had a specially good collection of pictures to offer he bethought him how he could make their importance generally understood. He went to the Earl of Chesterfield—Johnson's Chesterfield—to whom he was known, and told him about the pictures, asking him at the same time to be so condescending as to look at them:

"His lordship promised to attend the public view, and gave Mr. Christie leave to announce his intention among his friends, or wherever he thought proper, and in order to give éclat to the occasion he promised to come in state. On the day appointed, therefore, the room was crowded in the expectation of seeing this venerable and celebrated nobleman, who arrived in a coach and six, with numerous attendants. The company gave way, and afforded a convenient space for his lordship. He was attended by Mr. Christie, who took the liberty of directing his lordship's attention to some pictures, and requested to be favoured with his opinion of the chief productions in the room. . . . The auditors pressed as near as respect for his lordship would permit them, in order to hear and circulate his opinion."

There is a fine eighteenth century atmosphere about all that.

James Christie primus died in 1803 at a good old age. Gainsborough painted his portrait "avowedly for the purpose of drawing the public attention to his name as a portrait painter," and by his request it was hung in the sale room. The second James Christie was a highly cultivated man, a member of the Athenæum and of the Dilettanti Society. He died in his house in King-street in 1831, leaving two sons, of whom George Henry Christie, J.P., entered the firm, retiring in 1863, when he was succeeded by his son, Mr. James H. B. Christie, who retired in 1889.

The firm became "Christie & Manson" in 1831, but there are now no Christies and no Mansons in the King-street business. The present head of the firm is Mr. Thomas H. Woods, who became a partner in 1859, and there are several other partners.

It would not be profitable to attempt either a summary or a selection of the records of sales which have been compiled with so much industry by Mr. Roberts. They afford material for many kinds of inquiry, and they are interesting to many kinds of collectors. For many years sales of first-class importance were nothing like so frequent at Christie's as they have been in the last half century. Yet in the first volume it is interesting to note the sale of Hogarth's series of pictures, "Marriage à la Mode," and the sale of 411 pictures comprising the collection of Sir Joshua Reynolds. These fetched £10,319, and a supplementary sale of sketches fetched £4,536. The first great Christie sale in this century was that in which Mr. William Young Ottley's pictures were offered. Ottley had just purchased the pictures from the Colonna, Borghese, and Corsini palaces; and their appearance in London was accounted for by Mr. Christie in language which recalls Burke bewailing the wrongs of the princesses of Oude:

"It is to the era of fatal revolution in Italy; it is to the oppressive spirit of its invaders; it is to the fallen grandeur of the nobles and princes of Rome; it is to their extreme need and distress, that is to be attributed finally their parting with what they so long possessed and so highly valued."

In this sale the great National Gallery landscape of Salvator Rosa was included, and was bought by Sir M. M. Sykes for 1,550 guineas. The entire collection fetched 22,000 guineas. But it is perilous even to continue dipping into these voluminous records. The second volume exceeds the first in bulk. Here the collector may revive his memories of the sale of the Blenheim Palace collection, the Murietta sales, the Lyne Stephens sale, the Goldsmid collection, and scores of others, earlier and later, small and large, down to the last sales of 1896. Hardly had this work appeared when the brilliant sale of Sir John Pender's collection established "record" prices at Christie's for paintings by Turner.

ITALIAN ARCHITECTS.

Architecture in Italy, from the Sixth to the Eleventh Century. By Raffaele Cattaneo. Translated by the Contessa Isabel Curtis-Cholmeley in Bermani. (Fisher Unwin.)

THE work of Raffaele Cattaneo has been before the world for more than seven years, and though marred by the truculence of his criticisms, it is a monument of painstaking observation and synthetical ingenuity. Though here and there one may quarrel with a conclusion as to the age of this or that monument—the sarcophagus of the Exarch Isaac at Ravenna is a case in point—the accuracy of the author's main conclusions cannot, we think, be disputed. His divisions of indigenous or quasi-indigenous art into Latin-Barbarian and Italian-Byzantine, while he relegates the foreign art intermediately practised in Italy to the separate category of Barbarian-Byzantine, may not be always differentiated by very sharp lines of demarcation. But they represent real movements and real influences, and even if there be some overlapping of the sections, the utility of this classification is obvious. But our knowledge of the relics of those genuinely dark ages, the seventh and eighth centuries, owes much to Cattaneo's prolonged personal observation, quite independently of what it owes to his analysis, and he has thrown a perfect flood of light on the remains of the two twilight centuries that followed. He will always be famous for having given the coup de grâce to the pretensions of the Lombard spoiler to have possessed any indigenous art at all. Incidentally, too, the claim of the Irish artists, to have been the inventors of the various stone decorations of the knotted and braided and basket-work types, falls to the ground on an examination of the collected evidence of its Byzantine origin. This has been fully dealt with in the admirable work on the Irish Saints written by Miss M. Stokes, though, in truth, it is but a by-product of Cattaneo's laborious investigations.

The idea, of offering to the English student, ignorant of Italian, a translation of a work to which we owe so much, was exceedingly happy. It is, however, greatly to be regretted that the work of translation was not placed in the hands of some one conversant with the English idiom. It is distressing to read of the "fond of an altar" of "a little subterranean," and of monuments "attributed in that wretched (Lombard) time." It is hard to suppress a smile when we are told of a sculptured lion surrounded by "volatiles," of Saracens who learned "constructive organism" from the Byzantines, and of the island (the Rialto) which, circa 810, "was sufficiently populous to merit the Tribunal seat." What will the wretched student make of a "fragment of a cornice existing in the State archives of the Frari," described as "a gorge, gracefully carved with small palms in the Greek style, enclosed by listels and cubic notching?" The proper names, too, are dealt with on no rational system, nor, indeed, on any system whatever. Sometimes they are given in Latin, sometimes in modern Italian, sometimes in modern French, sometimes in English, sometimes in a mixture of languages. King Desiderio (who occasionally becomes Desiderius) and King Astolfo jostle King Luitprand and King Theodoric: French S. Ambroise and French S. Aquilin are to be set off against English S. Michael and English S. Lawrence. Pope Giovanni II. pairs with Pope Gregory IV., S. Celso with S. Satyrus, till we get to S. John in Valle and S. Simeon piccolo. The famous eunuch Narses becomes "Narsete," and one result of his victories is, that the Byzantines "hold an Esarch" in Ravenna. Finally, while the English word apse is puristically written apsis, the almost equally familiar narthex becomes narteci! All this is the more vexatious, because the book is excellently got up, handsomely printed, and superbly illustrated; and, if only it possessed a sufficient index, it would, even with its present faulty text, be a valuable adjunct to the archaeologist's library.

JUBILEE LITERATURE.

The Life of Queen Victoria. By Millicent Garrett Fawcett. (W. H. Allen & Co.)

The Victorian Era. By P. Anderson Graham. (Longmans & Co.)

The Rise of the Empire. By Sir Walter Besant. (Horace Marshall & Son.)

MRS. FAWCETT's biographical sketch of the Queen, first published in 1894, is reissued for Jubilee bookbuyers with a new portrait of Her Majesty. In a preface written two months ago, Mrs. Fawcett reminds her readers that the impossibility of being exhaustive has led her to dwell on "what may be considered the formative influences on the Queen's character in early life." The limitation need not be regretted now; this is the very time to remind people that the Queen was once a little girl. Stories of the Queen's childhood that at other times might seem too trivially petty have piquancy; and if we can magnify the significance of small incidents in our own early years, why not in Her Majesty's?

But Mrs. Fawcett tells also the story of the Accession, and of the happy period when "love and politics" began to mingle in the Queen's life; she sketches the Queen's relations with Lord Melbourne, Baron Stockmar, and Lord Palmerston; and devotes chapters to the Crimean War and to the great loss that came to Her Majesty in mid reign. A pleasing freedom marks Mrs. Fawcett's narrative: her loyalty is naïve and womanly.

The Victorian Era is a very child of the Jubilee. Mr. P. Anderson Graham has written it for boys. He just sketches the Queen's private life, and then we have the regulation chapters on Railways, the Post Office, Ironclads, the Progress of Medical Science, and other developments of the last sixty years. We think this book has been put together hurriedly. The Notes at the end have no proper beginning; and what kind of boy will be benefited by notes such as these?—"Affectionate; loving." "Ludicrous spectacle: a sight to be laughed at." "Gesticulated: moved body, arms, and legs to give force to what he was saying." "Afghan borders: in the north-west of India." "Aldgate: in London." "Genteel society: well-to-do people of good manners and breeding." We demur altogether to the last definition. The book is nicely printed and illustrated.

Sir Walter Besant's contributions to pleasant superficial history multiply apace. He now writes on The Rise of the Empire in a little volume, which inaugurates a new "Story of the Empire" series. Sir Walter begins at the beginning in his chapter on "The Making of a People," and there is some aptness in his illustration of the way in which village communities began to seek help from each other. Had they been self-sufficient they might have shrunk within their own bounds, but they were always less than self-sufficient, and the want of two things only—salt and iron—would bring them together for purposes of barter. It is a far cry from this quest of salt and iron to our present commercial conditions, but Sir Walter trips along like a schoolmaster trying to make his lesson pleasant, and succeeding. We have chapters on "The Empires of the West," "East," and "South"; on "The Empire of the Isles," on "Our Heritage," and on "The Future of the Heritage." In the last named chapter Sir Walter pleads for Federation, "an everlasting alliance, offensive and defensive." He also has wise words about the relations between this country and the United States which we hope will be quoted on the other side.

Various albums of photographs, inspired by the coming event, are before us. Temple Bar and State Pageants (Partridge & Cooper) is a shilling book in paper covers containing a record, with illustrations, of State processions to the City of London, and the ceremonies which used to delay them at the spot where the Griffin now stands. The Queen's Pictures (Cassell & Co.) is a reprint of a collection published in the Jubilee year of 1887, but time has given a new cachet to the letterpress, which is from the pen of Mr. Richard R. Holmes. The illustrations are after portraits and paintings executed during the Queen's reign and now hanging in the various Royal galleries. The same publishers issue a covetable album entitled Pictorial England and Wales, and dedicate it to the Queen. The photographs are nearly all of merit, and they bring towns, villages, and scenery vividly before the eye. Under the title of The Queen's Empire, Messrs. Cassell issue also a photographic album in parts, each part illustrating some aspect of life under the Queen. Part 2 illustrates methods of travel throughout the empire. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge issues a handsome album of photographic views called The Queen, Her Empire, and the English-Speaking World. The latter half of the title of course covers such photographs as those of Niagara and the Capitol at Washington. But surely these have no real place in an album designed for a festival which, in one aspect at least, is a great stocktaking of British possession.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Chap-Book Essays. (Gay & Bird.)

THIS is the title of a random selection of papers which have already appeared in the Chicago Chap-Book. Some of them will strike the reader as a little belated, as, for example, the amusing little essay on "Degeneration," by Alice Morse Earle, who also contributes a comical little sketch of her experiences with a "bureau of literary revision." Mr. Edmund Gosse writes on the "Popularity of Poetry," and from him you may gather that no man should take up the profession of verse-making unless he have a private income, though "to last forever, as a specimen, by the side of Lovelace or of Wolfe, should be better worth working for than to earn five thousand pounds as the author of a deciduous novel about the 'new woman.'" What, by the way, is a "deciduous novel"? A feminine appreciation of Verlaine by Mr. Reginald de Koven is well written and interesting. But readers on this side of the Atlantic will probably turn first to the short paper on Robert Louis Stevenson by Eve Blantyre Simpson. Herein we get some delightful glimpses of Stevenson in his early days in Edinburgh. For example:

"He was very sore, and somewhat rebellious, writing not being considered a profession, and having to bend to his good father in so far as to join the Scottish bar. For long 'R. L. Stevenson, Advocate,' was on the door-plate of 17, Heriot-row. The Parliament House saw him seldom, never therein to practise his bewigged profession. We frightened him much by avowing that a clerk was hunting for him, and even the rich library below the trampling advocate's feet could not wile him into the old Hall for some time after that false scare."

Here is another peep at the youthful Stevenson:

"He certainly liked to be noticed, for he was full of the self-absorbed conceit of youth. If he was not the central figure, he took what we called Stevensonian ways of attracting notice to himself. He would spring up full of a novel notion he had to expound (and his brain teemed with them), or he vowed he could not speak trammelled by a coat, and asked leave to talk in his shirt-sleeves. For all these mannerisms he had to stand a good deal of chaff, which he never resented, though he vehemently defended himself or fell squashed for a brief space in a limp mass into a veritable back seat."

Finally, the book is well printed and daintily dressed in a pictured cover, which would make a first-rate "poster."

My Life in Christ. Extracts from the Diary of the Most Rev. John Ilytch Sergieff ("Father John"). Translated by E. E. Goulaeff. (Cassell.)

FATHER JOHN is a pope of the Russian State Church, far renowned for learning and piety. He has the reputation, probably not without good reason, of possessing a gift of healing ("If I wish to cure an illness," he confidently writes, "I cure it"); he attended the late Tsar upon his death-bed, and administered to him the last sacraments; and he has kept an intimate diary over a wide space of years, from which voluminous extracts have been made by Mr. Goulaeff and, for the benefit of the British race and of Queen Victoria (to whom the volume is dedicated), have been translated by him into indifferent English. We do not say that the task was not worthy to be undertaken, but it may be thought that the editor has suffered his enthusiasm to leap somewhat ahead of his discretion. Quite one-fourth of this bulky book might have been produced with profit; the remainder consists of pious commonplaces which, however fruitful to the mind which bore them, are altogether too conventional to merit that they should be spread abroad among a people which cannot find time to read the Imitation. Here is a mystical passage, which, in spite of its muddlesome metaphysic, was quite worth preserving:

"Man is a small world. As the soul is in the body, so God is in the world. When the soul leaves the body it immediately crumbles to pieces. Likewise, when the Spirit of God leaves the world it will immediately crumble to pieces. The soul is throughout the body, but especially in the heart; and God is throughout the world, but especially in heaven and in temples."

As a monument of personal piety the book is edifying; but it cannot be said of it that it throws new light upon the spiritual problems which perplex the modern soul, or that it so abounds in graceful and illuminative fancy that as literature it may gratify the curious dilettante of religion. Nevertheless, to that section of the Church of England which is looking to the East for countenance and recognition it will be of supreme interest, as reflecting the spiritual side of Oriental orthodoxy.

Soldiering and Surveying in British East Africa. By Major J. R. L. Macdonald, R.E. (Edward Arnold.)

MAJOR MACDONALD's business was to survey the country which lies between Mombasa and the Victoria Nyanza, in preparation for the railway that is to be; his recreation was to shoot lions and to outwit treacherous niggers; he has crowned his achievements, scientific and adventurous, by writing them out at length in a book. Chance involved him in the complications which within the last decade have made Uganda the cockpit of three alien and rival religions. Accordingly he has thought fit to embody in his narrative a full account of the troubles and conflicts which resulted in a re-partition of that country and its settlement under a British Protectorate. The chapters devoted to the consideration of these matters are distinguished by good sense and moderation. While his sympathies are strongly with Captain Lugard, he does not think it incumbent upon him to sneer at missionary enterprise in general, or at either of the religious bodies concerned in particular; on the contrary, he bears a high testimony to the self-sacrifice of the missionaries and the civilising influence they have been able to acquire over the native mind. The story of these two and a half years is well told, and is illustrated by maps and plans; and if the narrative gains nothing from the author's literary accomplishment, it is too full of lively incident ever to be dull reading. Putting aside many passages clamorous for quotation, we select what we may call a social incident. Captain Pringle

"had experienced a little trouble from the Masai of Kedong, who carried off three of his donkeys. He retaliated by securing about twenty women, who were trading in camp, and threatened to carry these off unless the missing property was returned. As next day this was not done, he marched off with his prisoners, and demanded six donkeys for the trouble that had been caused. This brought the Masai to their senses, and the six donkeys were soon produced. The women were then liberated, and, being evidently struck with Pringle, insisted on his spitting on each individually in token of friendship."

We commend the incident to the attention of Mr. Rider Haggard.

* * *

English Army Lists and Commission Registers, 1661—1714. Edited and Annotated by Charles Dalton. Vol. III. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

We congratulate Mr. Dalton on proceeding so steadily with his great work of putting into print the earliest MS. records of the British army. The period covered by the present volume includes the first four years of the reign of William and Mary, which was a period of continued fighting. It is sufficient to mention the battles of Killiecrankie and the Boyne, Steinkirk and Landen. Except for a brief expedition to the south of Ireland, Marlborough was not employed on active service; and, indeed, most of the generals in command were Dutchmen. Very curious is the detailed report on the English regiments under Schomberg at Dundalk in 1689, which shows the contempt of a veteran for amateur officers and unseasoned recruits. Though in form a mere catalogue of names, the book is full of historic interest. Here may be found an account of the first regiment of Highlanders in the British army, which was raised, it seems, by the Earl of Argyle in 1689, and almost entirely composed of Campbells; and also of the Earl of Angus's Regiment of Foot, otherwise "The Cameronians," which had a minister of its own persuasion and an elder to each company. Here also may be found the commissions of the Rev. George Walker, to be colonel of the Londonderry Volunteers; and of Albert Borgard, a Dane who became nestor of the Royal Regiment of Artillery, to be "fire-master of the tin boatmen." We presume that a "tin boat" would now be called a pontoon. Mr. Dalton has spent infinite pains in identifying the names in these often mis-spelt lists, and in tracing their family history and subsequent career. He deserves the warmest thanks of all those who are concerned with either history or genealogy.

* * *

Round the Year: a Series of Short Nature Studies. By Prof. L. C. Miall, F.R.S. (Macmillan & Co.)

THESE descriptive chapters are meant for young naturalists, and treat of subjects suggested by the natural events of the year. Taking any point that occurs—gossamer, ichneumons, the flowering of plants, snow crystals—the Professor probes the questions which arise on it to the very bottom, and his reader is permitted to see his thorough methods of research. This constitutes the value of the book, which is great. Prof. Miall is not satisfied with traditional examples from nature or traditional explanations. He has read Darwin and Nature to some purpose, and greatly enlarges the horizon and the interest of young people thereby. They are taught much learning of a suggestive kind from buds and catkins alone. Turning to a more recondite example, the fruit of Saccoglottis amazonica—which we gather has once been drifted into an English bay from tropical America—is treated in the fullest manner, and illustrated (as are other of these articles) in a manner which does illumine the text. The account of a day spent in the moon most realistically elucidates the phenomena of that planet, and is a favourable example of Prof. Miall's writing. He thinks that the young cuckoos emigrate in succession "probably as soon as they are capable of taking care of themselves"; others, however (including Prof. Newton), believe that they leave England about the beginning of September. Prof. Miall apparently identifies Tennyson's "sea-blue bird of March" with the kingfisher. There can be little doubt that the wheatear is meant. But it is a point on which poetic naturalists will always wrangle. No one who is fond of using his eyes and his wits on the sights and problems of nature will take up this book without a large increase of pleasure and knowledge. It is quite superfluous to recommend it. Rather it is one of the few books which demand thankfulness.

* * *

The Observances in Use at the Augustinian Priory of Barnwell, Cambridgeshire. Edited, with a Translation and Glossary, by J. W. Clark. (Macmillan & Bowen.)

THIS book of "Observances," discovered upon the spot where it was written, in the ruins of the building where, until the dissolution of the Religious houses, men lived their lives in accordance with its discipline, forms a curious commentary upon the "Rule" of St. Augustine from which it was evolved. With the progress of centuries the precepts of the founder, bearing mostly upon spiritual dispositions in all the religious families, were subject to a process of concretion: reverence to superiors must show itself in definite acts of inclination and obeisance; the principle of subordination must express itself by resignation of the keys into the hand of the newly elected superior; purity of heart and life, similarly, must be manifested in outward demeanour—even the manner of entering their beds was prescribed to the brethren. The methods of assisting at the divine office and at holy mass were a tissue of complicated injunctions, which to the modern reader would seem incompatible with inward attention; but, indeed, it may be that the concentration of instructions applying to all the contingencies of a lifetime into a single volume gives an impression of formalism which the deliberate process of daily life would not suffer to be sensibly experienced. No details of daily life were too minute for regulation. These philosophers had discovered the intimate bond between the infinitely solemn and the minutely trivial, and in them no cheap sense of humour discerned anything ludicrous in the juxtaposition of provisions for the sufficient supply of warm shaving water and the profoundest of spiritual exhortations. The editor's very adequate Introduction gathers from the diffuse yet allusive "Observances" a fairly complete synopsis of the Canons' order of life. His translations, printed side by side with the originals of the "Rule" and the "Observances," are, upon the whole, highly to be praised; but there is manifest a tendency to shirk difficulties just in those places where the ordinary reader will look to the translation to clear up an obscurity. Also, if the brethren were to "lie prostrate" throughout the canon of the mass, it is not easy to understand in what sense they were to "bend the knee" at the elevation. It is obvious that proni here signifies not "prostrate," but merely "inclined." But it were ungracious to prolong particular fault-finding in the case of a volume for which every ecclesiastical antiquary has reason to be grateful, as representing a vast amount of diligent and very competent labour, and offering in a convenient form a human document of extreme interest.

* * *

Outlines of the History of the Theological Literature of the Church of England from the Reformation to the Close of the Eighteenth Century. The Bishop Paddock Lectures, 1896-97. By John Dowden, D.D., Bishop of Edinburgh. (S.P.C.K.)

THE Bishop of Edinburgh has contrived to present a general view of the stream of Anglican literature, and more particularly of Anglican controversial literature, that will be apt to persuade his brethren to a more careful study of their own sadly neglected divines. His acquaintance with the great writers of the Anglican Church is wide and intimate, his reverence for their words is profound, and he has scant patience with the minimising controversialists of to-day. He knocks the bottom out of the mistaken notion that the theological pronouncements of the reformers dealt merely, or even chiefly, with popular misconceptions of Catholic doctrine, upon which Tract XC. so largely built, which theory in the hands of less responsible persons than its author has served to take the sting out of any of the Articles seeming to smack too distinctly of Geneva or Augsburg. One cannot but admire the audacity of men like Ussher, who at the age of twenty could resolve to read through the whole of the Christian Fathers, and after eighteen years of labour could accomplish it—of men who, so far from pleading with Rome for the recognition that a rich man unwillingly bestows upon a poor relation, dared to flout the great mother church of the West, and declare in the face of its hierarchy, "You are heretical in this matter and in that: it is quite doubtful whether you should be esteemed a part of the Church of Christ." But Dr. Dowden allows his own strong anti-Roman feeling to carry him off his feet now and again. It is, for instance, very doubtful whether Parsons and Allen were cognisant of the plot against Elizabeth's life, and it is quite impossible to prove it; and when a writer speaks of the principle of "probabilism" as "vicious," we take leave to doubt whether he perfectly understands what that principle is.

* * *

Snarleygow. By Capt. Marryat. Edited by David Hannay. (Macmillan & Co.)

THIS is the latest addition to Messrs. Macmillan's library of standard novels. Snarleygow, originally called The Dog Fiend, appeared in 1837, the same year which saw the publication of Marryat's Code of Signals; and Mr. David Hannay, who edits the reprint, suggests that the story was written "not only because Marryat was, as he candidly confessed not long after his time, 'somewhat in want of money,' but as a relaxation from the really considerable toil of compiling his code." Snarleygow is in part an historical novel. When he wrote it, says Mr. Hannay, Marryat "probably felt that he had used up, at any rate for the present, the navy of his own time, and he turned to the past for a new field." But the story "is in reality a fantastic tale which Marryat made up partly, no doubt, out of his reminiscences of the time when he was cruising against smugglers in the Channel, partly, and in a much smaller degree, out of books, but most of all, as the children say, out of his own head." Snarleygow has something in common with Poor Jack, inasmuch as it is in these two books that Marryat's verse can be best studied. The song, "The Captain stood on the Carronade," from Snarleygow, was included by Mr. Henley in his Lyra Heroica. The present edition is illustrated with fair success by Mr. H. R. Millar.

THE BOOK MARKET.

A CHAT WITH MR. L. UPCOTT GILL.

"I HAVE come, Mr. Gill," I said, "to ask you some questions, if I may, about your books. You publish books about Coin Collecting, and Canaries, and Ticket-writing, and Mushroom Culture, and Bent Iron Work, and Goat-keeping for Amateurs, and How to Vamp, and I think yours must be a very interesting business." I said this while Mr. Gill was courteously handing me a chair. We were in his private room above the publishing office in the Strand, next door to the Strand Theatre.

"I see," said Mr. Gill; "and you want me to tell you something about it all. My difficulty is to know where to begin. You see the basis of all our business, or of nearly all of it, is our paper, Exchange and Mart. You perhaps know it?"

"Mr. Gill, I have never held it in my hand, but from my boyhood up I have known that if I want to exchange a barometer for a pair of fantail pigeons, or —"

"I see," said Mr. Gill smilingly; "that would not be one of our normal transactions, but you have the idea. And, by the way, here is our current issue."

"Then, Mr. Gill, will you tell me the story of this paper. It must have a story."

"A very simple one it is. The Exchange and Mart was started by the late Serjeant Cox, of the Law Times and the Queen, in 1867. The idea of it came to him like this. Mrs. Cox was a great invalid, but a wise one; she knew how to make the best of a maimed life; and she took up the collecting of lepidoptera and microscope work. She soon knew enough to write a nice little book, called, I think, Our Common Insects. Her collection of moths and butterflies, too, increased to a very respectable size, and then she began to find, as all collectors do, that she had some duplicate specimens and some crying wants. Well, it just occurred to Mrs. Cox to advertise for the specimens she wanted, offering in exchange those she could spare; and so one fine day there appeared a new kind of advertisement in the Queen. Mrs. Cox got what she wanted; and, what is more, her notion caught on. The very next week, and for many succeeding weeks, advertisements of the kind crept into the Queen, until there was a column of them, and until Serjeant Cox awoke to the fact that a great opportunity had been delivered into his hand. He broached to me the idea of the Exchange and Mart, and we started it right away. I will show you No. 1."

Mr. Gill got up and drew from underneath some bookshelves the first volume of his paper.

"This is the dust of ages—literally," he said, as he made it rise. "You see, it is but four pages, a good deal of it 'faked'—we all know what starting a paper is. Our price was a penny for a few months. But a penny didn't pay; we soon made it twopence and doubled the number of pages. And then the public wanted a lot of educating—an extraordinary deal of educating. In fact, they seemed as if they wouldn't be educated. However —"

"It is now a huge success?"

"Well, we issue the paper thrice a week now, and at busy times each issue may contain sixty-eight pages."

"Of which the bulk are filled with advertisements?"

"Yes, four-fifths."

"And now, Mr. Gill, may we come back to your series of 'Practical Handbooks'?"

"Yes, certainly. Their connexion with the Exchange and Mart is a very close one. In the first place, the innumerable transactions of exchange and purchase which are done through the paper introduce me to classes of collectors and amateurs to whom we can appeal. Secondly, the majority of these books are reprints of articles that have appeared in the paper."

"How does this apply to, let us say, your Guide to the Coins of Great Britain and Ireland?"

"Well, that is a good instance. The coin advertisements in the paper have always been numerous, and nearly twenty-five years ago I got the late Mr. Wundt to write me a series of articles on Coin Collecting for us, stipulating for the copyright. These I republished as a book. Some years later I had another series of articles on Coins written by the late Colonel W. Stewart Thirburn, and he revised and enlarged Mr. Wundt's book. At the present moment Mr. Gruber, of the British Museum, is preparing me a third revised edition of this very handbook."

"Some of your books," Mr. Gill, "reveal to me the existence of publics I have never suspected. It would not surprise me to find one man in a lifetime whose hobby was working in Bent Iron; but do you mean to tell me that there are enough of such persons to induce you to publish a handbook on the subject?"

"Oh, yes. But the Bent Iron workers are ladies. The work is a light, easy imitation—it is only an imitation—of mediæval and Italian wrought-iron work. The iron is sold in specially prepared strips, and it is all a matter of twisting and turning with the pincers and other light tools; very effective it is too. You see, there is always some hobby going. A few years ago the home-keeping young lady's solace was china painting, and we told her how to do it; then she wanted to paint on mirrors, and we got out a handbook for her; and then it was leather work, and we came to the rescue; and now she twists iron from our directions."

"Well, but you actually have a handbook on Pet Monkeys?"

"Yes; it goes slowly, but it goes."

"And on the Management of Goats?"

"Yes, for country people, who keep a goat nibbling about for the sake of the milk; it is they who buy that book."

"And on Firework Making?"

"Oh, that sells well; and I may anticipate one doubt that is probably in your mind: I never heard of an accident resulting from the carrying out of the directions in this book."

"And can you sell Practical Taxidermy?"

"Oh, dear, yes."

"And are there still amateur ventriloquists?"

"Hundreds."

"Indeed! and who write window tickets?"

"Country shop-keepers and their assistants."

"And who are the people who want to know 'How to Keep Lizards and Snakes Satisfactorily in Confinement'?"

"Well, I know two or three personally. You will notice that this book is only announced, yet my subscription list for it is a very fair one already."

"Do these handbooks make collectors as well as aid them?"

"Oh, decidedly. The sight of one of these books to-day makes a man a hobbyist to-morrow. Many men grow tomatoes from seeing our shilling book on how to do it."

"Then do you think, Mr. Gill, that when the millions of this great city see your cheap book on 'How to Keep Snakes in Confinement' —?"

Mr. Gill smiled; and feeling that enough was as good as a feast, I bade him good morning.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

A Rose of Yesterday. By F. Marion Crawford.
(Macmillan & Co.)

Mr. Marion Crawford is one of the few novelists whom one cannot take for granted. Other men have their brands and are true to them; before we open their books we know what to expect; but Mr. Crawford is continually producing a surprise. He has now pulled out yet another new stop, and in "A Rose of Yesterday" we are offered sheer Ibsenism. The Rose of Yesterday is Mrs. Harmon, whom we meet at Lucerne, travelling with her son Archie, a half-witted youth of exceptional strength. Mrs. Harmon is the wife of a man who took to drink, became brutalised, ill-treated his wife, lost his reason, and was confined in an asylum. Enter Colonel Wimpole, the old lover of Mrs. Harmon. He never told his love, but she is aware of it and silently returns it. They discuss Harmon and his possible recovery, and the Colonel, without success, urges her to take divorce proceedings. This is in the morning; and in the afternoon of the same day Mrs. Harmon hears that Harmon has recovered, and receives from him a letter asking her forgiveness, and making plans for the restoration of their home life. Her struggle over the reply to this request is the kernel of the book. She cables the word "Forgiven," and then for the first time learns from Archie a true account of his relations with his father. In this scene Mr. Crawford reminds one not a little of "Ghosts," and the total effect produced is very similar to that left by Ibsen. Archie, who is but a child in intellect, is led to tell the story of his father's cruelty. The man had continually hit him with the knob of his stick on the back of the head. The narrative proceeds:

"Once, when you were off somewhere for two or three days on a visit, he came at me with a poker. That was the last time. I suppose he had been drinking more than usual."

"What happened?" asked Helen.

"Oh, well, I'd grown big then, and I got sick of it all at once, you know. He never tried to touch me again, after that."

"Helen recalled distinctly that very unusual occasion when she had been absent for a whole week, at the time of a sister's death. Harmon had seemed ill when she had returned, and she remembered noticing a great change in his manner towards the boy only a few months before he had become insane."

"What did you do?" she asked.

"I hit him. I hit him badly, a good many times. Then I put him to bed. I knew he wouldn't tell."

"Archie smiled slowly at the recollection of beating his father, and looked down at his fist. Helen felt as though she were going mad herself. It was all horribly unnatural—the father's cruel brutality to his afflicted son, the son's ferocious vengeance upon his father when he had got his strength."

"You see," continued Archie, "I knew exactly how many times he had hit me altogether, and I gave all the hits back at once. That was fair, anyhow."

"Helen could not remember that he had ever professed to be sure of an exact number from memory."

"How could you know just how many times?" She spoke faintly, and stopped, half sick.

"Blocks," answered Archie. "I dropped a little blot of ink on one of my blocks every time he hit me. I used to count the ones that had blots on them every morning. When they all had one blot each, I began on the other side, till I got round again. Some had blots on several sides at last. I don't know how many there were now; but it was all right, for I used to count them every morning and remember all day. There must have been forty or fifty, I suppose. But I know it was all right. I didn't want to be unfair, and I hit him slowly and counted. Oh"—his eyes brightened suddenly—"I've got the blocks here. I'll go and get them and we can count them together. Then you'll know exactly."

"Archie unpacked the toys in silence and arranged the blocks all on one side in a neat pile, while on the other he laid the soldiers and the little cart with the few remaining toys. Helen's eyes became riveted on the bits of wood. There were about twenty of them, and she could plainly distinguish on them the little round blots which Archie had made, one for each blow he had received. He began to count, and Helen followed him mechanically. He was very methodical, for he knew that he was easily confused. When he had counted the blots on each block he put it behind him on the floor before he took another from the pile. He finished at last."

"Sixty-three—ju—!" He checked himself. "I forgot. I won't say 'jukes' any more. I won't. There were sixty-three in all, mother. Besides, I remember now. Yes; there were sixty-three. I remember that it took a long time, because I was afraid of not being fair."

This is gruesome enough, and something new from the author of "Dr. Claudius" and "Mr. Isaacs," "A Roman Singer" and "Zoroaster." Mrs. Harmon is moved by her son's story to write her husband a long letter, in which she offers again to live with him, but states that love is impossible. Another scene with Colonel Wimpole follows, in which he pleads for her and her frustrated life, but she refuses to be diverted from what she believes to be her duty. On returning to the hotel they find a telegram announcing Harmon's death. Such is Mr. Crawford's theme, or all of it that need be told. There are two other characters and a parallel story, but they are of no importance.

The object of the book appears to be ethical: a contribution to the solution of the problem of duty before desire. In his concern to find an answer, Mr. Crawford has forgotten that it is the duty of the novelist to put his reader's pleasure before philosophy. I cannot describe "A Rose of Yesterday" as either a good story or a good tract. It makes me long for the Mr. Crawford who is now retreating farther and farther into the past.

* * * * *
Pacific Tales. By Louis Becke.
(Fisher Unwin.)

It is impossible (for me, at least) to write with any enthusiasm of Mr. Louis Becke. His work is satisfying, like porridge; but, like porridge, it does not stimulate—much less "over-stimulate." It is possible that knowing he came in on the Pacific tide of the other Louis—the lost Wizard of Samoa—I have come to him with too great expectations; but, however that may be, he has fallen somewhat short of my hopes. Yet he has respectable qualities. These Pacific Tales, which he has just published, I find admirable in the way of colour. And by "colour" I do not mean the cheap substitute commonly distinguished by the adjective "local," which can be gained in a fortnight's holiday, and the cost of acquiring which can be counted in terms of deduction from the Income Tax, but the quality which has been soaked up by living for years in a certain milieu, and which is expressed in a man's writing, for the most part, unconsciously. That is your only true "colour," and for permanence and depth of tint and charm of effect it is, compared with the other, as wine to a solution of Condry's Fluid. It goes without saying that that kind of colour is manifest, not only in descriptions of scenery and in the mere aspect of things (which varieties of colour can be tolerably produced by the cheaper imitation), but also more effectively and poignantly in the intimate details of life and sentiment. Where "colour" thus interpenetrates and pervades all it is difficult to quote by way of illustration; but take the following from "The Shadows of the Dead":

"At a little distance from the beach stood a tiny thatched-roofed house with sides open to welcome the cooling breath of the land-breeze that, as the myriad stars came forth, stole down from the mountains to the islet trees and then rippled the waters of the shining lagoon. . . . Rolled up and placed over the crossbeams were a number of soft mats, and as Denison returned, Kusi took these down and placed them upon the ground, which was covered with a thick layer of pebbles. Throwing himself down on the mats, Denison filled his pipe and smoked, while Tulpé and the child made an oven of heated stones to cook the fish they had caught. Kusi had already plucked some young drinking cocoanuts, and Denison heard their heavy fall as he threw them to the ground. And only that Kusi had brave blood in his veins, they had had nothing to drink that night, for no Strong's Islander would ascend a cocoanut-tree there after dark, for devils, fiends, goblins, the ghosts of men long dead, and evil spirits flocked to and fro amid the boscage of the islet once night had fallen. And even Kusi's, despite the long years he had spent among white men in his cruises in American whale-ships; in his younger days, chid his wife and child sharply for not hastening to him and carrying the nuts away as they fell."

That is the kind of colour which gives to these Pacific Tales their one remarkable and valuable quality of verisimilitude. They appeal to you as real stories—as, in fact, "yarns," artless and unadorned. Sometimes the "yarn" is so artless as to be little more than a pointless reminiscence, like the one called "In the Evening"; but few are of that sort: most of them contain at least a moment of dramatic action. "In the old Beach-combing Days" may be cited as giving instance of that. There it is told how Togusa, the king, with the aid of the old beach-comber Westall, received the missionaries who proposed to make his people Christians. The missionaries, or "Christ-men," have brought into the presence of the king a native minister to interpret. The minister is discovered to be a wretched slave from a neighbouring tribe, and the king is incensed, and commands the creature to be seized. Then Togusa proposes to the leader of the missionaries a simple, savage test of a cardinal doctrine of the Christian faith:

"'Christ-man, answer me this. This dog here'—and he pointed scornfully at the grovelling figure of the native minister—'this dog sayeth that he will live for ever by reason of the new faith he hath gotten from thee.'"

"'Man,' said the missionary [to the old beach-comber, who interpreted] . . . 'tell him that Lakolalai, God's minister, will have eternal life hereafter, even if these godless heathens now take his life.'"

"Then Westall turned to the king. 'The Christ-man sayeth, O Togusa, that this man, Lakolalai, will have life for ever.'"

"'Ha,' said Togusa, 'now we shall see if this be true.'"

"Two men advanced, and, seizing the native minister, stood him upon his trembling feet. 'Stand aside, gentlemen, if you please,' said old Westall quietly to the missionaries. They moved aside, and then Togusa, calling to Sikra the chief, pointed to the wretched Lakolalai.

"'Take thou thy spear, Sikra, and thrust it through this man's body. And if he live, then shall I believe that he will live for ever.'"

"And Sikra, with a fierce smile, seized his heavy, ebony-wood spear, and as he raised his right hand and poised the weapon the men who held Lakolalai's arms suddenly stretched them widely apart. The spear sped from Sikra's hand, and, spinning through the convert's body, fell near the feet of the Reverend Gilead Bawl and his brethren at the other end of the room."

You may note, even from these two quotations which I have presented, that Mr. Becke's writing is lacking in character and distinction. Not only is his language not choice, but (as you may see) it is also frequently incorrect and ungrammatical. He has no feeling for la mot juste; but he has colour and reality. He provokes in us no delight in his art, for he has none himself, but he gives a tolerable amount of interest and amusement; and for these gifts—all too rare, spite of the marvellous multiplication of books—let us be thankful.

* * * * *

Symphonies. By George Egerton.
(John Lane.)

Both the limitations and the very considerable gifts of "George Egerton" are displayed in this book. One story, at least—"At the heart of the Apple"—is daring and original, beyond anything of "George Egerton's" that I have met with before. In the other six, for the most part, if she has learned little or nothing, she has, at least, unlearned none of the literary deftness which made "Keynotes" a notable book of its year, and justified the selection of it as the typical volume of a series that seldom contains an undistinguished work.

In the portrayal of individual character the author, it appears to me, reaches her limitations most readily. The indolently chivalrous, rather slangy man, into whose mouth are put the two stories, "Sea Pinks" and "A Nocturne" (which are, in their essentials, only two settings of the same idea), is rather unconvincing. Many women much less clever than "George Egerton" have represented the mannish attitude more faithfully. But when it is a question of conveying to the reader's imagination the atmosphere of a place—the general tone of some little community—the author achieves considerable success, by means in themselves restrained and legitimate. Take, for instance, the Irish village-folk in "Oony," a story which, though loose in construction and crowded with irrelevance, contains some of the most skilful detail in the book. The child of a murdered emergency-man is placed, after a legal contest arising out of the religious question, in charge of "a 'votene' of the worst description. The whole place reeked of dirt and neglect. The bed-linen she had brought Jack as a dowry had been turned into nether garments years ago: and no bed in the house could boast a 'screed' of white on it. The entire family, except the two elder boys, slept in the end room; and they threw their clothes, as they took them off, up on to the faded moreen canopy."

With the "boys" aforesaid the orphan speedily quarrels, the difference arising, characteristically, out of a prayer.

"'What are ye going to ask for?' queried Jamsie coaxingly. Oony hesitated; then she said softly, 'I'm going to pray for me poor Ma's soul, to get her out o' purgatory.' . . . 'Faith, then, ye might as well be prayin' for Musheragh mountain to move down to the meadow beyant. She never seen purgatory; cock her up with it, an' she a black Protestant! It's in hell she is for all eternity!' The child flushed, and her lip quivered; she sprang and struck him, with her thin little fist doubled, square on the mouth, calling: 'Ye lie, ye lie, ye lie, ye little blackguard!'

"Jamsie screamed, and hit her back. Noreen seized her by the hair behind. The ducks quacked and scattered the mud; and Mrs. Jack and the family gathered to witness the scrimmage. 'Mush, my God, childre, what the devil ails ye? Lave go, will ye, ye young divil! Quit, I tell yez, Jamsie, quit now!' . . . 'She sed she was goin' to pray for her ould Protestant mother's soul,' explained Noreen; 'an' poor Jamsie only sed she was burnin' in hell, an' she wint for him wid her fishts.' 'I told ye the black drop 'ud come out,' said Miss Mary Kate. 'She's damned crabbed intirely; look how she bit his hand!' Mrs. Jack dropped her beads, and, seizing the child, belaboured her with a round stick that served as a potato masher. 'I'll tache ye better manners, ye little bitch [whack]; where else would she be [whack], only in hell; an' out av hell there's no redemption.' The child shrieked between her pain. . . ."

Hardly anything could be more convincing, and so, throughout, whether the author writes of a Chilian town, a Norwegian islet, or her favourite Basque villages, the whole atmosphere of the place is created with the same precision of touch. The Norwegian story alone (though not precisely virginibus puerisque) would redeem the collection from mediocrity: and all the stories are worth a second reading. I do not see why they are called symphonies; there is nothing symphonic about them; but perhaps after "Keynotes" and "Discords" it was inevitable.

* * * * *

The Winds of March. By George Knight.
(Jarrold & Sons.)

Mr. George Knight has turned to the familiar contest between flesh and spirit in a young priest. The theme is so old that I cannot but admire the author's temerity in venturing upon it; but, in the main, he has succeeded in treating it with freshness and some distinction. It is a pity, I think, that he should have made Bab an illegitimate child—a pity, because so unnecessary—and one wonders still more why Magnus's mother should have been made so unholy a woman. However, having made his choice, the author has handled his material deftly enough.

Bab gave the Rev. Anthony Magnus tea in her workroom at the top of the house, and that infatuated gentleman was induced to hide in a cupboard because Bab's aunt (and the curate's landlady) was heard coming upstairs. When he was released—

"Magnus stepped out into the late sunlight, and stood brushing the dust off his coat.

"'There's no one else in,' Bab told him. 'Susie the maid's on her day off. You can go down and begin to study; and, remember, you've not been out since I let you in.'"

"He started to go without speaking to her.

"'You'll have to take your boots off,' commanded Bab, with secret amusement.

"'Why?'

"'Auntie's an awfully light sleeper,' she answered. 'Take them in your hand.'

"Magnus stooped and drew off his shoes.

"'Good-bye,' said Bab; 'I hope you enjoyed your tea.' He turned on her a face of such shame and sorrow that her conscience smote her. Then, like Pharaoh of old, she hardened her heart.

"'Good-bye,' she bade him again.

"He opened the door and went noiselessly out.

"When he had been gone a moment, she ran to the balusters and looked over. He was picking his way down the last flight with steady caution.

"Bab clapped her hands noiselessly, but there were tears in her eyes. She brushed them away.

"'Oh, ho!

You must know,

The tears were running down,'

she adapted, humming the air to herself.

"The curate of St. Mark's walked vaguely into his study and restored his shoes to their proper position. Then he crossed to his desk, sat down, and in the same vague fashion commenced to write.

"Suddenly he scanned what he had written—mere aimless scratchings of the pen.

"He dropped his face into his hands and began to weep with great convulsive sobs."

In the chapter which follows this, I regret to say that Magnus entirely ceases to be a gentleman and becomes a cad. It is impossible to believe that Mr. Knight convinced himself that his hero could have talked to any girl in such execrable taste. For the rest, the book is interesting and clever, with touches of true pathos and a sense of atmosphere and life.

* * * *

Dracula. By Bram Stoker.
(Constable & Co.)

Anyone, I think, who has watched with any attention the tendencies of recent fiction will have noted an increasing taste for what I may call "horrors." One sees the same thing, of course, in journalism. Crimes, floods, fires, "horrid details" of all kinds sell more editions of an evening paper than far more important and edifying matters. Many of the magazines, too, seem to rely on attracting readers by stories that are gruesome or revolting rather than by more cheerful reading. That the tendency is a particularly good one I cannot venture to assert, but it exists and must be taken into account. Mr. Bram Stoker's new book, Dracula, is an example of this school of work. The story is one long nightmare, full of mad-house imaginings, vampires, and everything that is likely to keep nervous people from sleep at night. It is a curious compound of realism and sensationalism; but though it does not belong to a school that I admire, it is written at times with considerable power. The descriptions of Count Dracula's Transylvanian castle, and, indeed, the whole picture of Jonathan Harker's experiences in the Carpathians, are done with a vivid impressionist touch which strikes home at once to the imagination, while the supernatural element of horror is so skilfully worked in the earlier chapters as to be, for the moment, quite convincing. Here is an effective passage:

"At last there came a time when the driver went further afield than he had yet gone, and during his absence the horses began to tremble worse than ever, and to snort and scream with fright. I could not see any cause for it, for the howling of the wolves had ceased altogether; but just then the moon, sailing through the black clouds, appeared behind the jagged crest of a beetling, pine-clad rock, and by its light I saw around us a ring of wolves, with white teeth and lolling red tongues, with long sinewy limbs and shaggy hair. They were a hundred times more terrible in the grim silence which held them than even when they howled. For myself I felt a sort of paralysis of fear. It is only when a man feels himself face to face with such horrors that he can understand their true import."

The middle part of the book, where the scene is mainly in England, strikes me as less good. Vampires need a Transylvanian background to be convincing. The witches in "Macbeth" would not be effective in Oxford-street. (And Mr. Stoker's method of telling his story by extracts from different people's diaries, letters, and the like unduly prolongs the book and makes the incidents less easy to follow.) He is best in his most nightmarish moods.

"I knew that there were at least three graves to find—graves that are inhabit; so I search, and search, and I find one of them. She lay in her vampire sleep, so full of life and voluptuous beauty that I shudder as though I have come to do murder. Ah, I doubt not that in old time, when such things were, many a man who set forth to do such a task as mine found at the last his heart fail him, and then his nerve! So he delay, and delay, and delay, till the mere beauty and the fascination of the wanton Un-dead have hypnotise him; and he remain on and on till sunset come, and the vampire sleep be over. Then the beautiful eyes of the fair woman open and look love, and the voluptuous mouth present to a kiss—and man is weak."

The speaker is Dr. Van Helsing, which accounts for the curious English. I have written enough, I think, to show my readers what to expect from Dracula. If they want their flesh to be made to "creep" Mr. Stoker will be able to manage it for them.

* * * *

In Vallombrosa. By Adeline Sargent.
(F. V. White & Co.)

It is one of the drawbacks attached to the vocation of the novelist that he must, even on holiday, bear the professional eye about with him. To him travel means local colour, castles are viewed from the point of view of their adaptability to love-scenes, and when the lark sings he makes a note of it for future reference. So, Miss Adeline Sargent has been to Vallombrosa, and the world knows of it through this book. She will not, I fancy, claim for her holiday task a more honourable title than "pot-boiler." We are introduced to a Mrs. Marchmont, who, through negligence rather than by intention, has been generally supposed a widow. She has, in reality, a not too attentive husband in England, who, being stricken with a fatal malady, comes presently out to Vallombrosa to ask her forgiveness. He lives long enough to make an edifying repentance, and dies in the hope that his wife will marry the better man whom the novelist has provided for her.

"When it was quite dark Anthony spoke in a hushed voice:

"'Cecily, when I am gone—'

"'Don't—don't speak of it, Anthony.'

"'I must, my sweet. I want you to remember what I say. Will you promise me to remember?'

"'Yes.'

"'Well. . . remember, I should like to think of you as happy. I don't know whether I shall know what you are doing; but if I know, I'm sure it will be a pleasure to me that you should have a happy life. So don't turn away from any chance of happiness with the feeling that you would be wronging me, or doing what I should not like.'

"She could not speak.

"'This man—that loved you,' he began.

"'Anthony, I have put him out of my life for ever.'

"'Not for ever, I think, dear. If he is worthy of you, I hope he will come back again, and make you his wife. Yes, I hope it. It will be better for you to marry, dearest, and find some compensation for all I have made you endure. I should be a churl, indeed, if I grudged you any happiness in the future.' But his voice trembled a little. After all, it was hard—it was hard! And Cecily clung to him closely still.

"'You do not think I could forget these days together,' she said. 'You have been to me so much more than ever before—'

"'No, don't forget them,' he said tenderly. 'Don't forget me, either. I should like you to think of me—to pray for me even, if you think prayers are of any use to the dead; to remember me with your sweet forgiveness and charity all the days of your life.'

"'I shall never forget,' she murmured."

The very thin thread of the story is twined rather deftly round a saintly legend of the locality; and, as might be expected, the descriptive element bulks largely. It would, perhaps, be better if good novelists like Miss Sargent would give us only masterpieces; but I suppose novelists must go on writing, and few of them can afford to tear up at the end the story which has not fulfilled the promise of its conception.

* * * *

In the Tideway By Flora Annie Steel.
(Constable & Co.)

In this book Mrs. Steel leaves the Land of the Five Rivers for that other portion of her kingdom, the cold, moorish, seaboard of north-west Scotland. Roedaray is a shooting-box on a wind-swept island, with the sound of Atlantic breakers always in the air, and in front of it, "right out in the sunset like Avilion," Eilean-a-varai—

Isle of the Dead. Thither come an English shooting party, and there, in that land of ancient memory and wild tales, Fate comes out of the sea for some of the number, and the tragedy of life is played out on the salt sands against the background of the moors.

The tale is quaintly fantastic, for an old folk-legend is woven in with the fact. Indeed, the book is very unlike Mrs. Steel's other work, with its sober air of reality and elaborate plan. It is far different even from her previous Scotch story, "Red Rowans," for there she had a large canvas and many figures. There is nothing in this book so humorously conceived as "Blazes," so subtly and adequately drawn as "Lady George," or even so pathetic as "Marjory Carmichael." It is a mere sketch—a study in melancholy sentiment and lost hopes, with hints of a great life-tragedy underlying the half-jesting conversation of the actors. When Lady Maud dies in the quicksand you feel that it is a mere freak of fate, but such is the author's skilful use of the old stories and the mystery of the land that the thing does not surprise or offend. Had the scene and atmosphere been different I should have asked to hear more about her cousin Eustace and her husband, to have a fuller account of her progress in emotions. As it is the book is a sheer triumph of skill, one degree, perhaps, less valuable than a fully conceived presentation of the actual, but none the less admirable, within its limits. There is care shown in every character. Miss Willina is delightful; Captain Weeks, Cynthia Strong, and the artist Lockhart are vividly done for all their slightness. But the real art, perhaps, lies less in the sequence of events or the portrayal of character than in just this subtle suggestion everywhere of the abiding causeless mystery of land and sea.

* * * *

Little Stories about Women. By George Fleming.
(Grant Richards.)

It is from a dingy palette that these impressions are spread; they are keyed down to the patience of the most morose pessimism; but they are truth (that side of it), and life (at its most lamentable). In the career of human beings there arrives a moment when the soul comes to the surface; and the careful watcher may discern in the meagre spectre the never realised notion after which its Creator fashioned it. George Fleming is this careful watcher. She knows how to capture the moment, she is cunning to unveil it. Her method reminds one more than a little of M. Marcel Prévost. I select "A Contemporary." It is the reverie of a woman upon what had not passed six years before, upon the day when, by way of a final indulgence of an unlawful passion, she had given her lover a farewell rendezvous: That meeting never took place.

"... They had been prevented by the commonest, the most obvious of accidents. It had simply rained all day long. . . . She had so vehemently persuaded herself that the very completeness of the sacrifice—the manner in which she sent him away for ever—could propitiate fate, cheat justice, turn this last poor self-indulgence into a mere question of compensation for the pain they suffered. And then it had rained all day."

We look into the woman's mind while the fictitious details of that sterile day stream through it, just as, by a more familiar device for securing the perspective of which Mr. Harland writes as so effective an element in the successful treatment of the short story, we have been shown the intimate leaves of the carnet or of familiar correspondence. She arrives at the station for Stonehenge (so runs the story which she tells herself for the hundredth time) and finds him awaiting her. In the lumbering hired carriage he was by her side.

"His love was there. . . . And in an instant a feeling of absolute satisfaction, the rest, the contentment of a natural completion, filled all her heart and being; stilled it; filled it; rising, rising like water in a lock."

(That trick, by the way, of doubling a word, either to give a sustained effect or for intensity, is throughout the volume over-indulged.) They send the carriage away and lunch.

"And then . . . she told him the whole story, rapidly, impetuously, without stopping to pick words; as if some secret barrier between their minds were for the first time broken. 'I was twenty-two, nearly twenty-three. And there were so many of us at home. I was so pleased not to wait; to be the first of all to marry. . . . I liked all the things he gave me. Roger, now—now—at the present moment—I like having those things still.'"

But this was not all that held her. When she was most nearly softened recurred the knowledge that "... sometime, somewhere, there would come a certain day, a certain hour, when he ceased [sic] to care for her as he cared now . . . And nothing could prevent it—nothing. . . . It was not even his fault . . ."

As they neared the terminus he made a last appeal, and as he knelt

"... she laid her other hand upon his bowed head. What was there left to say? She loved this man with all the force of which she was capable. . . . But she had grown up in a society which discourages sentiment and holds many material satisfactions for those who are successful after its own fashion."

Her husband fusses in upon the finish of the vision. The impression is of a little nature fenced into the strait path of social sanction by no principle of religion or of ethics, but by its essential defects of courage and confidence, subject, therefore, to every temptation, empty of all satisfaction—a strong and clear impression caught at the moment when the woman knew herself. Of the eleven other stories—and none of them falls below a high standard—"A Woman with No Nonsense About Her" and "For Ten Francs" are remarkable. Of all I may observe that they are not work to be recommended either to the man in the street or the man in the train.

* * * *

Audrey Craven. By May Sinclair.
(Blackwood.)

Fiction appears to be looking up. During the last three or four weeks I have come upon at least as many novels of real merit, all of them deserving to be classed as serious attempts at literature and not mere imitations of other men's vogue. Not the least notable of these is "Audrey Craven." If this is Miss Sinclair's first book, as I suppose it is, she has my warmest congratulations on a most admirable opening to her career. The writing is excellent and without affectation, and every character in the book lives. In Audrey, especially, Miss Sinclair has given us a fine character-study in the deliberate analytic style of Mrs. Humphry Ward, although Audrey is perhaps conceived with more of deliberate hostility than Mrs. Ward generally permits herself towards her puppets. Beautiful, vain and shallow, impressionable, and with only a rudimentary conscience, she goes far to ruin two men's lives before she falls into the hands of Langley Wyndham, and becomes the copy for his next novel. Here is a specimen of Miss Sinclair's handling of Audrey, full, it seems to me, of fine irony, and written with unstrained ease and distinction. One of Audrey's discarded lovers has died of drink. Katherine is the woman who really loved him:

"Katherine could bear it no longer, but she managed to control her voice in answering: 'Why do you tell me these things? Do you suppose I care to hear about your "feelings"?—if you do feel.'"

"If I do feel? Kathy!"

"Well, why can't you keep quiet, now it's too late?"

"Because—because I wanted you to know that I loved him."

"There was silence. Presently Audrey put one hand on Katherine's knee.

"Kathy—"

"I'd rather you didn't call me that, if you don't mind."

"Why?" Audrey stared with large, incomprehensive eyes.

"I can't tell you why."

"Katherine, then—it is prettier. Do you know I sometimes think it's better, oh, infinitely better, that he should have died."

Katherine rose from her seat, to end it, looking down on the kneeling figure, as she answered bitterly, "It was indeed—infinitely better."

"But irony, like so many other things of the kind, was beyond Audrey."

"I suppose I ought to go now," she said rising.

Katherine made no answer.

"Audrey went away to get ready a little reluctantly, for she had so much more to say. It had never occurred to her to be jealous of Katherine. That may have been either because she did not know, or because she did not care. She had been so sure of Vincent."

Presently she came back with her hat on. She carried her bear-skin in her hand, and under the shade of the broad black beaver her face wore an expression of anxious thought.

"Katherine"—she held out her cape and muff, and Katherine remembered that they were those which Vincent had given her—"I suppose I can wear my furs still, even if I am in mourning?"

"There was neither scorn nor irony in the look that Katherine turned on her, and Audrey understood this time. As plainly as looks can speak

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

The Struggle for Existence.

WHERE there is brain-fag and utter limpness, what is to be done? This is the time when Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa plays such an important part. It not only revives the exhausted nervous system, but it gives tone to what we may call the fountain of life and vigour.

The tired student, the exhausted professional man, the teacher, are revived, restored, and strengthened by Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, which brightens the eye, and stores up reserve power in the nervous system.

DR. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA,
6d., 9d., and 1s. 6d.

DAINTY SAMPLE TIN POST FREE ON APPLICATION
(a postcard will do) if when writing you name "THE ACADEMY."

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa, Ltd.,

60, 61, 62, Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

it condemned her as altogether lighter than vanity itself; and while condemning, it forgave her.

"He gave them to me, you know," she said at last. Audrey's pathos generally came too late."

A good foil to Audrey is provided in Katherine Haviland, true artist and true woman, who is most delicately and sympathetically done.

* * * *

The Old Ecstasies. By Gaspard Trehern.
(Bellairs & Co.)

This is a book in the Ercles vein. The author has a curious style. His familiarity with the reader is so great as to become offensive. He has no hesitation in addressing him, in the course of a purely imaginary controversy, as "Bah, man!" and he ends one chapter with the urgent query, also addressed to the world at large, "Why don't you spit on me?" It is, perhaps, unfair as a rule to cite particular phrases as samples of a book, but in the present case it is the shortest method of giving an idea of a book which is all gasps and ecstasies. Mr. Trehern, for example, is fond of the word "confab"; he even uses "confabbed" as a verb. "My dear little jumble girl" is his way of referring to the heroine. Another of his ladies is given to self-criticism. "You will find in me," she says, "a want of bay and promontory, hill and dale, we all like so to see in a woman." Somewhat in the Marie Corellian line is this outburst: "Consistent? Detested cant word of the critics. The critics? Rule of thumb jugglers with dead inkpots and pens. Who are they to talk to me about being Consistent? They were not there. I was! My God—I was there!" In his more restrained moments the author enunciates, through the mouth of one of his characters, the striking doctrine that "sin develops the heart and makes ye believe in God." The story of the book hardly counts; though towards the end a situation is developed which, in the hands of a more discreet author, might be powerful.

A GUIDE TO DICKENS.

The Novels of Charles Dickens. By Frederic G. Kitton.
(Elliot Stock.)

Mr. Kitton has produced a pleasant compilation of the facts concerning the writing, publication, and characters of Charles Dickens's novels. He adds to them new minor facts that have arisen, and of these there is a constant supply. The number of men and women who have personal recollections of Dickens, or were known to him, is still large. Mute things still wear the charm with which he invested them. People die whom he sketched, and buildings fall that he peopled. Being dead he yet speaketh, not only in his books, but in the streets of London and in the speech of daily life. Mr. Kitton is keen to note these adumbrations of Dickens's power. He reminds us of the revival of the eternal Jennings's case last October, in the Court of Chancery, when that prototype of "Jarndyce v. Jarndyce" was before Mr. Kekewich. He notes that in December of last year Mr. Cluer adopted, at the South Western Police Court, the ruling of Mr. Justice Stareleigh in "Bardle v. Pickwick," that "what the soldier, or any other man, said is not evidence." He quotes from a recent discussion in the Daily Chronicle on boys' literature the letter of an "Ex-Arab," who read the Bleak House chapter about Jo when he was living Jo's pitiful life. He reminds us that the original of Nicholas in Nicholas Nickleby, Mr. Henry Burnett, died only four years ago. He describes the present state of Tom All-Along's, near Drury-lane. Thus his book is salted with facts that are within the younger reader's knowledge, while those which are not so are clearly stated.

The identification of Dickens's characters with their prototypes in real life has received much attention from Mr. Kitton. There was never any difficulty in making these identifications, except such as arose from the eagerness of people to claim they had been in Dickens's eye. Many Yorkshire schoolmasters were anxious to be regarded as the true Squeers! Mrs. Nickleby was based on the author's mother. Miss La Creevy, the miniature painter, was Miss Rose Emma Drummond, who painted Dickens's portrait on ivory in 1835. The wretched Newman Noggs was portrayed after "an impoverished gentleman, Newman Knott, whom Dickens saw at the office of Messrs. Ellis & Blackmore, during his own clerkship days." The Cheeryble Brothers were the brothers Daniel and William Grant, of Ramsbottom, near Manchester; Dickens knew them only through others, but he did not exaggerate their benevolence. William Grant's papers showed, after his death, that he had given away £600,000 in charity. The original of Barnaby Rudge is thought to have died recently. "He was a peculiarly eccentric young man named Walter de Brisac, who lived at Chatham—a pedlar by profession." When Dickens's attention was first drawn to him he was wearing a suit of clothes suggestive of a remote period of antiquity, and was clad in the same garments when he died, suffering from wretchedness and destitution. In the same novel we have Lord Chesterfield described under the name of Sir John Chester. Mr. Pecksniff was thought to be Mr. S. C. Hall, editor of the Art Journal. Poor little Paul Dombey was the novelist's nephew, Harry Burnett, and of other characters in Dombey and Son Mr. Kitton writes:

"There can be no doubt that the novelist in portraying Mr. Dombey had in view a particular City magnate, as he expressly wished Hablôt Browne to get a glimpse of a certain merchant, because he was 'the very Dombey'—that is, externally. Carker was connected, through his father, with an eminent engineering firm, and lived in Oxford-street, where he prowled about. The original of Mrs. Skewton was recognised at the time in a Mrs. Campbell, a lady well known at Leamington; she was so tightly laced that the slightest exertion caused her to pant for breath. It is also said that her daughter stood for the second Mrs. Dombey. Captain Cuttle was one David Mainland, master of a merchantman, who was introduced to Dickens on the day when, accompanied by Thomas Chapman, Maclise, Leech, Rogers and others, he went to see Crosby Hall, Bishopsgate-street, the restoration of which had then been completed. . . . The old nautical instrument maker Sol Gills found his prototype in Mr. Norie, of the firm of Norie & Wilson, Leadenhall-street, in front of whose small shop stood the Little Wooden Midshipman, since removed to the Minorities."

Similar pedigrees are supplied by Mr. Kitton to many other characters in the novels. The prices of early editions, of which Mr. Kitton gives particulars, form a set of facts of less general interest. But every page of this unambitious sketch of the novelist deepens one's impression of the prodigious activity of Dickens's head and heart. It is well, too, to be reminded how marvellously he was helped, and how men's sympathies became tributary to the deep stream of his own sympathy with humanity. The thanks that were given him, the letters that were written to him, the coincidences in his career, all go to swell and authenticate his triumph. Such things are the accompaniment of every strenuous life; in Dickens's life they were daily as the sunshine.

THE GREATEST MAN.

On a second-rate planet there lived some men who Did Things. They cut down great forests and tilled the soil, so that they and their fellows might have food. They dug coal and iron from the earth, and with forges and furnaces wrought wondrous machines. They built broad smooth highways, spanned rivers with strong bridges, and tunnelled through high mountains. They led vast armies in battle, sailed huge structures of wood and iron across mighty seas, built million-peopled cities, and published Sunday newspapers with coloured supplements. Thus in many ways did they show that they were no mean persons.

And there were also some men who Wrote Things. They in well-phrased sentences described how the men who Did Things worked. They told of the craft of the woodsman and of the sailor's perils; of the brave men who fought in battle and how the peaceful farmer gathered his harvests. Everything that men did found someone who wrote about it.

Because the people on the second-rate planet were very wise they agreed that the men who wrote about things were far wiser and greater than the men who only did things. Therefore the choicest pleasures of life were given to the writers-about-things.

So in the course of time there grew up men who wrote only about the writings of the men who wrote about things. And these men were also held in high honour. When finally there was discovered a man who wrote only about the men who wrote about the writers-about-things, a happy planet declared him to be its chief Critic and Greatest Man.—(W. Graham in "The Philistine.")

MR. G. W. CABLE.

The surroundings of Mr. George Washington Cable, says The Bookman (New York), best known as the novelist of the Creoles, are very different to-day from those of his early years, for he is a Southerner and spent the best part of his life in New Orleans, where he was for a long time engaged in business. The innumerable opportunities which the city of New Orleans and the State of Louisiana afford to the novelist were not missed by Mr. Cable, whose delicate art has enshrined the old Creole life in stories of which the North as well as the South may be justly proud. Dr. Robertson Nicoll, who, in company with Mr. Barrie, visited Mr. Cable in his home in the New England town of Northampton, wrote:

"We visited New Orleans and saw the French quarter, which, amid the many changes in other parts of the city, remains practically unaltered. There you may see the house of Mme. Delphine, the haunted house, and the scenes of much besides in Mr. Cable's stories. There you may see the French life flowing beside the American, and hardly mingling with it yet. Mr. Cable naturally took the side of the South, and when a mere boy was a Confederate soldier, like his brother. They saw much of the war, and Mr. Cable was severely wounded. Among his most precious treasures is a collection of letters written by himself and his brother during the war. They are sure to be published some day and to take a prominent place in the literature of the subject."

As is well known, Mr. Cable was early tempted to portray the Creole character, but did not succeed in pleasing the Creoles. Dr. Nicoll had a talk at New Orleans with a lady of long Creole descent, who complained somewhat bitterly of this.

"I replied that to us it seemed that the Creoles Mr. Cable drew were perfectly delightful people, and that if he had underrated their merits they must be the very chosen of the world. She was somewhat propitiated by this, but remained still unsatisfied. A journalist told me that there was something effeminate about the Creole character which Mr. Cable had faithfully rendered, and that the Creoles did not like to have it pointed out. I should have said feminine rather than effeminate, but in any case there should be little reason for complaint. For delicate insight and unerring workmanship there are very few short stories in the English language that approach them. The Grandissimes is also a very gay, brilliant and tender book. Dr. Sevier is more of a novel with a purpose, but it, too, abounds in fine things, and there is a vein of sweet and serious thought through it all."

Mr. Cable is more than a novelist. He has been from the first an earnest philanthropist, deeply interested in the welfare of his kind. Among his recent undertakings has been the encouragement of home-culture clubs, and it was in behalf of this organisation that the unfortunate Symposium, which had a short-lived career, was started. These clubs have done a great deal in America, especially in the country districts, not only for culture, but for the bridging of the gulf between the rich and the poor. It has been already stated that Mr. Cable will visit England in the autumn and give readings from his works, as he has done for a long time in America. He interprets his own writings with consummate ability, and surely no American author is more entitled to, or more assured of, a cordial reception. Mr. Cable has lately assumed the editorship of Current Literature, in which he also conducts an editorial symposium.

With the exception of a book of short stories which he is now putting together, Mr. Cable has no immediate literary plans for the future. We understand that the Messrs. Scribner are preparing a holiday illustrated edition of Old Creole Days for next Christmas. An English edition of The Grandissimes, with an introduction by Mr. J. M. Barrie, is also being projected. Mr. Cable and Mr. Barrie met for the first time last autumn, although the latter had been an ardent admirer of Mr. Cable's work ever since he made the acquaintance of Old Creole Days, some five or six years ago.

NEW FICTION OF THE WEEK.

LITTLE STORIES ABOUT WOMEN. By GEORGE FLEMING. (Grant Richards.)

DREAM TALES. By IVAN TURGENEV. (Heinemann.)

A TALE OF TWO TUNNELS. A Romance of the Western Waters. By CLARK RUSSELL. (Chapman & Hall.)

A TRICK OF FAME. By H. HAMILTON FYFE. (R. Bentley & Son.)

FATHER HILARION. By K. DOUGLAS KING. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THE LARRAMAYS. By GEORGE FORD. (Hutchinson & Co.)

A PEAKLAND FAGGOT. Tales Told of Milton Folk. By R. MURRAY GILCURIST. (Grant Richards.)

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's
SWISS
MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK, BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely
proof against Carrying Disease.

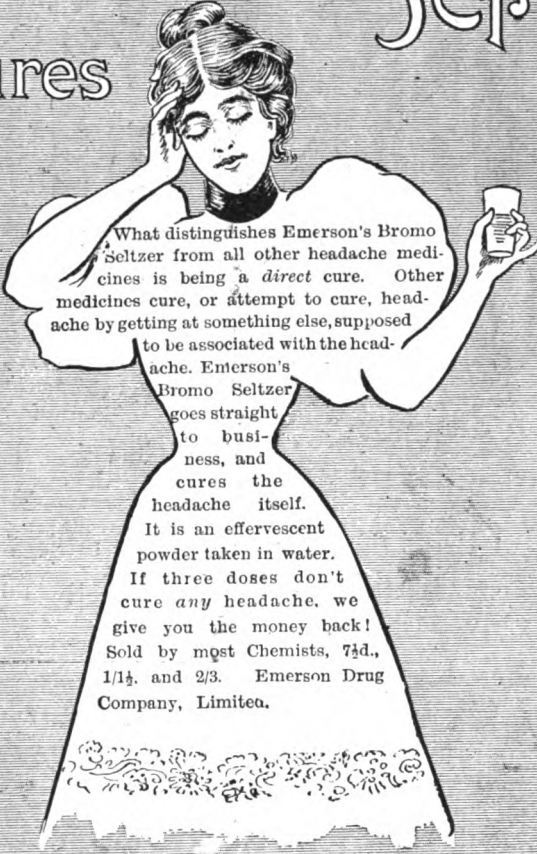

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes:
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c., &c.

Emerson's Bromo Seltzer

Cures

H
E
A
D
A
C
H
E

What distinguishes Emerson's Bromo Seltzer from all other headache medicines is being a direct cure. Other medicines cure, or attempt to cure, headache by getting at something else, supposed to be associated with the headache. Emerson's Bromo Seltzer goes straight to business, and cures the headache itself. It is an effervescent powder taken in water. If three doses don't cure any headache, we give you the money back! Sold by most Chemists, 7½d., 1/1½, and 2/3. Emerson Drug Company, Limited.

SOAP

is scientifically defined as the neutral compound of fatty acids with an alkaline base. Neutral is the important word.

Eeckelaers' Toilet Soaps

alone fulfil the conditions perfectly. Excess of alkali renders soap caustic: super-fatting renders it greasy and disagreeable. A really skilful soap manufacturer makes soap neutral.

ASK the Perfumer (or Perfumery Department at "the Stores") for the following, in boxes of three tablets:—

EECKELAERS' BROWN WINDSOR SOAP	1s.
EECKELAERS' SPRING ROSE SOAP	1s. 6d.
EECKELAERS' OPOPONAX SOAP	1s. 9d.
EECKELAERS' BOUQUET DE VIOLETTES SOAP	2s.

The exquisite perfume and dainty boxing of these soaps peculiarly recommend them. Unrivalled in the nursery.

TALKS ON THE TEETH.--No. 2.

Do you recognise how essential good teeth are to the health of the whole body? Every tooth that is decayed or inefficient throws extra work on the rest, and hastens their decay. Presently the work of mastication is interfered with, and that leads to Dyspepsia, while the decaying teeth are themselves a source of direct injury to the health.

Teeth that are kept really clean do not decay, and only a very little care is needed. The greatest danger is from small particles of food that lodge in irregularities of the teeth. What must be done is to use some dentifrice that will reach and remove these, while, at the same time, cleansing and sweetening any incipient decay. Only one thing will do this: SOZODONT. No one who has not used it has any idea how pleasant SOZODONT is. Sold everywhere, price 2s. 6d.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors New York.

Mends Everything.

LE PAGE'S LIQUID GLUE

Is used by Pullman Palace Car Co., Mason & Hamlin Organ and Piano Co., and by thousands of first-class manufacturers and mechanics throughout the world, for all kinds of fine work on Wood, Ivory, Leather, Paper, Glass, Marble, &c.

Awarded GOLD MEDAL at World's Exhibition, London, 1883. Pronounced the STRONGEST ADHESIVE KNOWN.

Sold in tin cans for mechanics and amateurs, and in bottles for family use.

IT MENDS EVERYTHING.

Wood, Leather, Paper, Ivory, Glass, China, Rubber, Stone, Jewellery, Metals, Shoes, Books, Card Albums, Toys, Musical Instruments, Statuary, Farmers' Implements, Furniture, Bric-a-Brac, &c.

Strong as Iron.

Solid as a Rock.

No Heating. No Preparation. Always Ready. Indispensable in every Family. Sold in tin cans for Mechanics and Amateurs. Half-pints, 2s.; Pints, 3s.; and Quarts 4s. 6d. each; and in bottles for family use at 6d. and 1s. Samples free by post on receipt of stamps or postal order. Sold by the Wholesale Trade generally, and retailed by Stationers, Fancy Goods Dealers, Grocers, Ironmongers, Chemists, &c., &c.

SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1897.

No. 1310, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow in due course.]

IT might have been thought that Dr. Birkbeck Hill's Johnsonian Miscellanies, which were published a few days ago, would be the completion of his life's work. But this is not so. Dr. Hill set aside another project—the editing of a new edition of the Lives of the Poets—to compile these interesting volumes. We may yet have the Poets, but here are the Miscellanies. They are the logical complement of the eight volumes in which Dr. Hill has edited Boswell's Life, and Johnson's Letters; an edition of the Lives of the Poets would have been only supplemental. One feels, therefore, with Dr. Hill himself, that the advice he received from Mr. Leslie Stephen to edit the Miscellanies first was sound. Dr. Hill is now far advanced in life, and, unfortunately, his health does not permit him to reside much in this country. These Johnsonian Miscellanies, he tells us,

"would have been ready for publication three years earlier had I not been delayed by illness, and by the necessity I have been under of passing all my winters abroad. On the banks of the Lake of Geneva, or on the shores of the Mediterranean, an editor, however much he may be supported by the climate, has to struggle against difficulties which might almost overwhelm him. Many a day he 'casts a long look' towards the Bodleian and the British Museum."

A glance through these volumes assures us of their interest and value to every Johnsonian student. The first volume opens with that strange, sad document, Dr. Johnson's Prayers and Meditations. Boswell, it will be remembered, often quotes it, but in its entirety it is little known. Yet in it Johnson opens his heart to himself and his Maker. Then follows the chapter of autobiography which Johnson would have committed to the flames with a mass of other papers a few days before his death. The fragment here given was kept back by Johnson's black servant, Francis Barber. Mrs. Piozzi's "Anecdotes" of Johnson is the next item. It has elicited many various opinions, most of which condemn its presentation of Johnson as inaccurate. The book appeared in 1786, and was sold out within three days. Arthur Murphy's biographical essay prefixed to his edition of Johnson's works (1792) concludes the first of these volumes. The second is more a collection of snippets. We have a number of "Apothegms," taken from John Hawkins's edition of Boswell, and a great many sets of anecdotes from the memoirs of Johnson's more or less illustrious contemporaries; also a number of Letters, mostly, Dr. Hill thinks, printed for the first time. Among the more amusing contents of the volume are the two Dialogues in which Sir Joshua Reynolds parodied Dr. Johnson's conversation and illustrated his own remark that "Dr. Johnson considered Garrick as his property, and would never suffer anyone to praise or abuse him but himself."

Mr. W. E. Henley's "Tudor Translations" series has been enriched by a new edition of Thomas Danett's translation of the famous Chronicle of Philippe de Comines. Danett published his version in 1596, and his present editor, Mr. Charles Whibley, has high praise for his work. He writes:

"When Comines wrote his Chronicle, he hoped no more for it than that the Archbishop of Vienne should turn it into Latin; and within a century it was part of four literatures! Moreover, so great is the superiority of a living over a dead language that, while the Latin version of Jean Sleidan is forgotten, the English of Thomas Danett is a masterpiece untouched by age. It possesses all the virtues of majestic speech: written at the time when all men handled English prose with freedom and strength unparalleled, it is distinguished by the rich cadences and the wealth of imagery which are the glory of our Authorised Version. To criticise it were superfluous, since it carries its virtues upon the surface. It satisfies the wisest canons of translation. It is neither slavish nor diffuse; the English is no mere echo of the French; but the sentences are admirably turned from one idiom into the other. . . . You may read his history from end to end with a pleasure which comes rather from the music of the phrase than from the simple statement. And he is a true Elizabethan in his preference for a fat, sonorous prose before the stern and careful elegance of Philippe de Comines."

The two volumes of the present edition have the lightness and the nobility of type common to the "Tudor Translations."

The arrival of four large volumes in a blue canvas binding cannot but excite curiosity. They turn out to be the Memoirs of Bertrand Barère, now first presented in English. Mr. Payen Pain has translated them from the French edition of 1843, for which M. Hippolyte Carnot, the son of Barère's well-known colleague on the Committee of Public Safety, and the father of the late President Carnot, was responsible. The Memoirs of a man so intimately concerned in the French Revolution may not prove superfluous even at this day. Barère, moreover, is interesting as a hater of England. It must be confessed that Macaulay gave Englishmen their revenge—had they desired it—in a summary of Barère's character which he wrote in the Edinburgh Review. Here it is:

"Our opinion, then, is this: that Barère approached nearer than any person mentioned in history or fiction, whether man or devil, to the idea of consummate and universal depravity. In almost every particular sort of wickedness he has had rivals. His sensuality was immoderate; but that was a failing common to him with many great and amiable men. There have been many men as cowardly as he, some as cruel, a few as mean, a few as impudent. There may also have been as great liars, though we have never met with them or read of them. But when we put everything together—sensuality, poltroonery, baseness, effrontery, mendacity, barbarity—the result is something which, in a novel, we should condemn as caricature, and to which, we venture to say, no parallel can be found in history."

M. Carnot portrays Barère more favourably, and we may hope that he therein portrays him nearer to the life.

Another book of the week that surprises at first sight is The Naturalist in Australia, a large and sumptuous square quarto, profusely illustrated by photographs and coloured drawings. The binding is embellished with four comic lizards. We thought they were meant to be comic until we found the drawings repeated in the book, with the information that they are from instantaneous photographs. The Australian frilled lizard walks erect, and with airs and graces and occasional dance attitudes that must be intensely ludicrous in life. One lizard is apparently performing an eccentric dance that would be the making of an Alhambra ballet. The walk of another proclaims him a born fop, and a third is running with the air of a policeman who is making speed with dignity. We see that the author, Mr. W. Savile Kent, devotes chapters to "Insect Oddities" and "Vegetable Vagaries." Many of the photographs would give ideas to Caran d'Ache or Oberländer, those past masters of comic zoology. The work, as a whole, is, of course, a serious contribution to science.

A Jubilee book that should find favour is Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign. It is a series of appreciations of deceased women novelists whose work fell entirely within the present reign. The contributing writers are all women. Mrs. Oliphant writes on The Sisters Brontë, Mrs. Lynn Linton on George Eliot, Miss Edna Lyall on Mrs. Gaskell, and Miss Adeline Sergeant and Miss Charlotte M. Yonge each have three short appreciations of women novelists. The book is in quarto size, and handsomely published.

The members of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society listened last autumn to five lectures, having for their object "the extension of the conception of Art, and, more especially, the application of the idea of beauty as well as of utility to the organisation and decoration of our greater cities." These lectures are now issued in a neat volume by Messrs. Rivington, Percival & Co.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

- THE MODERN READER'S BIBLE: EZEKIEL. Edited by Rev. R. G. Moulton, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.
 ST. JOSEPH'S ANTHOLOGY. Edited by Rev. Matthew Russell, S.J. M. H. Gill & Son (Dublin).
 LIFE OF ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS. Compiled and translated by David Lewis, M.A. Thomas Baker.
 SAINT COLUMBA: A RECORD AND A TRIBUTE. By Duncan Macgregor. J. G. Hitt (Edinburgh).
 ANCIENT ENGLISH HOLY WEEK CHERNOMIAL. By Henry John Feasey. Thomas Baker. 7s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- MEMOIRS OF BERTRAND BARÈRE. Now first translated by De V. Payen-Payde. 4 vols. H. S. Nichols.
 JOHNSONIAN MISCELLANIES. Arranged and edited by George Birkbeck Hill, D.C.L., LL.D. 2 vols. Clarendon Press. 28s.
 HISTORICAL MEMORIALS OF ELY CATHEDRAL: TWO LECTURES. By Charles William Stubbs, D.D. J. M. Dent & Co.
 MY FATHER AS I RECALL HIM. By Mamie Dickens. The Roxburghe Press. 3s. 6d.

ART, POETRY, BELLES LETTRES, ETC.

- ART AND LIFE, AND THE BUILDING AND DECORATION OF CITIES: A COURSE OF LECTURES. By T. J. Cobden-Sanderson, Walter Crane, and others. Rivington, Percival & Co. 6s.
 WOMEN NOVELISTS OF QUEEN VICTORIA'S REIGN. By Mrs. Oliphant, Mrs. Lynn Linton, and others. Hurst & Blackett.
 ENGLISH MINSTRELSIE. Vol. VII. Edited by S. Baring-Gould, M.A. T. C. and E. C. Jack (Edinburgh).
 BACKWARD LOOKING: VERSES OCCASIONAL AND MISCELLANEOUS. Anon. Wm. Pollard (Exeter).
 QUEEN-EMPEROR AND EMPIRE: 1837-1897. A Poem. By George Francis Savage-Armstrong. Marcus Ward & Co. 5s.

TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, ETC.

- DIARY OF A TOUR THROUGH GREAT BRITAIN IN 1795. By Rev. William MacRitchie. Edited by David MacRitchie. Elliot Stock. 6s.
 THE NEW AFRICA: A JOURNEY UP THE CHIBE AND DOWN THE OKOVANGA RIVERS. By Aurel Schulz, M.D., and August Hammar, C.E. William Heinemann.
 GRANT ALLEN'S HISTORICAL GUIDES: CITIES OF BELGIUM. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

NATURAL HISTORY.

- THE NATURALIST IN AUSTRALIA. By W. Saville-Kent, F.L.S., F.Z.S. Chapman & Hall.
 THE MIGRATION OF BIRDS: AN ATTEMPT TO REDUCE AVIAN SEASON-FLIGHT TO LAW. By Charles Dixon. Horace Cox.
 THE WOODLAND LIFE. By Edward Thomas. Wm. Blackwood & Sons. 6s.
 IN GARDEN, ORCHARD, AND SPINNEY. By Phil Robinson. Isbister & Co.

EDUCATIONAL.

- CICERO: CATO MAIOR DE SENECTUTE. With Notes by Charles E. Bennett. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn (New York). 60 cents.
 ST. JOHN IN THE DESERT: AN INTRODUCTION TO BROWNING'S "A DEATH IN THE DESERT." By Rev. G. U. Pope, D.D. Oxford University Press. 2s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- THE KLEESDORF GOLD FIELDS. By G. A. Denny. Macmillan & Co. £2 2s.
 WASTE AND REPAIR IN MODERN LIFE. By Robson Roose. John Murray. 7s. 6d.
 ELY CATHEDRAL. By Rev. W. E. Dickson, M.A. ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL. By Rev. W. C. E. Newbolt, M.A. Isbister & Co., Ltd.
 THE EASTERN CRISIS OF 1897, AND BRITISH POLICY IN THE NEAR EAST. By G. H. Pettis. Chapman & Hall. 3s. 6d.
 IMPRESSIONS OF TURKEY. By Prof. W. M. Ramsay. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.
 CABOT'S DISCOVERY OF NORTH AMERICA. By G. E. Wear. John Macquenn.
 THE VICTORIAN ERA. By P. Anderson Graham. Longmans, Green & Co. 2s. 6d.
 BOB-MOVS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Edited by Walter Jarrold. J. M. Dent & Co.
 THE PLACE OF DEATH IN EVOLUTION. By Newman Smith. T. Fisher Unwin.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. W. E. HENLEY has at last completed the edition of Burns which he has been engaged on for so long in collaboration with Mr. Henderson. The third and last volume will contain Mr. Henley's essay on the genius of the poet.

It is stated that the name of Mr. George Smith, the senior partner in the firm of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., will be found in the list of Diamond Jubilee honours. This choice will be popular among literary men. By his public-spirited enterprise in undertaking, at his own cost, the Dictionary of National Biography, which is now so near completion, Mr. Smith has performed an action which merits notice from the English throne.

MR. J. M. BARRIE has finished the dramatic version of The Little Minister.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. are preparing an English edition of The Choir Invisible, the historical novel of Kentucky, by Mr. James Lane Allen, which all Americans are now reading. Mr. Allen has been writing for some years, but he has only lately found his public. His other books are A Kentucky Cardinal, Aftermath, Summer in Arcady, The Blue Grass Region of Kentucky, and Flute and Violin. One critic has said of The Choir Invisible that it is the most considerable American work of fiction since The Scarlet Letter; another has grouped it with Esmond. We shall see.

WITH the July number Messrs. Dent & Co. become the publishers of Natural Science. Among those who will contribute papers to this number are Dr. John Murray, Prof. Ray Lankester, Dr. Bashford Dean, Dr. P. L. Sclater, Mr. Lewis Abbott, Mr. R. Lydekker, and Mr. F. R. Weldon. All communications for the editor or for the publishers should in future be sent to the editorial and publishing offices, 67, St. James's-street, S.W.

MR. HENRY JAMES is now the London correspondent of Harper's Weekly.

THE Chap-Book, after commenting upon the war correspondence of Mr. Stephen Crane, which it describes as a failure, owing to the conquest of the eyesight of Mr. Crane the reporter over the imagination of Mr. Crane the artist, continues thus:

"The literary honours of the war belong easily to Mr. G. W. Steevens, of the London Daily Mail, who within the past year has won the reputation of being the best special correspondent to be found in England. His fortunate ignorance of tactics and strategy kept him from spoiling the easy, pointed vivacity of his personal impressions by any display of amateur technique. Only one man could have excelled him, but though Mr. Rudyard Kipling announced his readiness to serve, no paper was able to make any definite arrangements with him."

THE letter summing up his impressions of the war which Mr. G. W. Steevens contributed to the Daily Mail of June 10 is one of the best of a remarkable series. In this article Mr. Steevens reproduces the effect of war upon the civilian accustomed to the machinery of quiet life. Here is a passage:

"Saddest of all were the foals. The new dropped foals, whose mothers had been taken straight away to carry cartridges, went trotting up and down the line of march calling to them. You know the slightly querulous, expectant expression of a foal's hairy little face. The baby was getting very hungry and tired. He was quite confident of finding his mother—she was there only an hour ago; where could she have got to meanwhile, and why didn't she come to comfort him when he cried? They all starved. And I saw the poor little bit of a chestnut filly foal trying to struggle up a slope of the Furze Path with a fore-foot lopped off at the pastern. Some devil must have done it to prevent her from following her dam. She tumbled over and whinnied, jumped up, hobbled a foot or two, and tumbled over again and moaned. To the soldier was only a devil in that he should have shot her through the heart instead of cutting off her foot. For the chestnut filly had to die anyhow. She was part of the inevitable wastage of war."

A RECENT OCCURRENCE at Filey, in Yorkshire, has turned attention to the clockmaker mentioned by Byron in Don Juan—

"Even his minutest motions went as well
 As those of the best timepiece made by Harrison"

—who has been identified as John Harrison, of Hull, who in 1767 received a reward of £20,000 from the Board of Longitude for a valuable discovery. In cleaning the clock of Filey Church the other day, an inscription was found, stating that £10 and a silver medal had been awarded to John Harrison by the Society for the Promotion of Arts. Filey is not a little proud of possessing this record of Byron's Harrison.

MR. CHARLES MORLEY is revising for the press his series of articles, "Archie; or the Confessions of an Old Burglar." The stories are from life, and are founded on actual facts, though the treatment is imaginative. The hero of the sketches, "Dad," spent forty years in Her Majesty's convict prisons, was flogged eight times, fifty lashes each time; he suffered in all 400 lashes with the cat. The volume will be published from the offices of the Westminster Gazette.

ON the anniversary of the death of Charles Dickens this week, a number of persons visited his grave in Westminster Abbey; among them one who wrote on his visiting card the suggestion that the day should in future receive national attention. The idea is worth careful consideration. Dickens was English through and through; and it would be peculiarly appropriate to connect his name with a yearly festivity. But is it not rather too soon?

BUT the following announcement from America makes, we think, for error: "The Story of Oliver Twist," condensed for home and school reading by Miss Ella Boyce Kirk, with an introduction by Dr. W. T. Harris, is published by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co."

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish within the next few weeks an account of the recent war, by Mr. Clive Bigham, to be entitled The Campaign in Thessaly. Mr. Bigham, who has served in the Grenadier Guards and in the British Embassy at St. Petersburg, was present during the entire campaign as Special Correspondent for the Times with the Ottoman Army.

THE sumptuous monograph on Queen Victoria which Mr. Holmes, the Royal librarian, has been writing to form the third volume in the series which contains Dr. Creighton's Elizabeth and "Shirley's" Mary, Queen of Scots, is now finished. Her Majesty herself is reading the proofs. Copies of the book are to be obtained at prices which can compare only with those asked from Americans for seats in St. Paul's Churchyard.

MR. JOHN BUCHAN, exhibitioner of Brasenose College, Oxford, won the Stanhope Historical Prize this week. Mr. Buchan is a promising and ambitious writer, and, though he has published two books and edited two others, he is only in his twenty-second year. He was born in Perthshire in 1875: was educated in Glasgow University, where he obtained a scholarship in philosophy, and at Brasenose. He intends to devote himself to the legal profession.

FOUR years ago Mr. Buchan edited a small volume of Bacon's essays, which Mr. Walter Scott published. He appeared next in 1893 as a story-teller with Sir Quizote of the Moors, which bore Mr. Unwin's imprint. He subsequently found his way to the "Bodley Head," which issued his Scholar Gipsies (1896), and his angling anthology, Musa Piscatrix. Mr. Buchan's later literary labours for the most part have not yet met the public eye. They include an ambitious historical romance, a collection of moorland stories, and a Jacobite novel.

MR. ANDREW LANG has made for the New York World a very charming translation, in the eighteenth century manner, of the Pope's new poem. His Holiness's theme is the praise of frugality, and he has written, in Latin, in the manner of the epistolary Horace, addressing his homily to Fabricius Rufus. We quote the first half of the poem, which has reference to the diet of the wise:

"What diet lends the strength to Life, and frees
The flower of health from each malign disease,
The good Ofellus, pupil from of old
And follower of Hippocrates, has told.
Rating base gluttony with anxious air,
He thus laid down the laws of Frugal Fare:
Neatness comes first! Be thy spare table
bright
With shining dishes and with napkins white,
Be thy Chianti unadulterate,
To cheer the heart, and raise the spirit's weight,
Yet trust not much the rosy god—in fine,
Be sure that you put water to your wine.

Picked be thy grain, and pure thy home-made bread,
Thy meats be delicate and dairy-fed;
Tender, nor highly spiced thy food; nor tease
Thy taste with sauces from Ægean seas.
Fresh be thine eggs, hard-boiled, or nearly raw,
Or deftly poached, or simply served au plat,
'There's wit in poaching eggs,' the proverb says,
And you may do them in a hundred ways.
Nor shun the bowl of foaming milk that feeds
The infant, and may serve the senior's needs;
Next on the board to Heaven's gift, honey, placed,
And, sparing, of Hyblæan nectar taste:
Pulses and salads on thy guests bestow—
Even in suburban gardens salads grow—
Add chosen fruits, whate'er the times afford,
Let rose-red apples crown the rustic board.
Last comes the beverage of the Orient shore,
Mocca, far off, the fragrant berries bore,
Taste the dark fluid with a dainty lip,
Digestion waits on pleasure as you sip.
Such are my precepts for a diet sage,
That leads thee safely to a green old age."

In the second half of the poem a wanton feast is described and the moral pointed.

AN examination of recent book-titles in the possessive case brings to light a curious change in the nomenclature of novels. An American librarian has compared 101 titles in this case taken from a catalogue dated 1889 with 101 titles in the same case taken from a catalogue covering the years between 1895 and 1897, and the result is the discovery that the use of the direct possessive is passing away in favour of the objective with "of." Out of the 101 novels of 1889, 71 used the direct possessive and 30 the objective with "of." But of the 101 of the last two years only 41 use the direct possessive. Half of the 60 that remain, says the librarian, would be distinctly improved by the change to the direct possessive, among them being: The Island of Dr. Moreau, The Damnation of Theron Ware, The Courtship of Morris Buckler, The Death of the Lion, The Soul of Pierre; which the critic would like to see altered to Dr. Moreau's Island, Theron Ware's Damnation, Morris Buckler's Courtship, The Lion's Death and Pierre's Soul.

THE contention that in ten years from now we may hear about "the breaking of the arm of John Smith" and "the hat of Tom" is not sound. As the editor of the Book-Buyer points out, the objective case with "of" is chosen for its greater power to arrest the attention, which is needed in a title.

THE director of the New York Library has discovered a disinfectant for books, which he claims to be perfect. He places the volume in an air-tight box, with a sauce of solution of formalin, and in an hour's time the vapour has saturated every leaf and has destroyed every germ. Trials of this system have been wholly successful.

IN the preface to the new, the sixth, edition of Mrs. Keith's Crime Mrs. Clifford lets the reader into the secret of the origin of the story and the manner of its growth; and it will be seen that she answers those critics who complained of its being written in the present tense:

"The first half of the book was written in Italy, in the spring of 1884. To me it was never a story that I had imagined, but a real one that circumstances in my own life made me seize upon and watch with breathless eagerness. Day by day, as if the unseen woman, or some strange mirage of her walked beside me, I saw and heard all that is written here: it seemed to be taking place. How, then, could it be told differently? If one looked on at a play, with a view to describing it to a companion who was blind, one's words would naturally take the present tense; and so did mine in telling this story . . . in fact, it was in the present tense that from beginning to end I saw Mrs. Keith. I wrote so swiftly that my hand often ached, but with a certainty of what must be told that made the concluding chapter an agony, and it took all the time that she suffered for my pen to set it on paper. It was done on my knees, or while I walked up and down, listening and seeing, and feeling as if unknown—always unknown to herself—she used my pen to tell the desperation and the anguish that drove her to that last act."

A feature of this edition of Mrs. Clifford's curious story is an "imaginary portrait" of the heroine by the Hon. John Collier.

IN amplification of Prof. Max Müller's remark, in his recently published reminiscences, that Emerson and Ruskin did not get on too well together, the following opinions expressed by the two illustrious men to friends after their meeting have been ranged side by side:

Ruskin wrote: "Emerson came to my rooms a day or two ago. I found his mind a total blank on matters of art, and had a fearful sense of the whole being of him as a gentle cloud—intangible."

Emerson said: "I had seen Ruskin at Oxford, and had been charmed by his manner in the lecture-room, but in talking with him at his room I found myself wholly out of sympathy with Ruskin's views of life and the world. I wonder such a genius can be possessed by so black a devil. I cannot but pardon him for a despondency so deep. It is detestable in a man of such powers, in a poet, a seer such as he has been. Children are right with their everlasting hope. Timon is always inevitably wrong."

AMONG the twenty-six books which will form Messrs. Henry's two-shilling Random Series will be three collections of Mr. Barry Pain's stories: In a Canadian Canoe (his first book), The Kindness of the Celestial, and Stories and Interludes. It was In a Canadian Canoe that brought Mr. Lang into conflict with what he called the New Humour. We shall be glad to see the book again, if only for the two delightful fancies: "The Celestial Grocery" and "The Camel who Never got Home." Mr. Barry Pain's merits as a deviser of humorous and whimsical tales have never, we think, received full justice.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces a treatise by a well-known prose writer, who has taken the pseudonym "Oxonensis," dealing with the question of religious belief in University circles of the present day. The title will be The Test of Truth.

JESTS AND JEST-BOOKS.

IT is notorious that no variety of book is quite so enervating as the jest-book. The good things which, when spoken, set the table in a roar are apt, when collected, to set the reader yawning more effectively even than a sermon. One reason probably is that the reader expects nothing much from a sermon, and a great deal (so persistent is hope in the human mind) from a jest-book. Another reason is the feebleness of the spoken witticism when printed. A literary joke, a joke prepared by the pen, is often good. But a joke begotten of the moment, dropped swiftly from the tongue in the midst of conversation, must lose its spirit when it is translated into type, and all the original conditions are wanting, especially the speaker's personality. Among the many reflections that jest-books give rise to, not the least prominent is wonder (and envy) at the splendid luck which attends upon the wit. Wherever he may go, there the way is made easy for a good thing. His jokes become almost automatic, so kindly is fate. Opportunities are thrust upon him. For example, a barrister having entered the Court with his wig awry, and having endured chaff from everyone that he met, at length turned to Curran, saying, "Do you see anything ridiculous in this wig?" What could Curran reply but, "Nothing but the head?" The joke was made for him. It is well known that the man who has prepared an impromptu never has long to wait before an opening occurs for it. The gods stand up for humorists. When Erskine was retained, says Mr. Jerrold, in defence of a man named Tickle, he began his case by saying, "Tickle, my client, the defendant, my lord—" At this moment the judge interrupted him. "Tickle him yourself," he (of course) said. An ordinary man would never have such chances as these; or, if he took them, the joke would go unrecorded. For the wit is fortunate, not only in opportunities, but in his friends. It is given to but few to have their good things reported; although to have them repeated is common enough. We meet but seldom the man who has the courage to disclaim the authorship of a witty remark which he has borrowed. Johnsons are rare, but Boswells are rarer.

And this leads to another reflection which always accompanies the perusal of a man's witty sayings, and that is that in many cases he must have put the remark on record himself. There is no reason why he should not. Lamb has shown us conclusively that a man may laugh at his own joke, and to report it is but a step farther. Yet one prefers that the chronicler should be someone else. The wit, however, who does not advertise has not a chance. A good example of a jest which only the maker could have spread abroad is the story of Saphir, the Austrian journalist and the man, an old enemy of his, whom he met in a narrow passage: "I'll not make room for a fool to pass," said the man, blocking up the way. "But I will," said Saphir, backing into a doorway. Only Saphir could have reported this. Thus we see that the complete wit must choose the right companions.

One other feeling that must often occur to the reader is doubt as to the genuineness of these stories. It is so easy to light upon a neat thing and give it an appropriate and credible setting, that we are convinced it must often be done. Mr. Barrie indeed once produced a number of bon-mots suitable for quotation as from Carlyle and other men. Here, for example, is a story which, on the face of it, is as worthy of belief as any of Mr. Jerrold's: Mr. Thornton, one of the dons, who was most zealous in denouncing Shelley's Queen Mab, had a reputation for amateur cookery. Being at a party, not long after Shelley's expulsion from Oxford, he was asked casually by his hostess if he had ever boiled a fish. "No, madam," he replied, "but I lately had much satisfaction in foiling a Bysshe." Why should not that conversation have taken place? Yet it did not, for we have just invented it.

The compiler of a jest-book cannot hope to please everybody. He is certain to come into conflict with every reader sooner or later, either because he has told a story wrongly, or has attributed it to the wrong man. We have all of us our favourite stories, and we cannot endure to have them mis-related. In the little books before us,* which are edited by Mr. Walter Jerrold, the bearer of a surname honoured among wits, our own quarrel is on account of the treatment of the beautiful story of Sydney Smith and the draught. Mr. Jerrold gives it to Paley. In our version Sydney Smith requested a waiter to shut the window behind him, and open another behind "one of the curates." Mr. Jerrold makes Paley say "behind some curate," which is not so funny. We also are disposed to be vexed with Mr. Jerrold for his italics. In Punch we respect italics—they make up a large part of its fun—but not in books. Mr. Jerrold should give his reader credit for more penetration.

We consider, also, that Mr. Jerrold has too high an admiration for puns. Puns rarely are bon-mots; but Mr. Jerrold seems to have been impressed by Erskine's foolish remark (which he quotes as a bon-mot) that a pun, because it is the lowest form of wit, is therefore the foundation of all wit. Hence we find such a bon-mot as the following: A certain author informed Foote that a passage which he found fault with might be justified as a metaphor. "Is it so?" said Foote, "then it is such a one as truly I never met before." We all can do this sort of thing, which is a result not of wit, but mechanism; yet heaven forbid that our efforts should reach the dignity of type! On the other hand, there is a form of pun, the pun that cuts both ways, which is a genuine product of wit. Curran's remark to a certain hanging judge, who asked if a piece of beef near Curran was hung beef, because, if it was, he meant to try it, is to the point. "I do not know," Curran said; "but if you do try it, my lord, it is sure to be." Again, take Fox's explanation of the passage in the Psalms: "He clothed himself with cursing like as with a garment."

* Bon-Mots of the Eighteenth Century. Edited by Walter Jerrold. (J. M. Dent & Co.)
Bon-Mots of the Nineteenth Century. Edited by Walter Jerrold. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

"The meaning," said he, "is clear enough: the man had a habit of swearing." Again a member of the Foley family having hurried across to the Continent to avoid creditors, "It is a pass over," said Selwyn, "that will not be much relished by the Jews." These are good; but the ordinary pun is no bon-mot, far from it. Nor is Hunt's savage remark to a lady who asked him what answer she ought to make when her age was inquired, a bon-mot. "Madam," he said, "answer that you are not come years of discretion." This is too savage. Dr. Johnson's curt dismissals or discouragements of his opponents are not bon-mots, although often witty. A true bon-mot is more happy, more urbane; it may be severe, but it must be just; the true bon-mot does not wantonly wound. A large number of the jokes in Mr. Jerrold's collections are too cruel to answer to his title at all. One quality which in great wits is so often wanting is fun. The presence of fun predicates a humane nature: wit is often merciless and unscrupulous. Lord Chesterfield was witty, but he had no fun. His wit was always at some one else's expense: his victims could never laugh too. Johnson had little fun. Jerrold had none. On the other hand, Sydney Smith was full of it, and so was Hood. Curran, Erskine, and Lord North all had fun.

The gems of Mr. Jerrold's collections are the witty remarks that proceed from a brain where fun is enthroned. Erskine's comment after a bad night at an inn, that if only the fleas had been unanimous they would have had him out of bed; Curran's answer during his last illness to his doctor, who remarked that he coughed with more difficulty: "That's rather surprising, doctor, as I've been practising all night"; Lord North's reply on being taxed by a speaker with being asleep during his speech—"I wish I was"; Curran's explanation of the reason of an Irishman's habit of lolling out his tongue as he walked—"I expect he's trying to catch the English accent"—these have fun at the back of them.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXXI.—WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY

NOT the least interesting period of Thackeray's career was his association with the Cornhill Magazine in the capacity of editor—a post which, as events showed, he ought probably never to have accepted. Illustrious though his term of office undoubtedly was, there is no question but that the duties brought injury upon his nervous system, embittered his nature, and had a harmful effect upon his work.

The letter from the editor to a friend and contributor which prefaced the first number was dated November 1, 1859, when Thackeray was forty-eight. Cornhill began with the year 1860. In this letter Thackeray explained the character of the magazine, as concisely as was possible to a man so in love with digression and playful asides. In the first of the "Roundabout Papers," which formed the concluding paper of No. 1 of Cornhill, he settled more congenially

...but Mr. Jerrold seems his tongue as he was
 ...by Erskine's foolish trying to catch the lips
 ...as a bon-mot, that have fun at the back of
 ...the lowest form of
 ...foundation of all wit.
 ...bon-mot as the follow-
 ...informed Foote that
 ...found fault with might
 ...aphor. "Is it so?"
 ...such a one as truly I
 ...We all can do this sort
 ...result not of wit, but
 ...even forbid that our
 ...the dignity of type.
 ...is a form of pun,
 ...ways, which is a
 ...Curran's remark
 ...who asked if a
 ...was hung beef,
 ...ant: to try it, is to
 ...w." Curran said:
 ...dard, it is sure to
 ...planation of the
 ...He clothed him-
 ...with a garment."

ACADEMY RE

XXXI.—WILLIAM MUR

NOT the least was Thackeray's creation with the Comic capacity of editor—a post showed, he ought to accepted. Illustrations office undoubtedly ran but that the duties
 his nervous system
 and had a harmful effect
 The letter from the
 and contributor which number was dated Novem-Thackeray was fore-with the year 1860. In explained the character
 concisely as was possible with digression and the first of the Comic which formed the Comic of Comic, he sealed

Edited
 Edited
 Edited

W. M. THACKERAY

From the Picture by Samuel Laurence in the National Portrait Gallery

W. M. THACKERAY

From the Picture by Samuel Laurence in the National Portrait Gallery

the task of introducing the new venture. In this charming essay, "On a Lazy Little Boy," the kindly, humorous giant was at his best. The lazy little boy, observed reading a book at the side of the river that runs through the town of Chur, in the Grisons, was most skilfully used. He stands between Thackeray and the reader. "What was the book?" asks the great, beaming editor.

"Do you suppose it was Livy, or the Greek grammar? No; it was a NOVEL that you were reading, you lazy, not very clean, good-for-nothing, sensible boy! It was D'Artagnan locking up General Monk in a box, or almost succeeding in keeping Charles the First's head on. It was the prisoner of the Chateau d'If cutting himself out of the sack fifty feet under water (I mention the novels I like best myself—novels without love or talking, or any of that sort of nonsense, but containing plenty of fighting, escaping, robbery and rescuing)—cutting himself out of the sack, and swimming to the island of Monte Cristo. O Dumas! O thou brave, kind, gallant old Alexandre! I hereby offer thee homage, and give thee thanks for many pleasant hours."

And so on. Thus was the subject of fiction introduced. Then came a little apologue, and then this statement:

"Novels are sweets. All people with healthy literary appetites love them—almost all women; a vast number of clever, hard-headed men. . . . Judges, bishops, chancellors, mathematicians, are notorious novel readers; as well as young boys and sweet girls, and their kind, tender mothers."

And hence there will be novels in Cornhill! Could anything be more delightfully, gracefully done? And so the Cornhill ship was gallily launched.

At the end of the first six months, in the fourth "Roundabout Paper," Thackeray passed from the humorous consideration of the Sayers and Heenan prize-fight to the magazine again:

"The victories which I wish especially to commemorate in this the last article of our first volume are the six great, complete, prodigious and undeniable victories achieved by the corps which the editor of the Cornhill Magazine has the honour to command."

It had been, indeed, a shining success, and MSS. were coming in at the rate of a hundred a week!

But the fifth "Roundabout Paper" was the famous "Thorns in the Cushion." Thackeray had begun to find editing a little irksome. He was never over fond of method, and also it seemed hard, when his fame was at its ripe, that he should be subjected to the annoyances which no editor is without. "Before I was an editor," he wrote, "I did not like the postman much—but now!" Some of the "thorns" were letters—begging-letters, fault-finding letters, unjust, hasty, foolish letters, which Thackeray might easily have avoided by the simple device of handing them to a discreet person to open and suppress. But he read them himself and permitted them to distress him.

"Ah me! we wound where we never intended to strike; we create anger where we never meant harm; and these thoughts are the thorns in our cushion. Out of mere malignity, I suppose, there is no man who would like to make enemies. But here, in this editorial business, you can't do otherwise; and a queer, sad, strange, bitter thought it is, that must cross the mind of many a public man. 'Do what I will, be innocent or spiteful, be generous or cruel, there are A and B, and C and D, who will hate me to the end of the chapter—to the chapter's end, to the Finis of the page—when hate, and envy, and fortune, and disappointment shall be over.'"

At the end of the second six months Thackeray again wrote a few words of satisfaction; but his tone was less jubilant, and he had drawn for the initial letter of the article, which is about Thomas Hood, a picture of a galley slave! And then, on March 18, 1862, Thackeray wrote the letter to contributors and correspondents, which appeared in the April number:

"Ladies and Gentlemen (who will continue, in spite of the standing notice below, to send papers to the editor's private residence), perhaps you will direct the postman to some other house, when you learn that the editor of the Cornhill Magazine no longer lives in mine. My esteemed successor lives at Number . . . ; but I will not intrude upon the poor man's brief interval of quiet. He will have troubles enough in that thorn-cushioned editorial chair, which is forwarded to him by the Parcels (Happy) Delivery Company. . . . I believe my own special readers will agree that my books will not suffer when their author is released from the daily task of reading, accepting, refusing, losing and finding the works of other people. To say No has often cost me a morning's peace and a day's work. I tremble recenti metu. Oh, those hours of madness spent in searching for Louisa's lost lines to the dead Piping Bullfinch, or Nhoj Senoj's mislaid essay! I tell them for the last time that the (late) editor will not be responsible for rejected contributions, and herewith send off the Chair, and the great Cornhill Magazine Tin box, with its load of care."

So, with a little too much grizzling in public, ended Thackeray's twenty-eight months' editorship of Cornhill, and in less than two years after his resignation his early death occurred: an unmistakable case of cause and effect. During his régime he put into the magazine some admirable work, although it cannot be said that he proved himself an editor of genius. His own writings were "Lovel the Widower," "The Four Georges," "The Adventures of Philip" (with Fred Walker's drawings), and the "Roundabout Papers"; among other contributions were Tennyson's "Tithonus," Anthony Trollope's "Framley Parsonage," Mrs. Stowe's "Agnes of Sorrento," and Sala's papers on Hogarth. The miscellaneous articles were not of the highest merit, but they supplied ballast. Thackeray was succeeded by Mr. Leslie Stephen, and "Philip," when it came to an end, was followed by "Romola."

DRAMA.

IT is curious to note how completely the resources of the stage fail to render the illusion of a horserace. The trick has often been attempted, but it is no more successful this week on the expansive boards of the Princess's Theatre (where a racing drama of American origin, called the "County Fair," is being played) than it was twenty years ago in "The Flying Scud" of Dion Boucicault. In "The Flying Scud" they had puppet horses running jerkily upon wires and doing violence to the perspective of a painted racecourse. Pretty much the same mechanism is still employed, with the exception that the ficelle, as the French say, is less apparent. The illusion is no better, and apparently it never will be. With the fatuity of the modern theatrical realist, who holds that an object or a human being is the same on and off the stage, and that there is no world of illusion behind the curtain at all, the late Augustus Harris tried more than once the running of live horses at Drury-lane. He could only show the tips of the animals' ears and the head and shoulders of their jockeys over the enclosure of the ring as they were supposed to be passing the post, the race having to be taken for granted. Perhaps no closer approximation to reality can ever be obtained under the circumstances, and there may be two opinions as to whether the puppets or the live horses convey the most graphic idea of the well-known scene at Epsom. I am inclined myself to award the palm to the puppets. There is very little illusion conveyed by a live horse on the stage. He is simply an actor who does not know his part and who is unable to accommodate himself to the optique of the scene. Mechanical speed, such as that of a running horse, it seems to be beyond the capacity of the stage manager to represent; and another nut too hard for him to crack is mechanical weight. If there is anything more ludicrously ineffective than a stage horserace it is a stage railway train. The spectators' sense of weight and force is not in the slightest degree appealed to. Nor is it easy to suggest how it can be, except by the old device of leaving something to the imagination—that is, by placing the train in the wings, where, like Wordsworth's cuckoo, it may be heard rather than seen.

Occasionally it would be well if this method of dealing with moral forces were also resorted to. Great men like Cromwell and Napoleon, or, may one add, Joan of Arc (on the principle of the Act of Parliament that man implies woman) are nearly always belittled when brought upon the boards. The scene, the details of the story, and, above all, the sentiments they speak dwarf them morally—a remark, by the way, which has no reference to the Lyceum version of "Madame Sans-Gêne," where avowedly only the trivial or domestic side of Napoleon's character is exhibited. One of the most effective stage exhibitions of Napoleon that I recall was his appearance in a pageant as a purely lay figure on horseback, with nothing to say and nothing to do, except bow his thanks to an applauding public. There the imagination of the spectator had scope.

As puppets of the modern stage-manager the racehorse and the railway engine are probably incapable of improvement, but with regard to the personality of great men much, of course, depends upon author and actor. While one ineffective piece may appear to bring the whole theory of stage effect into contempt, the born dramatist plays upon the emotion of his audience as easily as he might upon a pipe. Of this elementary fact one is reminded by "Un Mariage sous Louis XV.," which has been awkwardly rendered at the Haymarket into "A Marriage of Convenience"—the school-boy translation of a mariage de convenance. What life, what vigour, breathes through this old work, which, taken down from its upper shelf and dusted, proves to be as fresh as any production of the day! The hand of the master is felt here. There is nothing exceptional in the story, which tells how two young people, drawn into a loveless marriage, learn to love each other and to hug their chains. The spell is woven in the dialogue. Human nature in its weakness and its strength, worldly wisdom, wit, and a score of good qualities peep out at every turn to refresh and invigorate the jaded soul of the playgoer, surfeited with the inanities of musical comedy. The great dramatist reminds one of a skilful whip; he can do what he likes with his team, driving safely over treacherous ground and past risky corners where the ordinary equipage would come to grief. In "A Marriage of Convenience" (hateful phrase!) there are one or two such places, notably where husband and wife go off to a masked ball—the one with a mistress on his arm, the other on the arm of a soupirant. But tact and style bring the author safely through. After having had so much of the drama of incident, it is delightful to come across a play of pure sentiment like this; it is here, indeed—in the domain of sentiment—that the true springs of human nature are to be found. For to speak of the drama of powder and patches as necessarily artificial is to confound the husk with the kernel. If the hearts of real men and women do not beat underneath those externals, then the dramatist has failed in his task.

It is said that the tradition of the grand manner of Old Comedy is preserved only at the Comédie Française, and that even there it is failing, the actors of the younger school being infected with the conversational style of the modern drawing-room. I am afraid that, like other good things, the grand manner was occasionally over-done. It became an end instead of a means. Except for a little awkwardness in the manipulation of their swords, the Haymarket Company make as brave a show of the Louis Quinze theory and practice of life as need be. Mr. William Terriss has learnt his art in all schools, including the Lyceum, and knows that, though its expression changes, its principles remain ever the same. So sound and well-graced an actor as he is equal to all emergencies. Mr. Cyril Maude, the would-be lover of the story, has brought into this part something of the clownishness which he was called upon to exhibit in "Under the Red Robe." This is a pity. One may be foolish without being boorish, and foolishness is the note of the swaggering chevalier. As for Miss Winifred Emery's girl-wife, it is true that she shows little of the grande dame of tradition; but why should she? She has just emerged from the convent to be married, and, at school, girls must have been girls, even in the profligate, degenerate, heartless Louise Quinze period. Miss Emery's heroine is youthful, naïve, full of curiosity with regard to the ways of the wicked world and apt at learning them, but transparently honest and good-hearted too, and that is better than being the grande dame of convention. It is strange that so witty and interesting a play as "Un Mariage sous Louis XV." should have found its way to the top shelf. Now that Mr. Grundy has rescued it from that dusty limbo, it ought to find a more or less permanent place in the working repertory of the stage independently of the general fluctuations of taste. It is a costume play. True, but it is not to be classed with the picture-drama exclusively. It contains some of the permanent elements of drama animated by the souffle of genius.

J. F. N.

ART.

MR. MORTIMER MENPES repeats, with interesting variations, the very valuable and artistic work he did in Japan some years ago. The paintings and drawings now on view at the Messrs. Dowdeswell's Galleries, Bond-street, are small and spacious, brilliant with both colour and light, and proving the rare and sensitive feeling for place in composition. In general terms, the feeling for place is claimed by every designer, but the Japanese has touch of the relations between size and distance, and of the delicate increase of weight that comes with the remoter position, as when you move a single weight further upon a rod and so give it equivalence to a greater mass. It is a kind of buoyant measurement, and the swing of a composition is as tender and light as might be the equipoise of slender lanterns upon a bending staff. Whether Mr. Menpes sought Japan with its simplicity and its space because of his sense of the significance of position, or whether he improved that sense by the example of the art and the landscape there, with their few things justly appraised, it is certain that he has this special Japanese faculty, and with it an eye for colour of unusual vivacity, and a perception of the human but alien character of that trivial people. It is hard to believe that any man used to the liberal arts of European antiquity and to the passionate arts of the European Middle Ages should hold the Japanese as anything but a trivial race. He can hardly, for instance, readjust his idea of the human figure so as to find beauty in the Japanese proportions; and the nude and the spiritual, it seems, are to be foregone in Japan. There is inevitably a kind of indulgence in the Western treatment of Japanese character, a confession of the grotesque, mingled with the respect due to Japanese delicacy and fastidiousness. An Englishman in Japan must have an uneasy consciousness of the decorations he has left behind him—of the vulgarisms of the European world, of its wholesale trimmings, and its shouldering manners; and yet he must needs feel that Greece and Rome are in the ancestry of this dull and rough world, and are absent from the ancestry of that gentle and exquisite world of the extreme East, and that Japanese gentleness, nimbleness, instinct, and art are to us, as we have said, alien from the beginning.

Mr. Menpes has painted the Japanese in the daily chances of colours and lights.

Many of his pictures are studies of vivid firelight on the figures and faces of the little people circling round some roadside flame. The soft, tender light of the coloured lanterns, when the evening is full of blue air, and blue and purple flowers hang darkening in the dusk, is another illumination treated with fine skill; there is, in particular, a field under the early moon, which a girl crosses, carrying a lantern on a delicate rod. In the later night scenes the lanterns burn with a more fully coloured light. But king of all these lights is the Japanese sunshine, and Mr. Menpes has painted this, in clear noon, and with the sparkle of morning. Children are his favourite subjects, and he does not tire of the sleeping baby tied up to its squat little mother's back. He draws it with the sure hand that gives the weight and solidity of the sleeping head, as the large round cheeks are bent over upon the little woman's shoulder. There are studies of actors upon the Japanese stage. From these and from other inscrutable faces it would seem that the absence of expression—or perhaps the difference of expression—is the most persistent sign of a people of strangers. Ignorance of the language can be but little in comparison with ignorance of the eyes, and the eyes of the Japanese keep secret even the suggestion that there is anything to hide. They make denials of all mystery. The whole broad face utters a foreign language, but so habitually do we look for communication from the eyes that Japanese eyes seem to us to refuse all utterance whatever. Mr. Menpes has, nevertheless, given a far better idea of Japanese dignities than we have ever before seen presented, in his several pictures of processions. These are very curious, and the groups have a gravity that is all their own, and is not made grotesque even to the haughty judgment of the West. But, after all, it must be the works of Japanese man—his art, his illumination, his garden, his selection, the fewness and the charm of his adornments of labour and life, his delicate buildings, his planted flowers, that make the beauty of the country—these, and not his own monotonous little form and his unclassic presence. A gentle rosy lantern, a luminous white iris and a purple, a twilight moon—such things make the touching beauty of this ultimate East, where the temperate climate is unsmirched, the earth sweetly cultivated, the mountain forms strange, and the sky that of the ocean side of the globe. No one has done so much as Mr. Menpes to give us the pictorial vision of a country where—to the stranger at least—vision is everything.

As one of a series of permanent records of the Swiss National Exhibition of 1896, M. Camille Favre has issued a magnificent catalogue - album, illustrating by photographs and colours the complete history of the arts in Switzerland from the Roman period onwards. It is, perhaps, only in Switzerland itself that all the originality and distinctness of art and handicraft is thoroughly recognised in the national work; one reason for general ignorance being the frequent mis-naming of Swiss specimens as German, even in some of the national museums. Swiss work, however, is by no means unrecognised in this country, and South Kensington possesses a certain number of examples of Swiss windows—one, especially fine, from the Valais. The Swiss artist, through several centuries, keeps his own character, even while confessing the influences of Germany, Burgundy, France and Italy, active and various neighbours. The Roman period yields chiefly bronzes and ivories, in some of which the Teutonic grotesque spirit is already most curiously perceptible. The paintings and designs date generally no earlier than the latter part of the fifteenth century, and comprise the vivacious pastels of the eighteenth. But the collection of MSS. and illuminations begin at the ninth century, and are of the first importance. The ceramic specimens are generally fine, but Swiss art seems to be most full of life and enterprise in the paintings on glass. Of these, obviously, coloured reproductions give the least satisfactory representation; but what a reproduction can do has been well done, and the designs are so interesting, apart from the colour, that these plates have every possible value. The metal work is full of Germany, with a local difference, and among the textile fabrics are fine examples from ecclesiastical needlework from fourteenth century convents. The album has a European importance, for Switzerland illustrates the general history of the arts of a score of schools and the even more significant history of races.

MR. RALPH RICHARDSON has made a catalogue (Elliot Stock) of George Morland's pictures, with a history of each and a reference to the present possessor or the museum into which it has been gathered. It is the first effort to catalogue this painter's works, and Mr. Richardson has fulfilled the task with so much care and research as to give his book authority. It will be a valuable reference for students of Morland's rich rusticities, and a good guide for collectors on the track.

MORE or less to the class of art-books belongs Echoes, by Josephine Curtis Woodbury, decorated by Eric Pape (G. P. Putnam's Sons). It is certain that Mr. Pape's drawings are not decorated by Miss Woodbury's verses, and of these we need say no more than that the writer might do well to learn the rules of rhyme, and yet this for reading poetry rather than for writing it. Mr. Pape's work is at its best in the outlining of leaves and berries—there are some charming branches from nature to accompany the lines called "The Innocents." A drawing of "Mid-Ocean" gives to the waves the Japanese curl—hardly to be imitated, surely, by a hand of another race. It cannot be interesting to see the Japanese convention assumed, ready-made, by one who must himself have some difficulty in reading it. There are many things to be profitably learnt from the Japanese before seizing upon their most arbitrary signs—finely formed writings rather than drawings—of natural fact. It is, moreover, in natural fact that Mr. Pape has his best chance. He would do well (the advice if not necessarily for others) in using it very simply; in giving his sense of decoration chiefly by placing and arrangement, and his love of choice by a more and more fastidious simplicity. This process will probably give him what play for art he needs, without laying hands upon the Japanese for waves.

A. M.

MUSIC.

DR. PARRY conducted a new work of his at the fifth Philharmonic concert on Thursday, June 3. In the article "Variations," which the composer wrote for Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, he expressed the opinion that "the Variation still affords one of the most favourable opportunities for the exercise of their genius by composers of the future." It is not surprising, therefore, that the new work should be cast in Variation form. It consists, in fact, of a dignified theme, followed by variations, only the latter are grouped so as to represent, or correspond to, the movements of a sonata. Monotony of tonality is a weak point in the variations of the old classical masters; and to our ears accustomed to bolder chord progressions, to more sudden and frequent modulations, that monotony, even in the most skilful works, always proves a stumbling-block. Beethoven already felt the necessity of some change, and in his Variations in F (Op. 35) presented a scheme of modulation both original and effective. And in other sets he sought to develop his thematic material so that the old might appear actually new; in the variations of his predecessors one knew more or less in outline the character of each one from the opening bars. Dr. Parry has sought relief from key monotony by writing each of his groups in keys which would be suitable to the movements of a sonata. It will be readily understood that it is the tempo and not the form which suggests those various movements. The composer is skilled in his art, and the variations are in his best style. Yet I am disposed to think that the experiment rests on fancy rather than fact. This new sonata in variation form seems no real living organism. Why Beethoven seemed to regard even the sonata itself, especially one in four movements, as a thing scarcely worth preserving! Dr. Parry's venture if not satisfactory, is certainly interesting. At this concert Senor Sarasate played the Mendelssohn Concerto, but with more refinement than power. And the speed at which he takes the Finale gives no time for clear proper phrasing.

DURING the past week I have heard two pianoforte recitals. The first given by Mlle. Ella Pancera last Thursday week was actually her second. She played Schumann's Fantasia in C (Op. 17), and certainly displayed considerable intelligence, taste, and skill. And yet there was a want of poetry, and of true passion. It was the reading of an attentive, earnest pupil, rather than that of an independent thinker; it was satisfactory as far as it went, though not convincing. The dexterity with which the difficult second movement was given deserves note. Then Mlle. Pancera played the "Paganini" Variations of Brahms with commendable skill and clearness. Such a work, however, demands for its proper effect the exceptional technique, the superb ease of a Rosenthal. Is it right, it may be asked, to compare a young pianist at the outset of her career with a player endowed with special gifts, matured by time and experience? My answer shall be likewise in question form. Is it right for young artists thus to expose themselves to direct comparison? These remarks are of general application; the programmes of most pianoforte recitals run in a certain groove; the special capabilities and characteristics of the player are seldom taken into consideration. Mlle. Pancera interpreted various short solos with taste and delicacy.

On Tuesday afternoon M. Gabrilowitsch, who in Tchaikowsky's Concerto achieved such signal success at a recent Richter Concert, gave the first of two recitals at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. His reading of Beethoven's "Adieux" Sonata (Op. 81A) was marked by intelligence and feeling. At times, however, the sentiment was certainly exaggerated. In this work one may forgive here and there a momentary excursion over the border line which separates sentiment from sentimentality; there are, however, sonatas of Beethoven in which no such liberty can be taken without detriment to the music. The pianist also played Schumann's "Faschingsschwank" (Op. 26); but, after the remarkable precision and crispness of his playing in the Concerto, the performance was a disappointment. The programme opened and closed with a Liszt transcription: the first, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor for organ, one of his cleverest; the second, a transcription of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" and Fairy music, one of his worst. In both M. Gabrilowitsch exhibited the excellence of his technique; but in the latter piece the good playing only intensified the vulgarity of the transcription.

MISS ADELA VERNE gave an orchestral concert at the Queen's Hall last Friday week at which she performed Chopin's Concerto in E minor and Saint Saëns in G minor. Her rendering of both works was in many ways praiseworthy. She has a good touch, clear technique, and understands what she interprets. A little more charm in the beautiful slow music of the Chopin, and a little more dash in the second work would have proved acceptable. The most interesting item of the programme was a Concerto in E flat for two pianofortes, with orchestral accompaniment by Mozart. The work is practically unknown to the present generation of concert goers, and it well deserved revival. It appears not to have been given in London since 1863. The Finale may not be very strong, but the opening and slow movements represent Mozart at his best. The orchestra was under the careful direction of Mr. Henschel, whose clever interesting Prelude to One Way of Love, a one-act piece by Miss L. Alma Tadema, was well performed.

On Monday afternoon I went to hear "En Bonne Fortune," a play without words, by Th. Massiac, with music by Grillet. The little piece was well given by Mlle. Jane May and her excellent company. Pieces of this kind are of special interest to musicians in that they show how large a part gesture plays—or rather should play—in musical drama. The music of M. Grillet, if not strong, is fairly appropriate to the action. How well the system of representative themes would be to pieces of this kind, though, of course, only in moderate and fairly simple measure.

J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

I HAVE a vivid recollection of once undertaking an inquiry in Edinburgh, on behalf of the S. P. R., into certain alleged psychical phenomena. Nothing came of it beyond a loss of time and temper, and a cursory acquaintance with some dazzlingly stupid people. This, I am afraid, is generally the way with such inquiries. The circumstance is recalled to my mind by a long letter in the Times describing the writer's impressions of a "haunted" house which has been hired by Lord Bute for the purpose of investigation, and incidentally of the method in which such an investigation is conducted by the rank and file of the Psychical Society. To put the matter briefly, it implies that Lord Bute has been grossly imposed upon, that the noises, &c., are due to the house being constructed like a sounding-board, and that the major part of the stories going about are pure fabrication.

ALL the same, it requires a strong nerve to face ghostly associations at night. If ghosts be a purely subjective illusion, the nocturnal terror of them, which is inborn in the human race, is sufficient excuse for their creation. The writer referred to above admits no such terrors. Making all allowance for a clear conscience, and digestive powers well under control, his callousness is brutal. He hears loud and sudden noises which he contemptuously says would have frightened most people. His active mind attributes them at once to the fireplace or the waterpipes.

"Presently, he says, a deep buzzing sound indicated that a servant was drawing some water, probably in the distant wing, and was duly followed by a resonant bang, showing that the Thomson patent tap had not been fitted to the pipes in the house. These were all the noises I heard in the most haunted room of 'the most haunted house in Scotland.'"

It is certainly rather a come-down when ghostly manifestations can be explained by the absence of a patent tap. Yet many such have proved to be due to causes of no greater complexity. The writer, however, does more than suggest possibilities; he accuses the investigators of bolstering up their suspicions with unfounded gossip, and of displaying simply childish credulity. "I was told," he says, "an impressive story which illustrates the way of working up a noise into a manifestation":

"On a day when the late proprietor was to leave home for London, he was talking to his factor in the library, when a tremendous crash was heard on the table between them. 'For God's sake,' cried the husband, 'don't mention this to my wife.' He went to London, and next day was killed by a cab accident. Before the news reached his family an appalling noise was heard in the room he usually occupied, but, as the reader will expect to hear, everything was found undisturbed. This circumstantial story is false in every detail. There was no table, there was a bureau; there was no crash, but the lid of the bureau having been imperfectly closed slipped into its place; the husband did not mention either his Maker or his wife or the trivial noise; he was not killed till three weeks afterwards, and no mysterious sound in his room heralded the news."

If this is the kind of stuff out of which the S. P. R. reports are concocted by sympathetic believers, then the S. P. R. itself would seem to be in need of some such investigation as was applied to the notorious Eusapia Palladino. I have reason to know that the heads of the society pursue very different and more discriminating methods; but these things are carried out by the bulk of the members, and they make one shudder to think how much nonsense may be incorporated in the volumes of the Proceedings.

THE Royal Archaeological Institute in Hanover-square has recently held an exhibition of ancient flint implements discovered by Mr. Seton-Karr in the Eastern desert of Egypt, mostly at a distance of about thirty miles from the Nile. These implements were found in workings along the face of the cliff, in a position which made it probable that they were the original and long-lost flint mines of Egypt. Some of the finds were palæoliths of immense antiquity, but the majority belonged to a slightly later date, and included forms which are new to science. Signs of prehistoric life or of hasty departure were to be seen on the spot in the form of clubs and bludgeons distributed near certain central spaces which had served as workshops. Mr. Seton Karr has also made extensive discoveries of flint and quartzite implements in Somaliland—a fact which, according to Sir John Evans, may turn out to have an important bearing on the home of the human race. Man must have started life in a part of the world where the climate was mild and means of subsistence plentiful. Many ages were required before he could have been fit to cope with the rigours of the glacial period in Europe. The Somaliland flint-shops may not impossibly turn out to be the earliest source of supply for the whole world. Such a common source would well account for the uniformity of shape and manufacture which prevailed everywhere.

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WHY THE NIGHTINGALE SINGS AT NIGHT.

Siena: June 2.

I owe you an apology for a svista in my letter of May 10. The verse about the nightingale should run:

"Se la vite non mi legasse;
Se la serpa non mi mangiasse,
Dormirei fino al giorno chiaro-chiaro-chiaro-chiaro-chiaro."

DOROTHY H. CORNISH.

DARKING—AN OLD YORKSHIRE WORD.

Glasgow: June 1.

"When I come on a new word," said the late Prof. Blackie, "I lift it up before me and say: 'Who, to the devil, are you?'"

Repeatedly have I found myself saying to the old Yorkshire word "darking," "Who are you?" till one day I overheard a mother say of her infant, as it was peering with wide-open eyes: "Look at her darking!" Now I have it, thought I; "darking" is the Homeric Greek δερκωμα, with its derivatives δερκας, a gazelle—i.e., the animal with bright open eye—and δερκω, the creature with bright look. It is akin to the Sanskrit "dar" = see; and on the slopes of the Himalayas our Aryan cousins say: "Decko" ("Look here!").

Full of my discovery, I submitted my philological gem to the inspection of Prof. Max Müller, who, alas! returned it to me as counterfeit. "Dear sir," he wrote, "darking = δερκωμα is impossible, because any Greek's name in Anglo-Saxon, be it—e.g., δωο = two; &c."

Though disheartened that so high an authority should, by the test of Grimm's law, stamp my philological gem as spurious, I still cherished the thought that I was right, and that "darking" belonged to a field unknown to Grimm, and hence beyond the scope of his law.

On a railway journey to the Highlands, my companions were enthusiastic botanists from Glasgow, intent on seeing the Alpine flora on the summit of Ben Lawers—the survival, they said, of a primæval table-land, that stretched from Ben Lawers to the Matterhorn. Might "darking" not likewise be a survival of that Celtic, or Gaelic, speech once spoken universally from the Pyrenees to the Pentland Firth? The δωο of Greek is = two of Anglo-Saxon. Yes; but it is dha in Gaelic; and if "darking" was a Gaelic survival, it could hold δερκωμα by the hand, in spite of Grimm's law.

A Highland girl on the shores of Loch Etwe said she thought there was some such word in her native language, though not in ordinary use; while a Glasgow policeman—regarded among his Celtic brethren as an authority—unable to recognise the word from my pronunciation, directed me to McAlpine's dictionary. There, among a posy of the same family, and trying to look Highland, was my Yorkshire acquaintance—"Dearnaid," scrutinise keenly, criticise"; "Dearc, look steadfastly, piercingly, fix the mind intensely"; "Dreach, hue, complexion"; "Dreagh, a meteor"—i.e., a bright object. Also, we have two Bens Deargh—the red mountain—one in Ross-shire, the other further to the south. In spite of Grimm's law, then, "darking" can keep its place, and need not be ashamed of its Gaelic ancestry among the Angles and Danes of Yorkshire.

JAS. WALLACE.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,
ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of HEER HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,

the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Pictorial and Procession Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

...reason to know
of the society pursue very
more discriminating methods:
are carried out by the bulk
and they make one shudder
much nonsense may be incor-volumes of the Proceedings.

An archaeological Institute in
has recently held an exhibi-
that implements discovered
Karr in the Eastern desert of
at a distance of about thirty
Nile. These implements
workings along the face of tion which made it probable
the original and long-lost
Egypt. Some of the finds of immense antiquity, but the
ed to a slightly later date,
as which are new to science.
the life or of hasty departure
on the spot in the form of distributed near certain which had served as work-
on Karr has also made
of tint and quartzite
mainland—a fact which,
in Evans, may turn out
nt bearing on the home
Man must have started
world where the climate
of subsistence plentiful died before he could
with the rigours of the

...reason to know
of the society pursue very
more discriminating methods:
are carried out by the bulk
and they make one shudder
much nonsense may be incor-
volumes of the Proceedings.

An archaeological Institute in
has recently held an exhibi-
that implements discovered
Karr in the Eastern desert of
at a distance of about thirty
Nile. These implements
workings along the face of
tion which made it probable
the original and long-lost
Egypt. Some of the finds
of immense antiquity, but the
ed to a slightly later date,
as which are new to science.
the life or of hasty departure
on the spot in the form of
distributed near certain
which had served as work-
on Karr has also made
of tint and quartzite
mainland—a fact which,
in Evans, may turn out
nt bearing on the home
Man must have started
world where the climate
of subsistence plentiful
died before he could
with the rigours of the

"Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth,"
Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.
"Cannot but add to his already considerable reputation. Told with a vigour, a pathos, and a wealth of poetic sympathy with all that is beautiful that make the book admirable from first to last."—Star.

THE REJUVENATION OF MISS
SEMAPHORE: a Farcical Novel. By HAL GOD-
FREY. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.
"The story is very funny and very well told....as good as was 'Vice Verna.'"—Glasgow Herald.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls. By
LEWIS MACNAMARA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"There is a strong literary charm in the tales. So genuine is the artistic touch of the writer, so true his command of the springs of human pathos and passion, that these tales will take their place among the best of those short sketches of simple country life that form a feature of the literary products of the last ten years. The book is the work of a hand that may yet make a strong mark in the fictional literature of the day."—Scotsman.

Now ready, the First 5,000 Copies of the Sixth Volume in
THE "DAFFODIL" LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS
BY AUTHORS OF THE DAY,
VOL. VI. ENTITLED
A TOMBSTONE TREASURE. By
FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a
Hansom Cab." Crown 12mo, paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 2s.
London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

BY SIR WILLIAM MUIR, K.C.S.I.
(Principal of the University of Edinburgh).
Just published, 8vo, price 6s.
THE MOHAMMEDAN CONTROVERSY.—BIO-GRAPHIES OF MOHAMMED, SPRENGER ON TRADITION,
THE INDIAN LITURGY, The VALTER.
BY
SIR WILLIAM MUIR, K.C.S.I., D.C.L., LL.D., &c.
Edinburgh: T. & T. CLARK, 38, George Street.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., Ltd.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.
For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST
ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for
weekly exchange of Books at the
houses of Subscribers) from TWO
GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may
UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,
and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE
CHANGES.

The characteristics of the Literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages
to Annual Subscribers.

FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING	s. d.
POSTAGE*	8 6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING
POSTAGE	4 6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING
POSTAGE	2 6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven
Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES
the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS,
the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS
NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line
Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print
Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.
BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.
Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME
OF THE
English Catalogue for 1896
differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the
FULL TITLE
With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently
The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."
ONE SHILLING net.

Contents of the JUNE Number.
NIETZSCHE'S INDICTMENT OF CHRISTIANITY. By JOHN MR. ROBERTSON.
AN ETHICAL EXCURSION. By HUGH MORTIMER CROIL
THE TEACHINGS OF THOMAS HARDY. By DUANE
WILLIAMS.
THE TORY PROFESSOR. By ROBERT DUNCANSON.
MR. GLADSTONE'S LATEST POSTCARD. By ALAN
STEPHENS.
USURY AND THRIFT. By J. GENEVY FISHER.
A SPECIMEN OF RELIGIOUS JOURNALISM. By STANLEY BRUCE.
IN EXTREMIS. By ALLAN LAIDLAW.
THE LEGITIMATION LEAGUE. By A. GOLDWIN.
NANCY. By ERNEST NEWMAN.
CONVENTIONAL LITERATURE. By EASTWOOD KIDSON.
NEW BOOKS.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,
16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,
74, NEW-OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of
PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS
OF
FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.
AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.
AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.
AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.
AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH

The Doom of the Cedar Pencil Fountain Pens and Stylos

The objections to them, and how they have been met.

The cedar pencil, it appears, has received its death-blow. We are so accustomed to regard it as one of the things which are a matter of course, that for many years no attempt was made to improve it, until the other day there appeared on the market something which so obviously excels the cedar pencil in every possible way that the extinction of the latter can only be a matter of time.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Paper Pencil is of the same size and presents the same appearance as an ordinary pencil, the only difference is that the cedar-wood is replaced by tightly rolled paper, divided off into sections by little round marks down the side of the pencil. When the latter wants sharpening, all you have to do is to pick up the edge of the paper-covering with a pin, or the point of a knife, and unravel a section of it, until it breaks of itself, by which time a fresh piece of lead is exposed, and the pencil ready for continued use. The advantages of the Blaisdell Pencil are so obvious, that nobody who has ever seen it will ever use a cedar pencil again. To begin with, it lasts about three times as long as a cedar pencil, none of the lead being broken in cutting. Then the point is always perfectly conical—can't be otherwise: the fingers are not soiled with blacklead nor the place littered with chips in sharpening it, and the latter operation takes but five seconds to accomplish. The Blaisdell Paper Pencil is already being sold by many stationers; it costs twopence, which makes it much cheaper to use than any penny pencil on the market; and the lead is much better than any twopenny pencil ever sold. The blue and red Blaisdell Pencils (which cost 3d.) are even more superior to cedar ones than the black, because ordinary coloured pencils are more prone to break in sharpening. A set of specimens can be had (post free in the United Kingdom) for a shilling from the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL COMPANY, Limited, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C., on application.

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name for two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a reputation beyond their neighbours."
Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

The Doom of the Cedar Pencil Fountain Pens and Stylos:

The objections to them, and how they have been met.

The cedar pencil, it appears, has received its death-blow. We are so accustomed to regard it as one of the things which are a matter of course, that for many years no attempt was made to improve it, until the other day there appeared on the market something which so obviously excels the cedar pencil in every possible way that the extinction of the latter can only be a matter of time.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Paper Pencil is of the same size and presents the same appearance as an ordinary pencil, the only difference is that the cedar-wood is replaced by tightly rolled paper, divided off into sections by little round marks down the side of the pencil. When the latter wants sharpening, all you have to do is to pick up the edge of the paper-covering with a pin, or the point of a knife, and unravel a section of it, until it breaks off itself, by which time a fresh piece of lead is exposed, and the pencil ready for continued use. The advantages of the Blaisdell Pencil are so obvious, that nobody who has ever seen it will ever use a cedar pencil again. To begin with, it lasts about three times as long as a cedar pencil, none of the lead being broken in cutting. Then the point is always perfectly conical—can't be otherwise: the fingers are not soiled with blacklead nor the place littered with chips in sharpening it, and the latter operation takes but five seconds to accomplish. The Blaisdell Paper Pencil is already being sold by many stationers; it costs twopence, which makes it much cheaper to use than any penny pencil on the market; and the lead is much better than any twopenny pencil ever sold. The blue and red Blaisdell Pencils (which cost 3d.) are even more superior to cedar ones than the black, because ordinary coloured pencils are more prone to break in sharpening. A set of specimens can be had (post free in the United Kingdom) for a shilling from the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL COMPANY, Limited, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C., on application.

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."
Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1311.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied
promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.
LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.
LATEST CATALOGUES:—
No. 31 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
" 32 34 MISCELLANEOUS. (763, 723 lots.)
" 33 PHILOLOGY. (240 lots.)

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 115, for JUNE), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLER BEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS of 27 and 28 West 23rd Street, New York, and 34 BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-
TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPRING & Co.
Telegrams: MORTIMER, LONDON. [Established 1819.]

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, BELL & LILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 18, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.,
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast
folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 56121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.
(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

WANTED, BOOKPLATES of Bosman, Walker,
Giles, Beverley, Cabot, Pace; also any Old Specimens. Very best prices will be paid.—MOORE & Trelawn Road, Leyton, Essex.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)
Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

The BRITISH MUSEUM, Bloomsbury, and the NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM, Cromwell Road, will be CLOSED on TUESDAY, 22nd JUNE, by order of the Trustees.
E. MAUDSLAY THOMSON,
Principal Librarian and Secretary.

British Museum, 15th June, 1897.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East, S.W.
126th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIGFRIED H. HERKOMER, JUN., Secretary (pro tem.).

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street,
London, E.C.

JONES' WEST MONMOUTHSHIRE SCHOOL,
PONTPOOL.

The GOVERNORS INVITE APPLICATIONS for the HEAD
MASTERSHIP of the above Boys' School, to be opened in January
next.
The Head Master must be a Graduate of an University of the United Kingdom; previous teaching experience is desirable.
Salary £100, with a Capitation Fee of £2 per scholar, and house provided. The school will accommodate 300 boys. The Head Master is also permitted to take boarders.
Copies of the Charity Commissioners' Scheme, or sufficient extracts therefrom, can be obtained from the undersigned (price 6d.).
Applications and testimonials, stating age, qualifications, and experience (20 copies, printed or typewritten), must be sent so as to reach my office not later than the 17th day of July next.
JOHN HURCHMAN, Clerk to the Governors.
County Court Chambers, Newport (Mon.),
9th June, 1897.

HOLIDAY ENGAGEMENT REQUIRED from July 3rd to September 17th. FRANKLIN BURGESS, Good
German and French.—Refer to Miss HUGHES, Cambridge Training College.

THE NELSON MANUSCRIPTS, consisting of LORD NELSON'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY in his own handwriting, are now for SALE and on VIEW at H. SOTHERAN & CO'S WEST END HOUSE, 37, PICCADILLY, W. (opposite St. James's Church).

EDUCATIONAL.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.
1897.—EXAMINATION, July 6th, 7th. One of £50, two of
£30, and Minor Scholarships of £15 to £20. Candidates to be under 15 years of age.
For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An EXAMINA-
TION will be held in July next to all not less than FIVE
RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS,
and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the HEAD
MASTER, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI-
LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.
The last, most complete, and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-
Instruction.
Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.
Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 3 shs. 6d. 50 cents
American. 10s. 6d. English. Post free.
Prospectus, with opinions of EDUCATORS, SCIENTIFIC, PROFESSIONAL,
and BUSINESS MEN all over the world, free.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 227, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
300, REGENT STREET, LONDON.
SOLD ONLY BY THE PUBLISHER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Now ready, price 3s. 6d. net.
BACKWARD LOOKING.

Verses: Occasional, Miscellaneous.
Being a volume of poems written about twenty-five years ago, and now published for the first time with introductory verses, entitled
1897, THE QUEEN'S YEAR.
Publishers: WILLIAM POLLARD & Co., Exeter;
Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., London.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST
ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.	COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.	N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.
Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS
Now Offered at
Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)
Sent Gratis and post free to any address.
The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30-34, New Oxford Street; 241, Brompton Road S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BANTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of
PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS
OF
FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

A TOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH
SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproductions of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to
THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Sampson Low, Marston & Company's NEW BOOKS.

Demy 8vo, beautifully illustrated, cloth, 10s. 6d.

POPULAR ROYALTY

By ARTHUR H. BEAVAN, Author of "Marlborough House and its Occupants."

This book contains life-sketches of Her Majesty the Queen and the Royal Family, besides four chapters reviewing the national advance and changes during the last seventy or eighty years. A special feature of the book will be the numerous full-page illustrations, which appear by the special permission of Her Majesty the Queen, Her Imperial Majesty the Empress Frederick, and the members of the Royal Family, some of whom have contributed the photographs themselves. The frontispiece consists of a photogravure reproduction of the original jewelled miniature of the Queen, by Mrs. Corbould-Ellis, presented to the Emperor of China by Her Majesty.

Illustrated with 10 Photogravure Portraits, demy 8vo, cloth, 21s.

NAVAL ADMINISTRATIONS 1827-1892.

The Experiences of 65 Years from the Accession of H.R.H. the Duke of Clarence as Lord High Admiral to the end of the Naval Administration of Lord George Hamilton. By the late Sir JOHN HENRY BRIGGS, Reader to the Lords, and Chief Clerk to the Admiralty. Edited by Lady BRIGGS.

2 vols., demy 8vo, illustrated with many Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations, cloth extra, gilt top, 36s. net.

CAPTAIN A. T. MAHAN'S NEW WORK.

THE LIFE OF NELSON

The Embodiment of the Sea Power of Great Britain. By Captain A. T. MAHAN, U.S.N., Author of "The Influence of Sea Power upon History," &c.

"Must henceforth become one of the greatest of naval classics.....By far the best 'Life of Nelson' that has ever been written."—Times.

"A carefully planned, skilfully executed, and withal elaborate portraiture of the life and character of the greatest of our naval heroes.....This great work. Many lives of Nelson have been written, but till now there has been none which could be considered in any way complete or satisfactory."—Athenaeum.

"A great biography, and one to be read by all men."—Spectator.

"Destined to take its place among the foremost biographies of any literature."—Graphic.

New and Cheaper Edition, Revised and Corrected throughout, with New Preface, a Map, and 160 Illustrations, crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

IN DARKEST AFRICA

Or, The Quest, Rescue, and Retreat of Emin, Governor of Equatoria. By HENRY M. STANLEY, M.P., D.C.L., LL.D., &c., Author of "How I Found Livingstone," "Through the Dark Continent," &c.

Fourth Edition in the Press. Crown 8vo, 580 pp. 6s.

THE MASSARENES

By OUIDA.

Punch says: "Ouida's latest novel, 'The Massarenes,' is, from every point of view, excellent."

"So interesting that, in spite of its exceptional length, it will seem to most readers tantalisingly short."—Truth.

"Incomparably the best the author has ever written."—National Observer.

TWO NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE TRACK OF MIDNIGHT

A Tale of the Australian Bush. By G. FIRTH SCOTT.

"Strikingly original and ingenious, animating, interesting, and puzzling.....Deserves grateful recognition by lovers of tales well told."—World.

The MISTRESS of the RANCH

By FRED T. CLARK, Author of "On Cloud Mountain."

"The development of events is extremely interesting; it is invested at various stages with fine touches of tenderness, and the racy dialogue is a constant source of enjoyment."—Scotsman.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

DIARY of a TOUR THROUGH GREAT BRITAIN in 1795.

By the Rev. WILLIAM MACRITCHIE,
Minister of the Parish of Clunie, Perthshire.

With an Introduction and Notes by

DAVID MACRITCHIE,

Author of "The Testimony of Tradition," &c.

"Mr. David MacRitchie has done good service in giving to the world these notes of the journey from Edinburgh to London and back, on coach and horseback, by his great-uncle, the Rev. William MacRitchie, minister of the Parish of Clunie, in Perthshire."

Sheffield Independent.

In large demy 8vo, appropriately bound in art. linen boards, price 6s.

GEORGE MORLAND'S PICTURES.

Their Present Possessors, with Details of the Collections, by RALPH RICHARDSON, F.R.S.E., F.S.A.Scot., Author of "George Morland, Painter, 1763-1804."

"All interested in the charming art of George Morland can now learn, by means of this publication, where the best examples of his art are to be found."

Glasgow Evening News.

In crown 8vo, tastefully printed, and bound in parchment, price 6s.

GLEANINGS from IBSEN.

(THE BEST AND CHOICEST IN IBSSEN.) Selected and Edited, by Permission, by EMMIE AVERY KEDDELL and PERCY CROSS STANDING. With a Preface on Ibsenism.

"Its novelty ought to commend it to the general public. The compilers have also collaborated in a smart introduction, in which they refer to the beauty of Ibsen's poetical expression. This note of purely poetic quality is what they have been at pains to discover in compiling the Birthday Book."—Liverpool Daily Post.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 7s. 6d.

WREKIN SKETCHES.

By EMMA BOORE.

"The chapters on Shrewsbury in the days of old, and the extracts from its record, are quaint foot-notes to history."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Pleasant and instructive, dealing with a most picturesque part of Shropshire, rich in historical associations."—Leeds Mercury.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

TWENTY YEARS on the SASKATCHEWAN (N.-W. CANADA).

By the Rev. WILLIAM NEWTON, Hon. Canon of Saskatchewan.

"Filled with useful facts, and bears evidence on almost every page of shrewd observation."—Speaker.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 4s. 6d.

DIES DOMINICA.

Being Hymns and Metrical Meditations for each Sunday in the Natural Year. By MARGARET EVANS and ISABEL SOUTHALL.

In crown 8vo, 1s.

VICTORIA, the GREAT and GOOD.

An Essay on the Diamond Jubilee, June 22nd, 1897. By L. A. LAW.

NEW VOLUME OF VERSE.

In fcap. 8vo, cloth, 5s.

JENNIFRED, and other Verses.

By SEPTIMUS G. GREEN.

"Pleasant and musical reading."—Scotsman.

"The title-poem is finely, even richly, coloured, and is suggestive of the romantic period in which its scenes are set. Mr. Green infuses considerable vigour into his lines."

Dundee Advertiser.

LIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW,
LONDON, E.C.

MACMILLAN & CO'S NEW BOOKS.

SEVEN NOVELS WORTH READING.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

THE PHILANDERER.

By A. E. W. MASON,

Author of "Morris Buckler."

WORLD.—"One of the most interesting novels we have met for a long time."

A ROSE OF YESTERDAY.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

SCOTSMAN.—"It has a mature imaginative power which stamps it as a novel of a high order."

MY RUN HOME

By ROLF BOLDREWOOD.

THE SECRET of ST. FLOREL

By JOHN BERWICK.

SPEAKER.—"A book not merely to be read, but to be enjoyed. It is full of interest."

THE FALL OF A STAR

A NOVEL.

By Sir WM. MAGNAY, Bart.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Its interest is breathless cumulative from the first page to the last."

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

THE QUEEN OF THE MOOR

By FREDERIC ADYE.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"A story to be read and enjoyed."

THE CHOIR INVISIBLE

By JAMES LANE ALLEN,

Author of "Summer in Arcady," &c., &c.

COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE (Cincinnati).—"An excellent making book."

With Illustrations, 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A RIDE THROUGH WESTERN ASIA

By OLIVE BIGHAM.

Part I., ASIA MINOR. Part II., PERSIA, NORTH-SOUTH. Part III., TURKISH ARABIA. Part IV., PERSIA, WEST TO EAST. Part V., CENTRAL ASIA.

BROAD ARROW.—"Cannot fail to attract the attention alike of the politician, the student of history, and of those readers whose desires carry them no further than a wish to be interested and amused by an excellently written book of travel and adventure."

THE ROMANES LECTURE FOR 1897.

MACHIARELLI. The ROMANES

Lecture delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre, Jan. 1 1897. By the Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P., D.C.L. Oxon., Hon. LL.D. Camb. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

12mo, 3s. 6d.

THE PORT of MISSING SHIPS, and other Stories of the Sea.

By JOHN R. SPEARS.

Illustrated, 8vo, 10s. net.

THE YEW-TREES of GREAT

BRITAIN and IRELAND. By JOHN LESTER M.D. Ed., Honorary Physician to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, &c., &c.

SIXTH THOUSAND NOW READY.

RHYME ? and REASON ?

By LEWIS CARROLL. With 65 Illustrations by ARTHUR FROST and 9 by HENRY HOLIDAY. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
The Pamphlet	623
Mill for Beginners	624
The Turkish Character	625
A Negro Poet	625
Greek Civilisation	626
Wagner as a Critic	627
Chronologies and Calendars	627
A Woman's Wall	628
Some Old Scottish Pens	628
Hort's "Christian Ecclesia"	628
FROM CROWDED SHELVES	630
THE BOOK TRADE IN CANADA	630
ON A DIAMOND JUBILEE	631
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books	631
New Books Received	632
NOTES AND NEWS	632
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXXII., WILLIAM BLAKE	634
THE ACADEMIE DES GONCOURT	635
THE BOOK MARKET	636
THE SALE OF THE ASKEWENHAM LIBRARY	636
MUSIC	637
SCIENCE	638
CORRESPONDENCE	638
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED	638
FICTION SUPPLEMENT	17-30

REVIEWS.

THE PAMPHLET.

Political Pamphlets. Selected and Arranged by A. F. Pollard. (Pamphlet Library, Edited by Arthur Waugh: Kegan Paul & Co.)

THE vogue of the pamphlet is ir retrievable. It has had its heyday, and must now submit to be jostled aside by the hurried and breathless newspaper. Mr. Gladstone will probably go down to posterity as the last of the pamphleteers; yet even Mr. Gladstone's pamphlets could only be regarded, but for the glamour of his great name, as a curious and rococo survival. A hundred years ago, or, so far as the region of theological controversy is concerned, even fifty years ago, a notable pamphlet might mould the minds of men and sway the course of events: to-day a very similar production has all the effect of a somewhat fantastic personal manifesto. The pamphlet is indeed still, as managers of political vans will tell you, largely used for the dissemination of ideas: it is given away gratis, and as a literary species is indistinguishable from the tract. But as a means for the formation of ideas, for the ventilation and discussion of new political and social and ecclesiastical theories, it is as extinct as the dodo. These things, like poetry and like fiction, have been absorbed by the omnivorous, relentless magazine. We do not live in a leisurely age, and the pamphlet, in its preparation, its distribution, and its consumption, was essentially and emphatically an affair of leisure.

Since, then, we have ceased to read pamphlets actually and for the conduct of life: it is quite time that we should turn back and read them retrospectively, with an eye to their historical and literary value. As historical documents, specimens of fossilised controversy, they often repay careful study. It is wise, however, to regard them as records, less of facts, than of ideals or the glosses which from time to time men have wished to put upon facts. And too often it is the function of the historical critic to strip off the tinsel and the draperies, and to point to the marked difference between the naked truth and the truth as it appears dressed out in the rhetoric of the pamphleteer. Mr. Waugh's "Pamphlet Library" may, therefore, in the hands of competent editors, serve a very useful purpose. It is to consist, we gather, of several volumes, of which the present, devoted to Political Pamphlets, is the first. Later numbers of the series will contain respectively literary, theological, and dramatic pamphlets. The editing of the Political Pamphlets has been entrusted to Mr. A. F. Pollard, who has performed his task on the whole with care and discretion. His difficulty has, of course, been mainly one of selection. Nineteenth of the important pamphlets are directly political in character, and many others, which may be classed as primarily theological or literary, have at least a political side. Many, again, of the very best, such as Bolingbroke's Idea of a Patriot King or Halifax's Character of a Trimmer, though they well deserve reprinting by themselves, are far too bulky to find a place in such a collection as that before us. Mr. Pollard has been obliged to content himself with printing the dedication to Steele's Crisis and some extracts from Burke's Present Discontents and Letters on a Regicide Peace: in all other cases he has been able to find complete pamphlets at once sufficiently short and sufficiently representative of their authors. These include Saxby's Killing No Murder, Halifax's New Model at Sea and Cautions for Choice of Members of Parliament, Arbuthnot's Art of Political Lying, Swift's Thoughts on the Present State of Affairs, Bolingbroke's State of Parties at the Accession of George I., besides one of Swift's Draper's Letters and three of the Letters of Junius. It is somewhat surprising to find nothing of Milton and nothing of Defoe; probably the gap will be filled up in later volumes, the Areopagitica being classed as literary and the Shortest Way with Dissenters as theological. In other respects the choice is an excellent one, though one might have wished that room could be found for examples of the rugged eloquence of Cobbett and of the polished eloquence of Fletcher of Saltoun. The conditions of space are, however, tyrannous, and there is nothing in the book that could well have been spared. We have, however, a complaint against Mr. Pollard's introduction. So far as matter goes, it is sensible, though slight; and Mr. Pollard's historical knowledge, here and in the few notes which he gives, is evidently adequate. To speak, plainly and nakedly, of "Bishop Gauden's Εἰκὼν Βασιλική" is, perhaps, to show an ignorance of the latest trend of competent opinion upon the debated and debateable subject of Gauden's claims. This is not of much importance, but it is of importance that a volume containing some of the masterpieces of prose style should be introduced in a style which itself has some decent pretensions, if not to elegance, at least to grammatical accuracy. Mr. Pollard's manner of writing is clumsy throughout, and occasionally he falls into a solecism. "The genius of Defoe and Steele paled their ineffectual fires before that of their great antagonist Swift" is the sort of thing which is set for correction to schoolboys in the lower standards of a Board school; nor will you find a better specimen of the mis-related participle than occurs in Mr. Pollard's account of Bolingbroke: "Dazzling as an orator, Chatham declared that he would rather recover one of Bolingbroke's orations than the lost books of Livy, or all the gaps in Greek and Roman lore."

We are grateful to Mr. Pollard for reprinting two admirable and little known pamphlets by George Savile, Marquis of Halifax. The Cautions for Choice of Members of Parliament, in particular, is one of the wittiest and most pointed pieces of political writing known to us. And its wisdom is no less than its wit. Written in the last decade of the sixteenth century, it abounds with shrewd and practical comments which are as valuable, even to-day, as they are disregarded. Its fault is that it is written in sentences rather than in paragraphs, and has therefore the jerky effect of a string of maxims rather than the orderly development of a treatise; but for the neat turn of the stinging sentence, for the rapier-thrust of keen and polished irony, for the felicity of apt and easy illustration, it is surely unequalled in the annals of controversial literature. "I will tell you," says Halifax to the electors, "whom not to elect"; and proceeds to a scathing analysis of the various types of self-seeking or merely stupid politicians to be found in the parliaments of his own and of every day. A few of his criticisms will bear quotation, even in our own age of enlightenment and public virtue:

"A very extraordinary earnestness to be chosen is no very good symptom. A desire to serve the nation in Parliament is an Englishman's ambition; always to be encouraged, and never to be disapproved. . . . But there is a wide difference between this and the deciding a kind of petty war in the County or Corporation, entering the lists rather for a combat than an election, throwing fireballs to put men into heat, and omitting to spread no reports, whether true or false, which may give an advantage by lying a blemish on a competitor.

"These methods will ever be suspicious; it will never be thought a natural thing for men to take such extravagant pains for the mere sake of doing good to others."

And again:

"Next to these may be ranked a sort of super-fine gentlemen, carpet-knights, men whose heads may be said to be only appurtenances to their perukes, which entirely engross all their care and application. Their understanding is so strictly appropriated to their dress that no part of it is, upon pain of their utmost displeasure, to be diverted to any other use.

"It is not by this intended to recommend an affected clown, or to make it a necessary qualification for a member of Parliament that he must renounce clean linen or good manners; but surely a too earnest application to make everything fit right about them striketh too deep into their small stock of thoughts to allow it furniture for anything else.

"To do right to these fine-spun gentlemen, business is too coarse a thing for them, which maketh it an unreasonable hardship upon them to oppress them with it; so that in tenderness to them, no less than act of care to the public, it is best to leave them to their tailors with whom they will live in much better correspondence when the danger is prevented of their falling out about privileges."

Of carpet-baggers Halifax will have none, for to choose men unknown is "more like choosing valentines than members of Parliament"; nor of lawyers, for "if lawyers have great practice, that ought to take them up; if not, it is no great sign of their ability." It must be admitted that Halifax's doctrines are rather of the nature of counsels of perfection. Even in our legislators we have occasionally to put up with the second best, and if we reject, as Halifax would have us reject, all the pushful, the indolent, the busybodies, all nominees of peers, all drunkards, club wits, blockheads, boys and barbers' blocks, all lawyers, military men, and non-residents, all the extravagant, the unjust, and the poverty-stricken, and, lastly, all men of marked party leanings, it must be admitted that, in our author's own words, we should "do terrible execution."

MILL FOR BEGINNERS.

The Ethics of John Stuart Mill. Edited, with Introductory Essays, by Charles Douglas. (Blackwood & Sons.)

THERE seems just now to be a revival of interest in the writings and opinions of J. S. Mill, very gratifying to those who feel that the best part of their intellectual culture comes from his teaching. Among other symptoms of this revival may be mentioned a German edition of the essay on Liberty, annotated for the use of schools, which has appeared since the publication of the present volume. Dr. Douglas does not exactly address himself to schoolboys, but he believes that "for those who are beginning the study of moral science there is no better introduction to this subject than an accurate knowledge of Mill's ethical theory." So far as the theory is embodied in the "Utilitarianism" we quite agree with this opinion. One of the earliest readers of that small but golden work is said to have exclaimed, "I felt like a jelly-fish that was getting a backbone," and many subsequent readers must have felt the same. Mill was before all things a practical reformer, and as such he carefully kept in touch with the unorganised mass of popular sentiment and opinion. Hence he acquired an influence more direct and rapid than has perhaps been wielded by any other thinker of the century. Hence also it may be said that, while Mill addressed himself to the educated public at large, all subsequent writers on ethics have addressed themselves to Mill's disciples. Of those disciples Dr. Douglas is not one; but, as an accomplished Neo-Hegelian—for such we take him to be—he is less concerned to confute utilitarianism than to pick up some admissions let fall by its most illustrious exponent, and to make them serve as germs or hints whence a larger philosophy may be deduced. How far he or any other critic has succeeded in this dialectic process, and how far utilitarians in general are pledged by the master's admissions, are points that must be reserved. But while Dr. Douglas has done excellently well in reprinting the "Utilitarianism," and in illustrating it with numerous parallel passages from Mill's other writings, we may doubt the expediency of including in the same volume as part of his ethical theory that section of the "Logic" which deals with the method of the moral sciences. The chapters in question seem to us quite the weakest portion of that great work, and whatever may have been their value originally, they are now strangely out of date. Mill's attempt to distinguish between Determinism and Necessarianism may once have comforted a few, but it will not stand serious examination. The determinist predicates unconditional sequence of human actions and human motives; and if necessity does not mean this, what does it mean? Is it, as Goldwin Smith once wittily asked, to be turned adrift on the dictionary without a meaning? Again, however promising Mill's proposed science of ethology may have seemed half a century ago, it has not been taken up by the new school of psychologists; nor does there seem any likelihood of our being able to deduce the empirical laws of human nature from the general laws of association—even if those laws should hold their ground as first principles of mental science. The evolutionary method, which Mill ignores, holds out much brighter hopes. But to overestimate Mill's labours is a fault on the right side; and our thanks are due to Dr. Douglas for his able contributions to the study of one from whom the world has learned much and from whom it has still something left to learn.

THE TURKISH CHARACTER.

Impressions of Turkey during Twelve Years' Wanderings. By W. M. Ramsay. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

MR. RAMSAY'S impressions of Turkey would have been of greater interest to the general reader had the plan of the book received more attention. At a first glance it appears to consist of somewhat heavy magazine articles dished up for the European market in order to catch the psychological moment. But it would be unfair to Mr. Ramsay to convey this impression of his work without giving him credit for the great diligence and sobriety which he brings to bear on the Turkish question. That he has his own particular prejudices is perfectly evident; but he would be more than human if he could live in Turkey for so many years without having very strong feelings on the subject. A long residence in the East generally makes Europeans more fanatical than the Turks themselves. Once they have resolved to like "the irrepressible," and in some aspects he is very likeable indeed, they can see nothing wrong in either his manners or morals. With regard to the latter, it would have been interesting could Mr. Ramsay have enlightened us a little more, particularly in regard to the women; but, beyond a rather cheap pity at the expense of their hard lives, he seems to have had a somewhat pronounced fear of Eastern women in any shape or form. Whenever he wanted to arrange about copying inscriptions or purchasing stones pertaining to antique monuments, he feared lest the women should come along and upset the bargain; and in many instances experience justified his fears.

Disregarding Mr. Ramsay's somewhat prolix and uneventful searches in quest of the antique, it is interesting to note the tact with which he endeavoured to understand the Turkish character and to put himself in sympathy with it. As he very truly implies, a little careful consideration on this point may save the would-be traveller from a vast amount of discomfort. Everyone who has lived in the East knows how fatal it is to set about anything in a hurry. The mere sight of such misdirected energy annoys the Turk; he wants to smoke over it and try to invent excuses for not doing anything you particularly wish him to do. If you smoke with him, leisurely combat his excuses, and hold out the hope of bakshish when the thing is done, then your average Turk reluctantly understands that he will save himself a good deal of trouble by agreeing to your proposal. But the average European fails to understand this method. He wants "yes" or "no" at once, and, in consequence, generally receives "no" for an answer when the exercise of a little tact and ingenuity would have enabled him to carry his point.

For the Turk Mr. Ramsay has evidently a strong affection. And the reason is a very curious one. The average Turkish peasant is honest; the Armenian is not conspicuous for his honesty; and it is this somewhat doglike, unreasoning honesty of the Turk which atones for his shortcomings in other directions. The average Turk is incredibly stupid; he can do nothing that is not absolutely simple. Once his lust for blood is roused, however, he can be very unpleasant indeed. Yet he is frugal, straightforward, and would be industrious were it not useless to produce more than enough food to support a bare existence. Should he grow more, the tax-gatherers rob him of it, or the Greek and Armenian money-lenders get this poor, good-natured, hulking fly into their clutches and suck his juices at their leisure. There is also a great distinction between the average Greek and Turkish villages, which accounts for a good deal of the physical and moral deterioration of the Turk. Turkish women are mere beasts of burden, tillers of the soil—human animals, in fact—with whom their lords and masters do not condescend to bandy words. But in all the Greek villages the women live on terms of perfect equality with the men, and are of magnificent physique: while the poor, down-trodden Turkish women are slight, stunted, and impoverished. This, more than any other reason, accounts for the steady degeneration of the Turk. It is true that the Turks recently thrashed the Greeks; but the reader has only to compare the relative numbers of the contending armies, and to remember how large a share artillery, directed, it is asserted, by German officers, played in the struggle, to understand the poor show made by the Greeks.

Mr. Ramsay is very emphatic when describing the results wrought by the American missionaries in Asia Minor. The present writer has also had an opportunity of studying these results. It appeared to him that every Armenian who became a Christian went to New York directly he could raise funds to pay his passage money, and either remained there or else collected subscriptions to relieve the wants of his own people. Some Armenians do, of course, return to their own country; but most of them find it very much to their advantage to stay away from it. As a characteristic instance of Armenian dishonesty, Mr. Ramsay describes how he bought twenty pairs of socks made from the wool of the beautiful Angora sheep, at the house of an Armenian merchant. The socks were delivered just as he was leaving the place. On the following day he discovered that each pair was so arranged that one sock concealed the other. In every pair the inner sock was a mere tattered rag of common wool; the Armenian had procured twenty worn-out socks, washed them, and made ten good pairs into twenty. This is only a small instance, but it is typical.

Mr. Ramsay believes that in agreement with Russia against German influence in Turkey lies our only rational hope, and thinks that such a course is not likely to be taken till "Lord Salisbury has given place to a successor." Though Mr. Ramsay has picked up much useful information during the course of his twelve years' wanderings, the ideal book on the East still remains to be written.

A NEGRO POET.

Lyrics of Lowly Life. By Paul Laurence Dunbar. (Chapman & Hall.)

SOME little while ago, America was startled by the appearance of a negro poet. Negro orators there had been in abundance, and negro prose writers were not unknown; but a negro poet was something new. There is no reason whatever why a negro should not be possessed of the poetic sense, for his race is singularly addicted to rhythm of movement, and plantation lullabies are rich in natural poetry; but Mr. Dunbar—for that is his name—the son of slaves, and himself an elevator-boy and mechanic, came as something peculiarly novel to a people continually on the search for novelty. Mr. W. D. Howells, who is the friend of young talent, took the dusky singer under his wing, and his work crept into the magazines. In course of time Mr. Dunbar embarked for England on a lecture tour. He gave a few recitals with but indifferent success, and now we have this volume containing those poems which he considers representative.

These lowly lyrics, although Mr. Dunbar has mingled them indiscriminately, fall naturally into two divisions: verse descriptive of negro life and standpoint, which could have been written only by a negro; and verse after a more ordinary pattern, which is within the scope of any sentimentalist with a gift for rhyme. With the latter section we need not concern ourselves; but the negro poems are well worth attention. Here, for example, is a little poem of friendliness, which has the genuine ring:

"AFTER A VISIT.

"I be'n down in ole Kentucky
Fur a week or two, an' say,
'T wuz ez hard ez breakin' oxen
Fur to tear myse'f away.
Allus argerin' 'bout fren'ship
An' yer hospitality—
Y' ain't no right to talk about it
Tell you be'n down there to see.

"See jest how they give you welcome
To the best that's in the land,
Feel the sort o' grip they give you
When they take you by the hand.
Hear 'em say, 'We're glad to have you,
Better stay a week er two';
An' the way they treat you makes you
Feel that ev'ry word is true.

"Feed you tell you hear the buttons
Crackin' on you're Sunday vest;
Haul you roun' to see the wonders
Tell you have to cry for rest.
Drink yer health an' pet an' praise you
Tell you git to feel ez great
Ez the sheriff o' the country
Er the gov'nor o' the state.

"Wife, she sez I must be crazy
'Cause I go on so, an' Nelse
He 'lows, 'Goodness gracious! daddy,
Cain't you talk 'bout nuthin' else?'
Well, pleg-gone it, I'm jes' tickled,
Bein' tickled ain't no sin;
I be'n down in ole Kentucky,
An' I want o' go ag'in."

It is curious how true the dialect poem nearly always rings. It seems as if a man does not write in his own patois unless he has sincerity. If one would be moved readily to tears, or to that kindly laughter which lies not far from them, let him turn to the poems of Edwin Waugh and T. E. Brown, Col. John Hay and William Barnes, J. W. Riley and, we may add, Mr. Dunbar. Here are a few stanzas from a piece of genuine sentiment—"When Malindy Sings":

"Ain't you nevah hyead Malindy?
Blessed soul, tak' up de cross!
Look hyeah, ain't you jokin', honey?
Well, you don't know what you los';
Y' ought to hyeah dat gal a-wa'blin',
Robins, la'ks, an' all dem things,
Heish dey moufs an' hides dey faces
When Malindy sings.

"She jes' spreads huh mouf and hollahs,
'Come to Jesus,' twell you hyeah
Sinnahs' tremblin' steps and voices,
Timid-lak a-drawin' neah;
Den she tu'ns to 'Rock of Ages,'
Simply to de Cross she clings,
An' you fin' yo' teahs a-drappin'
When Malindy sings.

"Oh, hit's sweetah dan de music
Of an edicated band;
An' hit's dearah dan de battle's
Song o' triumph in de lan'.
It seems holier dan evenin'
When de solemn chu'ch bell rings,
Ez I sit an' ca'mly listen
When Malindy sings.

"Towsah, stop dat ba'kin, hyeah me!
Mandy, mek dat chile keep still;
Don't you hyeah de echoes callin'
F'om de valley to de hill?
Let me listen, I can hyeah it,
Th'oo de bresh of angels' wings,
Sof' an' sweet 'Swing low, sweet chariot,' Ez Malindy sings."

We cannot go so far as Mr. Howells does in his introduction to this volume, and describe Mr. Dunbar as an author

"whose brilliant and unique achievement is to have studied the American negro objectively, and to have represented him as he found him to be, with humour, with sympathy, and yet with what the reader must instinctively feel to be entire truthfulness."

A much wider range of emotion and thought would need to be covered before such praise were applicable. But Mr. Dunbar has displayed certain sides of the negro character very charmingly. Let us take leave of him by quoting the most individual piece in the book—a drily humorous dissertation on the old question of Responsibility:

"ACCOUNTABILITY.

"Folks ain't got no right to censuah othah folks about dey habits;
Him dat giv' de squir'ls de bushtails made de bobtails fir de rabbits.
Him dat built de great big mountains
hollered out de little valleys,
Him dat made de streets an' driveways wasn't
'shamed to make de alleys.

"We is all constructed diff'ent, d'aint no two of us de same;
We cain't he'p ouah likes an' dislikes, ef
we'se bad we ain't to blame.
Ef we'se good, we needn't show off, case you bet it ain't ouah doin',
We gits into su'ttain channels dat we jes'
cain't he'p pu'suin'.

"But we all fits into places dat no othah ones could fill,
An' we does the things we has to, big er
little, good er ill,
John cain't tek de place o' Henry, Su an'
Sally ain't alike.
Bass ain't nuthin' like a suckah, chub ain't nuthin' like a pike.

"When you come to think about it, how it's all planned out it's splendid.
Nuthin's done er evah happens, 'doubt hit's somefin' dat's intended;
Don't keer what you does, you has to, an'
hit sholy beats de dickens—
Viney, go put on de kittle, I got one o' mastah's chickens."

GREEK CIVILISATION.

A Survey of Greek Civilisation. By J. P. Mahaffy, D.D., D.C.L. (Macmillan & Co.)

THIS is a book which, though it is learned, and, in the rhetorical Irish manner, well-written, we confess to laying down with some feeling of disappointment. The title raises expectations which the contents do not, and do not even attempt to, gratify. The past decade has been prolific in Hellenic lore. To the already existing evidence of the texts has been added that of archaeology in its many branches. Coins, inscriptions, funeral monuments, folk-lore—the study of all these has thrown a flood of new light upon this most unique and potent of civilisations. Schliemann and Dörpfeld have revolutionised innumerable preconceptions. We no longer talk of the tale of Troy as a Sun-myth, for we have traced the succession of cities upon the plain of Hissarlik. We no longer think of Attic temples as candid and built upon a system of rigid straight lines; for we know that they were glowing with colour and composed of infinitely subtle curves. Aided by the comparative method of religious study, we are rapidly decomposing the complicated structure of poetic mythology into its constituent elements and its successive strata. But hitherto it has been all piece-meal work, the labour of highly specialised students, each grubbing away in his own little hollow of excavation. But of attempts to estimate the total outcome, to sum up the meaning of Hellenism, its value and its message for the world-spirit, as, for instance, Matthew Arnold in a certain famous essay summed up the value and message of Celticism, of these there have been comparatively and lamentably few. Yet this is what we want from time to time, if research is to be kept clear-headed and English scholarship saved from irretrievable Teutonicisation. Matthew Arnold himself did the thing, of course, a quarter of a century ago, but Matthew Arnold's conclusions and formulas, true as they probably are in the main, require their revision in the light of the modern learning. Prof. Butcher, in his Aspects of Greek Genius, and Mr. Pater in his Greek Studies, have dealt admirably with isolated facets of Hellenism, while the latter great critic, in his Plato and Platonism, has given a magnificent interpretation of a whole important side of the problem. We had hopes that Prof. Mahaffy would prove to have tackled his subject in the same comprehensive and illuminating spirit. He has many of the qualifications for the task. He has approached Greek history and literature from many and diverse points of view; he has borne his share of the burden of research, and yet has escaped the researcher's narrowness by attaining to the platform of broad and liberal culture. And, therefore, we say that we are disappointed when we find that Prof. Mahaffy has conceived his subject on much slighter and less helpful lines. He has written, indeed, as he himself admits, a "personal and partial book." He has not risen to the endeavour to envisage Hellenism in its totality, but has been content to lead his readers through a sketch of Greek civilisation from Homer to Plutarch, dilating on such points as happened to please him, and neglecting others, on which he had nothing particular to say at the moment.

"Had I," he says, "attempted to touch upon even a tithe of the many topics that crowded upon me from the literature in which I have spent my life, the book would have been a mere kaleidoscope of colours, and would have left no permanent impression. It was imperative, therefore, to make a selection, and in so doing I have been led by my own fancy, by the preference with which my own mind, without any suggestion from books, brought up one topic and neglected the others."

Built upon these principles, the book is naturally discursive, fragmentary. It is, indeed, not much more than a summary of previous works of the author, from some of which several pages at a time are incorporated in the text. And it has the further defect, that it is professedly addressed to the illiterate. It is clear, from several allusions, that it was written in the first place for an American audience, and Prof. Mahaffy's readers are told in a footnote that they are not expected to know Greek. If this is so, surely a systematic outline was all the more desirable, for Prof. Mahaffy cannot count upon having the gaps in his treatment filled up for him. But, frankly, is not the attempt to instil any real knowledge of Hellenism into those ignorant of Greek a hopeless one, by whatever method it is pursued? "Oh, Danaides! oh, Sieve!"

It is fair, however, to say that within its limitations Prof. Mahaffy's book contains much that is interesting, and is marked by a fresh and often original treatment of the selected topics. We often disagree with the writer, but we always recognise an antagonist who has an adequate knowledge of his subject and can make out a plausible case for his wrong-headed views. A good instance is afforded by his vindication of Greek tyranny, in which he makes the point of a true Unionist that a measure of material benefit may well be held to outweigh the degrading effects of political subjugation. As an example of Prof. Mahaffy's style, we may quote his account, half false, half true, but, in any case, well expressed, of one with whom he has but little sympathy, "the master of those who know."

"I cannot but instinctively regard him as a great outsider, combining many narrownesses, indeed, of his age and race with a certain cosmopolitanism which was no small agent in breaking down the peculiar virtues as well as the weaknesses of Hellenism, and changing it into the broader, shallower, more commonplace Hellenism, which we shall consider in a subsequent chapter. As in his personal appearance, so in his writings, there was an almost total absence of beauty, and the recovery of his lost work on the constitution of Athens has not altered that judgment."

"What place can a man devoid of this feature have in a study of Greek culture? None, I think, but that of a strange and notable exception, given us, as it were, to show that even in scientific severity, in cold reasoning, in complete absence of any relaxation of thought and of life, the Greeks were our masters, and equalled the best modern men here, as they surpassed them in manifestations of the beautiful. For there never was any single man who had a greater effect in promoting the knowledge of his own and of succeeding generations. It may even be said in proof of his greatness that he also retarded more than any other man ever did the course of scientific discovery. For he bound the learned man of the Middle Ages by the superstitious veneration for his words which they accepted as almost inspired. In the thirteenth century he was all but canonised as a saint by the Roman Catholic Church. And so modern thinkers found it their hardest task to break through the bonds of Aristotle, whom early thinkers had failed to follow in his marvellous investigations. Were there ever stronger or more inconsistent evidences of human greatness?"

WAGNER AS CRITIC.

Richard Wagner's Prose Works. Vol. V. "Actors and Singers." Translated by W. A. Ellis. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

SLOWLY, yet steadily, Mr. W. A. Ellis is labouring at his herculean task of translating Wagner's writings; the fifth volume, entitled Actors and Singers, has just appeared. It opens with "A Capitulation," a piece of satire which must have intensified the anti-Wagner feeling which existed in Paris long before the Franco-German war. Mr. Ellis, in his interesting preface, mentions that some "who can see no farther than their noses" have attributed this attack to revenge for the failure of "Tannhäuser" at Paris in 1861. It may be true up to a certain point to say that "the ridicule cast upon the French is meant as a more effectual mode of shaming their German imitations." We do not doubt that Wagner had such a motive in view, yet it is difficult not to believe that the unfair reception given to his "Tannhäuser" had something to do with the piece. Revenge is sweet; and, after all, Wagner, although a genius, was human—nay, very human. The "Capitulation" is followed by the Essay "Beethoven," written in celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the great master. It is a thoughtful, though perhaps in some respects an extravagant, essay, as, for instance, the "skeleton outline" of the C sharp minor Quartet.

While on the subject of Beethoven, mention may be made of another article in the volume on the "Ninth Symphony," which originally appeared in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt in 1873. Wagner maintains that in certain passages of that Symphony Beethoven's intentions are not fully represented by the written notes. In one passage the master was hampered by limited compass of the flute, and in another by the "natural" trumpet. Wagner therefore proposes to modify the score, and suggests how this should be accomplished. Such tampering with the text of Beethoven naturally called forth bitter opposition. Only fancy at the present day a musician, not of world-wide fame—and in 1873 Wagner had not won the commanding position which he afterwards held—suggesting, on similar grounds, some alteration of the scoring in "Die Meistersinger" or "Parsifal." In these Wagner-fever days it would be better for that musician never to have been born. The question of altering, by even a single note, the scores of the great masters is beset with difficulty. There are, undoubtedly, weighty arguments for and against such a course. This is not the place to discuss that momentous question, and yet just a word or two may not be amiss, as Wagner's attempt to improve Beethoven's score has been the subject of interesting comment in a letter recently published by Sir G. Grove in the Musical Times. Wagner's true admiration for Beethoven and his mastery of orchestration give weight to his words, even if his arguments fail entirely to convince; also it should be remembered that Beethoven himself, when the compass of the keyboard of the pianoforte was extended during the composer's lifetime, referred to certain passages in his is pursued? "Oh, certain point to which upon the French's actual mode of character-izations." We do not see that is a motive to view a fresh and often original of the selected topics. We are with the writer, but we have an antagonist who has knowledge of his subject and a plausible case for his wrong-

A good instance is afforded of Greek tyranny, in the point of a true Unionist of material benefit may well through the degrading effects of civilization. As an example of style, we may quote his false, half true, but, in any case, of one with whom he sympathy, "the master of instinctively regard him as a containing many narrownesses, and race with a certain which was no small agent in the peculiar virtues as well as of Homeliness, and changing to shallower, more common-which we shall consider in a
As in his personal appear-ings, there was an almost-ity, and the recovery of his institution of Athens has not a man devoid of this feature Greek culture? None, I strange and notable ex-try were to show that even interest. For is not Bayreuth now the centre, as it were, of the musical world? It is natural to suppose that Wagner, in planning the Bayreuth Playhouse, was largely occupied in making known his own works. As with Bach and Beethoven, so his own greatness absorbed much of his attention. Still it is clear, from the "Final Report," that the Bayreuth Theatre was not intended to be what it has now become—i.e., solely a Richard Wagner Theatre. Mr. Ellis has provided this fifth volume with an interesting preface, an index, and a useful summary of contents.

THE MEASUREMENT OF TIME.

Chronologies and Calendars. By James C. Macdonald, F.S.A. (William Andrews & Co.)

WHY must those who were born on the 29th of February wait till 1904 to celebrate their next birthdays? This little book will answer that and many other curious questions. The Roman pontiffs had corrupted the Calendar Rolls—for instance, ordaining special intercalated days to favour a moneyed friend who wished to retain office. At last the seasons fell months out of time, so that the festival of spring was celebrated in July. Julius Cæsar unmade this confusion, decreeing that the year 46 B.C., then current, should contain 445 days, and instituting leap years, though he never lived to see one. How difficult the counting of days must be when historical and astronomical events have to be compared. Cæsar's orders were misread, and for the next thirty-seven years every third instead of every fourth year was made a leap year; eight days each and one month of twenty-nine days, except in leap year, when the thirteenth month would have thirty days.

Dates for the Creation range from the 7382 B.C. of Josephus and 3760 B.C. of present-day Jews to the era of evolution, the hundred million years of Lord Kelvin's limit to the period of organic life upon earth. The "Evolution of Eras" in China, Egypt, and elsewhere, is treated as history and archaeology, perhaps without sufficient reference to those astronomical conditions to which human systems have sought to conform. The author of Chronologies and Calendars sticks to his last, and, indeed, he knows his own business uncommonly well, but might have referred his readers, say, to Whewell's chapter on "The Fixation of the Civil Year" in The History of the Inductive Sciences.
Of ancient cycles the Metonic nineteen-year period was so highly esteemed that it was cited in the Greek Fasti in letters of gold, hence our "Golden Number." Some further information would have been welcome as to the use of this number in the prediction of eclipses and in the Prayer-book "Table to find Easter." Modern astronomers reckon the day as beginning at noon, not at midnight; and in their calculations the year 0 (unknown in history) would precede A.D. 1. Recent efforts to extend the use of the Greenwich meridian might suitably have been noticed.
Mr. Macdonald whets our appetite when he tells of the conjunction of Venus and Jupiter in B.C. 6, supposed to be the Star of Bethlehem, and of battles long ago, which have been dated by calculating back to old eclipses. These astronomical checks are most useful when applied to unravel history written when men compiled freely and forms a temperate presentment, from the point of view of a clever woman, of the marriage question. Moreover, the foreword, "Religio Fœminæ," may be recommended as an antidote to the nonsense which has been written concerning that mythical creature the "New Woman." But we have been chiefly interested in the essay which deals with the "Disparagement of Woman in Literature," and discloses a feminine grievance of which we had never suspected the existence. For the writer has discovered in the course of her reading that the makers of books have from time immemorial been in the habit of saying the nastiest things about women. Even when they have not abused women they have spoken of them in a "tone of affectionate patronage" which is even more annoying than abuse. And if you will cast a roving mental eye over the literature of the ages, from Homer to Anthony Hope, you will be bound to admit the existence of a habit of writing of women as, in a manner of speaking, different from men. Even the Homeric tag—θηλυραὶ δὲ γυναικες—seems to contain a covert sneer, if we translate it "womanly women." Then there was Euripides (who is certainly understood to have had experience to back his opinion), with all manner of horrid remarks, quite uncalled for, about the sex; he calls it τὸ θῆλυ, you remember, no doubt meaning the neuter to indicate contempt. The same may be said of that apophthegm which has passed through unnumbered adaptations, "varium et mutabile semper femina." But Miss Chapman does not bother herself about antiquity. She is willing to let bygones be bygones, so long as they have gone by for three centuries, and is content to base her case, which she pleads with much research and ingenuity, on the ways of writers who flung their handful of mud or their sprinkling of chaff at the sex; and Miss Chapman thinks that it is quite time they gave up the amusement.

There may have been some reason in the past, Miss Chapman admits, for the disparagement of women. "Nor am I concerned to deny," she writes, "that, from one cause or another, considerable pretext has been afforded for this chronic depreciation, ridiculing and vilipending of woman." But in these days, we are given to understand, when women are doing their best to be serious and honest and brave, when they are taking degrees and sitting in serried rows on platforms, and, in short, making themselves generally useful, it is a serious discouragement that men will persist in regarding them as belonging to a different sex, and being either rude or ribald at their expense. It is enough to send them back in despair to the suckling of fools and the chronicle of small beer. Something, obviously, will have to be done. Miss Chapman suggests that it would be well to follow the example of those "who, in reading standard works or, for the matter of that, current literature aloud in the family circle are careful to omit all depreciatory references to the female sex, as a sex." We cannot think that this would meet the case. The proportion of literature that is read aloud in the family circle is extremely small, and you may trust the young folks to lay hands upon the books and investigate for themselves if they suspect deceit. A committee of expert ladies might be appointed to expurgate all books of anti-feminine matter, winnowing the chaff and leaving only the pure grain of approbation. The "Woman's Bible" would supply the precedent. But even then, who could guarantee that the expurgated edition would hold the market?

After all, we fear, the only thing is for woman to take it smiling. She is not alone in her punishment. Men have been exceedingly outspoken about their own sex, ever since a man exclaimed that "All men are liars." If "Frailty, thy name is woman" offends, let her reflect that "Men were deceivers ever" and cry quits. Moreover, now, if ever, women have the game in their own hands. The novelist with the largest circulation in the world is a woman. It only remains for our conquerors in the world of fiction to speak their minds. Miss Chapman's complaint comes too late to be of service. We have disparaged women for three thousand years or so, but the time of our "spanking" has come.

SOME OLD SCOTTISH PENS.

The "Blackwood" Group. ("Famous Scots" Series.) By Sir George Douglas. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS is not always a good critic, but he is a pleasing biographer. It would be hard, indeed, to be utterly dull on such a subject, for the men he writes of—Wilson, Galt, Moir, Michael Scot—were vigorous personalities in their way, tirelessly energetic, crude and faulty to the last degree, but at the worst living, bustling human beings. As a relief from anæmic young gentlemen who worship the bones of art, it is worth while turning to those uncritical Scots who set down their gloriously faulty stuff with real gusto and delight. Wilson was the type of the school, Galt, perhaps, rather above it; while Moir, save for one masterpiece, was certainly below it. The school has been overpraised in later times by its perfervid fellow-countrymen, who fancy analogies between its spontaneity and the ease of production of the great author of Waverley; but it is easy for a generation which has been schooled to admire the exquisite and the chastened to fail in appreciating raw elemental power. Nowadays we seek, even in our realists, a certain reticence in passion, and mere violence in the sentimental is set down as rococo and futile. But the rococo has its charm; and these men were more than boisterous sentimentalists and windy rhetoricians.

The author has learned a trick or two from his subjects, and is betrayed more than once into a flamboyant phrase or an ill-considered judgment. "To-day the critic Johnson is remembered chiefly for his blindness." Indeed! we had not thought so. Or take such an inexact note as this:

"The Inheritance in its own degree unites the principal characteristics of the Greek and the Shakespearean drama, for the web of circumstance inexorably woven about the innocent and unconscious heroine is entirely in the manner of the first, while the indifferent, life-like alternation of tragic and ludicrous incident in the narrative is of a piece with Shakespearean irony."

Nor can we see the point of such a piece of patriotism as: "The success of Marriage had the right effect upon the sterling Scottish character of the authoress. It led her to try how much better still she could do." He calls a line of Moir's a fine line:

"The bliss that feeds upon the heart destroys"—in which we can see no more than a trite thought awkwardly expressed. Nor, in spite of our strong admiration for Galt, can we admit that his Covenanting story, Ringan Gilhaize, shows a more real sympathy with Scots feeling, more "literary style, intensity, and delicacy than Old Mortality." Two scenes alone in the book seem to us to have the quality of first-rate romance—the journey of Michael Gilhaize along the Fife coast to St. Andrews and the somewhat Rabelaisian meeting between the trooper and the goat.

In fact, Sir George Douglas suffers from having to group together a number of writers of very disparate gifts. The result is that he starts at a high level of praise, and, when he wishes to go further (as in Galt's case) he is driven into ill-timed comparisons with a very great writer. But the book is interesting and useful, if for no other thing than that it emphasises the excellence of the Noctes and the best work of Galt and Miss Ferrier. In the present woful state of Scots fiction, when the Scots village is a transcendental point round which are grouped religious myths, it is refreshing to turn to the real thing in The Provost and The Annals of the Parish.

HORT'S "CHRISTIAN ECCLESIA"

The Christian Ecclesia. By Fenton John Anthony Hort, D.D. (Macmillan & Co.)

THIS volume consists of a course of lectures delivered before the University of Cambridge in 1888-89 by the late Dr. Hort, and of four sermons preached on various occasions, but dealing more or less with the same fundamental topic. Having to speak about the origin and early history of the Christian community as an organised body, Hort chose for his title the word Ecclesia, as his editor, Mr. J. O. F. Murray, puts it, "expressly for its freedom from the distracting associations which have gathered round its more familiar synonyms"—especially, we may suppose, the word "Church." The same effect might perhaps have been still better attained by writing Ecclesia with two E's in the Greek character. In any case, to nearly every reader it will simply spell church. We live in a time when historical investigations of apparently the most innocent kind are at once captured for party purposes; and ecclesiastical studies are so peculiarly exposed to this fate that Hort might as well as have begun by boldly facing the risk. Nor do these lectures give the impression that he was himself actuated by a merely antiquarian curiosity. They read like a pamphlet against sacerdotalism, not only as represented in an extreme form by the claims of Rome, but also as represented in a more moderate form by the Anglican pretensions. In reference to the famous text on which Pius IX. relied so confidently as a proof to Protestants of papal infallibility, Hort observes (p. 16) that in his opinion

"the most obvious interpretation is the true one. St. Peter himself, yet not exclusively St. Peter but the other disciples of whom he was then the spokesman and interpreter, and should hereafter be the leader, was the rock which Christ had here in view. It was no question here of an authority given to St. Peter; some other image than that of the ground under a foundation must have been chosen if that had been meant. Still less was it a question of an authority which should be transmitted by St. Peter to others."

As to the bishops mentioned in Apostolic literature, Hort seems to look on them as officials corresponding to the elders of the Judaic congregation, from which he assumes the Christian ecclesia to have been developed; while the diaconate is characterised as "a strictly subordinate and external function" (p. 231). No system of church government was instituted by Christ, nor was any recognised as binding by the Apostles (p. 230). In short, the Gospel is not "a second Levitical Code" (p. 232). Protestant Nonconformists will welcome these conclusions as water to their mill, and Roman Catholics will, perhaps, appeal to other credentials than isolated New Testament texts; but one feels curious to know how Hort would have reconciled the privileges claimed by his own Church with this unsparing, though indirect, demolition of their alleged foundation in the earliest Christian tradition.

Hort might have made out an even stronger case had he accepted the results of any but the least advanced New Testament criticism. On this point, however, he remains rigidly conservative. Every saying attributed to Christ by the Fourth Evangelist, and every word reported as having been uttered after the Resurrection, is accepted without hesitation; and this even when the genuineness of a command to preach the Gospel over the whole earth seems to be discredited by the strange quiescence of the disciples to whom it is said to have been delivered (p. 37). The Book of Acts receives more credence than most scholars would give to Thucydides. The Epistle to the Ephesians is quoted as Pauline even when the lecturer has to cite the passages which most distinctly betray its later origin. Objections to the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles are indeed mentioned, but only in the briefest manner, and only to be peremptorily swept aside (p. 171).

The lectures are, of course, marked by refined scholarship and painstaking accuracy. But the treatment of the whole subject is highly technical, and the style austere to aridity. The sermons are a little, but only a little, more popular. The finely wrought abstractions of which they chiefly consist give the impression—very likely an erroneous one—of being designed to commit the preacher to the fewest possible definite statements, and the vaguest possible promises of reform.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Gleanings of Past Years: 1885-96. Vol. VIII. (Theological and Ecclesiastical.) By the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. (Murray.)

MR. GLADSTONE speaks his thoughts with a subjective accompaniment of winning modulations and commanding gesture, the periods punctuated with the warning arm and the setting of the strong sensitive mouth; but the callous pen and dispassionate ink decline all part and lot with such matter, the phrases they inscribe are the pale ghosts of the author's full-blooded idea. But if Mr. Gladstone the essayist is less a master of style than Mr. Gladstone the orator he is at least a clear, intelligible writer—diligent, laborious, conscientious; and that which his wonderful industry puts forth is invariably a serious contribution to the consideration of the subject of which he treats. In the present volume he is seen at his best. Here he discourses of the matters in which he has most delight—discourses with an urbanity, with a restraint, with a dignity, which show him at his best. The papers cover ground familiar to such as concern themselves with controversies of the day. The methods of "Bob" Ingersoll are examined with a seriousness that must have surprised that light-hearted humorist; Huxley is bombarded on the subject of the Swine Miracle with historical evidences amid which stars and daggers dazzle the reader with their multitude of references; the voluble, versatile Mrs. Besant is treated with a lighter hand of courteous ridicule; Mrs. Humphry

Ward's philosophy is examined with more gravity than her Robert seems by this time altogether to deserve. Of the other essays three are devoted to a justification of the Reformation settlement of religion. The volume contains also Mr. Gladstone's hopeful forecast of the verdict to follow upon the Roman inquiry into the essence of the Anglican ministry, and, by way of postscript, his lament that the Commission did not contrive to return a verdict in favour of the validity of its orders. The acerb tone of this last document denotes the bitterness of the writer's disappointment.

This eighth volume, which completes the series, leaves the reader astonished at the industry which in the midst of the burdens of an exacting career has found time for so voluminous occasional work, full of admiration for the learning and of respect for the character that speaks in its every page.

* * *

Memories of the Months: Being Pages from the Notebook of a Field-Naturalist and Antiquary, to wit, Sir H. Maxwell, Bart., M.P. (Arnold.)

If Englishmen do not yet appreciate the beauty and many enjoyments to be found in the country it is not the fault of the numerous writers who of late years have treated them, each in his own style. A White of Selborne or a Richard Jefferies is not often reproduced by nature, in spite of the assertions of reviewers, and yet many of their excellencies may be found in Sir H. Maxwell's little book. He unfeignedly loves every aspect of country life, and devotes some ninety chapters to revealing a few of nature's secrets. He does so, too, in a scholarly manner, having much sympathy with ballads, art, and archæology. Being an authority on fishing, especially trout fishing, he judiciously flavours his pages with piscatorial anecdotes. Not contented with these pleasant subjects, scenery, flowers and flower lore, gardening, deer-stalking, black game and ptarmigan occupy his facile pen. The result is, that every lover of nature finds much to charm him in these Memories, and will be wise to add them to his shelf of favourite books. The essays are arranged under the four seasons. Snow, sunshine, foliage and autumnal tints thus form suggestive backgrounds for studies of birds and animals. Half-a-dozen characteristic etchings bestow additional grace on the volume. It upholds the highest traditions of fair sport and humanity to the lower creatures; and as the reader lays it down he cordially wishes that ere long Sir H. Maxwell may impart to the world some further chapters from his notebook.

Naturalists are sure to differ here and there from the author. That detestable fungus phallus cannot, for instance, fortunately, be termed "common." Shakespeare's "long purples" are more probably lythrum salicaria than the spotted orchis. It is a somewhat rash experiment also to introduce the jay into a district tolerably clear of it, whether eggs or garden produce are taken into account. Such diversities of opinion, however, add to the book's charm. The reader in his country rambles finds someone, as it were, to oppose his own views. Sir H. Maxwell's vignettes of Scottish scenery are delightful and painted with the utmost felicity. From them he takes the reader to the mouth of an estuary and bids him notice the smell of violets and cucumbers which pervades a catch of smelts, and which, it may be added, is also apparent in the grayling on being first taken. An interesting chapter relates to the discovery of water by the divining rod; another to the lavish display of colour when the wild hyacinths are out; "those fairy banks, enamelled with acres of azure among the grey ash-stems, with bright green fern-fronds springing, and dog's mercury of more sober tone." Nothing else in nature's colouring has so fine an effect on English scenery; a bed of these hyacinths reminds one of the gentian on the Alps, like a blue cloud on the mountain side, as Mr. Ruskin describes it.

These remarks show something of the variety and interest which pervade Sir H. Maxwell's Memories. It is of the country and for the country. Everyone going North this summer cannot do better than put it in his pocket. It will assuredly lend a more vivid charm to the hills and wild-life of Scotland.

* * *

Forecasts of the Coming Century. By a Decade of Writers. (Manchester: The Labour Press, Limited).

THE papers which make up this book have been written by men to whom we may fairly look for well-informed utterances on the aims of Socialism and the methods by which it is proposed to realise them. Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace writes on "The Re-occupation of the Land"; Mr. Grant Allen on "Natural Inequality"; Mr. Tom Mann on "Trade Unionism and Co-operation"; Mr. Edward Carpenter on "Transitions to Freedom"; and there are seven other papers. All are affable and reasonable to a degree. Mr. Tom Mann has put off the Socialist Adam of ten years ago less, perhaps, than his fellows; but in writing on Trade Unionism he is dealing with his own calling, which it is natural he should magnify. His hopes may probably be classed among those illusions of Socialism on which Mr. Bernard Shaw discourses amusingly later in the volume, half apologising for them, half condemning them. As for Mr. Shaw's own opinions, they would, we think, be nothing but a help to pleasant intercourse between himself and, say, Lord Salisbury.

Mr. Henry Salt writes on "Socialism and Literature." He thinks that a Socialist régime would stamp out dilettante writing, incompetent writing, superfluous writing, the books of rich amateurs, the itch for authorship, and other literary evils. Very likely it would; but so would a Mohammedan invasion of Europe, or the Day of Judgment. These evils exist, but our explanation of them would be simpler than Mr. Salt's. We trace the itch to write to the itch to read, and this to the Compulsory Education Act, which has made millions read voraciously, but has not had time to make them read well. All that is wanted is time.

THE BOOK TRADE IN CANADA.

A TALK WITH A CANADIAN PUBLISHER.

I HAD met Mr. Thompson before in Toronto, and when I caught sight of him the other day in London I suggested the advisability of an interview on Canadian book-selling. Mr. H. L. Thompson is president of the firm of Copp, Clark & Co., of Toronto, probably the largest wholesale booksellers and publishers in the Dominion.

"No," said Mr. Thompson in answer to the inevitable question, "I cannot say that the Jubilee has affected our business to any large extent; it has certainly not had the disastrous effect which I hear it is having in this country. Canada was never more loyal and further from annexation to the United States, but it is curious that the innumerable Jubilee publications have not had a large sale."

"But I hear that the various schools are giving Jubilee medals instead of book prizes this year. Surely that will lessen the sales of 'juveniles'?"

"That is quite a mistake. In the Canadian public schools book prizes are seldom given. We carry a large stock of 'juveniles,' but most of them go to the Sunday-school libraries, which are a great institution in our country."

Mr. Thompson went on to explain that a very important branch of his firm's business is the sale of school text-books. "The text-books for all the lower classes are, as a rule, authorised by Government, and we publish quite a number of these. The Educational Department of Ontario insists that these shall be produced in the country and be, for the most part, the work of Canadian authors. The provinces of Quebec, Manitoba, and British Columbia generally follow Ontario in the choice of educational works, so we have a large public to supply; but in the maritime provinces, notably in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, Toronto publications are looked upon with something of suspicion and antagonism."

"You do a large business in Colonial editions of English works, I believe?"

"Yes, we make these a special feature, and have the exclusive agency for the Colonial editions of quite a number of books. Of course we have at present to contend with the numberless American reprints, and I think English publishers are coming to understand that it is useless to expect us to sell any number of the six-shilling edition of, say, Mr. Barrie's earlier books, when the market is simply flooded with the American 'ten cent pirate.'"

"I suppose the popular authors are much the same in Canada as in England?"

"Yes, that is so. We have no local literature of any moment, if you except the novels of Gilbert Parker, which have sold in large numbers. Ian Maclaren, Hall Caine, Crockett, Barrie, Weyman, Conan Doyle, all command a ready sale, and we also get rid of large numbers of David Douglas's neat editions of American novels."

"Have the free libraries reached Canada yet?"

"Yes! They are very popular, and on the increase everywhere. Mechanics' institutes and school libraries are being formed in many towns; and now that books for such institutions are, for the most part, free of duty, they are likely to grow very rapidly. It is not very easy to understand the provisions of the new tariff" [here I nodded in token of fervent assent, for I can vouch for the difficulty of fathoming some of its vagaries], "but it seems that in the first case we shall have to pay the ordinary duty, but sell at the free price to the various libraries, and then look to the Government to refund such duty. I should have preferred to have had the duty collected upon all library books imported into Canada, and then have had the rebate allowed to the library direct; but either of these plans will be a great benefit to the local booksellers, who can now sell books from stock to the library and receive, either direct or through the library, a rebate of duty previously collected."

And then, of course, we plunged into a discussion of the new tariff, and especially of the clauses in it relating to books. Mr. Thompson is personally exceedingly sorry that the clause prohibiting the importation of American reprints or pirated editions into Canada has, upon consideration, been abolished. English publishers who, when arranging for the American "market" of a book, have "thrown in" Canada would be surprised to learn how strong the feeling against this arrangement is.

"We want to deal with England," said Mr. Thompson with great emphasis. "It is true that for the present the unauthorised reprints can come in from the States with impunity, but I think the whole question of British copyright will come up again before long, and I believe the Canadian Government will have been convinced that it is unjust to the British author and publisher, and pernicious for the Canadian bookseller and reading public, to allow the sale in the Dominion of American pirated editions. The proposed clause was probably too sweeping and drastic, but in a modified form it would receive the hearty support of all right-thinking people."

"And what is the latest information from Canada as to the duty on books?"

"It seems there are to be two distinct duties. All novels, whether in cloth or paper, and paper-covered books, of whatever nature, are subject to a 20 per cent. duty. This does not include Sunday-school books, which, with all other kinds of literature outside fiction and some educational books, are only subject to 10 per cent. duty. It is not definitely stated, but I suppose English books will have the one-eighth preference as was proposed in the earlier tariff, which would, of course, bring the duty on English books down to 17½ per cent. and 8½ per cent."

"This arrangement practically amounts to a premium on serious reading?"

"Yes; and so as further to encourage the sale of the best literature the Government in making grants to libraries and other institutions stipulates that fiction shall not constitute more than 20 per cent. of the books bought. Of course, the Government's definition of fiction is not very sweeping. I should not be surprised to hear, for instance, that Mr. Henty's stories were classed as 'historical.'"

The vexed question of Canadian copyright right was bound to come up in such an interview. English publishers are quite unaware how seriously the matter is being debated in Canada.

"On this question," said Mr. Thompson, "I am distinctly a 'moderate.' I am in favour of Canadian copyright under certain conditions—first, that the law shall in no way be retroactive, and secondly, that English Colonial editions shall be prohibited as well as the American reprints. The proposal now before the Government is as follows: Supposing that a book is published in England and that no arrangements have been made with a Canadian publisher for a special Canadian edition, it will be open to anyone to apply to Ottawa for the right to reprint the book. The Government will then communicate with the author or publisher asking whether any such arrangements have been made, and giving a definite time for reply. Should the response be in the negative, or there be no reply at all, the applicant may receive Government authorisation to publish that book at whatever price he likes, and to pay to the Government a royalty of ten per cent. upon the retail price which will be handed by them to the English publisher or author. Now it stands the reason that it will be to the advantage of the English publisher or author to arrange beforehand with some firm in Canada to publish the book as his agent, for he can then make distinct stipulations as to price and royalty. If no such arrangement be made, he will receive, it is true, his ten per cent. royalty, but nothing prevents the Canadian applicant, of whose business standing the English author or publisher may know very little, from selling the book at twenty-five cents, or even lower."

"You speak of author or publisher. Is the idea to leave it optional as to whether you communicate with the English publisher or direct with the author?"

"I am, as I have said, one of the 'moderates.' Some of the Canadian publishers deny the right of the English publisher to interfere in the matter at all. As business men, who have had long and exceedingly pleasant relations with publishers of this country, we should certainly wish to deal with the publishers. And I must say most emphatically that as far as my firm is concerned we shall not apply to Ottawa for the enforced publication of any book, though we shall be glad to arrange with English publishers for the publication of Canadian editions, when such arrangements can be made to mutual advantage."

"One more question. Will a Canadian edition pay you?"

"Only in the case of some popular books. The cost of production would be cheaper in Canada than in England if we printed from English plates, as we shall hope to do when dealing with the publisher. The buying public is not large, but with an author of any popularity a Canadian edition should be a success, providing always that the cheap English and American editions are not allowed to come into the country."

J. E. H. W.

"Ah! Don't be hard on Thackeray," said Amyas, raising his pointed fingers; "he was of his age, of his age."

"So was Noah, dear chap."

"Even Noah was only partly antediluvian," said another.

"True," said Amyas; "he had his second period. What I value in a writer," he added, musing, "are the odd moments, the between periods, the neither this nor that!"

I am skirting Mr. Sturgis's plot persistently; but I do not think that there is injustice in so doing. The reader will come to it the more freshly. It interested me greatly, as I said; but Mr. Sturgis's satirical touches and clean-cut portraits interest me more. We need such observant wits as he to crystallise types for us from time to time.

* * * *

An Odd Experiment. By Hannah Lynch.
(Methuen & Co.)

In An Odd Experiment Miss Hannah Lynch has hit on a plot which is not absolutely new—Mr. Kipling has turned it into a short story—but she has worked it out in a manner which is novel and remarkably clever. It is simply the struggle of a woman—verging on middle age—for the affections of her husband. Mrs. Raymond finds her husband in sore trouble, and inquires the reason:

"If it were an ordinary squalid infidelity," he says, "I might make shift to be sorry in silence and mend. But that's the worst of it, Kate. There's more than you and me to consider in this matter."

"Naturally. There's—the other woman," said his wife, with her unruffled placidity."

That remark alone is enough to interest you in Mrs. Raymond. She is marvellously reasonable. She goes to see the "other woman," who is merely a passionate girl, and insists that she shall come to stay with her—and her husband—as a guest. This is how the other woman—her name was Blanche—contemplated the prospect:

"Blanche's thoughts, like unintelligent birds, flew in a circle to the running murmur of consciousness: 'To-morrow I shall be sitting between his wife and him, we three aware of what that means.' She blinked faint lids upon the awful picture, and the colour came in hot waves, and subsided under chalk patches, to the surprise of the servant, who removed the plates, and noted her silence and want of appetite."

When I had reached this point I became intensely interested; for a writer who tackles such a situation strikes deep indeed. I also saw, as you will see from the above-quoted sentence, that Miss Hannah Lynch has caught the Meredithyrambic spirit to her undoing. Take, for example, her description of Miss Baruna, a quite secondary character, who "carried with her the emphatic note of wealth that sets mercenary Cupid sighing like a bellows at the skirts of gilded maidenhood." Such grotesqueness, I must confess, worries me when I come across it in a book with a live story written by a live writer. It is for Mrs. Raymond, the reasonable wife, that I shall read this story again. This is how Mrs. Raymond feels when she intercepts "an imprudent flash of eyeball" passing between the husband and the other woman:

"Instantly she felt beggared of youth and its incandescent glow, since never again could life light such fire for her. Love and its beguiling rashness lay behind, buried in the grave of experience, and, with a thrill of memory, she felt a poignant yearning for the soft follies, the caresses, the tender, broken speech of young passion. But this was no moment to listen to the restless beats of a heart suddenly stripped of its conventional wrappings of philosophy. Duty was then simple, sure, defined. It ordered her to be satisfied with friendship, and not aggravate by her own futile regrets the troubles of a tortured heart. The rest, after all, is purchasable; only comradeship and the quiet affections can neither be sold nor paid for. She it was who was the man's friend; and what did it matter how much of the inferior feeling, never a permanent one, he gave the other?"

From this you may see something—it would be robbing you of an enjoyment to tell you more—of the result of Mrs. Raymond's experiment. The book is a curious study of the life of middle-aged married people whose passional life does not entirely synchronise. A book to read and remember.

Lazarus: a Tale of the Earth's Great Miracle. By Lucas Cleeve.
(Hutchinson & Co.)

Some provision of the copyright law should be contrived to cover the New Testament. Another lady has entered the field in which Miss Corelli has delighted her "public." Barabbas is followed by Lazarus; and now we expect with confidence the arrival of Pontius Pilate and Judas Iscariot. Barabbas one knows chiefly by disrepute; of Lazarus I have had some hours of wearisome experience. Lucas Cleeve's acquaintance with the Hebrew race is such as might be cursorily gleaned from the "Teacher's Bible"; her moralising—and there is an unconscionable deal of it—is of the most obvious and irritating quality. As for the extraordinary jargon which she deems appropriate to a story of Palestine, methinks it doth bear a semblance unto nought of language written or spoken since Babel's builders were by Jah confounded.

Her hero is introduced musing upon "a clashing dissonance he could not account for"—a judgment given in favour of a usurper. He falls in with Nicodemus, and together they go to his domicile, conversing gravely by the way. When they arrive—

"We heard a wondrous story to-day from Cana," Mary [the sister of Lazarus] said to the two men. "We cannot credit it, but our kinsman Nathaniel . . . doth write how that they were all at the wedding of a friend, and Mary was there with her amazing son, this strange Man of whom all speak; and, when they entered, Mary did say to the servants, 'Whatever He saith unto ye, do it.' And there were set there six water-pots of stone, containing water; and this Jesus said unto them, 'Fill the water-pots with water'; and they filled them to the brim. Then He said unto them again, 'Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast.' And when they did so, behold it was all wine, and of such choice flavour as Nathaniel saith he never before did taste . . . and all were full of wonder at this thing, which they do term a miracle. What think ye, noble rulers, can this thing be true?"

Poor St. John! And Nicodemus being "a master in Israel"—the people whose war-cry was, "The Lord your God is One"—comments: "If 'tis true ['tis] Aramaic for 'it is'], 'tis surely a God who hath come among us!"

To our very serious Lazarus the two most beautiful women in Jerusalem, Mary Magdalene (Lucas Cleeve does not follow the tradition which identifies her with Mary the sister of Lazarus) and Rebekah, the daughter of Caiaphas, are devoted. This is how that young man replies to Rebekah's pleadings. She is very lovely; you are to understand, but not at all good:

"Noble lady," he said, "farewell; thou art not thyself to-night, and to listen to thee were wrong; for thou thyself would'st weep if thou did'st know the words which thou hast said. I thank thee for the love thou offerest, but 'twould [Hebrew for "it would"] be but sorry love I gave thee, for my heart and soul are given to the Nazarene; henceforth, in life and death, I belong to Him, and of naught else can I think; and if I cause thee pain, sweet lady, forgive me, for I would not; but if thou hast a sorrow for a while, turn thee to the Nazarene, who doth assuage all sorrow. So shall we be united, thee and I, in a common heavenly love that will wipe out all earthly yearning."

And even that cured not the infatuated young woman!

"That one short hour in the fragrant, silent garden had brought him closer than ever he would be again. On that sweet memory she must feed till ages should have rolled away, while swathed in grave-clothes of finest embroidered linen the High Priest's daughter would be lying in her granite sepulchre."

Admire that touch about the grave-clothes. The lady came to a bad end, one regrets to add. After "quick, hot words" with "the beauteous Magdalene," about to be married to the resuscitated Lazarus, with "madness-given strength" she "stabbed her in her jealousy." And Lazarus and Mary sailed away in a ship "to where they could preach the Gospel unmolested." It will be seen that the book has in it the elements of a wide popularity.

* * * *

Impossibilities: Fantasias. By Israfel Mondago.
(Henry & Co.)

This book is a little literary lark. But the jest is rather one-sided. No real human being, with passions, temper, and a will, can limit himself in all the emergencies of life to the vocabulary of the concert-platform. If his creator insists on so restricting him, he becomes automatic, incredible. The author will lay his finger upon

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's SWISS MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK, BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely
proof against Carrying Disease.

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes :
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c., &c.

A Free Book.

A Valuable Guide advising
What to Eat and What to Avoid. It contains Notes on Food, Alcohol, Tea, Coffee, and Milk.

There is a Diet Table for Increasing Weight, and suggestions for safely reducing Flesh.

A Tabulated Chart is also given showing the Time required for the Digestion of all usual articles of Food.

Write for a Free Copy today.—Address Guy's Tonic
Co., 12, Buckingham Palace
Road, London, S.W.

Name "THE ACADEMY"
when writing.

Guy's Tonic should be instantly resorted to—

When Digestion is accompanied by Flatulency ;

When Pain, Weight, Fulness, or Distension is felt after Eating ;

When there is Drowsiness after Meals ;

When there is Distaste for Food of all kinds ;

When there is a Dull, Weak, Failing Appetite ;

When there is Loss of Flesh, and Strength is gradually diminishing.

All Chemists sell
Guy's Tonic.

SOAP

is scientifically defined as the neutral compound of fatty acids with an alkaline base. Neutral is the important word.

Eeckelaers' Toilet Soaps

alone fulfil the conditions perfectly.
Excess of alkali renders soap caustic :
super-fatting renders it greasy and disagreeable. A really skilful soap manufacturer makes soap neutral.

ASK the Perfumer (or Perfumery Department at "the Stores") for the following, in boxes of three tablets :—

EECKELAERS' BROWN WINDSOR SOAP	1s.
EECKELAERS' SPRING ROSE SOAP	1s. 6d.
EECKELAERS' OPOFONAX SOAP..	1s. 9d.
EECKELAERS' BOUQUET DE VIOLETTES SOAP	2s.

The exquisite perfume and dainty boxing of these soaps peculiarly recommend them. Unrivalled in the nursery.

Mends Everything. LE PAGE'S LIQUID GLUE

Is used by Pullman Palace Car Co, Mason & Hamlin Organ and Piano Co, and by thousands of first-class manufacturers and mechanics throughout the world, for all kinds of fine work on Wood, Ivory, Leather, Paper, Glass, Marble, &c.

Awarded GOLD MEDAL at World's Exhibition,
London, 1883. Pronounced the STRONGEST
ADHESIVE KNOWN.

Sold in tin cans for mechanics and amateurs, and in bottles for family use.

IT MENDS EVERYTHING.

Wood, Leather, Paper, Ivory, Glass, China, Rubber,
Stone, Jewellery, Metals, Shoes, Books, Card Albums
Toys, Musical Instruments, Statuary, Farmers'
Implements, Furniture, Bric-a-Brac, &c.

Strong as Iron. Solid as a Rock.

No Heating. No Preparation. Always Ready. Indispensable in every Family. Sold in tin cans for Mechanics and Amateurs. Half-pints, 2s. ;
Pints, 3s. ; and Quarts, 4s. 6d. each ; and in bottles for family use at 6d and 1s. Samples free by post on receipt of stamps or postal order.
Sold by the Wholesale Trade generally, and retailed by Stationers, Fancy Goods Dealers, Grocers, Ironmongers, Chemists, &c., &c.

the title and remark, "I told you so"; but the self-respecting critic cannot allow his ink-pot to be thus overturned. A series of tales in which no one character is for a moment alive, in which nothing particular happens, in which no person loves, suffers, or even dies, is not a good book of stories, though it contain, as Mr. Mondego's volume contains, some clever juggling with words, together with some startling effects in the juxtaposition of preciousness and slang, and though it manifest a surprising familiarity with the technical phraseology of the musical art and with the concert-room classics. One of the characters describes himself thus:

"Mine is the secret of personality. I am the Wagner of the piano. I do not merely play notes. I play on thought and emotion, on every complex chord of beauty and passion. I read the lurid sins of Liszt, the Magyar scroll of blood and death and fiery intolerable desire; I feel the clinging soft Slavonic, lazily affettuoso with a fierce double entente. . . . I am a genius, and my Leschetzky turn of the wrist is greatly admired. . . ."

Incidentally occurs some passable descriptive criticism. Take this from "Buggins at Bayreuth," a description of the famous low E flat of the Rheingold:

"How exquisite is running water on the orchestra!—the limpid amber trickle, sound liquified, flowing, flowing, interwoven with little sunlit cross currents kissed by a quivering ray of emerald light reflected from the trees far above that mirror their drooping branches in the stately river."

Which, allowing for the extravagant pose and an air of burlesque, may be accepted. Sometimes Mr. Mondego drops to the level of a more daily jocosity. A landlady goes away muttering: "It ain't the work as I objects to; it's the manool labour of running up and down these 'ere stairs": that is a pleasant little surprise. But, to conclude as I began, the author probably has amused himself more than the result of his freak is likely to amuse anybody else.

* * * * *

The Widow Woman. By Charles Lee.
(James Bowden.)

If you can master an unfamiliar dialect, you will find this little book as brisk and exhilarating as a draught of West-country cider. It is a simple tale of a Cornish fisherman, "as helpless on land as a fish out of water." John Trelill, torn from the side of his true love, and dragged by his termagant of a sister to the desirable kitchen of the widow whom he is expected to marry, does not cut an imposing figure. Mrs. Poljew, the sister, is the master of ceremonies.

"Casting aside all superfluous delicacy, she came to the point.

"Come," she exclaimed, suddenly jumping up, 'let's spake out free, an' have done wed'n. John, you're a widdier man, 'a b'lieve, an', simmen to me, you're a widdier woman, Mis' Pollard; you do both live too near a wood to be afraid of owls. Edn' no 'casion to be 'ave like fullish maid an' bachelor; out wed'n, now, an' be done!'

"They seemed to have turned to stone as they sat. Mrs. Poljew pitched a note of soft sentiment.

"When I be'old you two a-settin' together, an' chattin' happy and comfortable (John writhed in his chair), I say to myself, 'Here's a pair, sure 'nough!' Anybody to look upon 'ee 'ud say you wor made for aich other, like Pilchards an' Pendennack men. . . . Come, Mis' Pollard, John's got somefen to say to 'ee. Are 'ee exposed to hear 'en say et?'

"Ess, s'pose," murmured Mrs. Pollard faintly.

"Mrs. Poljew turned to her brother.

"Now, John, out wed'n!'

"Beads stood on John's forehead. He uttered an inarticulate gurgle.

"Mis' Pollard," he began desperately, and suddenly stopped short.

"That's very well; I do think a brae lot of 'ee," prompted his sister in a very audible whisper.

"I—I do think a brae lot of 'ee," he repeated mechanically.

"That's very well, too. Will 'ee have me?'

"Will 'ee——" he broke off. "Oh, I can't," he cried in despair. "Lis me alone, Mary; I can't!'

"The wrath on Mrs. Poljew's face was terrible to behold. But, unbeaten to the last, she instantly subdued it, and turned a knowing grin on Mrs. Pollard.

"There's bashfulness for 'ee!' she exclaimed."

The Countess de Saldar had not more presence of mind. But it avails nothing. The widow, who is a good soul in spite of her moustache, is not to be imposed on, and relinquishes her claims. So John comes to his true love once again, mainly by the counsel of Mrs. Pezzack, whose "garrulity spoiled her for the ideal detective." But her reminiscences atone for her gossip:

"There were six of us maids at home, and all of us had our chaps—all but little Patience, the beauty. Ah, the times we had! Sat'dar night the kitchen was as crowded as if there was a berren on. An' what mother'd say. She'd pertend to be vexed when she come in, an' found all the chairs full, some of em' double, and two settin' 'pon table. "Hullo!" 'a'd say, "what's this? Got a berren on?" 'a'd say. But all the while 'a wor as pleased as could be to think her daughters were so much thought for. But 'a managed us proper, mother did. N' kissin' or huggin' in comp'ny, 'a believe. Ef 'a should see tw' hauldin' hands, "rap" 'ud come the stick 'pon their fingers. "Where's your manners?" 'a'd say. "Ef you caan't be 'ave proper, young man, out wi' 'ee." An' soon's ten o'clock did strike, 'a'd say to Betty—she wor the youngest, nex' to Patience—'a'd say to Betty to take her chap out, an'—"I'll gie 'ee five minutes to say good-bye in," says mother. An' then, after five minutes, 'twas "Time's up, Betty. Off wi' 'ee, young man!" An' then 'a wor Naomi's turn, she bein' next to Betty, an' she'd have her five minutes; an' then five for Jane an' five for Cath'rine. But I was the aldust, an' came last, so 'Shah an' me had ten minutes. The others used to be vexed, but mother'd tell 'em 'a wor my right, bein' the aldust."

It is a delightful book, full of quaint characters, and abounding in that quiet humour which ought to grow in every Kailyard.

* * *

The Philanderers. By A. W. Mason.
(Macmillan & Co.)

I am thankful for such a book as The Philanderers, not because of the story, which is, however, sufficiently good in itself, but for the manner of it. Mr. Mason, in a word, has style, and to this he adds a genuine, if at present a slightly superficial, knowledge of human nature. Man-nature he understands better than woman-nature. Drake and Mallinson and Fielding are true enough. Drake, indeed, is consistently good; but Clarice le Mesurier is hardly convincing, and certainly when she becomes Mrs. Mallinson I find her incredibly shifting and unrealisable. I cannot conceive that any woman of her upbringing would so readily consent to play at the old game of runaway wife with one man a few hours after she had almost lured another, whom she really appeared to love, into the same trap. But, as I said before, I am satisfied with Stephen Drake; he lied boldly and well to save a worthless woman at the cost of his own reputation, and when disillusion came, and he found himself at the crisis of his sacrifice to be making it for no better than a shallow wanton, he as boldly reversed his decision, and faced the world again to fight his slanderers down.

There is something curiously Meredithian in much of Mr. Mason's work; such sentences as these, for instance, "Her voice was pitched to convey thanks," "To a gentleman whose ambition it had been to combine the hermit's indifference to social obligations with an indulgence in social festivities," occur continually. But in a time of slipshod writing one is glad to find a man of Mr. Mason's calibre; he sees clearly, and teaches the lesson of The Philanderers with strength and grace.

Drake, after his election was won, came upon Clarice in a dark room in the hotel which faced his opponent's room on the other side of the street. It was there that he was assured that the wife of the clever, weak, and selfish Mallinson loved him. He struck a match to see her face.

"You mustn't fancy," he began, in a hesitating tone. "You mustn't misunderstand. I was thinking what men owe to women—that's all—that's all, indeed—and how vilely they repay it. That way, like Cranston—he nodded in the direction of the house across the street, "or worse—or worse," he clung to the word on a lift of his voice, as though he found some protection in it, as though he appealed to Clarice to agree with and second him, "or worse."

"The match burned down to his fingers, and he dropped it on the floor and set his foot on it. Once in the darkness he repeated "or worse," with a note almost of despair, and then he was silent. Clarice simply waited. She stood, feeling the darkness throb about her, listening to the sharp irregular breathing which told her where Drake stood. In a few moments he stirred, and she stretched out her hands towards him. But again she heard the click of a matchbox, and again the thin flame of light flared up in the room.

"Clarice!"

"Her name was shouted up a second time."

The Philanderers should add to Mr. Mason's reputation—a reputation which, I am convinced, will continue to grow.

SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1897.

No. 1311, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ON A DIAMOND JUBILEE.

BY SIR LEWIS MORRIS.

TWELVE centuries and more have passed and gone
 Since this dear Britain of our love and pride
 Her crownèd state and royal robes put on,
 And, her seven realms, grown gradually one,
 Waxed great and glorified.
 Year after year, Age after struggling Age,
 Broadened her wide imperial heritage,
 Until to-day, safe-throned beyond the foam,
 The greatest Realm beneath the wandering sun,
 From North to South, from East to West,
 On sea and land, a puissant Queen confest
 She rules, a mightier Rome.

Through all the long processions of the years
 This solemn pageant of our Island Crown,
 'Neath skies unclouded, or through mists of tears,

Sweeps still unbroken down,
 From Egbert to Victoria, the long line
 Of crownèd Sovereigns, never fails to shine
 From our dim dawn to this our noontide day

Always our Kings, our Queens bore temperate sway
 Through brief years some, some through a troublous reign

And fierce fights fought in vain,
 Some by mean vices marred and crost,
 And surging passions tempest-tost
 And grovelling sense, untimely slain,
 And some through long lives anxious, mixed with pain,
 To suffering Age at last, forlorn with clouded brain.

But now, but now, in these our latest days
 Of Britain's chequered story,
 A woman's blameless hand the sceptre sways
 And points the way to glory.

Already three score years, already more
 Than any of all that long array before,
 The sceptre rests in one beloved hand,
 A hundred peoples bow at her command,
 Safe-guarded by our crownèd Commonwealth
 From all the ills that mar a nation's health,
 The tyrant trampling Right and fostering Wrong,

Who finds the freeman where he leaves the slave;

And him the cunning glozing knave
 Who battens on the gross ignoble throng.

Oh, halcyon days of civil peace and rest!

Oh, happy, happy race, more than our fathers blest!

Within our memories, who live to-day,
 This glorious thing has been.

The girl who, with that fateful dawn in June,

Aroused from happy maiden dreams too soon,
 Woke to the cares of Empire, she to-day,
 Though three score years have fled away,
 Rules, our beloved Queen.

Scant change these busy chequered years have brought

Save haply slower limbs and riper thought,
 Few sorrows save that unforgotten loss
 Which is her Crown, and was long time her Cross.

The wider sympathy, the pitying heart,
 Which of the lowliest suffering bears a part,

And beats responsive to her people's pain.
 For us alone, after twelve centuries,
 Hath Fate reserved this greatest prize of all,
 The longest, justest, purest, happiest reign;
 "The spacious times of great Elizabeth"

Show narrower far than these.
 Fate cannot rob us now, nor Change, nor Death,

Who, whatsoever thing befall
 Through three score happy chequered years,
 Have lived with her and shared both smiles and tears,

Whose eyes have watched so long, and not in vain,

A reign without a blot, a life without a stain.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

PUBLISHING, like other businesses, is at a low ebb this week. Nor do the books that have come to hand reflect the hour. There is nothing festive about them. It would seem that publishers have put forth this week books that will be sought out by their special public, and that may as well be issued at one time as at another. We do not say that this applies to all the books in our list; but it may be held to apply to an unusually large batch of metaphysical and philosophical works which whisper that Jubilees are not everything, and that life holds more problems than pageants. True, M. Ribot's work, the latest edition to the "Contemporary Science Series," on The Psychology of the Emotions, may be more seasonable than appears at first sight. There is plenty of emotion in London just now, and we hope to see it redoubled on Tuesday; but its psychology must be one of our after thoughts. Even M. Ribot, be it observed, is a Frenchman. English psychologists are booking seats for the procession. America sends us The Genesis of The Social Conscience, by Prof. H. S. Nash, and The Fertility of the Land, by Prof. Isaac Phillips Roberts, of Cornell University. Germany, where philosophers never cease from troubling, gives us, for Jubilee reading, Prof. Oswald Külpe's Introduction to Philosophy. Add to these works The Rationalist's Manual, by Aletheia, M.D., and Ruskin Revised, by R. J. Muir, M.A. What a time to revise Ruskin!

But there are other books. There is Christ in Shakespeare in a "Victorian" edition which appears to contain a good deal of new matter. We say "appears," for Mr. Charles Ellis, its author, has made a first examination of his book sufficiently difficult. Never have we opened a book so beset with fly-leaves, dedications, prefaces, preludes, and proems. Mr. Ellis has five proems, one of which is part of a sonnet by Wordsworth, and another an extract from the Daily Telegraph. Mr. Ellis's method is to print a passage from Shakespeare facing a page of texts from the Bible. The passion for representing Shakespeare in new lights and extracting new meanings from his writings has produced some interesting books and some wearisome ones. It may be laid down that the test of the value of any sectional treatment of Shakespeare's works lies in the degree in which it helps the reader to understand and delight in the whole body of his work and the whole quality of his genius.

A likely looking Colonial book is to hand. The stirring events of the Matabele rebellion of last year have already somewhat faded from the public memory, but there will doubtless be readers enough for a well-illustrated narrative of those stirring days. Mr. Frank W. Sykes served as a trooper in the M.R.F. throughout the operations, and he has told the story of his experiences with Col. Plumer's relief force. In introducing his book Mr. Sykes is careful to emphasise the standpoint from which he viewed the campaign. He says:

"It may be pointed out that military operations, as seen and experienced by a trooper, are not all couleur de rose, either at the time or afterwards, no matter what his preconceived notions may have been on the subject. Again, the trooper's scope of observation is limited, and opportunities of learning the 'whys' and 'wherefores' of this and that are not frequent. Hence, to pretend to describe technically the movements and operations of the column would be absurd."

The photographs, sketches, and maps in the book are specially good and interesting.

We began to annex Burma in 1826 and now we are beginning to write about it. Quite a literature about this ancient and interesting country is springing up. Following Mrs. Ernest Hart's Picturesque Burma, published two months ago, comes Mr. George W. Bird's Wanderings in Burma. Mrs.

Hart wrote as a traveller, Mr. Bird writes as a resident of twenty years. His book is well furnished with illustrations, maps and statistical tables, and he has drawn much material from official sources. This work runs to over four hundred quarto pages and is furnished with a large special map of Burma and the surrounding countries, this being inserted in a pocket in the binding.

Books inspired by current events depend largely for their success on their promptitude; and we fancy that writers of this class of book have fared rather badly of late. We do not say that Miss Catherine Janeway's Glimpses at Greece has arrived too late, but it is certain that Greece and her affairs are ceasing to interest the man in the street. The Jubilee devours all. Similarly, books about Crete began to arrive just when interest was transferred to Athens, and books about the Dongola Expedition just when Crete popped into notoriety. It takes some time to get a book out, but a war can be arranged in five minutes.

A book on a rather novel and decidedly attractive subject is The Yew Trees of Great Britain and Ireland, by Dr. John Lowe. Dr. Lowe introduces his book in these words:

"There is no English tree which has gathered round itself so much of historic, poetic and legendary lore as the yew; none is so closely associated, directly or indirectly, with events persons, and buildings which are famous in our national history. In early and mediæval times it was a source of our country's greatness and supremacy, by supplying the bows and arrows with which our great victories were won; but in spite of this it has never attained that love and veneration in the popular mind so lavishly bestowed on its rival, the oak, which has played such a conspicuous part in the successes of later days."

Dr. Lowe does not forget, however, that so modern a writer as Dr. A. Conan Doyle has paid a lyrical tribute to the English yew-tree, and the following verse, which he places in front of his book, strikes the right note:

"What of the bow?
The bow was made in England;
Of true wood, of yew wood,
The wood of English bows;
So men who are free
Love the old yew-tree
And the land where the yew-trees grow."

From Mr. Grant Richards comes the second part of the series of English Portraits by Mr. Will Rothestein. It contains the portraits of Sir F. Seymour Haden and of Mr. William Archer. The first is convincing as a portrait and pleasing as a picture. Mr. Archer's features are perhaps less austere than they should be.

Royal Academy Pictures, 1897, is now completed, and is issued as a quarto in a decorative binding, with a preface by Mr. M. H. Spielmann. Referring to the general belief that this is an "Outsiders' Academy," Mr. Spielmann writes:

"The general level of the Outsiders is seen to be higher than ever; and those of the front rank make sturdy effort to render themselves worthy of taking their rightful place when Time shall summon them to assume the main burden of sustaining the credit of British art. In portraiture and landscape, in figure- and subject-painting, and in animal painting too, names little known to the public at large have started into prominence."

The most gorgeous of the Diamond Jubilee publications that have come under our notice is issued by the Illustrated London News, under the title of Her Majesty's Glorious Jubilee, 1897. Sir Walter Besant's explanatory text is set up in a Gothic type that, if not too readable, is in keeping with the imposing character of the whole. The weddings, christenings, and high State functions—events of Her Majesty's reign—are blazoned in almost as many colours as could have gone to the reality.

After the Jubilee, the exodus. It would be strange if the Guide Books were not beginning to arrive. This week brings us several, including new editions of Messrs. A. & C. Black's Guides to Hampshire and Dorsetshire. Each has been entirely recast.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

THE MYTHS OF ISRAEL: GENESIS. By Amos Kidder Fiske. The Macmillan Co. (New York). 6s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

THE AGE OF MILTON. By Rev. J. Howard B. Masterman. George Bell & Sons.

LIFE IN EARLY BRITAIN. By Bertram C. A. Windle. David Nutt. 3s. 6d.

MEMOIR OF MRS. URQUHART. By M. C. Bishop. Kegan Paul. 6s.

A MAN OF PLAIN SPEECH: ALEXANDER JAFFRAY, MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS. By "M. E." Headley Brothers. 2s. 6d.

THE NATIONAL MOVEMENT IN THE REIGN OF HENRY III. By Oliver H. Richardson. The Macmillan Co. (New York).

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

THE RATIONALIST'S MANUAL. By Aletheia, M.D. Watts & Co. 2s. 6d.

GENESIS OF THE SOCIAL CONSCIENCE. By H. S. Nash. The Macmillan Co. (New York).

INTRODUCTION TO PHILOSOPHY: A HANDBOOK FOR STUDENTS. By Oswald Külpe. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 6s.

HUMAN EMBRYOLOGY. By Charles Sedgwick Minot. The Macmillan Co. (New York). 35s.

THE CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES: THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE EMOTIONS. By Th. Ribot. Walter Scott, Ltd. 6s.

FICTION.

THE ROMANCE OF GOLDEN STAR. By George Griffith. F. V. White & Co. 3s. 6d.

THE CHOIR INVISIBLE. By James Lane Allen. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN: A TALE OF '37. By Allen Upward. Chatto & Windus.

THE GIRLS AT THE GRANGE. By Florence Warden. F. V. White & Co.

THE LIGHT OF THE EYE. By H. J. Chaytor. Digby, Long & Co.

MY BONNIE LADY. By Leslie Keith. Jarrold & Sons.

THE MYSTERY OF PHILIP BENNION'S DEATH. By Richard Marsh. Paper Covers. Ward, Lock & Co.

THE CRAFTSMAN. By Rowland Grey. Ward, Lock & Co.

MALLETTON. By A. B. Louis. Bliss, Sands & Co.

AN ELECTRIC SHOCK, AND OTHER STORIES. By E. Gerard. W. Blackwood & Sons.

ART, POETRY, BELLES LETTRES.

A VISION'S VOICE, AND OTHER POEMS. By Maria Greer. Digby, Long & Co.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE YEW TREES OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND. By John Lowe. Macmillan & Co. 6s. 6d.

TRAVEL AND GEOGRAPHY.

WITH PLUMER IN MATABELELAND. By Frank W. Sykes. Archibald Constable & Co. 15s.

BLACK'S GUIDES TO HAMPSHIRE AND DORSETSHIRE. Thirtieth and fourteenth editions. Edited by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. A. & C. Black.

WANDERINGS IN BURMA. By George W. Bird. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.

EDUCATIONAL.

SAMSON AGONISTES. Edited by Edmund K. Chatter. Blackie & Son. 1s. 6d.

THE RALPHIGH HISTORY READERS: THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA. By J. H. Rose, M.A. Blackie & Son. 1s. 9d.

ANCIENT CLASSICS FOR ENGLISH READERS: XENOPHON. New edition. By Sir Alexander Grant, M.A. ESCHYLUS. By Reginald S. Copleston, D.D. 5s. editions. Wm. Blackwood & Sons. 1s. each.

MISCELLANEOUS.

RUSKIN REVISED, AND OTHER PAPERS OF EDUCATION. By R. J. Muir, M.A. Oliver & Boyd (Edinburgh).

THE FERTILITY OF THE LAND. By Isaac Phillips Roberts. The Macmillan Co. (New York). 5s.

THE CHRIST IN SHAKESPEARE. By Charles Elba. Hoken & Sons. 3s. 6d.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S HIGHLAND HOME AND VICINITY. By Alex. Inkson M'Connachie. Walter Scott, Ltd. 6s.

PROGRESS IN THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA. By the Very Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D. Bliss, Sands & Co. 1s.

BILLY AND HANS: A TRUE HISTORY. By W. J. Sullivan. Bliss, Sands & Co.

PASTORAL WORK IN THE COLONIES AND THE NEW FIELD. By the Right Rev. J. R. Selwyn, D.D. S.P.C.K.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MARK TWAIN, it is well known, was interested in the American publishing firm of Webster, which after the issue of General Grant's Memoirs had heavy losses, and at length succumbed altogether. Mark Twain, whose writings had made him a rich man, was impoverished by this crisis. Holding himself, though, we believe, with no more reason than Sir Walter Scott did, personally responsible for some of the firm's debts, he started immediately on the lecturing tour round the world which concluded last year, and upon the history of which he is now working in lodgings in Chelsea, hoping thereby for some rapid means of producing money. In how far he was successful, cannot be said, but it is certain that his own finances are in a poor condition: so much so that a Jubilee subscription has been set on foot in America by the New York Herald, which heads the list with a thousand dollars. It is satisfactory to learn that this appeal has called forth co-operation from all parts of America. Mark Twain has caused so many persons honest and hearty laughter and good entertainment that common gratitude ought to see to it that he is relieved from monetary care.

A CORRESPONDENT of the St. James's Budget sends home a drawing of the memorial fountain to the late R. L. Stevenson which has been erected at San Francisco. A ship surmounts a plain square column on which is the inscription:

To Robert Louis
Stevenson.

To earn a little
To spend a little less
To be honest
To be kind
To help a few friends
And these without Capitulation.

In the drawing of the fountain Stevenson's name is spelt "Stephenson." It is to be hoped that the artist who made the repro-

... of the ...
 ... has been entirely recast.

W BOOKS RECEIVED.

[... prices are given where they
 ... by Publishers.]

SERIAL AND THEOLOGICAL.
 ... By Anna Kilder Paine.
 ... New York, N. Y.

SPORT AND BIOGRAPHY.
 ... By Rev. J. Howard B. Mansergh.
 ...

... By Bertram C. A. Windle.

... By M. C. Babop. Kegan

... By Alexander Jaffray, Messrs

... By "M. R." Bentley

... IN THE REIGN OF HENRY III.
 ... The Macmillan Co. (New

... AND PHILOSOPHY.
 ... By Alchem, M.D. Wain &

... CONDUCTOR. By H. S. Nash.
 ... New York.

... A HANDBOOK FOR STUDENTS.
 ... Swan Sonnenschein & Co. &

... By Charles Sedgwick Minot. The

... By Th. R. Scott. Walter Scott, Ltd.

... FICTION.
 ... By George Griffith.
 ...

... By James Lane Allen. Macmillan

... By Allen Upward.

... By Florence Warden. F.V.

"Bell." How Frank Fairleigh and Lewis Arundel and Harry Coverdale's Courtship would read now one cannot say, but twenty to thirty years ago schoolboys swore by them. The favourite of the three was always Frank Fairleigh and Lawless was the noblest figure of the book.

The same correspondent goes on to mention that "in 1816 Messrs. Hine & Co. (the senior partner of which firm was a very popular and skilful coachman) put on the Brighton road a new light coach," which ran between the "Bell" and the seaside town. He might have gone on to say further that this Mr. Hine was the father of the late Henry Hine, P.R.I., the painter of the Sussex Downs, whose pictures are so prized by their owners, and that the story of the old driver is set down very charmingly in a book by Mrs. Egerton King, his granddaughter, called Round About a Brighton Coach Office, which Mr. Lane published a year or so since.

THE case for the wheel against literature is put in a nutshell by an advertiser in the Queen. This lady asks plaintively if she has any chance of exchanging her set of Knight's Shakespeare for a bicycle.

In the facsimile reproduction of the Coronation number of the Globe, dated Thursday evening, June 28, 1838, price fivepence, which the Globe of Monday next will contain as a supplement, there are only three publishers' advertisements. One is of a new edition of Smith's Wealth of Nations; another, The Zoology of South Africa; and the third, a quack medical work. It is interesting to note that the proprietor of Cocker's pills was in the habit

An' laughin' fit to bust.
 Sez Jimmy, 'Can you pull 'er up?'
 Sez Ginger, 'W'y, of course.
 We're troopers now—but I don't know
 'ow—
 In the Naval Mounted 'Orse.'

"They said we was the winners,
 Which made us cock a chest.
 They said we done it splendid;
 We said they done it best.
 But w'en the drinks was ordered,
 We 'auled 'em all inside,
 An' asked 'em werry nicely
 If they'd teach us 'ow to ride."

When it is added that "G. F. S. B." is a midshipman not yet out of his teens Mr. Kipling will perhaps realise, if he sees these lines, that a rival has arisen to sing. There is room for Lower-Deck Ballads, as well as for ballads of the Barrack-Room.

THE Lounger who writes agreeable notes for the New York Critic has a vigilant eye for the literary developments of this country. He has just discovered an advertisement in an English paper asking for someone to write "a history of California, from information to be gathered from the Reading-room of the British Museum." The length of the publication, the advertiser continues, is to be 40,000 words, and the remuneration £10, or sixpence per 1,000 words! The wretched thing about such an offer is that there probably are a score of hacks so poor as to jump at it!

THE literary paraphrast of a society paper with some claims to culture has recently committed a rather pleasing howler. He made the following announcement: "Messrs. Hacon & Ricketts have just issued a dramatic poem by that ripe scholar and painted, that hangs down to her shoes; and one of her hands, raised to rest as she turns, against the old faded, figured tapestry of her seat, holds the hand of one of her two children, boy and girl, who, with their dark heads together, show, over the back of the sofa, shy olive faces, Jewish to a quaint orientalism, faces quite to peep out of the lattice or the curtains of closed seraglio or palanquin. Of these elements Mr. Sargent has made a picture of a knock-down insolence of talent and truth of characterisation, a wonderful rendering of life, of manners, of aspects, of types, of textures, of everything. It is the old story; he expresses himself as no one else scarce begins to do in the language of the art he practises. The complete acquisition of this language seems to so few, as it happens, a needful precaution! Beside him, at any rate, his competitors appear to stammer; and his accent is not to be caught, his process, thank heaven, not to be analysed."

THE word Philistine, as a term of abuse, is becoming a little tiresome. So few persons have wit enough to use it with meaning. Matthew Arnold made it do admirable work. Since then it has passed into the indiscriminating hands of discontented young men, and we find it now upon the cover of a new sixpenny magazine. The Anti-Philistine proceeds from the office of Messrs. John and Horace Cowley; it calls itself a periodical of protest; its mottoes are: "Would to God my name were not so terrible to the enemy as it is" (from "Henry IV.") and "Castigare ridendo"; and among the editor's intentions are to insert no contributions that are not written pleasantly, in a gentle spirit; to hate log-rolling and scandal; and to make extraordinary efforts to make as many discoveries of new talent as Mr. W. E. Henley has done. A good programme.

THE magazine does not begin too

It deals mainly with the naval history of England.

On the evenings of Thursday, June 24, and the two following days, the Independent Theatre Company will invite their friends to a performance of Ibsen's play of "Ghosts," at Queen's Gate Hall, South Kensington, which will be given under the stage-direction of Mr. Charles Charrington.

MR. STUART J. REID, at the request of the Duke of Marlborough, has been trying for some time past to identify the flags captured by John Duke of Marlborough at the Battles of Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet in the years 1704-9. Mr. Reid's report on these military trophies is based on researches in England and France, and it has been just submitted to the Commander-in-Chief, who is himself busy with the closing volumes of his Life of the great Duke of Marlborough. Lord Wolseley states that Mr. Reid has studied the question thoroughly and compiled a most interesting and valuable report that practically exhausts the subject. His Grace intends to have some of the most typical of the flags, which Mr. Reid has identified, reproduced in silk embroidery, and hung in the Hall at Blenheim Palace.

MESSRS. HENRY SOTHERAN & Co. will publish this month a new work by Mr. J. G. Millais, the author of Game Birds and Shooting Sketches and A Breath from the Veldt, entitled British Deer and their Horns, which will treat the subject in a more thorough way than has ever been attempted yet, and will be fully illustrated with numerous plates from drawings by the author.

THE Diamond Jubilee has brought to light a new humorist, and it is difficult to decide whether he deserves more praise for his courage or his fancy. The name of this gentleman is T. Mullett Ellis, and his quality is to be studied in a little book whose title, The Fairies' Favourite; or, the Story of Queen Victoria told for Children, gives an idea of its scope. Authors who are loyal to order must be in such straits for novelty of form that any new device, however fantastic, must commend itself to them. Mr. T. Mullett Ellis's peculiar method is to give to the fairies credit for those protective measures for which Her Majesty will thank God on Tuesday next. After that it is impossible to withhold from him the style of humorist.

YET in those families where it is thought desirable that Her Majesty should be venerated and loved, Mr. Mullett Ellis's extraordinary work had, perhaps, best be avoided. He may be on the side of laughter, but dignity and he are at enmity. It is thus that he makes the Duke of Kent speak over the cradle of the royal child: "What a lucky thing she was born in England," he said pensively. "If I hadn't driven her mother here myself all the way from Bavaria, perhaps the fairies wouldn't have taken to her. They don't like articles made in Germany." The rest of the book is of a piece with this.

THE ONLOOKER.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXXII.—WILLIAM BLAKE.

THERE have been men who loved the future like a mistress, and the future mixed her breath into their breath and shook her hair about them, and hid them from the understanding of their times. William Blake was one of these men, and if he spoke confusedly and obscurely it was because he spoke things for whose speaking he could find no models in the world about him. He announced the religion of art, of which no man dreamed in the world about him; and he understood it more perfectly than the thousands of subtle spirits who have received its baptism in the world about us, because, in the beginning of important things—in the beginning of love, in the beginning of the day, in the beginning of any work, there is a moment when we understand more perfectly than we understand again until all is finished. In his time educated people believed that they amused themselves with books of imagination, but that they "made their souls" by listening to sermons and by doing or by not doing certain things. When they had to explain why serious people like themselves honoured the great poets greatly they were hard put to it for lack of good reasons. In our time we are agreed that we "make our souls" out of some one of the great poets of ancient times, or out of Shelley or Wordsworth, or Goethe or Balzac, or Flaubert, or Count Tolstoy, in the books he wrote before he became a prophet and fell into a lesser order, or out of Mr. Whistler's pictures, while we amuse ourselves, or, at best, make a poorer sort of soul, by listening to sermons or by doing or by not doing certain things. We write of great writers, even of writers whose beauty would once have seemed an unholy beauty, with wrapped sentences like those our fathers kept for the beatitudes and mysteries of the Church; and no matter what we believe with our lips, we believe with our hearts that beautiful things, as Browning said in his one prose essay that was not in verse, have "lain burning on the Divine hand," and that when time has begun to wither, the Divine hand will fall heavily on bad taste and vulgarity. When no man believed these things William Blake believed them, and began that preaching against the Philistine, which is as the preaching of the Middle Ages against the Saracen. He wrote:

"I know of no other Christianity, and of no other gospel, than the liberty both of body and mind to exercise the divine arts of imagination—the real and eternal world, of which this vegetable universe is but a faint shadow, and in which we shall live in our eternal or imaginative bodies when these vegetable mortal bodies are no more. The Apostles knew of no other gospel. What are all their spiritual gifts? What is the Divine Spirit? Is the Holy Ghost other than an intellectual fountain? . . . What is the life of man but art and science? . . . Answer this for yourselves, and expel from among you those who pretend to despise the labours of art and science, which alone are the labours of the gospel."

And he wrote:

"I care not whether a man is good or bad,

all that I care is, whether a man is a wise man or a fool. Go, put off holiness and put on intellect."

He had learned from Jacob Boehme, as from old alchemist writers that imagination was the first emanation of divinity, "the body of God," "the Divine members," and drew the deduction, which they did not draw, that the imaginative arts were therefore the greatest of Divine revelations, and that the sympathy with all living things, sinful and righteous alike, which the imaginative are awoken, is that forgiveness of sins commanded by Christ. The reason, and by the reason he meant deductions from the observations of the senses, binds us to mortality because it binds us to the senses, and divides us from each other by showing us our clashing interests; but imagination divides us from mortality by the immortality of beauty, and binds us to each other by opening the secret doors of all hearts. He cried again and again that every thing that lives is holy, and that nothing is unholy except things that do not live—lethargies, and cruelties, and timidities, and that denial of imagination which is the root they grew from in old times. Passions, because most living, are most holy—and this was a scandalous paradox in his time—and man shall enter eternity borne upon their wings.

"Men are admitted into heaven not because they have curbed or governed their passions or have no passions, but because they have cultivated their understandings. The treasures of heaven are not negations of passion but realities of intellect from which the passions emanate uncurbed in their eternal glory."

And he understood this so literally that certain drawings to "Vala," had he carried them beyond the first faint pencillings, the first faint washes of colour, would have been a pretty scandal to his time and to our time. The sensations of this "foolish body," this "phantom of the earth and water," were in themselves but half living things, "vegetative" things, but that "eternal glory" made them a part of the body of God.

This philosophy kept him more simply a poet than any poet of his time, for it made him content to express every beautiful feeling that came into his head without troubling about its utility or chaining it to any utility. Sometimes one feels, even when one is reading poets of a better time—Tennyson or Wordsworth, let us say—that they have troubled the energy and simplicity of their imaginative passions by asking whether they were for the helping or for the hindrance of the world, instead of believing that all beautiful things have "lain burning on the Divine hand." But when one reads Blake, it is as though the spray of an inexhaustible fountain of beauty was blown into our faces, and not merely when one reads "The Songs of Innocence," or the lyrics he wished to call "The Ideas of Good and Evil"; but when one reads those "Prophetic Works" in which he spoke confusedly and obscurely because he spoke of things for whose speaking he could find no models in the world about him. He was a symbolist who had to invent his symbols; and his counties of England, with

of the baptism in the world in the beginning of in-the beginning of in-the day, in the beg-work, there is a moment when more perfectly than we until all is finished. In people believed that they with books of imaginathey "made their souls" by and by doing or by not things. When they had to people like themselves greatly they were of good reasons. In that we "make our one of the great poets of out of Shelley or Words-or Balzac, or Flaubert, in the books he wrote a prophet and fell into or out of Mr. Whistler's we amuse ourselves, or a poorer sort of soul, by or by doing or by not things. "We write of
 of writers whose beauty
 an unholy beauty,
 sentences like those our
 the beauties and mysteries and no matter what we our life, we believe with our things, as Browning said
 that was not in verse.
 on the Divine hand," has begun to wither, the fall heavily on bad taste
 When no man believed these and loved them, and

Men are certain they have created a ge-or have no power to cultivated their minds of heaven or as up-realities of matter in estimate mortal a lot
 And he understood certain drawings of them beyond the first faint values of
 a pretty scandalous time. The reason body," this "plum water," were in these things, "regency":
 "eternal glory" and
 body of God.
 This philosophy is a poet than any poet
 him content to express that came into his about its utility or utility. Sometimes

It deals mainly with the naval history of England.

ON the evenings of Thursday, June 24, and the two following days, the Independent Theatre Company will invite their friends to a performance of Ibsen's play of "Ghosts," at Queen's Gate Hall, South Kensington, which will be given under the stage-direction of Mr. Charles Charrington.

MR. STUART J. REID, at the request of the Duke of Marlborough, has been trying for some time past to identify the flags captured by John Duke of Marlborough at the Battles of Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet in the years 1704-9. Mr. Reid's report on these military trophies is based on researches in England and France, and it has been just submitted to the Commander-in-Chief, who is himself busy with the closing volumes of his Life of the great Duke of Marlborough. Lord Wolseley states that Mr. Reid has studied the question thoroughly and compiled a most interesting and valuable report that practically exhausts the subject. His Grace intends to have some of the most typical of the flags, which Mr. Reid has identified, reproduced in silk embroidery, and hung in the Hall at Blenheim Palace.

MESSRS. HENRY SOTHERAN & Co. will publish this month a new work by Mr. J. G. Millais, the author of Game Birds and Shooting Sketches and A Breath from the Veldt, entitled British Deer and their Horns, which will treat the subject in a more thorough way than has ever been attempted yet, and will be fully illustrated with numerous plates from drawings by the author.

THE Diamond Jubilee has brought to light a new humorist, and it is difficult to decide whether he deserves more praise for his courage or his fancy. The name of this gentleman is T. Mullett Ellis, and his quality is to be studied in a little book whose title, The Fairies' Favourite; or, the Story of Queen Victoria told for Children, gives an idea of its scope. Authors who are loyal to order must be in such straits for novelty of form that any new device, however fantastic, must commend itself to them. Mr. T. Mullett Ellis's peculiar method is to give to the fairies credit for those protective measures for which Her Majesty will thank God on Tuesday next. After that it is impossible to withhold from him the style of humorist.

YET in those families where it is thought desirable that Her Majesty should be venerated and loved, Mr. Mullett Ellis's extraordinary work had, perhaps, best be avoided. He may be on the side of laughter, but dignity and he are at enmity. It is thus that he makes the Duke of Kent speak over the cradle of the royal child: "'What a lucky thing she was born in England,' he said pensively. 'If I hadn't driven her mother here myself all the way from Bavaria, perhaps the fairies wouldn't have taken to her. They don't like articles made in Germany.'" The rest of the book is of a piece with this.

THE ONLOOKER.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXXII.—WILLIAM BLAKE.

THERE have been men who loved the future like a mistress, and the future mixed her breath into their breath and shook her hair about them, and hid them from the understanding of their times. William Blake was one of these men, and if he spoke confusedly and obscurely it was because he spoke things for whose speaking he could find no models in the world about him. He announced the religion of art, of which no man dreamed in the world about him; and he understood it more perfectly than the thousands of subtle spirits who have received its baptism in the world about us, because, in the beginning of important things—in the beginning of love, in the beginning of the day, in the beginning of any work, there is a moment when we understand more perfectly than we understand again until all is finished. In his time educated people believed that they amused themselves with books of imagination, but that they "made their souls" by listening to sermons and by doing or by not doing certain things. When they had to explain why serious people like themselves honoured the great poets greatly they were hard put to it for lack of good reasons. In our time we are agreed that we "make our souls" out of some one of the great poets of ancient times, or out of Shelley or Wordsworth, or Goethe or Balzac, or Flaubert, or Count Tolstoy, in the books he wrote before he became a prophet and fell into a lesser order, or out of Mr. Whistler's pictures, while we amuse ourselves, or, at best, make a poorer sort of soul, by listening to sermons or by doing or by not doing certain things. We write of great writers, even of writers whose beauty would once have seemed an unholy beauty, with wrapped sentences like those our fathers kept for the beatitudes and mysteries of the Church; and no matter what we believe with our lips, we believe with our hearts that beautiful things, as Browning said in his one prose essay that was not in verse, have "lain burningly on the Divine hand," and that when time has begun to wither, the Divine hand will fall heavily on bad taste and vulgarity. When no man believed these things William Blake believed them, and began that preaching against the Philistine, which is as the preaching of the Middle Ages against the Saracen. He wrote:

"I know of no other Christianity, and of no other gospel, than the liberty both of body and mind to exercise the divine arts of imagination—imagination, the real and eternal world, of which this vegetable universe is but a faint shadow, and in which we shall live in our eternal or imaginative bodies when these vegetable mortal bodies are no more. The Apostles knew of no other gospel. What are all their spiritual gifts? What is the Divine Spirit? Is the Holy Ghost other than an intellectual fountain? . . . What is the life of man but art and science? . . . Answer this for yourselves, and expel from among you those who pretend to despise the labours of art and science, which alone are the labours of the gospel."

And he wrote:

"I care not whether a man is good or bad,

all that I care is, whether a man is a wise man or a fool. Go, put off holiness and put on intellect."

He had learned from Jacob Boehme and from old alchemist writers that imagination was the first emanation of divinity, "the body of God," "the Divine members," and he drew the deduction, which they did not draw, that the imaginative arts were therefore the greatest of Divine revelations, and that the sympathy with all living things, sinful and righteous alike, which the imaginative arts awaken, is that forgiveness of sins commanded by Christ. The reason, and by the reason he meant deductions from the observations of the senses, binds us to mortality because it binds us to the senses, and divides us from each other by showing us our clashing interests; but imagination divides us from mortality by the immortality of beauty, and binds us to each other by opening the secret doors of all hearts. He cried again and again that every thing that lives is holy, and that nothing is unholy except things that do not live—lethargies, and cruelties, and timidities, and that denial of imagination which is the root they grew from in old times. Passions, because most living, are most holy—and this was a scandalous paradox in his time—and man shall enter eternity borne upon their wings.

"Men are admitted into heaven not because they have curbed or governed their passions, or have no passions, but because they have cultivated their understandings. The treasures of heaven are not negations of passion but realities of intellect from which the passions emanate uncurbed in their eternal glory."

And he understood this so literally that certain drawings to "Vala," had he carried them beyond the first faint pencillings, the first faint washes of colour, would have been a pretty scandal to his time and to our time. The sensations of this "foolish body," this "phantom of the earth and water," were in themselves but half living things, "vegetative" things, but that "eternal glory" made them a part of the body of God.

This philosophy kept him more simply a poet than any poet of his time, for it made him content to express every beautiful feeling that came into his head without troubling about its utility or chaining it to any utility. Sometimes one feels, even when one is reading poets of a better time—Tennyson or Wordsworth, let us say—that they have troubled the energy and simplicity of their imaginative passions by asking whether they were for the helping or for the hindrance of the world, instead of believing that all beautiful things have "lain burningly on the Divine hand." But when one reads Blake, it is as though the spray of an inexhaustible fountain of beauty was blown into our faces, and not merely when one reads "The Songs of Innocence," or the lyrics he wished to call "The Ideas of Good and Evil"; but when one reads those "Prophetic Works" in which he spoke confusedly and obscurely because he spoke of things for whose speaking he could find no models in the world about him. He was a symbolist who had to invent his symbols; and his counties of England, with their correspondence to tribes of Israel, and his mountains and rivers, with their correspondence to parts of a man's body, are arbitrary as some of the symbolism in the "Axël" of the symbolist Villiers d'Isle Adam is arbitrary, while they have an incongruity that "Axël" has not. He was a man crying out for a mythology, and trying to make one because he could not find one to his hand. Had he been a Catholic of Dante's time he would have been well content with Mary and the angels; or had he been a scholar of our time he would have taken his symbols where Wagner took his, from Norse mythology; or have followed, with the help of Prof. Rhys, that pathway into Welsh mythology which he found in "Jerusalem"; or have gone to Ireland—and he was probably an Irishman—and chosen for his symbols the sacred mountains, along whose sides the peasant still sees enchanted fires, and the divinities which have not faded from the belief, if they have faded from the prayers of simple hearts; and have spoken without incongruity because he spoke of things that had been steeped in emotion from the old times; and have been less obscure because a traditional mythology stood on the threshold of his meaning and on the margin of his sacred darkness. If "Enitharmon" had been named Fylgga, or Gwydeon, or Danu, and made live in Ancient Norway, or Ancient Wales, or Ancient Ireland, we would have forgotten that her maker was a mystic; and the hymn of her harping, that is in "Vala," would but have reminded us of many ancient hymns.

WILLIAM BLAKE

From the Picture by T. Phillips, R.A., in the National Portrait Gallery

"The joy of woman is the death of her beloved,
Who dies for love of her,
In torments of fierce jealousy and pangs of adoration.

The lover's night bears on my song,
And the nine spheres rejoice beneath my powerful control.

"They sing unwearied to the notes of my immortal hand.
The solemn, silent moon
Reverberates the long harmony sounding upon my limbs.
The birds and beasts rejoice and play.
And every one seeks for his mate to prove his inmost joy.

"Furious and terrible they rend the nether deep,
The deep lifts up his rugged head,
And lost in infinite hovering wings vanishes with a cry.
The fading cry is ever dying,
The living voice is ever living in its inmost joy."

W. B. YEATS.

THE ACADEMIE DES GONCOURT.

In the declining years of his life, Edmond de Goncourt was undoubtedly one of the most pathetic figures in modern French literature. The death of his brother Jules cast a spell of sadness over him, which was never removed up to the very day of his death, and with old age had come not only an increased difficulty of doing work, but the polite indifference of critics to his literary output, and the desertion of those whom he regarded as his staunchest friends. Still, though others were worshippers at strange altars, Edmund de Goncourt never for a moment lost sight of his early ideals, and these served as his solace to the end.

The idea which most occupied his mind during his last years of life was the formation of an academy, to be called the Académie des Goncourt, for the support and encouragement of independent art among young writers of talent. The two brothers had talked over its details a thousand times. It was to consist of ten members only; politicians, noble seigniors, poets and officials were to be debarred from membership. Many were the names which Edmond de Goncourt, at one time or another, added to his list of prospective members and then removed. MM. Zola, Cladel, Pierre Loti and Henri Céard figured upon it. Sometimes one of these would seek admission to the rival Académie Française, whereupon Edmond de Goncourt's sadness would grow deeper; and at one time he even began to suspect that his dearest friend, M. Alphonse Daudet, also intended to abandon him.

Upon De Goncourt's death, now nearly a year ago, his will was found to contain full particulars in regard to the suggested academy. The names of eight out of ten members were given—Alphonse Daudet, Léon Hennique, Joris Karl Huysmans, Octave Mirbeau, Rosny aîné, Rosny jeune, Paul Margueritte, and G. Geffroy. The proceeds of the sale of his collections, and the house at Auteuil would be found amply sufficient, the testator estimated, to provide an annual income of 6,000 francs for each of the ten academicians, and an annual prize of 5,000 francs to the author of the best novel, the best historical work, or even for the best collection of short stories.

A little time after the death of the author of Germinie Lacerteux, I remember having a conversation with one of the eight selected members, in which a doubt was expressed as to whether the Académie des Goncourt would ever be founded:

"Somebody will probably be found to purchase Edmond's collections," said my friend, "but it will be many, many years before the person willing to pay the price comes forward. I do not think we shall ever receive a penny of the income of 6,000 francs."

The master, however, was right, after all, in his estimates. The collections of books, japonaiseries, pictures, drawings, engravings, and art furniture, to which their owner was ever adding some new treasure to increase the dot of the proposed institution, have realised at the Hôtel Drouot about 1,368,000 francs. When to this sum is added 500,000 francs, which is the total of the private income of Edmond de Goncourt, and the estimated value of the house at Auteuil, still to be sold, it will be seen that, all expenses having been paid, the amount will practically be sufficient for the formation of the Académie des Goncourt.

In a recent conversation M. Alphonse Daudet, who with M. Léon Hennique is an executor under the will, the author of Sappho spoke at some length on this subject. It must be remembered that M. Daudet in no way agrees with academies, and he would not have undertaken the formation of the Académie des Goncourt had it not been the wish of his friend that he should carry out all the necessary arrangements. He considers that Edmond de Goncourt named his idea badly.

"He should not have called it the 'Académie des Goncourt,'" said M. Daudet, "but, what would have been much better, the 'Dîner des Goncourt,' for that it will really only be, the members meeting once a month to dine together at the rate of twenty francs a head. Many times did I try to persuade him to give up the idea of making the Académie des Goncourt a rival of the Académie Française; but he only answered, 'I wish this academy to be what my brother and I dreamed it would be, and such it shall be.' At one time he did seriously think of changing the name, but a scruple held him back. Had his brother been living, it might have been otherwise. Edmond used to say that the Académie Française did not know how to find out men of talent, and that his prize of five thousand francs would render famous services."

M. Daudet went on to explain that, according to the ideas of Edmond de Goncourt, if the sum realised by the collections and the house at Auteuil, added to his personal fortune and the proceeds from his books and plays, was not found sufficient for the carrying out of all his ideas the academy was nevertheless to be founded.

"We shall, first of all," said M. Daudet, "have to appoint two members to make up the number to ten. Then we shall probably start by offering a prize of 5,000 francs for the best work of fiction, afterwards extending it to works in other branches of literature. Do not let us forget, however, that we are threatened with a law suit. Certain of the cousins of the late Edmond de Goncourt, who was ignorant of their very existence, have announced their intention through an agent d'affaires of starting an action for the annulling of the will. Of course, the whole thing is preposterous, because everybody, years before Edmond's death, knew his wishes in regard to the academy, and it cannot, therefore, be said that we in any way influenced him. The plea, however, will probably be not that undue influence was brought to bear upon the testator, but that the will contains some vice de forme—some error in its construction."

M. Léon Hennique and M. Huysmans re-echo M. Daudet's words.

In conclusion may be given the opinion on this question of one who, although not a member of the new academy, was nevertheless a constant visitor to the "Grenier" at Auteuil. M. Paul Alexis writes to me:

"It is possible that the will of Edmond de Goncourt may be found to contain certain imperfections of form, but should it be annulled—a very improbable thing to happen—is it not probable that the preceding will, and even several others, will be found to contain the expression of the same desire—the foundation of the Académie des Goncourt—a desire which was not only that of Edmond, but also that of Jules, who died a quarter of a century before? And everything, in their Journal, in their entire work, in their habits of life, loudly and very nobly proclaims the constant and unique wish of the two brothers, the intention of realising the great literary ideal of their whole existence."

F. L.

THE BOOK MARKET.

MR. C. ARTHUR PEARSON AS A PUBLISHER.

"I HAVE dropped in, Mr. Pearson, to learn your theory of publishing."

"My theory of publishing!" Mr. Pearson turned toward me in his swivel armchair so quickly that I thought it was Henrietta-street, not he, that was revolving.

"Yes. I'm sudden, I know; but then, Mr. Pearson, your intention to publish books is fairly sudden, and, if I may say so, very interesting. Hitherto, I think, you have published only periodicals; but now you are going to publish real books in covers, and you have even issued a list of them for publication in the autumn."

"And you want me to give up my secrets!"

"Please; and, first, will you tell me this? It was in print a little while ago that you intended to issue first-class novels of the usual six-shilling length at the price of two shillings the volume. I now find that three-and-sixpence is your price. Have you changed, or has rumour lied?"

"I have not changed, and rumour has not lied. I want to publish novels by first-class writers, six-shilling length, at the price of two shillings; and I believe the day is coming when I shall do it. At present I am content to issue a six-shilling novel at three-and-sixpence."

"Then, do you think that the public is beginning to jib at six shillings?"

"I do. I assert it. It is a matter of observation. Just as the thirty-one-and-sixpenny novel, in three volumes, has gone and left not a wrack behind, so the six-shilling novel, which has succeeded it, will have to yield in its turn to a cheaper book. The fact is, the appetite for good reading is spreading like fire. The average reader not only wants to read good books, but more of them. He wants to read book after book. Now, how can he go on paying six shillings? Of course, he really pays only four-and-sixpence, but as my three-and-sixpenny books will be really two-and-eightpence, we will ignore discount for the purposes of argument. Well, I say (mind, I say it because I know the public is thinking it), that six shillings is, after all, a lot of money to pay for a story. Only consider. My monthly magazine contains more matter than many a six-shilling novel; then is it not absurd that a novel should cost twelve times as much?"

"It does seem so, looking at paper and print only. But how about authors and circulation?"

"Ah, those, of course, are the difficulties—authors and circulation. The reason I cannot bring out first-class fiction at two shillings yet is that authors' terms are too high and strict. I don't complain of this, as I shall explain to you. But what are the conditions? I take a clever, likely story from a first-rate man. He wants a big royalty—a royalty possible only to be paid on a six-shilling book—but that is not all. He wants a large sum in 'royalties on account'; in other words, a heavy cash payment on delivery of MS. I must recover that cash payment, and pay the remaining royalties; and thus my operations are confined to the old groove from the first."

"I understand that. Then at bottom the revolution in prices which you foresee means a revolution in the terms now usual between author and publisher."

"Yes. I believe the time must come when authors will be paid by actual results, that is to say, on the actual completed sales of their books, not on their 'name,' or on a guess at the sales. This may seem a little Quixotic at first sight, but I believe that authors will have the most reason to welcome such a system. When books are cheap enough to command a score of readers for every one reader which they can command now, the author will be only too glad to find in the public a more direct paymaster. The hunger for books is a fact; the expensiveness of books is a superstition. Books can be made cheap to the public, sound business to the publisher, and a fine thing for the author."

"You certainly have a policy, Mr. Pearson. Have you made any practical beginning of it?"

"Oh, yes. I have induced several authors of acknowledged standing to allow me to bring out their books at three-and-sixpence."

"And do they accept from you the terms appropriate to that price?"

"They do; and they won't regret it."

"Mr. Pearson, I don't know whether it is a fair question, but shall you prefer to treat directly with authors or through the literary agents?"

Mr. Pearson smiled. "I only wish," he said, "I could meet the author face to face, but it becomes less and less possible. And yet," Mr. Pearson continued thoughtfully, "I have a high opinion of the good literary agent. He certainly raises prices, but he is square. He doesn't change the price of an MS. in crossing the street from one publisher to another. Now, authors——"

"Authors?"

"Well, authors have moods, you know."

"Another point interests me, Mr. Pearson. Do you consider that your numerous magazines and papers will be an aid to your book publishing?"

"Oh, decidedly. They link me to a large public. They give me a medium for advertising; and they are a conduit through which the serial story can run into cloth covers."

"Well, now, Mr. Pearson, may we come to your books?—what are you going to give us to read?"

Here is our little preliminary list. It is headed, you see, by a new story called "The Invisible Man," by Mr. H. G. Wells. This began to run last week in our "Weekly." It is funny. A man finds the secret of making himself invisible, but it doesn't work as regards his clothes. They are seen as usual wherever he goes—you catch the possibilities. Then I have secured the first long story which Mr. W. W. Jacobs, the author of Many Cargoes, has written. It is now taking its trial trip in the Windsor Magazine. I predict a great success for it. Mr. G. B. Burgin has written for me a story of dramatic life laid in Enfield and in London. It has a good plot and plenty of humorous relief. By the way, Mr. Burgin is my reader and right-hand man in the book-publishing department, and very satisfied I am to have secured the services of such a good workman and critic of fiction.

"Of course you have a 'series' or two in preparation?"

"Yes, several. I am going to run an 'Explorers' Series,' edited, I hope, by Mr. Stanley; it will be a new thing. Also a series of national histories, new in treatment, which will probably be edited by Prof. York Powell. These will take their complexion rather from Green's History of the English People. Then—and this is rather a big thing—I have in hand a sort of everybody's reference library, consisting of, say, fifty or sixty books at two shillings. They will be concerned with all kinds of social, scientific, and art subjects, and they will enable the man who puts them on his shelves to prime himself in almost any branch of modern knowledge."

"Well now, Mr. Pearson, is there anything you would like to say apart from my questions?"

"Just this. Don't judge me only by this list. It has, perhaps, not occurred to you how difficult, nay, how impossible it is for a new publisher to make much of a show at first, whatever his resources and capital. In other businesses you can, if you have the means, leap into the public eye like Minerva, armed and glorious. That isn't possible to a publisher. Authors can no longer be got by whistling from a third-story window. They are at home, writing for dear life. They are like wards in Chancery, and are as jealously guarded. They talk glibly about the book they will have ready in the year two thousand and one, and they tell you, after much persuasion, that they can just squeeze you out a story in two thousand and two."

"And so you are taking your place in the queue?"

"Yes."

W. W.

THE SALE OF THE ASHBURNHAM LIBRARY.

THIS sale, so long looked forward to by collectors and booksellers, will begin at Messrs. Sotheby's on Friday the 25th. One cannot but admire the astuteness shown in holding a sale that will be historic at a time when London will contain more wealthy and cultured people than it has done for many years. Messrs. Sotheby have already issued their Catalogue of the first portion of the sale, which will occupy, altogether, eight days. The excellent reproductions which the Catalogue contains of rich bindings in the Library are such as to whet the appetites of bookbuyers. In an interesting preface to the Catalogue Messrs. Sotheby relate in detail the story of the formation of the collection by the late Bertram, fourth Earl of Ashburnham. From this it appears that this nobleman was by no means an omnivorous collector of books. He bought the books he liked, but bought their rarest and finest editions.

MUSIC.

THE Handel Festival comes once every three years to remind us of the greatness of the composer. Apart from that Festival, one might almost forget that he ever existed. Since Handel flourished great changes have been effected in the art of music. In his days form, and of a very severe kind, reigned supreme; a composer had to express his thoughts and feelings in the stereotyped aria or stiff fugal chorus. Under these rigorous conditions, it is not surprising that so little of the music of the early part of the eighteenth century has survived. Handel, however, was a genius, and, in spite of all restrictions, prevailed. It was perhaps unfortunate that circumstances compelled him to write much, and frequently at a very rapid rate, for he could not thus always give of his best. Then, too, he always had to keep public taste and intelligence well in mind, and this naturally led him to curb rather than give free rein to his imagination. The "Messiah" is a great work; but if Handel, like Bach, had thought solely of his art, he would doubtless have left us a still more wonderful creation. It is absurd to sit down with piously folded hands and accept the oratorio from first note to last as if it had been sent, a perfect gift, direct from heaven. There is contrapuntal clay mixed with the gold, and one ought to distinguish the one from the other, if Handel is to be intelligently admired. The "Messiah" was written in twenty-four days. The rapidity of the composer's pen was of course astonishing; but the slow rate at which another master, Beethoven, produced his works was, on the whole, more satisfactory. The programme-book speaks of the "firm and lasting hold of the minds of generation after generation" which the "Messiah" has taken. But this is not entirely by reason of its musical merit. The sacred subject appeals strongly not only to sincerely religious minds, but also to the general public, with many of whom religion is more or less of a habit or fashion. Then, again, the oratorio has been connected since the days of the composer with charitable institutions, and this offers another and a strong explanation of its "firm and lasting hold."

With regard to the performance on Monday at the Palace little need be said. With such an immense body of singers it is impossible always to secure perfect precision, especially where the music is at all complicated. In matters of detail, too, with regard to phrasing and expression, there were points which might be criticised. The rendering of the music must, however, be judged in a broader, more generous spirit. Taking all the practical difficulties into consideration, Mr. A. Manns may be honestly and heartily congratulated on the result. Some of the choruses, such as the "For unto us" and the "Hallelujah," were really given with great power. The soloists—Mme. Albani, Miss Marian McKenzie, and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley—were all in good voice and sang their best. In the choir the bass voices are splendid; the quality of the sopranos is excellent, although in the high notes the tone sounds thin. The altos and tenors are also good. The body of singers may most certainly be described as fine and impressive. The orchestra was not strong enough against the music; the balance between voices and instruments was, indeed, altogether un-Handelian.

"TRISTAN UND ISOLDE" was produced at Covent Garden on Monday evening, and thus the past and the present were brought into close juxtaposition. Had an opera of Handel's been given in place of the oratorio, the contrast would have been perfect. "Tristan," curiously enough, was written by Wagner with, for him, wonderful haste, but he was impelled thereto by the heat of inspiration, not by the force of circumstances; and that heat is maintained throughout. Handel's inspiration—in its way, perhaps, equally great—is intermittent; so he had to fill out his music by help of scientific devices or divisions more or less tedious. The performance of "Tristan" was in many ways remarkable. The Isolde was Mlle. Sedlmair from the Vienna Opera. She entered thoroughly into the spirit of the part, but what ought to have been specially strong in the first act was weakened by gesture, at times melodramatic, and by the evident strain caused by the exacting music. She was really at her best in the second act. Miss Marie Brema was a fine Brangäne, though at moments she seemed a little too prominent. M. Jean de Reszke, as Tristan, fulfilled the highest expectations. His singing in the duet in the second act was splendid, and here Mlle. Sedlmair materially helped towards the great success. In the third act he achieved still higher results, for his powers, both as an actor and singer, here put to the severest test, were displayed at their fullest. Mr. D. Bispham was effective as Kurwenal, though there were certain moments, one especially towards the close of the work, in which over-anxiousness spoilt good intentions. M. E. de Reszke proved a dignified King Marke. The orchestra, under the direction of M. A. Seidl, played admirably. "Tristan" came on the same day as the "Messiah," and so the one led straight on to the other. I ought really to have first noticed an interesting performance of "Die Walküre" at Covent Garden on the previous Saturday, and regret that I cannot give it the space which it deserves. Miss Marie Brema was a magnificent Brünnhilde, magnificent in voice, acting, and general appearance. Miss Susan Strong impersonated the unhappy Sieglinde. She sang well, but there was at times a want of freedom in her acting. M. Van Dyck took the part of Siegmund, in which he achieved great success. And so, too, did Mr. D. Bispham in the difficult part of Wotan. Mme. Schumann-Heink, by her fine declamation, imparted special interest to the scene between hesitating Wotan and his stern spouse. M. Seidl was, of course, satisfactory as conductor, yet the orchestra would have been the better for more rehearsal; there were some doubtful moments. No pianist since Rubinstein has enjoyed such popular success as Paderewski. The latter, like his predecessor, exerts a magnetic influence over his audience; it matters little how he plays, he is sure to be applauded. Rubinstein sometimes indulged in tricks unworthy of a great artist, and Paderewski is inclined to follow his example. The performance, for instance, which he gave of the Polonaise in A flat of Chopin, at his recital at Queen's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, was more remarkable for sensational effects than for poetry, but—to use a common expression—it brought down the house. Great pianists must not, however, be judged as ordinary players; they often rise to exceptional heights, and it is perhaps inevitable that they should occasionally fall as far in the opposite direction. The programme opened with the Brahms Variations on a Handel theme, and the fugue at the end was given with power; the reading of some of the variations, however, was anything but Brahms-like. The pianist played—and also I think at his last visit—Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2). His interpretation of the work shows many strong and a few weak points. The first movement demands more dignified passion. The slow movement was given with wonderful charm, and no living pianist could play the Finale with greater tenderness and poetry. After the Sonata came Schumann's "Carnaval." Paderewski's rendering of this music with its often exaggerated sentiment does not please me; and yet in its way it is a really striking performance. Then followed Chopin's lovely Nocturne in B, played in so admirable a manner that one regretted not to find the rest of the programme devoted to the Polish master. Besides three of his Etudes finely rendered, there were only transcriptions of two of his Chants Polonais, weak Chopin served up with tawdry Liszt trimmings. Queen's Hall was filled from floor to ceiling, and the audience were evidently well satisfied with the quality and the liberal quantity of the music.

MANY concerts which well deserve notice have to be passed by. I should, however, just like to name the one given by Mme. Melba at Queen's Hall on June 9. The prima donna was in splendid voice, and her singing of the Mad Scene from "Lucia" and of various songs proved artistic triumphs. The "Lucia" music, well rendered, is effective in a concert-room; on the stage most of it is out of keeping with the situation. On the following day, at St. James's Hall, Mlle. Chaminade, the talented French pianist-composer, gave a concert. The programme was devoted to her music, and though all of it is clever and refined, and some of it very attractive, it is possible to have too much at a time even of "Chaminade" music. On the Friday afternoon the young violinist, Maud McCarthy, played with Miss Fanny Davies, at the same hall, Brahms' Sonata in G for piano and violin with rare intelligence and feeling, also pieces by Wieniawski and Sarasate with astonishing skill and dash. In the evening M. Johann Kruse gave his second orchestral concert, with Dr. Stanford as conductor. His interpretation of Bach's A minor Concerto, showed marked intelligence. J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

AMONG the Diamond Jubilee retrospects there are few more deserving of notice than that which the venerable Dr. Huggins contributes, under the title "The New Astronomy," to the pages of the Nineteenth Century. The advances made during the last fifty years in this, the oldest science of which we have any knowledge, are almost too great to be realised; and it is satisfactory to feel that they are largely due to a typical studious Englishman working out of his own resources without regard to notoriety or remuneration. A few notes culled from Dr. Huggins's modest narrative will not be out of place.

We start with a period which extended well beyond the Queen's accession, when it was firmly believed that no direct knowledge could ever be acquired of the composition of the stellar bodies. The nebular theory of Laplace had, indeed, made it probable that, at all events, the sun and the nearer planets had been formed in the same way, and out of the same cosmic materials as the earth. But probability could not be made proof. Then came the momentous discovery by Kirchhoff, in 1859, that the dark lines of the solar spectrum, which had been mapped in the early part of the century by Fraunhofer, were due to the absence of certain rays which had been absorbed in the sun's atmosphere, and that these dark rays corresponded to many substances actually found upon the earth. To jot down a list of substances thus shown to exist in the sun was a matter of short time; the enormously greater task which Huggins set himself was to apply the same principle to the faint spectra given by the stars, and so to discover their chemical composition. Stellar spectroscopy is a very different thing now from what it was then, when no instruments existed for the purpose, but everything had to be invented and manufactured specially. Yet in spite of such drawbacks, the first nights of the new experiments yielded results of most surprising richness, and by 1862 the spectra of many of the principal fixed stars had been mapped. For purposes of comparison it was, of course, necessary to have perfect spectra of the leading elements, and these, too, the early investigators had to make. The experiments, however, proved that it could no longer be doubted that many of the commonest terrestrial elements, such as hydrogen, sodium, magnesium, and calcium were also present in the composition of the stars.

In 1864 Dr. Huggins began some observations in a region hitherto unexplored, observations which, he says, "remain to this day associated in my memory with the profound awe I felt on looking for the first time at that which no eye of man had seen." These were his researches on the nebulae, till then an unread riddle. As telescopes continued to improve, many supposed nebulae resolved themselves into innumerable stars, and the opinion gained ground that this might be the explanation of all nebulae, despite the theoretical grounds for belief that some should be stars in the earlier stages of evolution. The spectroscope proved this at once to be actually the case: a single bright line thrown through the prism showed that they were not aggregations of stars, but masses of luminous gas. The element helium, which, together with hydrogen, plays so large a part in these nebulous spectra, has only lately been identified with the gas included in certain rare terrestrial minerals.

This does not exhaust the account of Dr. Huggins's triumphs with the extremely delicate instruments which he had called to his aid. Astronomers had never had any means of detecting or measuring the motion of bodies in a direct line with the earth. Two stars whirling round each other in a small orbit, or receding from one another in this line, would appear either as one star or as two stationary ones. The minute displacement of lines in the spectrum, caused by the shortening or drawing out of the waves of light as a body moves towards or away from the earth, gave the required means of not only detecting but even of measuring this motion. The mere fact speaks for the delicacy of the observations, and the success which has attended this use of the spectroscope does so even more. It only remains to mention one other development—the application of photography to the record of astronomical observations, and in this, too, Dr. Huggins has played a by no means small part. Photographic records have become so much a matter of course that we have ceased to wonder at the beautiful mechanism which enables a camera to move slowly across the heavens so as to keep the exact positions of the stars on which it is focussed. Still less can we now appreciate the revolution which this permanent record has effected. Yet its beginning and its perfection are all written in the history of the last fifty years.

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Exmouth: June 7.

I cannot refrain from expressing the pleasure given me in reading the able and interesting article in your issue of June 5 on Gabriele d'Annunzio's Trionfo della Morte. Readers of modern Italian literature so seldom find any sympathetic notice of their favourite authors in English reviews that it was quite an unexpected treat to peruse your reviewer's criticisms. The writer of the article has apparently read no other work of Annunzio. I would recommend to his attention L'Innocente and Le Vergini delle Rocce, by the same author. The last-named work seems to me the work of a man bordering on insanity, but nevertheless, from the beauty of the style, has a fascination of its own. Your reviewer does not allude to the charges of plagiarism brought against Annunzio by his literary fellow-countrymen, charges which I fear have a solid foundation of fact. I am sure your readers would be gratified if some day you would favour us with a review of some one of the romances of another Italian writer—Giovanni Verga—a novelist who has few superiors at the present day in any country.

F. H. PICTON.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"The Secret
Rose."
By W. B. Yeats.
(Lawrence & Bullen.)

MR. GEORGE MOORE in the columns of the Chronicle professes to have learnt from the book three things: "The Stevenson is not the only man who ever lived who wrote English prose"; "that romance comes from within and not from without"; and "that it matters not at all whether our symbols be a 'bus conductor or a knight-errant, the important thing is that they stand for eternal truths." The writer concludes: "We may take for motto: Look after the words and the ideas will look after themselves; or our motto may be: Look after the ideas and the words will look after themselves. The latter is the truer, I think. I would ask if the melody of the quoted pages is not richer and deeper than anything in Stevenson? It seems to me to be beautiful as wine, as flowers; it seems to me to float like some dim evening, and to hang like a rainbow, calm and exalted. Out of the colours of the sunset and the moonrise, vague blue and vanishing silver, the whole book is made, and through this dream atmosphere the wizard, the Shee, the knights and gleemen softly pass, cadencing their tales of old truths." The Saturday Reviewer criticises at length the story named "Rosa Alchemica": "The tale does not tell us much of the strange science, the figure of the student is not very interesting, and . . . our attention is somewhat lightly held. . . . No doubt the lore is interesting in itself; but Mr. Yeats . . . is an artist using mysticism for its own sake, and then, frankly, it is . . . less interesting than most things. . . . Others, however, 'are fairy stories or echoes of sagas with a meaning. And we would only make this general suggestion about such tales written for our present edification, they are attempts to . . . remodel for our certain comprehension what would be better left as raw material. . . . The great charm of such things is to discover for ourselves a . . . moral or . . . a symbol in some ancient tale that was simply told with less conscious meaning. But there are fancies in the book which would move even the most cantankerous. The Speaker praises this 'riper book' for its wealth of detail, lavishness of colour, and tireless invention—with special reference to 'Rosa Alchemica.' There is 'wanton untruth' in 'The Crucifixion of the Outcast,' for 'the lives of the early Irish saints were Franciscan in their tenderness for all weak things'; but "in things of frank Paganism Mr. Yeats is excellent." "Of his poetry he gives us too little, and that, with one exception [his rendering of 'Kathaleen-ny-Hoolihan'], not of a high quality. . . . Of course, genius must be left to find its own method and its own ways . . . yet it were well that he should strive a little to make himself intelligible to plain people." The Pall Mall's "Irresponsible Reader" writes: "Mystic, visionary, often blurred as these word paintings may sometimes be, the dignity of the language and the picturesqueness of the style invests them with undeniable charm."

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS

A SHORT POPULAR HISTORY OF
CRETE.By J. H. FREESE, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.

With Introduction by P. W. CLAYDEN.

Maps of Crete and Seat of War. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.
Mr. GLADSTONE writes: "I hope this book may tend to enhance the public interest in the condition of Crete, which at present threatens to bring serious disgrace upon this country."
The Daily Chronicle says: "A useful piece of work... a singularly clear account of the origin of the present crisis in the island."

SIXTH EDITION OF

THE GREEN BOOK; or, Freedom

Under the Snow. By MAURUS JÓKAI. Sixth

Edition. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"Takes rank with the great novels of the century."—Spectator.

LADY JEAN'S SON. By Sarah Tytler.

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"The glimpses of Edinburgh society while the Northern Athens was still the seat of fashion are life-like and clever." Lady Jean's Son is from first to last a delightful story."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE WINDS OF MARCH. By George

KNIGHT, Author of "Dust in the Balance,"

"Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth,"

Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"A remarkable book... finely written. The character sketching is remarkably clever, and there is genius shown in the creation of the versatile and unconventional heroine."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE REJUVENATION of MISS

SEMAPHORE: a Farical Novel. By HAL GOD-

FREY. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

"The story is very funny and very well told, almost as good as was Vice Versa."—Glasgow Herald.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls. By

LEWIS MACNAMARA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Deserve to rank with Miss Jane Barlow's 'Irish Idylls'... One of the best contributions to Irish literature for some considerable time."—Irish Independent.

Now ready, the First 5,000 Copies of the Sixth Volume in

THE "DAFFODIL" LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS

BY AUTHORS OF THE DAY,

VOL. VI.

ENTITLED

THE TOMBSTONE TREASURE By

FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a

Hansom Cab." Crown 12mo, paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 3s.

"The interest of the story prevents the reader ever dreaming of laying aside the book till the end."—Glasgow Daily Mail.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.

Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

The BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:

An Anatomy of the Disease and a
Theory of Curative Treatment.

By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

1. WHAT IS RESPECTABILITY?
2. THE PATHOLOGY OF THE DISEASE.
3. "LADIES" and "GENTLEMEN."
4. SPECIFIC SYMPTOMS OF THE MALADY in WOMEN.
5. RESPECTABILITY and MORALS.
6. CULTURED GENTILITY.
7. PLUTOCRACY.
8. VILLADOM.
9. THE TYRANNY OF RESPECTABILITY.
10. RESPECTABLE CIVILISATION and AFTER.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE
AND FREE REVIEW:

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."

ONE SHILLING net.

Contents of the JUNE Number.

NIETZSCHE'S INDIOTMENT OF CHRISTIANITY. By

JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

AN ETHICAL EXCURSION. By HUGH MORTIMER CREIL.

THE TEACHINGS OF THOMAS HARDY. By DUANE

WILLIAMS.

THE TORY PROFESSOR. By ROBERT DUNCANSON.

MR. GLADSTONE'S LATEST POSTCARD. By ALAN

STEPHENS.

USURY and THRIFT. By J. GREENY FISHER.

A SPECIMEN of RELIGIOUS JOURNALISM. By

STANLEY BRUCE.

IN EXTREMIS. By ALLAN LAIDLAW.

THE LEGITIMATION LEAGUE. By A. GOLDWIN.

NANCY. By ERNEST NEWMAN.

CONVENTIONAL LITERATURE. By EASTWOOD KIDSON.

NEW BOOKS.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,

16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR
AND
BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS,
BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COL-
LECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE
AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—
ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—
NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CON-
TINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS
ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW
BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF
BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND
AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—
BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED,
AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO
PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE
CHANGES.

The characteristics of the literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of
current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages
to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING
POSTAGE*	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING
POSTAGE	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING
POSTAGE	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven
Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES
the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS,
the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS
NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line
Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print
Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the
FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead
of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by
over 80 pages,

whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only
the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research
wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.
"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.... The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LIMITED,
St. Dunstan House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

A PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT

Of unique interest is given with each
issue of "THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:—

	1896.
BEN JONSON	November	14
JOHN KEATS	"	21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING	"	28
TOM HOOD	December	5
THOMAS GRAY	"	12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON	"	19
SIR WALTER SCOTT	"	26
	1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON	January	2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY	"	9
LEIGH HUNT	"	16
LORD MACAULAY	"	23
ROBERT SOUTHEY	"	30
S. T. COLERIDGE	February	6
CHARLES LAMB	"	13
MICHAEL DRAYTON	"	20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR	"	27
SAMUEL PEPYS	March	6
EDMUND WALLER	"	18
WILKIE COLLINS	"	20
JOHN MILTON	"	27
WILLIAM COWPER	April	8
CHARLES DARWIN	"	10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON	"	17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONG- FELLOW	"	24
ANDREW MARVELL	May	1
ROBERT BROWNING	"	8
THOMAS CARLYLE	"	15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY	"	22
CHARLES DICKENS	"	29
JONATHAN SWIFT	June	5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY	"	12

To-day's Issue.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,

ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,

the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHURE now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

MESSRS. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process

For the reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application

Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

E P P S ' S

CRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B; H; B; H.H; B.B; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL, CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos:

*The objections to them, and how they have
been met.*

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

WITH PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT—SIR RICHARD STEELE.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1312.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.

New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.

Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—

No. 51 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
.. 52, 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (762, 732 lots.)
.. 53 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 115, for JUNE), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

SOTHERAN'S NEW CATALOGUE (PICCADILLY SERIES, No. 9) should be applied for by all who are interested in AUTOGRAPHS. Out of 542 items, no less than sixty-two are from the pen of Charles Dickens, and many of these are of special interest and value.—Post free.

H. SOTHERAN & Co., 37, Piccadilly, and 140, Strand, London.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.

CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum).

Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.

CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.

MSS. considered for Publication. (Established 1819.)

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C. desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-
TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and
Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.,
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast
folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

LONDON LIBRARY,
ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, the Very Rev.
the DEAN of LLANDAFF, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq., Sir
HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B.

TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF,

Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL
of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 170,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year: Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country, and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room Open from 10 to half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 22, Pall Mall East, S.W.

126th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIR FREDERICK H. HENKOW, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Fumival Street,
London, E.C.

PUBLISHING PARTNERSHIP.—A Publisher,
owner of a well-known established Book Publishing Business, having in preparation for this autumn what will be a very profitable and lasting publication, is prepared to take a JUNIOR PARTNER, with capital of £5,000, in view of a general extension of his business.
The fullest particulars can be forthcoming to any bona fide likely Gentleman possessed of some knowledge of the Publishing Business.
Communications by letter, addressed to PUBLISHER, care of Messrs.
Shoen, Rogers, Munsey & Co., 8, Bedford Row, London, W.C., will receive attention should the advertiser consider the applicant suitable for the position referred to.

TO LOVERS OF QUIET.—Lady and Gentleman (young), occupying roomy old house in Country, wish to take TWO or THREE PAYING GUESTS. Charming surroundings.
Farm produce. Moderate terms.—X., "ACADEMY" Office, 43, Chancery
Lane, London, W.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

EDUCATIONAL.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.

1897.—EXAMINATION, July 4th, 7th. One of £50, two of
£30, and Minor Scholarships of £15 to £30. Candidates to be under 15 years of age.

For particulars apply to the SECRETARY.

EPSOM COLLEGE.—ANNUAL EXAMINATION

for SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS early in JULY.
New junior department just opened for 100 boys. Preparation for London Matric. and Prel. Scient. Exams., the Army, Navy, and Universities. Numerous recent successes. NEXT TERM begins
SEPTEMBER 16th.—Apply to the BURSAR, 5, The College, Epsom, Surrey.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An EXAMINA-
TION will be held in July next to fill up not less than FIVE
RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS,
and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the HEAD
MASTER, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

MEMORY.—Prof. A. LOISETTE'S ASSIMI-
LATIVE MEMORY SYSTEM.

The last, most complete, and perfect edition. Arranged for Self-Instruction. Mind-Wandering cured. Speaking without notes. Indispensable in preparing for examinations. Any book learned in one reading.

Cloth bound, with portrait and autograph. Price net 2 dols. 50 cents
American, 10s. 6d. English. Post free.

Prospectus, with opinions of EDUCATORS, SCIENTIFIC, PROFESSIONAL,
and BUSINESS MEN all over the world, 7/6s.
Address, A. LOISETTE, 327, Fifth Avenue, New York; or
200, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

SOLD ONLY BY THE PUBLISHER.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.

(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

JOHN & ED. BUMPUS, Ltd.,

BOOKSELLERS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

350, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

AND

5 & 6, HOLBORN BARS, E.C.

NEW BOOKS, with a few exceptions, at 3d. in 1s. discount.

HANDSOMELY BOUND BOOKS for Presentation and the Library.

BOOKS BOUND to ORDER. Original Designs
Best Workmanship.

Largest and finest Selection in London of Bibles,
Prayer Books, Hymn Books, and Devotional Manuals.

Second-hand Books, Scarce Books, Cheap Books.

NEW CATALOGUE just issued, containing:—

MILTON'S PARADISE LOST, First Edition, with First Title-page, Large Copy . . . 100 0 0

QUEEN VICTORIA, by HOLMES, Japanese
Paper Edition . . . 18 18

QUEEN ELIZABETH, by Bishop CREIGHton, Japanese Paper Edition . . . 14 0 0

MARY STUART, by SKELTON, Japanese
Paper Edition . . . 18 18 0

BEWICK SELECT FABLES, Largest
Paper, uncut, 1830 . . . 7 10 0

BRITISH POETS, Pickering's Aldine
Edition, 53 vols., Full Morocco . . . 24 10 0

ENGLISH SPY, Illustrated with Coloured
Plates by George Cruikshank, 2 vols., royal 8vo, uncut, Full Crushed Morocco, Bound from Numbers . . . 32 10 0

DUGDALE'S HISTORY OF WARWICK-
SHIRE, First Edition, Extra Illustrated,
Folio, Morocco . . . 9 9 0

GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS, First Editions.
29 vols., Full Calf Gilt, Gilt Tops . . . 24 0 0

FROUDE'S SHORT STUDIES, Best
Edition, 4 vols., Full Calf Gilt . . . 5 10 0

GEORGE MEREDITH'S NOVELS, &c.,
First Editions, 35 vols., Calf, Gilt Tops . . . 38 0 0

NOTES and QUERIES, Complete Set, with all the General Indices, 101 vols. . . . 36 0 0

PUNCH, Complete Set, handsome Copy in Full Calf Gilt, 111 vols. in 67 . . . 35 0 0

RUSKIN'S MODERN PAINTERS, First Edition, 5 vols., Fine Copy in Cloth . . . 18 18 0

SOWERBY'S BOTANY, First Edition . . . 14 0 0

STEVENSON'S WORKS, First Editions.

SYMONDS' RENAISSANCE in ITALY,
7 vols., complete set, also separate volumes.

ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA, Ninth
Edition, 25 vols., Half-Russia . . . 18 19 0

PEPYS' DIARY, Edited by WHEATLEY,
Large Paper, 8 vols. . . . 12 10 0

And many other interesting and necessary Books.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

A BOOK OF THE HOUR.

THE WINDS of MARCH. By George KNIGHT, Author of "Dust in the Balance," "Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth," Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"The book is interesting and clever, with touches of true pathos and a sense of atmosphere and life."—Academy.
 "The cellophane of the priesthood is a difficult subject to handle. But Mr. Knight's 'The Winds of March' cannot but add to his already considerable reputation. Told with a vigour, a pathos, and a wealth of poetic sympathy with all that is beautiful that make the book admirable from first to last."—Star.

THE REJUVENATION of MISS SEMAPHORE: a Farical Novel. By HAL GODFREY. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

"The story is very funny and very well told, almost as good as was 'Vice Versa'."—Glasgow Herald.
 "It is the funniest novel that has appeared for many months."—Star.
 "The humour of the book is most enjoyable."—Daily Mail.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls. By LEWIS MACNAMARA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Deserve to rank with Miss Jane Barlow's 'Irish Idylls'... One of the best contributions to Irish literature for some considerable time."—Irish Independent.
 "There is a strong literary charm in the tales. So genuine is the artistic touch of the writer, so true his command of the springs of human pathos and passion, that these tales will take their place among the best of those short sketches of simple country life that form a feature of the literary products of the last ten years. The book is the work of a hand that may yet make a strong mark in the fictional literature of the day."—Scotsman.

Now ready, the First 5,000 Copies of the Sixth Volume in
THE "DAFFODIL" LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS

BY AUTHORS OF THE DAY,

VOL. VI.

ENTITLED

THE TOMBSTONE TREASURE. By FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab." Crown 12mo, paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 2s.

"The interest of the story prevents the reader ever dreaming of laying aside the book till the end."—Glasgow Daily Mail.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
 Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

Now ready, price 3s. 6d. net.

BACKWARD LOOKING.

Verses: Occasional, Miscellaneous.

Being a volume of poems written about twenty-five years ago, and now published for the first time with introductory verses, entitled

1897, THE QUEEN'S YEAR.

Publishers: WILLIAM POLLARD & Co., Exeter; Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., London.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
 from ONE GUINEA
 per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for
 weekly exchange of Books at the
 houses of Subscribers) from TWO
 GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY
 SUBSCRIPTIONS from
 TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may
 unite in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,
 and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
 30—34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
 at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

The BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:

An Anatomy of the Disease and a Theory of Curative Treatment.

By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

1. WHAT IS RESPECTABILITY?
2. THE PATHOLOGY of the DISEASE.
3. "LADIES" and "GENTLEMEN."
4. SPECIFIC SYMPTOMS of the MALADY in WOMEN.
5. RESPECTABILITY and MORALS.
6. CULTURED GENTILITY.
7. PLUTOCRACY.
8. VILLADOM.
9. THE TYRANNY of RESPECTABILITY.
10. RESPECTABLE CIVILISATION and AFTER.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE AND FREE REVIEW:

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."

ONE SHILLING net.

Contents of the JUNE Number.

NIETZSCHE'S INDIOTMENT of CHRISTIANITY. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

AN ETHICAL EXCURSION. By HUGH MORTIMER CREIL.

THE TEACHINGS of THOMAS HARDY. By DUANE WILLIAMS.

THE TORY PROFESSOR. By ROBERT DUNCANSON.

MR. GLADSTONE'S LATEST POSTCARD. By ALAN STEPHENS.

USURY and THRIFT. By J. GERRIE FISHER.

A SPECIMEN of RELIGIOUS JOURNALISM By STANLEY BRUCE.

IN EXTREMIS. By ALLAN LAIDLAW.

THE LEGITIMATION LEAGUE. By A. GOLDWIN.

NANCY. By ERNEST NEWMAN.

CONVENTIONAL LITERATURE. By EASTWOOD KIDSON.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,
 16, JOHN STREET, BEDFORD ROW, W.C.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of

PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS

OF

FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproduction of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples, of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocoaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled Tins.

UNWIN'S 6/- FICTION

In uniform green cloth covers, gilt tops.

PACIFIC TALES.

By LOUIS BECKE. With

MRS. KEITH'S CRIME.

By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD. With

TROOPER PETER HALKET.

By OLIVE SCHREINER.

THE HERB-MOON.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS. Third

DAUGHTER of the FEN.

By J. T. BEALBY. Second

THE LILAC SUNBONNET.

By S. R. OBOCKETT. Sixth

NANCY NOON.

By BENJAMIN SWIFT. Second

THE STICKIT MINISTER.

By S. R. CROCKETT. Third

TALES of JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

Part

CLARA HOPGOOD.

By MARK RUTHERFORD

EBBING of the TIDE.

By LOUIS BECKE

A FIRST FLEET FAMILY.

By LOUIS BECKE and WALTER JEFFE

ALMAYER'S FOLLY.

By JOSEPH CONRAN

AN OUTCAST of the ISLANDS.

By JOSEPH CONRAN

EFFIE HETHERINGTON.

By ROBERT BUCHANAN. Second Edition

THE GREY MAN.

By S. R. CROCKETT

THE RAIDERS.

By S. R. CROCKETT

THE "BRITISH EMPIRE" SET OF "THE STORY OF THE NATIONS."

Fully Illustrated, and with Maps and Index, bound in cloth, price 5s. each.

SOUTH AFRICA (Cape Colony, Natal, Orange Free State, South African Republic, Rhodesia, and all other Territories South of the Zambesi).

By G. MCALL THEAL, LL.D. Fourth Edition, revised, enlarged, and brought up to date.
 "The Author threads his way, with the confidence of ease born of intimate knowledge, through the labyrinth of annexation and surrender, triumph, and defeat."—African Review

THE AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH.

(New South Wales, Tasmania, Western Australia, South Australia, Victoria, Queensland, New Zealand). By GREVILLE TREGARTHEN.
 "The story of the convict days of the parent colony is well told, and the whole volume is readable."—Athenaeum

CANADA. By J. G. Bourinot, C.M.G., LL.D., D.C.L.

"A very sound and a very readable and picturesque book."—Douglas Slader in the Literary World.

BRITISH INDIA. By R. W. Fraser, LL.B., I.C.S.

"Mr. Fraser has succeeded in a remarkable degree. He tells with accuracy, with fairness of spirit, and in good English."—Times.

THE WEST INDIES and the SPANISH MAIN. By JAMES RODWAY, F.L.S. Second Edition.

"A work which condenses with much lucidity all the general reader need know of one of the most interesting regions of the New World."—Morning Post.

SCOTLAND. By John Mackintosh, LL.D. Third Edition.

"A good and useful sketch, and Dr. Mackintosh has performed his task in a thorough and workmanlike manner."—Graphic.

IRELAND. By the Hon. Emily Lawless. Fifth Edition.

"This clear and temperate narrative."—Spectator.

In all 46 Volumes have appeared in "The Story of the Nations." An Illustrated Descriptive List of the Series will be sent post free to any address on application.

LONDON:

T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Boswell's Understudies	643
The Chances of Death	644
George Washington at Home	645
Open-Air Essays	646
The Romance of Isabel, Lady Burton	647
An Author's Child	647
FROM CROWDED SHELVES	648
PARIS LETTER	649
THE JUNE LITERATURE OF 1897	650
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books	651
New Books Received... ..	651
NOTES AND NEWS	652
LITERARY GLORY	653
MARK TWAIN, BENEFACTOR	653
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXXIII., SIR RICHARD STEELE	655
THE BOOK MARKET	655
ART	655
DRAMA	656
MUSIC	657
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED	658
FICTION SUPPLEMENT	21-24

REVIEWS.

BOSWELL'S UNDERSTUDIES.

Johnsonian Miscellanies. Arranged and Edited by Birkbeck Hill. In 2 vols. (The Clarendon Press.)

IT was greatly to be desired that Dr. Hill, who has devoted his life to the study of Dr. Johnson, and has given us the most exhaustive and accurate of all editions of Boswell's Life, should one day edit the accounts of Johnson which were written by Boswell's numerous understudies. This he has done with the same copiousness of annotation that enriches his six volumes of the Life and Letters. We have now, in all, eight volumes of Life, Letters, and Miscellanies, in uniform type and binding, embodying practically all that is known, and all that ever will be known, of Dr. Johnson.

These Miscellanies are mainly short sketches and collections of anecdotes, extracted from the biographies and autobiographies of men and women who knew Johnson, and who, knowing him, did not neglect to link his name with theirs. These writers are mostly small fry; and following in the wake of Johnson and Boswell they resemble a fleet of cock-boats pressing toilfully onward, now bumping each other, now getting upset by the swell of Boswellian truth, or stove in by one of Dr. Hill's penetrating notes; but still pressing on, each carrying a useful little cargo and anxious to "share the triumph and partake the gale." We are not much troubled when we find Dr. Hill warning us against a particular anecdote. He who comes to these Miscellanies with a fairly complete knowledge of Johnson's character, derived from Boswell, will be able to apply a touchstone of truth to the tales of Mrs. Piozzi, George Stevens, Richard Cumberland, Sir John Hawkins, Hannah More, and Miss Reynolds, that will serve him in better stead the more he uses it. But a story is not necessarily valueless because it is doubtful. If it be a really happy invention, if it might have been true and is actually illuminative, it can be discreetly welcomed. One of Richard Cumberland's anecdotes is to the effect that Johnson, being annoyed with a gentleman who laughed too obsequiously at his jokes, demanded of him: "What provokes your risibility, sir? Have I said anything that you understand? Then I ask pardon of the rest of the company." Cumberland adds that he thinks this story was an invention of John Henderson, the actor, who mimicked Johnson. Let it be so; but it is a story that could be told successfully of no other man but Johnson. Similarly, Joseph Cradock's anecdotes, taken from his Memoirs, may be, as Dr. Hill says they are, "very loose and inaccurate"; but an instance of Johnson's rudeness which Cradock gives is characteristic even if it is suspect. He tells us that a pompous gentleman said to Johnson, as they were coming out of Lichfield Cathedral: "Dr. Johnson, we have had a most excellent discourse to-day!" "That may be," said Johnson, "but it is impossible that you should know it." It is to be noted also that truth is often vindicated by a writer's varying statements. Mrs. Piozzi has a passage in which she piles up an indictment of Johnson's unwillingness to do favours, such as writing a letter of recommendation:

"No force could urge him to diligence, no importunity could conquer his resolution of standing still. 'What good are we doing with all this ado (would he say)? dearest Lady, let's hear no more of it!' I have, however, more than once in my life forced him on such services, but with extreme difficulty."

Yet in another place she writes: "Innumerable are the prefaces, sermons, lectures, and dedications which he used to make for people who begged of him." It may be quite true that he said "he hated to give away literary performances," and that "the next generation shall not accuse me of beating down the price of literature." This was like Johnson, who had no fine sentiments about the literary calling. "The man who writes except for money," he said, "is a blockhead." In the mass, then, these miscellaneous descriptions of Johnson, these innumerable anecdotes, are of the greatest value. The student who reads them all will hardly be deceived by one.

Mrs. Piozzi's is by far the most considerable collection of anecdotes concerning Johnson, outside of Boswell's Life. She compiled it in hot haste in Italy, and the book, which appeared on March 26, 1786, had an immense vogue, the whole edition being sold the first day. It is difficult to find the complete Johnson in her Anecdotes, so unmethodical and disjointed are they. But taken singly, or in such groups as are readily formed in the mind, they are delightfully vivid and saline. Mrs. Piozzi did not sit up making tea for Johnson till four in the morning for nothing. She tells us how her husband (Mr. Thrale) used to over-rule him at the Streatham dinner table by saying coldly: "There, there, now we have had enough for one lecture, Dr. Johnson; we will not be upon education any more till after dinner, if you please"—or some such speech." She extols his fearlessness. In their French tour

"he gave himself no concern about accidents, which, he said, never happened: nor did the running away of the horses on the edge of a precipice between Vernon and St. Denys, in France, convince him to the contrary; 'for nothing came of it (he said), except that Mr. Thrale leaped out of the carriage into a chalk-pit, and then came up again looking as white'"

She has sympathy with his hard, common sense. "Let the people learn necessary knowledge," she heard him say once; "let them learn to count their fingers, and to count their money, before they are caring for the classics," and she tells how, when a certain lady was ridiculed for her ignorance, Johnson said: "She is not ignorant, I believe, of anything she has been taught, or of anything she is desirous to know; and, I suppose, if one wanted a little run tea she might be a proper person enough to apply to." Nor does Mrs. Piozzi fail when reporting Johnson's repartees and his jokes. It is she who relates his reply to a Scotchman, who was boasting of Glasgow, "that he probably had never yet seen Brentford"—which is one of the few pieces of Johnson's wit that one can imagine on the lips of Charles Lamb. A rather similar reply was that which he gave to a youth who was lamenting that he had lost all his Greek: "I believe it happened at the same time, sir (said Johnson), 'that I lost my large estate in Yorkshire.'"

"All desire of distinction," says Mrs. Piozzi, "had a sure enemy in Mr. Johnson. We met a friend driving six very small ponies, and stopped to admire them. 'Why does nobody (said our doctor) begin the fashion of driving six spavined horses, all spavined in the same leg? It would have a mighty pretty effect, and produce the distinction of doing something worse than in the common way.'"

Mrs. Piozzi does pleasing justice to Johnson's sturdy contentment with the plain truth: "he never embellished a story." A good instance of Johnson's scrupulosity in this respect is afforded by the account which he gave to Mrs. Piozzi of his encounter with Tom Osborne. The town had magnified the tale for years, and it would have been easy for Johnson, who was proud of his strength, to have concurred in its version of the affair, but Mrs. Thrale tells us:

"I made one day very minute inquiries about the tale of his knocking down the famous Tom Osborne with his own dictionary in the man's own house. 'And how was that affair in earnest? do tell me, Mr. Johnson.' 'There is nothing to tell, dearest lady, but that he was insolent and I beat him, and that he was a blockhead and told of it, which I should never have done; so the blows have been multiplying, and the wonder thickening for all these years, as Thomas was never a favourite with the Public. I have beat many a fellow, but the rest had the wit to hold their tongues.'"

One of the most respectable chroniclers of small Johnsonian beer was the Rev. Dr. Thomas Campbell, whose anecdotes Dr. Hill extracts from his Diary of a Visit to England in 1775. Campbell heard Johnson get off one or two of his jibes at Scotland. Boswell said he wished there was a good map of Scotland. "There never can be a good map of Scotland," said the Doctor, and when Boswell excitedly asked why, the reply came: "Why, sir, to measure land, a man must go over it; but who could think of going over Scotland!" Two evenings later, at General Oglethorpe's, the talk fell on America, and it was observed by some one that the Doctor's works would not be popular there. "No," said Boswell, "we shall soon hear of his being hung in effigy," and he added that he wondered this had not been done already in Scotland, from the Hebrides to England. "I shall suffer them to do it corporeally," said Johnson, "if they can find me a tree to do it upon." Dr. Hill defends the Doctor's exaggerated notion of the treelessness of Scotland by inserting in his "Addenda" a note to the effect that in Burton's History of Scotland it is stated that "after a certain raid on the Border by the Earl of Murray, to put down disturbances there, eighteen outlaws were drowned 'for lack of trees and halters.'" Mrs. Piozzi has a curious echo of Johnson's repartee. She credits him with loving trees, and says he detested the Downs about Brighton 'because it was country so truly desolate that if one had a mind to hang one's self for desperation at being obliged to live there, it would be difficult to find a tree on which to fasten the rope.' Yet Johnson must have associated Brighton Downs with one of the most pleasing compliments that he ever received. Mrs. Piozzi herself tells how Mr. Hamilton called out one day upon Brighthelmstone Downs, "Why, Johnson rides as well, for aught I see, as the most illiterate fellow in England."

Besides Mrs. Piozzi, several women wrote their recollections of Dr. Johnson, notably Lady Knight, Hannah More, and Miss Reynolds; and their papers go to swell these Miscellanies. Lady Knight, of whom Johnson said that "her acquisitions were many and her curiosity universal," has written some sprightly stuff about old Mrs. Williams. This venerable friend and house-mate of Johnson's was by way of being a poet, and for long she hoped in vain to see her effusions in print. "The half-crowns she got towards the publication," says Lady Knight, "she confessed to me, went for necessities, and that the greatest pain she ever felt was from the appearance of defrauding her subscribers: 'But what can I do? The Doctor always puts me off with, "Well, we'll think about it"; and Goldsmith says, "Leave it to me."'"

Hannah More's well-known Recollections are very bright and young-ladyish. In 1783 she says of Johnson: "He is more mild and complacent than he used to be. His sickness seems to have softened his mind, without having at all weakened it. I was struck with the mild radiance of this setting sun." It is only fair to remember that Johnson was always particularly mild and radiant to Hannah. But Miss Reynolds confirms her report of Johnson's growing suavity, and thinks that in his latter days he was "asperous" only in the defence of morality and religion.

Space forbids us to travel through the whole of these attractive volumes. We have not mentioned Johnson's Prayers and Meditations, which, by the way, we think ought hardly to have been placed among Miscellanies; for the gulf between Johnson's outpourings toward his Maker and the tattle of his fellow-men about himself is too wide. Nor have we touched on Sir John Hawkins's Life, or on Hoole's narrative of Johnson's last days, or on Sir Joshua's skit on the Doctor's conversation, or on Thomas Tyers's interesting biographical sketch. Sir Joshua's effort is not specially happy; his imitation of Johnson's whale talk is rather exact than humorous. Such imitations should be both. A really delicious parody of Johnson's talk has apparently been overlooked by Dr. Hill. We refer to a contribution to The Onlooker by James Beresford, the witty author of The Miseries of Human Life, a humorous book very popular in the early years of the century. The piece is so little known that it may be permissible to describe it. The conversation is supposed to take place at Sir Joshua Reynolds's house, and to turn on rope-dancing. Johnson is provoked into asserting, and then demonstrating, that "a rope-dancer concentrates in himself all the cardinal virtues," and he is made to conclude his harangue in these words:

"He that is content to vacillate on a cord, while his fellow-mortals tread securely on the broad basis of terra firma; who performs the jocund evolutions of the dance on a superficies, compared to which the verge of a precipice is a stable station, may rightfully snatch the wreath from the conqueror and the martyr; may boast that he exposes himself to hazards from which he might fly to the cannon's mouth as to a refuge or a relaxation! Sir, let us now be told no more of the infamy of the rope-dancer."

One reflection we must make in conclusion, however obvious it may seem. These volumes complete a life-long literary devotion to the works and memory of Dr. Johnson; and it is an extraordinary thing that after Johnson had found such a biographer as James Boswell, Boswell should find such an editor as Birkbeck Hill. It is as though we had seen at Boswell's side the Johnsonian sun go down in glory, and had descended into the valley and been reconciled to the dusk, and now, on another hill, we meet another guide, who bids us still look back; and lo! the sunset lingers triumphant, and moves again "our special wonder."

SCIENTIFIC BOOKMAKING.

The Chances of Death, and other Studies in Evolution. By Karl Pearson, M.A., F.R.S. (Edward Arnold.)

HERE are twelve essays written, and for the most part published, at considerable intervals of time, on very different subjects and without any explicit relation to each other, as may be gathered from such titles as "Politics and Science," "Women and Labour," "Kindred Group - Marriage," the "German Passion Play," &c. Sir Isaac Newton could keep the materials of his Principia in hand for thirty years before giving them to the world. Your modern man of science has no sooner written a thousand words on any subject than he publishes them here or there, in this magazine or that, at the market rate of remuneration. This may be good business, but it is bad science, and it leads Prof. Pearson into a strange sort of apology or piece of special pleading, not well calculated to inspire confidence in his general trustworthiness as an observer. Feeling, as well indeed he may, that there is an apparent want of unity in this collection, he offers a few words of explanation:

"There must always be a unity," he remarks, "interesting at least to the psychologist, if not to the general reader, when a mind, with its opinions and methods of investigation reasonably matured, approaches even very diverse problems. . . . The sympathetic reader will find in one and all the essays the fundamental note of the author's thought—namely, the endeavour to see all phenomena, physical and social, as a connected growth, and describe them as such in the briefest formula possible."

This, to say the least of it, is a convenient hypothesis for the scientific bookmaker.

Prof. Pearson treats of evolution from two points of view—the statistical and the historical, and regard being had to the small amount of time which human experience or history covers, it would be hard to say which is the more untrustworthy. The number of statistics available is often extremely limited, as in the essay on "Variation in Man and Woman," where the writer cheerfully draws a conclusion as to the skull capacity of the modern English from the skulls of twenty-six men and thirty-two women dug up in Whitechapel. "We conclude," says Prof. Pearson, after settling on this basis his "standard of deviation" and his "co-efficient of variation," "that English women are more variable as to skull capacity than English men" (vol. i., p. 330). Occasionally the author apologises for the meagreness of his material. But at best the mathematical results arrived at in this way must be extremely uncertain from the narrowness of the basis of comparison obtained with regard to entire races and civilisations, ancient and modern. As Prof. Pearson confesses, "skulls are to be procured not by the hundred, but too often by the ten, or even only by units." Happily the result of this laborious arithmetic is not very startling:

"So far as the data we have considered extend, the conclusion we must draw from them is that there is no marked preponderating variability in either sex. The variability of men and women is not very different now from what it was 5,000 years ago, and the difference in male and female variability are apparently far less than racial differences in variability and even less than differences in the same race living under diverse conditions or indeed at opposite ends of the town."

The statistical method is pushed to its greatest length, perhaps, in the essay on "The Chances of Death," which for that reason is the least valuable of the series. It is nothing more than an attempt to reduce to a mathematical formula the familiar returns of the Registrar-General as to the mortality of infancy, youth, manhood, and old age; and most people will be disposed to confess that they understand the Registrar-General's percentages better than the Professor's "curves" and "frequencies," complicated as these are by a certain "skew-ness" of result which we suspect to be mathematical jargon for that considerable margin which the author finds it necessary to allow in order to bring his speculations into harmony with the ascertained facts. The better to illustrate his statistical method, Prof. Pearson (inspired by the "vision of Mirza") supposes the human race to be crossing "a Bridge of Life," with Death as a marksman aiming at them as they traverse the various arches that extend from infancy to old age. A picture of this bridge forms the frontispiece to the first volume:

"Suppose," says the author, "a thousand babes to start together 'along the bridge or causeway of life.' The length of that bridge shall represent the maximum duration of life, and our cohort shall march slowly across it, completing the journey in something perhaps over the hundred years. No—not the cohort completing the journey, the veriest remnant of the thousand who started together! At each step Death (as a marksman with a certain skewness of aim and a certain precision of weapon) takes his aim, and one by one individuals fall out of the ranks—terribly many in infancy, many in childhood, fewer in youth, more again in middle age, but many more still in old age."

It appears, however, that a single figure of Death does not suffice. In the frontispiece there are three skeletons representing Death, each engaged in "potting" the human race as it passes over the bridge, personified in a child, a young woman, a man in his prime, and a grey-bearded patriarch. One skeleton uses a bow and arrow, the second a blunderbuss, while the third is engaged in loading what appears to be a breach-loading rifle. On the whole, one prefers Addison's conception of the Bridge of Life as full of traps or pitfalls through which the unwary passengers drop into the dark flowing river of Eternity underneath. Prof. Pearson's plan is faulty if only because it makes no provision for getting rid of the bodies of the slain. The "curve of mortality," it appears, has caused the author some little trouble. Starting very high in infancy, falling to its least value at the age of thirteen or fourteen years, slowly increasing until it reaches a maximum in the seventy-second year of life, and again falling more rapidly than it rose, till scarcely two isolated stragglers of the 1,000 reach ninety-one, and hardly one in 10,000 remains for Death to aim at in the hundredth year of life, this mortality curve is unlike any of the "frequency curves" involved in what is termed a normal chance distribution. At all hazards, however, the theory must be made to fit the facts, and accordingly we have the author's conception of "skewness" in the shooting, otherwise faultiness of aim and of three Deaths shooting at different ranges instead of one. In his own words:

"We can only complete our picture by supposing several marksmen aiming with different degrees of precision and with different skewnesses of aims at different portions of the column of life—that is, at different ages. At each step in life we may be bit by more than one marksman, for although they aim at one portion of the Bridge of Life they may hit another, their shots being scattered like those of a rifleman on a target."

Surely this is the very insanity of statistics. Yet we are judging the essay from no isolated passage; for elsewhere Prof. Pearson remarks: "Death, aiming at the old, sometimes shoots wide of the mark and hits the young"—a strange example of the lengths to which a piece of false imagery may carry its author. All this statistical jugglery, be it observed, adds not one iota to the information conveyed to us in the mortality returns of the Registrar-General, who is not hampered by a conception of three Deaths instead of one, using weapons of different periods and patterns. Nevertheless your statistician can be amazingly precise on occasion. Prof. Pearson finds that his infancy curve, in order to fit a certain order of facts, has to be "started very approximately nine months before birth."

On reflection he must, like Olive, be astounded at his own moderation. Why take in nine months before birth merely? Why not all the ages during which the germ-plasm must have existed?

As an unpretentious collection of essays these volumes would be entirely acceptable. It is the "scientific unity" with which the author seeks to endow his casual researches that provokes criticism. The essay on "The Scientific Aspect of Monte Carlo Roulette," for instance, is extremely interesting, but what has it to do with Evolution, elastic as that much-abused term may be? Here, again, the author's besetting sin of generalising from insufficient data asserts itself. The results of actual play, as far as he has been able to collect them, do not accord with what he calls the scientific theory of chance. Accordingly, he jauntily concludes that "the random spinning of a roulette, manufactured and daily re-adjusted with extraordinary care, is not obedient to the laws of chance, but is chaotic in its manifestations." Before such a conclusion can safely be promulgated, it would surely be well to take a much wider basis of calculation than Prof. Pearson has been able to do. After all, there has been a prodigious amount of roulette spinning done during the past fifty years, and there is but a very microscopic sample of it given in the figures here dealt with. Let the spinning be chaotic in its results or not, the fact remains that a very small mechanical interference with the theory of even chances (viz., an interference to the extent of 1 in 37) suffices to yield a princely income per annum in favour of the bank. There is nothing chaotic in the dividends of the Monte Carlo administration.

GEORGE WASHINGTON AT HOME.

The True George Washington. By Paul Leicester Ford. (Lippincott.)

THE memory of the Father of his Country has been so wrapt round with a tissue of patriotic legends that to discover the true man beneath is now something of the hardest. The present volume is an attempt to set before us, in a quiet, sober way, the man just as he seemed to those who knew him best, amid the familiar intercourse of daily life and the intimacies of home. Happily,

Mr. Ford writes without anything of the iconoclastic bias which the words "the true George Washington" might suggest, and has done his work in a spirit of anxious sincerity. The hair of the American schoolboy may, indeed, rise on end when he reads that if Washington, at the age of six, was incapable of telling a lie, he "partially outgrew the disability in his more mature years"; but the instances cited savour rather of the necessary fineness of the politician than of anything to which the taint of personal duplicity could attach.

The theory that every great man had a gifted mother finds no support in this instance. Washington's mother seems to have been an untidy and illiterate woman, who on more than one occasion in his later life was a grievous trial to her son. After the death of his father, George Washington lived chiefly in the homes of his two elder brothers and so came little under his mother's influence. On one occasion her complaints of poverty caused a proposal for a pension to be made in the Virginia Assembly, a proposal which was instantly put an end to by an indignant letter from Washington. "Confident I am that she has not a child that would not divide the last sixpence to relieve her from real distress . . . but, in fact, she has an ample income of her own." At one time Washington, to spare his mother trouble, rented her plantation from her and paid her an annual sum far in excess of what it was worth. Afterwards, in consequence of her appeals for money to strangers, he ended the arrangement, not because "I mean to withhold any aid or support I can give from you, for whilst I have a shilling left you shall have part," but because "what I shall then give I shall have credit for, and not be viewed as a delinquent and considered perhaps by the world as an unjust and undutiful son."

Of special interest is the chapter dealing with Washington's personal connexion with the problem of slavery. At one time he had as many as 300 slaves at work, but he very soon learned that servile labour, on all but the richest soils, is economically a mistake. At one time at Mount Vernon he had more slaves than he could profitably employ; but the difficulty was to know how to reduce their number.

"To sell the overplus I cannot, because I am principled against this kind of traffic in the human species. To hire them out is almost as bad, because they could not be disposed of in families to any advantage, and to disperse the families I have an aversion."

It is interesting to learn that on one occasion Washington received £69 from the State as compensation for a slave wanted for the gallows.

We find constant traces in these letters of the perplexities in which a humane man was inevitably placed by the working of this hateful system. Nothing could exceed the strictness of the injunctions which Washington gives to his agents to care in every way for the sick slaves, and to see that all have abundant food. But what was the poor man to do when his slaves alleged sickness just to avoid work? What can he do but ask, "Is there anything particular in the cases of Ruth, Hannah, and Pegg, that they have been returned sick for several weeks together?" His suspicions are the more natural because he knows "Ruth is extremely deceitful." On occasions, too, Washington could overcome his aversion to selling slaves; thus in 1766 he shipped an unruly negro to the West Indies, and wrote thus to the captain of the vessel:

"With this letter comes a negro (Tom), who I beg the favor of you to sell in any of the islands you may go to, for whatever he will fetch, and bring me in return for him—

"One hhd. of best molasses.

"One ditto best rum.

"One barrel of lymes, if good and cheap.

"One pot of tamarinds, containing about 10 lbs.

"Two small ditto of mixed sweetmeats, about 5 lbs. each.

"And the residue, much or little, in good old spirits.

"That this fellow is both a rogue and a runaway (tho' he was by no means remarkable for the former, and never practised the latter till of late) I shall not pretend to deny. But that he is exceeding healthy, strong, and good at the hoe the whole neighbourhood can testify, and particularly Mr. Johnson and his son, who have both had him under them as foreman of the gang; which gives me reason to hope he may, with yr good management, sell well, if kept clean and trim'd up a little when offered for sale."

Another "misbehaving fellow" in 1791 was sold for "one pipe and quarter cask of wine from the West Indies." It is remarkable that there is not a single order to whip, and only on two occasions is there any reference to punishment of any sort, while in several instances we find injunctions to agents to try the effects of "admonition and advice" rather than correction. Altogether, Washington seems to have acted just as a high-minded English gentleman placed in such circumstances might have been expected to act. He was eager to prohibit the further importation of slaves from Africa, and, though acquiescing in slavery as an institution, looked forward to the time when its abolition should become possible, and, finally, by his will, arranged for the gradual liberation of his own slaves.

The formality of manner which always distinguished Washington stiffened into something like solemnity in later life. Contemporary letters give some funny glimpses of the sort of awe he inspired among his guests. Senator Maclay writes of one of the President's weekly dinners:

"It was the most solemn dinner I ever was at. Not a health drunk; scarce a word was said until the cloth was taken away. Then the President, filling a glass of wine, with great formality drank to the health of every individual by name round the table. . . . The ladies sat a good while, and the bottles passed about; but there was a dead silence almost. Mrs. Washington at last withdrew with the ladies. I expected the men would now begin, but the same silence remained."

But the poor senator had had a disappointment during the dinner. He tells us that, "after his second plate had been taken away," the President offered to help him from a dish which was at the end of the table. As the senator observes, "Could anything have been more unlucky?"—he had just before, in view of his fellow-guests, declined another dish, "with some expression that denoted my having made up my dinner." So the poor man was obliged to forego the honour of being helped by the President! It is pleasant to think that later in the evening, when Washington "was distributing a pudding," the senator got another chance. All his contemporaries are agreed that among strangers Washington was extremely silent, while among intimate friends he was merry and lively. As evidence of his kindness of heart, Mr. Ford points to the fact that at different times he adopted or assumed the expenses and charge of no less than nine of the children of his kinsmen. That he was childless himself was probably a great grief, but it was one to which he was reconciled. Writing some years after his marriage with the widow of Mr. Curtis he dismisses the possibility of his having issue, on the ground that even if he survived his wife "while I retain the faculty of reasoning I shall never marry a girl," and a second wife of suitable age would not be likely to bear him children. Altogether we can welcome Mr. Ford's book as adding appreciably to our knowledge of the character and manners of the great President.

OPEN-AIR ESSAYS.

In Garden, Orchard, and Spinney. By Phil Robinson. (Isbister & Co.)

MR. PHIL ROBINSON has long been known as a charming essayist of the open air. Several years ago he gave us tiny volumes describing the garden life of India; then came examinations of the Poets' knowledge of birds and beasts; and now he seems to have settled down again to the study of the more domestic natural history of England. He does not go deep; he is wary of Latin names; he takes the line of least resistance; but he has a pleasant humour and an engaging and fluent fancy. This fancy is, indeed, so fluent that Mr. Robinson must be careful or it will flow away with him altogether. As it is, we could put our finger on a number of places in his latest book, In Garden, Orchard, and Spinney, where it is obvious that fancy was left to do alone work in which it should have had the immediate assistance of Mr. Robinson's eyes. Things remembered at a distance have not the value of things just seen. Mr. Robinson's fancy is, however, his strength; he has not patience, like Thomas Edwards; he has not application, like Gilbert White; he has not mystery and literary genius, like Richard Jefferies; but he has a glib fancy, and a nimble wit, and a well-ordered memory. Here is a passage concerning rooks—that fascinating subject—which illustrates our point:

"It is one of the compliments that Nature pays the dwellers among tall trees that rooks shall come and tenant them. Chief among the honours in her gift is to send herons to your groves; but then there must be a lake or mere hard by, or long reaches of water; and the estate must be so large that no public ways can intersect the solitude with noisy lines of traffic. With the heron a certain etiquette must be observed; its taste for peace must be studied, and the place of its sojourn fenced round with sacred quiet.

"Not so the rooks. Having honoured one of your trees by selecting it for their abode and built their nests in it, they take everything else as it comes. They do not haggle with you as to observances, or split straws over the ethics of reciprocity. They have made their bed and intend to lie on it. The bargain is struck, 'and there's an end on't.' They did not come in a hurry or by mistake, and now that they have come they are going to stay. It is a robust philosophy this of the rook. He does not expect more than he gets, but, content with very little, he protests against any nibbling at what he has. Though your tenant, at your pleasure, he is also your neighbour, and never allows you to forget that in the country there are neighbourly obligations on the one side as well as on the other, on yours as on his. He is perpetually reminding you—whenever he sees you, in fact—that you are to let him and his household alone; that you and yours may make any disturbance you like anywhere else, but that his tree is his tree, and you will please to let it alone, and respect such privacy as a tree-top affords. When he catches sight of you afar off he passes the remark to his wife, 'There he is!' and she replies, off-hand, 'So he is!' And there the matter drops. But should you come under their tree the conversation assumes quite another tone, and if we could only understand what birds say, we should know what rooks think of the vulgar manners and lack of taste of those who go poking about the ground-floor of a place that is already inhabited up above by a decent couple."

It is agreeable and pleasant and superficial. Mr. Sowerby's recent little monograph on the same bird has a thousand times more "stuff" in it, but Mr. Robinson's play carries him into the hands of readers who would never touch more serious writers. Had he also the passion for truth Mr. Robinson would be the most delightful natural historian in the world. Here is a pretty passage contrasting the wasp and the bee:

"No one likes bees better than I do. I have kept hives. But, after all, are they not the cattle and poultry of the insects? They are the sheep, while the wasps are the wild deer. The one represents Routine, the other a protest against Routine. What poetry is there in the hives of bees as compared with that of wasps—in the tame citizenship of the artificial hive, the machine-made honeycomb, as compared with the romance of the woodland comb-maker? Both bee and wasp need honey; but the latter, when it has not the leisure (or the will) to gather it for itself, goes after the former. 'What ho, there!' it cries, 'You bumbling fellow, in your jerkin of woolly brown, stand and deliver!'—and the bee does."

Adventures, we know, are to the adventurous, and evidently open-air phenomena are to the natural historian. These chroniclers of woodland life have such magnificent luck! Noah, pacing an Ark gangway, saw hardly fewer strange animals than they do! Other men try for years to see a fox. Mr. Robinson has but to open his front door and there are a pair of them doing all the correct things—stealing geese, or sucking eggs, or whatever it is that foxes do! This is a little exaggeration, but Mr. Robinson's pages so convince you that he is nature's darling. For example, one night he sleeps in the orchard, and on awaking sees in a few minutes the following things: a pheasant, six feet from his head, crowing; a rabbit washing its face; a squirrel, which came to pay his respects; a turtle dove feeding two young ones; a score of tits; a wren and seven young ones sitting on a bar below it. The fact is, we suspect, that the fauna and flora of a dozen walks are packed into one when the pen touches the paper.

Finally, let us quote a plea for the more timid birds that dwell in the garden :

"So, reader, you who love the birds, do not bring them all down to an equal necessity of accepting too publicly your out-door relief. Do not insist upon their coming to the doorstep and the window-sill for food. Some of them are very nervous and sensitive—made of tender stuff. They shrink from the common feast and, until the pain of real starvation beats down their shyness, will, from the shelter of your shrubs, piteously watch the robust ones dividing your alms among them, but will not, these small gentlefolk in feathers, intrude any claim upon your kindness. So pretend that you know nothing of their necessities. Affect an innocence even of their haunts, and, out of your own good taste, as it were, do not urge them to the ordeal of joining the mob before your windows. So will your bounty not be a misery to these little people. Take your benevolences out into the shrubberies and the orchard, and, as you pass, scatter the saving morsels wherever they may most quickly catch the eye—under the bushes where the earth is brown, round the foot of the trees where there is still grass green—and the birds that you love best will eat in peace, gratefully sharing in your charity, now sweetened to them by seclusion. They eat now not as paupers, but as the little neighbours of a great lord, each of them in its own home, as it were, and twice thankful for the snow-tide help, and for their own escape from the sharp discipline of public relief."

Mr. Robinson dogmatizes with great freedom. There are well-defended opinions—for example, that the "sea-blue bird of March" might be meant both for the kingfisher and the wheatear, as well as for the swallow which he so confidently states it to be. Again, other experimentalists with wild creatures might, with much reason, deny that "few animals are so fearless of man as the squirrel." Another fault with which we charge Mr. Robinson is repetition. In two separate books we expect repetitions from a man who gossips about nature; but in one there should be none. Careful proof-reading would have prevented this blemish. But Mr. Robinson's new volume is a very pleasant companion.

THE ROMANCE OF ISABEL.

The Romance of Isabel, Lady Burton: the Story of her Life. Told in part by Herself, and in part by W. H. Wilkins. In 2 vols. (Hutchinson & Co.)

MR. WILKINS did well to bring the word "romance" into his title. Some readers, indeed, will give it a meaning more inclusive than Mr. Wilkins ever meant; but that is no fault of his. His loyalty to Lady Burton's accuracy is intact; and if the credulity of readers at times suffers a strain, there is no real snapping of charity between them and her, certainly never between them and Mr. Wilkins. No one will grudge the volumes their "over sixty columns of favourable reviews," still less their triumphant entry into the second thousand of their circulation. We do not desire to strike any harsh note in the concord of praises. All the same, there are certain thoughts and afterthoughts which do arise in the mind, and to which we allow ourselves to give what is no hasty expression.

Lady Burton was an enthusiast, and no enthusiast is without the capacity for self-sacrifice. Lady Burton's immolation of herself at the shrine of her husband is notorious. It was a supplementary religion; and as to that, a pious Roman Catholic, brought up on counsels of detachment, perhaps felt some scruple that needed to be set at rest. The seal of the Unseen must in some way be set upon it. In the foretellings of gipsies she found that desired sanction. Near her father's home in Essex, in her girlhood, she had met Hagar Burton, who cast her horoscope :

"You will cross the sea, and be in the same town as your Destiny. You will bear the name of our tribe, and be right proud of it. You will be as we are, but far greater than we. Your life is all wandering, change, adventure. One soul in two bodies in life and death, never long apart. Show this to the man you take for your husband."

The sequel is well known. Isabel Arundell did cross the sea; she went with her family to Boulogne. On the ramparts she met a man "who looked at her as though he read her through and through." She "felt completely magnetised," though she was alert enough to note that he "started a little," and to turn to her sister and whisper, "That man will marry me." Next day he was there again, and chalked up: "May I speak to you?" In spite of magnetism, "No, mother will be angry," was the maidenly reply. A few days, however, brought about a formal introduction—"Destiny is stronger than custom," she says, not quite appropriately, seeing that she had first declined to swerve from custom, and was now in its traces. And when she heard his name it was her turn to "start." "Like a flash came back to me the prophecy of Hagar Burton, and I thrilled through and through." This is romance in any case; but it may be romancing too. It is a case for original documents, if ever there was one. If all the written testimony to marvels of this sort is subsequent to the date of the accomplished facts, that is a material consideration in our estimate of them. Hagar Burton's prophecy was written in Romany. Who translated it, and when? Or was it all written out from memory by Lady Burton years and years after the usual course of events had unrolled for her the scroll of her married career? Admittedly, the romance, communicative as it is on most points, would be immensely more interesting if it were more communicative on details such as these. "Blessed be they who invented pen, ink, and paper!" Lady Burton once wrote to her sister. Yet these would not have been so great a boon after all had the invention stopped with them. It was the further invention that these were the means of giving to the world—the romances and the rest—that really called forth the benediction of Lady Burton. And who shall say that she did not desire that some benefit of that benediction should not fall upon herself?

There are a number of figures whom one might wish to pursue from the pages of Lady Burton into the Palace of Historic Truth—the American widower with 300,000 dollars (to a penny), for instance, and the Russian general with nine [might it not turn out to be ten?] chateaux, who each made offers for her hand. These, however, are mere accessories, though their introduction is characteristic of a style of memoir-writing which is open to the constant objection that it either tells too much or tells too little. Nor can we quite be ridded of a certain air of unreality in the statement, for instance, of the terms on which Sir Richard Burton stood with the successive Governments of his country, or of the actual circumstances connected with the destruction, by "Herself," of the MS. of The Scented Rose. Great traveller as he was, Burton was admittedly not a man whom any Government in its senses could have transferred from the Consular to the Diplomatic service, and sent to Paris or Vienna as ambassador. The very idea is ridiculous. In his own service he had promotion in due course, with payment and pension to match. He had a knighthood as well; and Lady Burton, in her widowhood, a place on the Civil List. If he had abilities quite above the requirements of the Consular service, the reward for them was to be found outside of it. Surely he found it in fame, and, if money is to be brought into account, in the immense cheque he received for his translation of the Arabian Nights. This work was done with literalness in its indelicacy, all in the interests of History and Science, which do not commonly cast to their pale votaries drafts for £10,000. This payment was a romance of science—the romance, at any rate, is genuine, but what about the science?

AN AUTHOR'S CHILD.

The Invisible Playmate and W.V. her Book. By William Canton. (Isbister & Co.)

THE literary instinct has to be fully understood by the critic of this reprint of Mr. Canton's two little books. To the ordinary man who loved his children nothing would seem much more unsuitable than that he should sit down at his desk and write an account of their playfulness and little whims of affection, ending with a version of the prayer which he offered to his Maker for his and their good governance, and then ask the public to pay three-and-sixpence for the privilege of reading it. More than one reason would deter him, not the least being the thought that some day such a record was likely to be rather a trial to the children themselves. But between the ordinary man and the man with the literary instinct a great gulf is fixed, and we have no hesitation in saying that it is as right for the latter to publish the secrets of his nursery as it is for the other to keep them to himself—provided, that is, that he does it in a seemly manner. The end justifies the course. In the case of W. V. the course is abundantly justified.

Mr. William Canton has won us with this book as surely as Mr. Barrie did with Margaret Ogilvy. We laid that volume aside at the end with a sense of deep gratitude to the author for permitting us to come upon such terms with so sweet and wholesome and beautiful a character. Similarly we have closed Mr. Canton's account of his daughter with a feeling of satisfaction that we, too, are of W. V.'s court. The odd thing is that both Mr. Barrie and Mr. Canton are Scotchmen: that is to say, they belong to a nation which is notoriously reserved and undemonstrative of affection. And Dr. John Brown, who wrote of Marjorie Fleming, the direct intellectual ancestress of W. V., was Scotch too. We shall have to revise some of the proverbs relating to the dour race.

The Invisible Playmate, when it appeared some three or four years ago, struck us as being a very fresh and remarkable little work of individualism. It has mystery and tenderness rare in English literature. It pairs off with nothing that we know. The second half of the volume before us, W. V., her Book, which appeared independently a year or so later, is less imaginative and remarkable. It is often beautiful, always winning, and here and there it contributes something of value to that science of which Prof. Sully and Mrs. Meynell are the principal exponents. Mr. Canton's chapters remind us, as we have said, of Dr. John Brown's perfect sketch of Marjorie Fleming, love being the basic principle of both writers.

So much of the book consists of reprinted matter that we confine our quotations to the new chapter, "Her Violets." The following passage illustrates our remarks as to the scientific bearing of the little work:

"Early in the spring it occurred to me to ascertain the range of her vocabulary. I did not succeed, but I came to the conclusion that a child of six, of average intelligence, may be safely credited with a knowledge of at least 2,000 words. A clear, practical knowledge, too; for in making up my lists I tried to test how far she had mastered the sense as well as the sound. Punctual, she told me, meant 'just the time'; dead, 'when you have left off breathing—and your heart stops beating too,' she added as an afterthought; messenger, 'anybody who goes and fetches things'; then, as a bee flew past, 'a bee is a messenger; he leaves parcels of flower-dust on the sticky things that stand up in a flower.' 'The pistils?' 'Oh yes, pistils and stamens; I remember those old words.' Flame, she explained, is 'the power of the match.' What did she mean by 'power?' 'Oh, well, we have a power of talking.' So that flame, I gather, is a match's way of expressing itself. What was a hero? 'Perseus was one; a very brave man who could kill a Gorgon.' 'Brain is what you think with in your head; and'—physiological afterthought—'the more you think the more crinkles there are.' And sensible? 'The opposite to silly.' And opposite? 'One at the top' (pointing to the table) 'and one at the bottom; they would be opposite.' Lady? 'A woman.' But a woman is not always a lady. 'If she was kind I should know she was a lady.' Noble? 'Statelily, a great person. You are the noble of the office, you know, father.' 'Domino,' as an equivalent for 'That's done with,' has a ring of achievement about it; but 'jumbos,' in the sense of 'lots,' 'heaps,' cannot commend itself even to the worshippers of the immortal elephant. While I linger over these fond trivialities, let me set down one or two of her phrases. 'You would laugh me out of my death-bed, mother,' she said the other day, when her mother made a remark that tickled her fancy. As the thread twanged while a button was being sewn on her boot: 'Auntie, you are making the boot laugh!' 'I shall clench my teeth at you if you won't let me.' 'Mother, I haven't said my prayers; let me say them on your blessed lap of heaven.'"

We take leave of Mr. Canton's exquisite pages with the prediction that The Invisible Playmate and W. V., her Book, is likely for many years to come to be with all who own it a volume very near to the hand and heart.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Prehistoric Problems. By Robert Munro. (Blackwood & Sons.)

THIS is an interesting work which treats, with tolerable completeness, certain points as to the condition of man in the stone and bronze periods of his existence. It is stated in the preface to be composed of papers which have been previously published, but are here republished in a modified form, with the exception of that which forms the second chapter of the work, and is an unaltered reproduction of the address delivered by the author as president of the anthropological section at the meeting of the British Association at Nottingham in 1893.

We are strongly of opinion that when papers are republished the dates and modes of their first publication should always be given. The work is illustrated by 150 wood-cuts and eight plates, but twenty-five cuts and two plates have been lent by various societies and academies as is duly acknowledged by the author at the end of his preface. He begins by a sketch of the rise and progress of the science of anthropology. He appears sceptical as to the existence of any great "hiatus" between palæolithic and neolithic times. As to man of the earlier of those periods, it seems evident that he had extended his range over the greater part of the old world. As to his extent and range in the American continent the author declines to hazard a judgment, although, for our part, the opinion of so eminent a palæontologist as M. Gaudry suffices to convince us that palæolithic man did inhabit the banks of the Delaware.

In his republished presidential address Dr. Munro considers the advantage to man of the erect posture, and gives some interesting quotations (pp. 94 and 95) from a letter received by him from Prof. Huxley, as well as one from a paper by Prof. Cleland, showing how the skull of man has been developed by the bending down of its base to its utmost possible limit (p. 98). With respect to the nature of the remains found in Java, which have been named Pithecanthropus erectus, he quotes the judgments of others, but gives no decided one himself. The book contains an interesting chapter on prehistoric trepanning and cranial amulets, and other chapters on otter and beaver traps, bone skates, and prehistoric saws and sickles.

We can cordially recommend the work as interesting and instructive, but we cannot regard it as forming any distinct advance in anthropological science. But such an advance is hardly to be looked for in a volume consisting of a republication of an author's antecedent papers or addresses, however much modified.

* * *
An Old Soldier's Memories. By S. H. Jones-Parry, J.P. (Hurst & Blackett.)

CAPTAIN JONES-PARRY'S Memories are essentially military, and begin with his getting his commission in 1849. He went out to India, and he describes very pleasantly and minutely the incidents of his voyage and arrival, his early difficulties and scrapes. On the way out, at Aden, half a dozen youngsters, including himself, went ashore in defiance of orders, and sat down to play vingt-et-un in a hotel coffee room. Our author lost all his money, and his luck was just turning when:

"I heard a voice behind me saying, 'You young blackguards, what are you doing?—You're gambling!' Some one ventured a 'No, sir.' 'Yes, you are; look at those paper I.O.U.'s in the saucer.' It was Colonel Outram. He was very angry, but eventually said, 'I will not report you, on one condition—that you burn all those papers, and promise me never to gamble again.' The papers were burnt, the promise made. 'Now, then, boys, come and have supper with me.' He gave us as good a supper as the hotel afforded, and then sent us on board. I think I may say we all worshipped him."

Capt. Jones-Parry continues to worship Outram. In his account of the Alumbagh fighting in the Mutiny he writes:

"I can see Outram now, riding along the lines when an attack was going on, smoking as usual a huge cheroot, stopping now and again to speak a cheery word to some officer or sergeant, or offer a cheroot to some private who looked as if a smoke would be a treat to him. Others may say what they like: Outram was my man, and knitting-needles will not make me alter my opinion."

In his Indian chapters Capt. Jones-Parry gives us, so to speak, scraps from Mr. Kipling's commonplace book. Not that the Captain's time and Mr. Kipling's coincided. But here is the cantonment life of Mr. Kipling's stories, and the dāk travelling, and the priests, and the pagodas, and the cholera, and the blessed propinquity of brave women. Capt. Jones-Parry even found a piece of Mulvaney.

"We had a most wonderful drill-sergeant in Murphy. [This was at Bellary, with the 52nd.] He lived solely to study the drill-book. In those days light white trousers were the fashion, and report had it that Murphy used to put his on damp, and let them dry upon him. He could manage recruits better than any man living."

More than once we have a description of such a storm of rain as that on which John Holden looked with stony indifference, because, though the rain took the cholera away, the cholera had taken Ameers. And the "little orf'cer boy" in "With the Main Guard," who cried to be allowed to go and be killed, meets us at Alumbagh

"I remember hearing that one fledgling, on being told he was too young to go on the most dangerous of all our outposts, cried and said he was quite old enough to be killed the same as any other officer."

Capt. Jones-Parry is to be thanked for a budget of stories (his book is essentially that) told with soldierly frankness, humour, and kindness.

* * *

Diary of a Tour through Great Britain in 1795. By the Rev. William MacRitchie. Edited by David MacRitchie. (Elliot Stock.)

THIS is the diary of a Scottish clergyman who toured through England 102 years ago, and jotted down his impressions. It has only lately been published, partly in the Scottish Antiquary and partly in the Antiquary. Now it is issued, by no means superfluously, in book form, and with notes by a great-nephew of the writer. To be sure this diary is a very simple record. The reverend author met few celebrities; and his diary is concerned with the everyday world as he saw it in one place after another. From his native Perthshire Mr. MacRitchie travelled through Edinburgh, Kendal, Manchester and Liverpool, Buxton, and Sheffield, to London, and returned northward by another route.

Here is an entry which shows us what a traveller who has just emerged from his London hotel to look around him might see in 1795:

"Pass Blackfriars' Bridge and set out along the south side of the river to Westminster Bridge. Arrive there happily in time to witness a grand anniversary sailing-match on the river. The prize a silver bowl, run for by six barges with four men in each; the distance from Blackfriars' Bridge to Putney Bridge, about eight miles up the river, and back again to opposite Vauxhall. The vast concourse of people on the Bridge and on each side of the river, the vast number of boats and barges with splendid company on board, the rowers keeping time in the most regular harmony, &c., was to me a scene of perfect astonishment."

MacRitchie's luck did not end here, for on the bridge he met Mr. David Ritchie, "my old school- and college-fellow," and together—after taking tea at Ritchie's house in Barton-street, Westminster, with a French priest—they took boat by moonlight to Vauxhall, where MacRitchie was "much struck" with everything, and heard Mrs. Mountain sing. The morals of the place very properly shocked him, but we note that he stayed till 2 a.m.

A comparison at once suggests itself as fit to be made between this Scottish minister's account of his travels in England in 1795, and the similar itinerary left us by Moritz, the Prussian clergyman who journeyed through England in 1782. It must be confessed that the Prussian's book is much the more succulent, and discovers keener and wider sympathies and a higher literary faculty. But this newly-found Diary of his Scottish brother is acceptable. It has antiquarian, and not a little human, interest.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. VICTOR BÉRARD's masterly study of the Sultan's politics led us to expect in his book on Macedonia an important addition to the political literature on the fatal, eternal, and unsolvable problem of the East. If La Macédoine is a less vivid and powerful book than its predecessor, La Politique du Sultan, it remains in itself a graphic and interesting account of remote and complicated affairs that seem to have puzzled Europe for ages, with small hope of amelioration or general satisfaction. It is sad reading at the best, this interminable tale of brigandage, massacre, violation, outrage of every kind, and petty dissensions and rivalry. On laying down M. Bérard's book, the bewildered reader, conceiving the lower Mediterranean shores as exclusively the nest of every infamy, political, social, and private, with nothing to choose between the villainy of Turk and Christian, wishes that civilisation had the force of will and the power to sweep off the face of the world all these atrocious, if picturesque, races. Among Armenians, Servians, Bulgarians, Turks, Albanians, Greeks, there is apparently not a pin's-worth of honour or honesty, not a vestige of intelligence or capacity. Plunder and outrage seem to be the aim of each race's existence. Lamenting France's loss of her old reputation for uprightness and generosity, M. Bérard exclaims:

"This policy of immediate interest would be at least excusable if we had the first rank among Abd-ul-Hamid's servitors and the exploiters of his empire. But whatever she may do, France in her new rôle is ever impeded by her old engagements and oaths. She cannot always openly take the Master's part, and when he massacres with excessive show she is obliged to say to him softly: 'You are making a little too much noise; you are even heard over here. You will arouse my people, who will cry out, and I could not send them to sleep again.' Germany is not obliged to take such precautions. When the Master kills she can shout: 'Strike!' She can even send him in aid her officers and sailors. France is not cut out for this struggle in servility. She loses her honour and makes no money. For three or four hundred kilometres of railway and the satisfaction of a few financiers she loses the profit of three or four centuries of honesty and the patronage of ten or fifteen millions of Christians. Now these will remain, and their sympathy of olden times, turned to rancour, will also remain when the Master and his fantasies will have passed away."

M. Bérard's explanation of the failure of the Greeks in Macedonia is amply confirmed by the mournful errors of the recent war.

"The Greeks," he says, "would not be now on the verge of ruin if they brought into their commercial affairs the amount of intelligence and activity they waste on their political squabbles, or if they spent on the expansion of Hellenism the money their rivalries and their law proceedings cost them."

But painful as the impression of this lucid and remarkable volume is, with its abundant proof of the cruelty, corruption, and worthlessness of the Oriental along the southern shores of the most romantic sea of the world, whatever shrine he may worship at, whatever language he may speak, whether Mahomet or the Virgin be the object of his brutal worship, the Patriarch or the Sultan his spiritual guide, M. Bérard lightens it now and then with a pleasing anecdote. All Turks are happily not Turks, or can be Turks with a delightful mediæval notion of justice: swift, elemental, crude, but refreshing. As late as 1886 a pasha, one Begli Mehemed, crossing the snowy plain between Prizrend and Pritchina in a driving sleet, saw a group of famished little donkeys outside a miserable inn. Side by side they shivered under the pelting rain and snow, heavily burdened, while inside their Albanian masters were warming themselves round a fire over which simmered a big pot of hot wine. In a twinkling the pasha collared the Albanians, dragged them outside, ordered his followers to unload the donkeys and attach their burdens to the men's shoulders, whom he tied together out in the snow. He then led the animals into the inn, installed them round the fire, and ladled them out big bowls of hot wine. Happy donkeys! Splendid pasha! Again, when a Christian priest refused to baptize a poor woman's child because she had no money to pay for the ceremony, Begli Mehemed ordered him to be stripped and flung into the sea to teach him to baptize gratis. If the Turk must rule, let him rule thus, and we shall sing the praises of the good pasha.

M. de Meaux's study of Montalembert's public life displays a sober enthusiasm which, after all, is the obligatory attitude of the biographer, who is at the same time a disciple. His presentments of the austere, elevated and chivalrous orator of the Catholic party is, if not vivid or convincing—scarcely even interesting—a sincere and able piece of work. We would fain have learnt more about the celebrated fraternity and estrangement of the two illustrious Frenchmen with Irish blood in their veins—Lammenais and Montalembert—and something less of Montalembert's obnoxious conviction of the scoundrelism of free thinkers and the complete iniquity of all parties in opposition to Rome. But the book is dry—lacks charm and a personal touch. Of Montalembert's tastes and tendencies M. de Meaux writes:

"After religious questions, foreign politics won his preference. From childhood he was accustomed to travel; after his elevation to the peerage and his marriage he continued to travel. More than any public man in France at that time was he familiar with the various languages and races of Europe. Declared admirer of English institutions, he frequently rose up against the foreign policy of England. Determined partisan of the English alliance, more than once did he revolt against British arrogance and the complaisance of the French ministry."

When M. Molé accused Montalembert of being too old to be permitted to make mistakes, Montalembert wisely retorted:

"It might be so if my ambition were to become what is called a practical man—a possible man. But such is not my ambition or my destiny. I should not be, I do not wish to be, other than a pioneer, a precursor. Not to make mistakes, that would mean in politics to do nothing."

It is consoling to remark the small and innocuous vice of vanity in these great and lofty natures. After one of his oratorical triumphs, Montalembert writes in his notebook :

"From the first I felt master of my audience, and for an hour tasted the ineffable happiness of dealing justice to miscreants who had never personally injured me. Leaving the tribune I was literally crushed with congratulations. The poor Chancellor embraced me weeping. Others kissed my hands. Enthusiasm was at white-heat. I have touched the pinnacle. There is nothing now to do but descend."

But Sainte-Beuve's study of Montalembert remains the only one.

H. L.

NEW BOOKS.

Brigandes. André Godard.
Boisfleury. André Theuriet.
Portraits et Souvenirs. Gabriel Monod.
Stanislas Poniatowski. Eugène Mottaz.
Responsable. Princesse Olga Cantacuzène-Altieri.

THE JUNE LITERATURE OF 1837.

WHAT was doing in the literary world this month sixty years ago? The question seems worth asking and answering; and a forage among the literary publications of the time has yielded some interesting results. Let us take the Magazines first. Here is Blackwood of June, 1837, to our hand. Blackwood—which is already in its twenty-first year—is regaling its earliest batch of Victorian readers with a series of articles on "Modern French Classics;" the June instalment being a study of Mme. de Staël and Chateaubriand. This may not seem exciting; but it is curious to find the editor introducing these studies to the not very book-ridden public of his day as an antidote to "the deluge of new and ephemeral publications under which the press both in France and England is groaning." The Gentleman's Magazine of the same month has no great literary interest. It reviews, as we do this week, a collection of Johnsoniana. Bentley's Miscellany ought to contain the ninth and tenth chapters of "Oliver Twist" which has run through its papers since February. But instead, we have a suspension of the story and the following notice:

"Since the appearance of the last number of this work, the editor has had to mourn the sudden death of a very dear young relative to whom he was most affectionately attached, and whose society had been, for a long time, the chief solace of his labours. He has been compelled to seek a short interval of rest and quiet."

The grief into which Charles Dickens had been plunged was caused by the death of his sister-in-law, Mary Hogarth, a bright, lovable girl of seventeen, in whom he saw his ideal of girlhood. The issue of the June instalment of Pickwick, which was also in hand, is delayed for the same reason. The fifteenth part of Pickwick is to appear on June 30, a month late. The June newspapers contain the following business notice:

"PICKWICK PAPERS.—Advertisements intended for insertion in No. 15 of the Pickwick Papers (which will be published on the 30th instant) are required to be sent not later than the 23rd; Prospectuses, &c., by the 26th. Chapman & Hall, 186, Strand."

This is not the only bit of Pickwick lore that a hasty glance through the periodicals of June, 1837, has discovered. The following short article explains itself. It appears in The Idler and Breakfast Table Companion, a rather pleasant little paper, published weekly at the price of twopence, and describing itself as a "Fashionable Journal of Literature, Fine Art," &c.:

"The Penny Pickwick. Edited by Bos. Illustrated by Phis. (Lloyd.)

"We notice this contemptible publication with a view to call the attention of Mr. Dickens and his worthy publishers, Messrs. Chapman & Hall, to the fact of its existence; and also to caution the unwary against being made the dupes of so base an artifice. The plan of the work is precisely similar to the genuine publication, and the names of the characters introduced are only literally altered. For instance, Mr. Tupman is re-christened Tupnall; Mr. Snodgrass, Mr. Snodgreen; Mr. Winkle, Mr. Winkle-top, &c., &c. This vile act of plagiarism requires summary punishment; and however low-bred and base-born the person who practises it may be, still he should be made to feel the power of the strong arm of the law. The publication being infamously printed, and therefore unlikely to sell among persons of discernment, will be no fitting excuse for Mr. Lloyd; nor can he readily get over the substitution of the word Bos, for Boz; or Phis for Phiz."

Deprived of its chief attraction the June "Bentley" owes its lustre to the fact that it contains the Ingoldsby Legend of Lord Tomnoddy's visit to a hanging at Newgate in the company of Captain M'Fuze and Lieutenant Tregooze, and Sir Carnaby Jenks of the Blues. Fraser's Magazine is dull, and nothing need be said of it but that it has a long review of Mr. Disraeli's Venetia, with a proportion of quoted matter that no modern publisher would stand. The London and Westminster Review has an article on Carlyle's French Revolution, which, be it noted, is newly published. Referring to its style the writer says:

"A most original book; original not least in its complete sincerity, its disregard of the merely conventional: every idea and sentiment is given out exactly as it is thought and felt, fresh from the soul of the writer, and in such language (conformable to precedent or not) as is most capable of representing in the form in which it exists there. And hence the critics have begun to call the style 'affected'; a term which conventional people, whether in literature or society, invariably bestow upon the unreservedly natural."

This is kind and enlightened, but the writer has even more of our gratitude for the following footnote, the interest of which lies not so much in its defence of the author of Henrietta Temple from the same charge, as in its reflection of the views then held as to how conversation in fiction should be written. Referring to the misuse of the term "affected" as applied to style, the writer says:

"Mr. D'Israeli, a writer of considerable literary daring, tried in his novel, Henrietta Temple, one of the boldest experiments he had yet ventured upon—that of making his lovers and his other characters speak naturally the language of real talk, not dressed-up talk; such language as all persons talk who are not in the presence of an audience. A questionable experiment—allowable as an experiment, but scarcely otherwise; for the reader does not want pure nature, but nature idealised; nobody wants the verbiage, the repetitions and slovenlinesses of real conversation, but only the substance of what is interesting in such conversation, divested of these. There was much which might have been said by critics against Mr. D'Israeli's experiment; but what did they say? 'Affectation!'—that was their cry. Natural conversation in print looked so unnatural to men of artificiality; it was so unlike all their experience—of books!"

Thackeray's name does not crop up; but it must be remembered that his first book, The Paris Sketch Book, did not appear until 1840. In June, 1837, Thackeray is living with his young wife in Great Coram-street, and contributing to the newspapers, particularly to the ill-fated Constitutional, which died a month later. It is interesting to note also that he writes the review of Carlyle's French Revolution in the Times.

Mr. Murray, Mr. Bentley, Mr. Colburn, and Messrs. Longman & Co. are the most active publishers of books in this month sixty years ago. Mr. John Murray, the first, is advertising Hallam's Literary History of Europe, vol. i.; Lord Mahon's History of England, vols. i. and ii.; and the whole of Byron's works in one volume at twenty shillings. Mr. Bentley is very busy, and is advertising Theodore Hook's Jack Brag and Samuel Lover's Rory o' More as new novels. He is also issuing Fenimore Cooper's England; With Sketches of Society in the Metropolis. The book consists of letters which Cooper had written to his friends during his residence in England. The following paragraph, which we have noted in a random inspection of it, reads quaintly:

"I was passing through Pall Mall, shortly after the town became so crowded, when I saw a mermaid combing her hair before a small mirror, as the crest on a chariot that stood at a door, and I at once thought I recognised the arms of Sir Walter Scott. On examining nearer, I found the bloody hand, which left no doubt that the literary baronet was in town."

This experience, of course, dates back some years earlier than 1837, probably to 1826, when Scott was lodging in Pall Mall. In June, 1837, Mr. Cadell and Mr. Murray have already issued three volumes of Lockhart's Life, and are announcing the fourth, and last, to be ready on the first day of July.

Mr. Henry Colburn, of Great Marlborough-street, is bringing out Captain Marryat's Snarleyyow, a new illustrated edition of which was issued a week or two ago by Messrs. Macmillan. Snarleyyow has been running in the Metropolitan Magazine. Mr. Colburn is also pushing Venetia.

Messrs. Longman & Co. have a good list, and are issuing the fourth volume of Southey's curious and erudite work, The Doctor. One paper, reviewing it, thinks that the author "if he be not positively mad, is certainly one of the most pedantic, egotistical, and vain non-descripts of the age." This is not a representative criticism, any more than this survey of literary doings and opinions in June, 1837, is representative of the whole literary field at that period. But a cross-section is always interesting.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

Dream Tales and Prose Poems. By Ivan Turgenev. Translated from the Russian by Constance Garnett. (Heinemann.)

The dream tales comprised in this, the tenth volume of Turgenev's novels, are four. Let me take one, "Phantoms." The story is of a man who became the object of amiable attentions on the part of a lady-phantom called Alice. Two nights in succession, "with motionless eyes in a motionless face and a gaze full of sadness," she visited him and besought him to meet her. Upon the third night he fearfully betook himself to the spot she had named.

"As I approached her, the moon shone out again. She seemed all as it were spun out of half-transparent, milky mist—through her face I could see a branch faintly stirred in the wind. . . .

"I love you," I heard her whisper. . . . "Only say two words: Take me." . . .

"I had hardly uttered the words when the mysterious figure, with a sort of inward laugh which set her face quivering for an instant, bent forward and stretched out her arms wide apart. . . . She seized me; my body rose a foot from the ground, and we both floated smoothly, and not too swiftly, over the wet, still grass."

The pace increases and the height. This night excursion is followed by others: "Alice" cannot fly by day. Wherever there is night he is carried swiftly, according to his choice, in her embrace. She shows him seas and cities; she teaches him to call up the great dead, too; and she gives him a glimpse of the ancient gods. And daily he grows weaker, while Alice ceases to be transparent, and he saw in her eyes something astir, "with the slow, continuous, malignant movement of the benumbed snake, twisting and turning as the sun begins to thaw it." At last one night, as they were nearing home after a long flight, he saw Alice's face distorted with terror.

"I turned my head in the direction in which her trembling hand was pointing, and discerned something. . . .

" . . . Something bulky, dark, yellowish-black, spotted like a lizard's belly . . . was crawling with a snake-like motion over the earth. A wide, rhythmic, undulating movement from above downwards and from below upwards—an undulation recalling the malignant sweep of the wings of a vulture . . . ; at times an indescribable, revolting grovelling on the earth, as of a spider stooping over its captured fly. . . . A putrefying, pestilential chill came from it. . . . It was a power moving, that power which there is no resisting, to which all is subject, which, sightless, shapeless, senseless, sees all, knows all. . . .

" . . . And meanwhile, in pursuit of us, parting from the indescribable mass of horror, rushed [a] sort of long undulating tentacles, like outstretched arms, like talons."

To quote mere fragments of a whole so highly wrought is to do an inevitable injustice. You read with horror and uplifted hair. You are in the dream atmosphere; incongruities and discrepancies trouble you not; you have ceased to demand coherence and co-ordination. If, when the mood has passed, you seek between the lines for some ethical significance, it is not easy to verify any hypothesis. It is a riot of the imagination; at that you must be content to take it; and, indeed, what else is a dream? In the other stories the human factor is stronger; and the first presents a strong and wonderful picture of a woman, quite alive.

But the most striking portion of the volume is, to my mind, that section devoted to the prose poems. Here is one of them, almost entire; one must not split diamonds:

"Over the mountain a pale-green, clear, dumb sky. Bitter, cruel frost; hard, sparkling snow; sticking out of the snow the sullen peaks of the ice-covered, wind-swept mountains, . . . the Jungfrau and the Finsteraarhorn. And the Jungfrau speaks to its neighbour: 'What canst thou tell that is new? . . .'

"A few thousand years go by: one minute; and the Finsteraarhorn roars back in answer, 'Thick clouds cover the earth. Wait a little.'

"Thousands more years go by: one minute.

"Well, and now?" asks the Jungfrau.

"Now I see: there below all is the same. There are blue waters, black forests, grey heaps of piled-up stone. Among them are still fussing to and fro the insects, thou knowest, the bipeds that have never yet once defiled thee nor me." . . .

"Thousands of years go by: one minute.

"Well, and now?" asks the Jungfrau.

" . . . It is clearer down below; the waters have shrunk, the forests are thinner.' Again thousands of years go by: one minute.

"What seest thou?" says the Jungfrau.

"Close about us it seems purer," answers the Finsteraarhorn, 'but there in the distance in the valleys are still spots, and something is moving.'

"And now?" asks the Jungfrau, after more thousands of years: one minute.

"Now it is well; . . . it is clean everywhere, quite white wherever you look. Everywhere is our snow, unbroken snow and ice. Everything is frozen. It is well now, it is quiet." . . .

"The huge mountains sleep; the green, clear sky sleeps over the region of eternal silence."

It is a contemptuous hopelessness: has passed beyond sorrow. Other sketches are animated by a kind of helpless pity, as the tale of the "Cabbage Soup"; but satire fierce and bitter is the dominant note. How competently Mrs. Garnett has done the work of translation the passages I have quoted from this creepy volume will suffice to show. In descriptive passages her rendering sometimes approaches distinction. But do Russian officers habitually wear epaulettes upon their breast?

* * * *

A Nineteenth Century Miracle. By Z. Z. (Louis Zangwill). (Chatto & Windus.)

This is a mystery indeed. Robert Ashfield, a City tea merchant, is washed overboard in mid-Channel, at half-past twelve one Wednesday night. About one o'clock he is precipitated through the top light of the studio of Mr. John Clinton in St. John's Wood. At first Mr. Clinton, who is roused from sleep by the crash, takes him for a burglar who has met with death in the exercise of his calling; but the corpse is presently identified by a tailor as the respectable and wealthy Ashfield, who had left Dover on the previous night for Ostend. The wife and many more add their recognitions. At the inquest the doctors declare with one voice that though Ashfield was found dead among the wreckage of Mr. Clinton's roof, the symptoms were those of death by drowning, and the stomach was full of sea-water. The evidence is given at length, but there is only one clue—in the statement of the porter on duty at the pier gate at Dover on the eventful night. He had sworn that Mr. Ashfield had not returned after passing to the boat.

"The Coroner: You are perfectly sure you noticed everybody who passed out?"

"The Witness: Certainly, sir.

"The Coroner: You were not talking to anybody?"

"The Witness: Only to — No, sir; nobody in particular.

"The Coroner: Oh, then you were talking to somebody?"

"The Witness (uneasily): Yes, sir.

"The Coroner: How, then, were you able to observe people so carefully?"

"The Witness: I was only talking just for a moment, sir.

"The Coroner: To whom were you talking?"

"The Witness (hesitating): To Mr. Barham, sir.

"The Coroner: Who is Mr. Barham?"

"The Witness (very uneasily): He's a—a—he's a hairynawrt.
 "The Coroner (puzzled): A hairy what?
 "The Witness (loudly): A hairynawr-r-r-t!
 "The Coroner (his face lighting up): An aéronaut, you mean?
 "The Witness: Yes, sir.
 "The Coroner: What was he doing on the quay?
 "The Witness (hesitating): He only came on for a chat."

Here, thinks the observant reader, is the explanation. I need only say that the observant reader is mistaken. So is the great detective who is brought on the scene to unravel the mystery, and who, with a deference to precedent which is perhaps hardly called for, bears the name of Warlock Jones. He fulfils the double part of a caricature and a means of keeping the interest alive. He has, of course, a "method."

"My acquired mental faculty went immediately to work the moment my brain had mastered all the details of the case. This faculty works with extraordinary rapidity; reasons exactly—without giving me the consciousness of mental effort; and furnishes me with the results at which it has arrived. So that what in another man would be suspicion and nothing more, in me becomes a conclusion based on the most rigorous and logical processes of thought."

Unfortunately, his logical processes lead him very far astray indeed—so far astray, that I fancy the great Sherlock would not have employed him as office boy. But his introduction into the book is quite consistent with Mr. Zangwill's plan. That seems very analogous to the system which the inventors of toy mazes must pursue. They first of all arrange their way in. Then they go on to devise as many blind alleys and lay down as many false scents as their space permits. So, Mr. Zangwill knows his secret; but, if I may mix the metaphors, he has determined that the reader shall have a good run for his six shillings. The "aeronaut" clue is one of the cunning by-paths up which the reader is invited; and there are plenty of others. It seems to me that Mr. Zangwill has sacrificed everything, or nearly everything, to this one feature of his book. The love, the humour, the pathos of it are all used as one might use the cubes in the Fifteen Puzzle. Hence it comes about that though A Nineteenth Century Miracle is not a great novel, it is as tantalising a problem as was ever bound in cloth. I prefer the enunciation to the solution of it; but no doubt there is bound to be a sense of disappointment when you expect an author to prove that two and two make five and he really shows that they are only four.

* * * * *

A Tale of Two Tunnels. By Clark Russell.
 (Chapman & Hall.)

Mr. Clark Russell is fertility itself. This is his second story within a fortnight, and I understand that yet a third is in the offing. I do not think that A Tale of Two Tunnels is at all upon Mr. Russell's best level. There is a minimum of the breezy, wholesome description of ships and sea-life, and a maximum of grotesque romance and inconceivable character. The hero is an insane sea-captain who robs his employers and spends the proceeds in fitting up a brig and a Cornish cave for piracy on the high seas. Meanwhile he elopes with an absurd young woman. This is Mr. Russell's way of describing Miss Conway:

"At this instant she entered. She leapt in a graceful bound from the bottom step of the short flight into the room, giving her body as many swings, though always of a stately sort, as you would expect to see in some lively princess on her entrance."

Conundrum: how many swings would you expect to see? Miss Conway accepts the ethics of piracy in the same unhesitating style. Her sea-captain has unfolded his daring scheme.

"It is bold, possible, and dishonourable," she said, with a subtle note of triumph in her voice, and the same high, encouraging colour of sympathy in her face.

"It is not dishonourable," said he calmly, "for an Englishman to rob a foreigner upon the seas where the Englishman has himself been most atrociously looted by most of the nations you can name. I must live by a dishonourable income or die by my own hand."

"He made a step to her, and taking her cheeks, gently lifted her face to his and said:

"My life is now in your hands, I have confessed all to the woman I love, have ever loved, shall ever love. Knowing my scheme, Ada, will you be my wife?"

"There was no hesitation in her answer, 'Yes.'"

"How could she resist his pleading presence, his manly candour with her, the love that lighted his eyes, the love that was now the single impulse of her life? Worthier women for more worthless men have consented to go to the devil."

It is a pity that Mr. Clark Russell, with all his undeniable merits in other directions, cannot escape from so unreal and childish a parody of human nature. But he has done much better work than A Tale of Two Tunnels.

* * * * *

Salted with Fire. By George Macdonald.
 (Hurst & Blackett.)

It is refreshing to come back—it seems a long way back—to Dr. Macdonald's grave and simple style of fiction. Nor do I regret to find it applied once more to grave and simple themes; to the aptitudes for sin and repentance in the average human heart. This is a story of the hiding of a sin. James Blatherwick, a superior, self-righteous youth, with an unlovely blindness to the sterling qualities of his less cultured parents, is studying for the Church. He is studying in his Edinburgh lodgings, and growing fond of his landlady's daughter, when we make his acquaintance. Isy is a nice creature, and her heart has gone out to her aunt's lodger. Young Blatherwick's only course was to quench in Isy's innocent breast the hope he did not mean to fulfil. But when he undeceived her, it was to deceive her finally. Isy's tears, her clinging, and the sorrow into which his rough words threw her, carried him away in a whirlwind of returning, but reckless, tenderness, and "at the very moment when a genuine love would have hastened to surround the woman with bulwarks of safety he ceased to regard himself as his sister's keeper." On the eve of his first sermon before his class young Blatherwick makes an addition to the shame and misery of a world to which he is destined to preach restraint and purity.

The next stage of the story is concerned with Isy's long disappearance, and young Blatherwick's cowardly satisfaction therein. While the girl resolves not to cross his path again, lest she should be a hindrance to his career, Blatherwick entrenches himself in a false repentance, and adds to a sin of passion the worse sin of neglect. But the rôle of hypocrite proves a terrible one to play, and especially in his own village, where his parents keenly perceive that he is a divided man. Here also is a shoemaker saint who reads hearts with almost more than human vision. To this man the unhappy Blatherwick, now the unfruitful minister of the village, comes again and again like a moth to the flame. One day he orders a pair of half-Wellington's which he does not want, and plunges into an argument on the duty of confession. The scene is a very strong one. Nearer and nearer he steers the talk to his guilty secret. "Suppose," he says at last—and old MacLear has already grown strangely attentive—

"suppose the thing not known, however, or likely to be known, and that the man's confession, instead of serving any good end, would only destroy his reputation and usefulness, bring bitter grief upon those who loved him, and nothing but shame to the one he had wronged—what would you say then? You will please remember, Mr. MacLear, that I am putting an entirely imaginary case, for the sake of argument only!"

After some probing observations the shoemaker replies:

"It seems to me the offender wud hae to cast aboot him for ane fit to be trustit, and to him reveal the haill affair, that he may get his help to see and do what's richt: it maks an unco differ to luik at a thing throw anither man's een i' the supposed licht o' anither man's conscience! The wrang dune may hae caused mair evil, that is, mair injustice, nor the man himsel kens! And what's the reputation ye speak o', or what's the eesefu'ness o' sic a man? Can it be worth onything? Isna his hoose a lee? isna it biggit upo' the san'? What kin' o' a usefulness can that be that has hypocrisy for its foundation? Awa' wi't! Lat him cry oot to a' the warl', 'I'm a heepocrit! I'm a worm, and no man!' Lat him cry oot to his Makker, 'I'm a beast afore Thee! Mak' a man o' me!'"

"As the soutar spoke, overcome by sympathy with the sinner, whom he could not help feeling in bodily presence before him, the minister, who, risen when he began to talk about the English clergy and confession, stood hearing with a face pale as death."

How the unendurable life on which Blatherwick had entered is finally straightened out and himself made humble and strong, and Isy a happy woman, I shall not tell. I must, however, express the opinion that whatever is gained to the story by Isy's subsequent

Emerson's Bromo Seltzer

Cures

H
E
A
D
A
C
H
E

What distinguishes Emerson's Bromo Seltzer from all other headache medicines is being a direct cure. Other medicines cure, or attempt to cure, headache by getting at something else, supposed to be associated with the headache. Emerson's Bromo Seltzer goes straight to business, and cures the headache itself. It is an effervescent powder taken in water. If three doses don't cure any headache, we give you the money back! Sold by most Chemists, 7d., 1/1 $\frac{1}{2}$, and 2/3. Emerson Drug Company, Limited.

TALKS ON THE TEETH.--No. 3.

To clean the teeth properly, remember that they must be brushed up and down, as well as backwards and forwards, and something used on the tooth-brush that will penetrate to the crevices and inter-spaces. Ordinary tooth pastes and so on are of no use for this. Some of them would be all right "if it wasn't for the spaces in between"; but SOZODONT and SOZODONT alone will keep these spaces clean. The spaces matter: bits of food can't lodge on the front of the teeth: it is the spaces that hold them:

Another thing is, that SOZODONT sweetens everything it touches; it is so agreeable to use, and makes the mouth feel so nice afterwards, that you find it no trouble to clean the teeth twice a day; and twice is the proper number of times--night and morning. SOZODONT gives you sound teeth, healthy, rose-red gums and breath that is always sweet. Sold everywhere at 2s. 6d.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors, New York.

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's

SWISS

MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK, BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely
proof against Carrying Disease.

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes:
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c., &c.

MAYPOLE SOAP

For Home Dyeing.

Dyes any Colour.

For Dyeing Silks, Satins, Velvets, Cottons Feathers, Lace Goods, Wool, &c.

Such as Lace Curtains, Antimacassars, Toilet Mats, Blouses, Dresses, Underlinen, Ribbons, Children's Frocks, Pinafores, Lamp Shades,
Silk Scarves, Handkerchiefs, Gentlemen's Shirts,
Silk Gloves, Stockings, Shawls, &c., &c.

4d. per Tablet, all Colours. Black 6d. Sold Everywhere.

THE MAYPOLE COMPANY, Ltd.,

98 AND 99, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

illness in the home of her weak lover's parents would have been gained without the sensational device of suspending her in a death-like trance for a fortnight, and without the grotesque circumstances attending the introduction of a coffin which she never needs.

* * * *

The Mistress of the Ranch. By Frederick Thickstone Clark.
(Sampson Low, Marston & Co.)

Mr. Clark has chosen for his background the Rocky Mountains of Colorado, and his people reflect the roughness and strength of their environment. Their speech is the picturesque dialect of the Far West; the characters are few in number, but they all have individuality. From the first sentence to the last the attention is held and fascinated. To describe the plot would be to spoil the reader's pleasure in its gradual unfolding. It is enough to say that the sudden growth of a temptation in the heart of a selfish woman is portrayed with considerable power. Phoebe Ellen and Anny Thompson are sisters widely different in disposition. Through what tragic happenings Phoebe is enabled to usurp her sister's position does not lie within the scope of this notice to describe. The Boston doctor, dying of consumption, bracing himself with brandy to perform a critical operation involving life and death, sustained in his physical weakness by a passion of professional ambition to do something that shall make his life worthy to have been lived, and dying before he knows whether he has succeeded or failed, is strongly drawn. Sam Tinker, the cowboy, with his giant strength and his patient love, is a worthy hero. The following description of his mad midnight ride against time, by which he is enabled to rescue Anny, is an example of the author's vigorous style:

"The outward fling of the fore-feet comes regular and strong, and the answering crash as they strike the ground sends no uncertain quiver through the slim, firm back. Sam sits with his knees screwed into the animal's ribs, his hand on the bridle—not for guidance, but encouragement; he feels the beast's sympathy along the leathern thong, as if it were an electric wire; his lips are drawn, his nostrils wide, his teeth set, his eyes fixed. From the crown of his head to the sole of his foot he is the embodiment of a terrible purpose. . . ."

The book is not all tragedy; it abounds in humorous scenes and studies of character that have been well observed.

* * * *

The Earth Children. By Mrs. Stephen Batson.
(Hutchinson & Co.)

MRS. BATSON'S new story reminds me of Mrs. Margaret Woods's memorable "Village Tragedy," and the comparison is one which does her honour. There is real literary art in her picture of this rustic love-making and betrayal, and its tragic end. I am inclined to say that it is inspired by Mrs. Woods's fine original, modified by the influence of Mr. Hardy. The portrait of Lil Goodeve is a notable one, and Dick Jennings is a real country lad—a beautiful character and a fine study. The sweethearting of these two, from childhood up, is described by Mrs. Batson with much tenderness and insight. Lil's hair, according to Fanny Brown and other malevolent girls, was red—it was a perpetual cause of offence:

"'Em be golden,' murmured Dick, as he kissed her curly locks again. 'Em be carrots,' said his sweetheart mischievously. 'Em be golden,' protested Dick stoutly. 'No; they bain't. They be carrots.' 'Well, if you say so, Lil—p'raps 'em be,' said Dick waveringly. It was only by force of love that he had been persuaded on the point. 'Em be what?' demanded Lil. 'Carrots,' answered Dick—'if you says so, Lil.' 'Carrots!' cried Lil, jumping to her feet in a fury, her eyes flashing fire. 'Do you say, Dick Jennin's, as my hair be carrots?' 'Twas you said so,' said Dick pertly. He never was prepared for Lil's sudden rages. 'Didn't you say 'twas carrots?' 'Well, I did, Lil; but—' 'I don't want your buts. Did you tell me my hair was carrots?' 'I said carrots when you axed me—' Dick smiled uncertainly as he spoke, and tried to pass his arm round her waist again; but she broke from him and faced him like the spitfire that she was. 'Narn of your blarney, Dick Jennin's; did you say 'em was carrots, or didn't you?' 'Yes, I did,' said Dick miserably. 'An' you purfess to love me! Go to Fanny Brown; go on off to she. Don't stop here, I pray of 'ee; I ain't got no call for a sweetheart as ain't a real sweetheart.' 'But I be a real sweetheart, my dear,' said Dick pleadingly. 'No you ain't! To call a girl's hair carrots!' 'But, Lil, I didn't—' 'An' you said just now as you did!' 'Taint no good a talkin',' said Dick sullenly. 'I shall go whoam.' 'I knowed it!' cried Lil, bursting into tears. 'I knowed you didn't love me, an'

I loved you so, dear!' 'But I do loff 'ee.' 'Tis a lie.' 'Gimme a kiss, Lil.' 'Sha—an't.' 'Do 'ee kiss me.' 'Sha—an't.' Dick stole his arm round her waist. 'Gi'e out!' sobbed Lil, as she yielded to his caress."

This is simple and good, and it is typical of the simple, straightforward telling of the story. Clement Drury, the commercial traveller, who marries, or pretends to marry, Lil, while Dick is in prison for poaching, is cleverly drawn too. And the tragic conclusion is inevitable, and quite fine. This is a little book which I advise everyone to read who likes good writing and a dramatic human story.

JOAQUIN MILLER,

THE POET OF THE SIERRAS.

California has produced four great men of letters, says The Anti-Philistine—namely, Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Ambrose Bierce, and Joaquin Miller. Nearly five-and-twenty years ago a great wave of enthusiasm swept from London to the Golden Gate of San Francisco, proclaiming that a new poet had been born. Joaquin Miller had just published in London his immortal Song of the Sierras with the oft-quoted keynote—

"So I have said, and I say it over,
And can prove it over and over again,
That the four-footed beasts on the red-crowned clover,
The fierce and horned beasts of the plain,
That lie down, rise up, and repose again,
And do never take care, or toil, or spin,
Nor buy, nor build, nor gather in gold,
Though the days go out, and the tides come in,
Are better than we by a thousand fold,
For what is it all, in the words of fire,
But a vexing of soul, and a vain desire?"

Of the incomparable four he is the only one who has permanently returned to California, to buy his land and make him a home on the hill-side of the land he loves best. It is an odd, beautiful spot on the Oakland hills facing San Francisco, away from the paths of men, and the fogs that clasp the lower world in their embrace. Each room of the place he calls home is built under a separate roof, no two people sojourning in the same spot. One of these quaint dovecots has been set apart for his mother for her own as long as she lives. In the valley below is his crematory, a stone pile, where he is to be burnt at his death, at the cost of only enough wood to reduce him to ashes. Within his tent-like home of one room are his treasures, but not one book, not even his own. He prefers to dwell with nature and not with man. In the following sketch of "Robert Browning" Joaquin Miller relates some of his experiences when engaged in storming literary London:

"How I came to know Robert Browning and his kind, or why Fate, so terribly cruel to me as a rule, should have so favoured me, will to the end be to me a miracle. . . . And so I must ascribe it all to the great good English heart; for nothing in the world is nearly so warm as the inside of the English house and heart, and few things are so cold on the outside. I had left Oregon almost without money and, of course, without letters. Bret Harte, in San Francisco, had helped me get permission to try to write letters for a San Francisco paper from the Franco-Prussian war, then raging, and with this and my rhymes I set out. . . . But finding no remittances forthcoming for my work I accepted the conviction that my battle-field letters had been tumbled into the basket unread (as, indeed, was the case), and so set about the impossible task of finding a publisher for my poems; finally pawned my watch, and so got out one hundred copies, called 'Pacific Poems,' published without a publisher. . . . When the notices of my one hundred poems came out I had my pick of London publishers. Two bright and thoroughbred Oxford gentlemen named the new book Songs of the Sierras, and revised it for me, for my eyes had failed from an old attack of snow-blindness in Idaho, aggravated by a winter of London smoke, anxiety, hunger, and hard work. . . . Mind you, no one knew I was poor. My poverty was my own business, and I kept it to myself. There is but one thing more vulgar than a display of wealth, and that is a display of poverty. But I reckon that I was thought to be rich, like all Americans there, as a rule, and none but those two young friends knew, nor did they half know, my sufferings from my blinding eyes. Soon after launching my new book these two young friends came out to see me, where I sat in darkness and pain, and read my letters to me. 'Your fortune is made,' cried one. 'Here is a letter from Trench, Archbishop of Dublin, to meet Browning at breakfast.' And this is the long-short story of how I first came to meet Robert Browning."

SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1897.

No. 1312, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom.	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

THIS week we chronicle the fact that we have nothing to chronicle. Wordsworth thought the world is too much with us, but it is not very easy to think so in a week of national pride and rejoicing. Rather let us substitute "books" for "world," and we shall still have a truth. For the cessation of books may enable us to see that books also are too much with us. How uncommonly well people have been able to dispense with them this week! More than that, how small a place literature takes in the history of the Victorian era when it comes to celebrating and trumpet-blowing! We think of railways, telegraphs, the penny post, and ironclads, and twenty other things before we think of books. And literature itself, so far as it contributes to the Jubilee rejoicings, points, in its odes and songs, to these practical achievements. The white light of the Jubilee, searching our lives and collective history, only proves once more that the welfare of the human race depends as much as ever on men of action. There was architecture, and agriculture, and hydraulics, and generalship, and sovereignty in the world long before there was a single book on these subjects, and the men who have most successfully shaped human destinies through these channels have been, as a rule, small readers. What, indeed, has the man who is set on practical or desperate ventures to gain from books? Brutus reading in his tent on the eve of Philippi may make a noble impression on the mind, but when, next day, he is lying dead on the field and Mark Antony is victor, it occurs to one that probably Antony carried no library. But literature knows its place in the order of things. Its highest forms, the epic and the drama, are precisely those which celebrate or describe the actions and struggles of men. Homer, Virgil, Dante, Shakespeare—what were their themes? Did they write books about books? They may be almost said to have written books about bookless men. The great writer is, we may be sure, great only in proportion as he remains a normal man in his sympathies. At bottom he would rather dig than write. It is at a time like this that the mists rise from minds beset with books, and the few grand forms of the great writers stand out, eloquent of the beauty of life, its struggles, and its jubilees.

We do not suggest that we have no books around us. On the contrary, our European friends, anxious, perhaps, to moderate the English Jubilee delirium, have deposited a quite unusual mass of publications on our table. France seeks to divert our gaze from our own glorious history with a ponderous work, entitled Histoire Politique de l'Europe Contemporaine, 1814-1896, by Charles Seignobos. M. Seignobos does us the compliment of discussing "L'Ancien Régime Anglais" first in order. From the house of Calmann Lévy comes Trois Années de la Question d'Orient: 1856-1859. We shall, no doubt, return to la question d'Orient at our early convenience, though we fancy that English interest in it will be dated differently. Histoire de la Littérature latine, by René Picton, is a book of 986 pages, and we shall examine it again when the Jubilee and the heat are past. A present from Berlin is Die chromatische Alteration im liturgischen Gerang der abendländischen Kirche. St. Petersburg sends us two books, with unprintable titles, the publisher marking each with the words—"Specimen for recension." The word recension may be strange to most of our readers, but our St. Petersburg correspondent uses it correctly. From Ghent comes an historical study of the Inquisition in the Netherlands; from Rome the current Nuova Antologia Rivista di Scienze, Lettere ed Arti. For all these favours we are grateful; but our thoughts remain at home, and we are more interested in our foreign visitors than in foreign books.

P.S.—Three Jubilee odes come to us as we are going to press. Messrs. Macmillan have sent Victoria, June 20, 1837—June 20, 1897, by Mr. Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate; the Clarendon Press send Prof. W. J. Courthope's Ode in Commemoration of the Sixtieth Year of the Reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and from Mr. John Lane comes Jubilee Greeting at Spithead to the Men of Greater Britain, by Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton. The taste for courtiers' odes is an acquired one, and we yet only stumble towards acquisition. Loyalty paralyses criticism. There is but one opinion of this kind of composition that is of any consequence, whatever, and that is Her Majesty's. The ode which Her Majesty likes best is the best ode. It may, however, be stated here that the Laureate has in his official poem returned to his rural manner. He begins:

The lark went up.

After a considerable number of natural phenomena have been mentioned, the Queen is introduced as "a summer maid," and invested with sovereignty. She then says:

With the dread Summons, since 'tis Heaven's decree,

I would not palter, even if I could;

But, being a woman only, I can be

Not great, but good.

The Diamond Jubilee bore so much upon Victoria's greatness that we feel that Mr. Austin has been unfortunate in his stanza. The poem is in the main smooth and lucid.

Prof. Courthope's ode represents the feeling of Oxford. It has dignity and sound scholarly virtues. This is the close:

Crowned with the joys and sorrows of Old Age,
Throned in the centre of Thy Kingdom's cares,

Take this last tribute from Thy Heritage:

The gift Thine England sends, Thine Isis bears—
Love, Homage, Reverence, Benediction, Prayers

That, through the grace of Heaven's Almighty Power,

Thy Realms, Thy Joys, Thy Days, may yet increase;

Then wait with quiet mind the coming hour,

When Cares, and Sorrows, and Old Age shall cease,

And the long reign of Time close in eternal peace.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

THE MOHAMMEDAN CONTROVERSY: BIOGRAPHIES OF MOHAMMED, SPRENGER OF TRADITION, THE INDIAN LITURGY, AND THE PSALTER. By Sir William Muir, K.C.S.I. T. & T. Clark (Edinburgh).

POETRY.

ESTABLISH, AND OTHER VERSE. By John Stuart Thomson. William Briggs (Toronto).

HOPE AND BROTHERHOOD. By William Platt. Clarion Office. 6d.

FICTION.

AN ELECTRIC SHOCK, AND OTHER STORIES. By E. Gerard. William Blackwood & Sons.

EDUCATIONAL.

MACAULAY'S LAYS OF ANCIENT ROME. Edited by R. L. A. Du Pontet, B.A. Edward Arnold.

TRAVEL AND GEOGRAPHY.

HANDY GUIDE-BOOK TO ENGLAND AND WALES. By Edward Smith. George Allen.

MEDICINE.

LECTURES ON THE ACTION OF MEDICINES. By T. Lander Brunton. Macmillan & Co. 10s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE TEACHING OF MORALITY IN THE FAMILY AND THE SCHOOL. By Sophie Bryant, D.Sc. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

NAVAL ADMINISTRATIONS: 1827 to 1893. By the late Sir John Henry Briggs. Sampson Low.

TALES OF THE SUN-LAND. By Verner Z. Reed. Continental Publishing Co.

THE ABOLITION OF PRIVATERRING, AND THE DECLARATION OF PARIS. By Francis R. Stark. Columbia University (New York).

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL INDEX OF SWEDENBORG'S WRITINGS. The Swedenborg Society.

GRAMMAR EXPLAINED ACCORDING TO THE ORDER OF IDEAS. By Rev. J. A. Dewe. Elliot Stock.

THE ROYAL NAVY. By a Lieutenant, R.N. With a Preface by Sir J. E. Commerell, V.C. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1s.

THE AERONAUTICAL 'ANNUAL: 1897. Edited by James Means. W. B. Clarke & Co. (Boston, Mass.).

MARIA CANDELARIA: AN HISTORIC DRAMA. By Daniel G. Brinton, M.D. David McKay (Philadelphia).

SONGS AND TALES OF ST. COLUMBA AND HIS AGE. Patrick Geddes & Colleagues (Edinburgh).

NOTES AND NEWS.

THERE is still so much uncertainty concerning the actual condition of Mark Twain (a eulogy of whom will be found on another page) that it may be as well to recapitulate the facts. A few weeks ago the rumour was circulated in America that Mark Twain was dying in London; some papers even said that he was dead. The New York Herald, therefore, caused inquiries to be made, and one of their representatives called on Mark Twain in London. He found him in his Chelsea lodgings in good health, and discovered that the mistake concerning his illness had arisen through the confusion of the humorist with another, Mr. Clemens, his cousin, who had been ill.

IN the course of his visit, and also from private sources, it was, however, made clear to the interviewer that Mark Twain is in distress. The task which, after his bankruptcy proceedings in 1895, he set himself of beginning the laborious task of building up a fortune sufficient to enable him to pay off the debts of the publishing firm in which he was partner has been too great. Mark Twain is in his sixth decade, and much of his old robustness has vanished. Moreover, a few months ago his daughter died and he has never recovered from the shock.

THESE being the facts the New York Herald promptly decided to call on Mark Twain's countrymen to show in a practical manner their sympathy for the writer who has done so much for their entertainment. The appeal was issued on Sunday, June 13, the Herald heading the list of subscriptions with a thousand dollars. Since then the sum has steadily grown, and support has been received from all parts of the United States. One fellow-author, Mr. H. S. Edwards, wrote: "One relief expedition to London to rescue Mark Twain from his cheap English boarding-house is worth a hundred sent in search of the North Pole."

IF the fund is as successful as it promises to be, the motto which Mark Twain wrote beneath what he considers the best photograph of himself will have to be modified. "Be good and you will be lonesome," he wrote.

MARK TWAIN'S forthcoming book, due about Christmas, is to be called The Surviving Innocent Abroad. It is true, he says, that other members of the party who left America in the Quaker City some twenty-eight years ago are still living, but he is the only one who has remained innocent.

MESSRS. OSGOOD, McILVAINE & Co. inform us that they have amalgamated their business with that of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, and that such business will henceforth be carried on by, and under the style of, Harper & Brothers. Mr. Clarence W. McIlvaine, as a Vice-President of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, will in that capacity have charge of the London house.

AMONG the articles contained in the July number of the Genealogical Magazine will be one by Rev. A. W. C. Hallen, on "Circumstantial Evidence in Heraldry"; and one by Mr. H. Murray Lane on "Lane of Bentley Manor," whose family saved King Charles after the battle of Worcester.

AN American friend of Mr. R. D. Blackmore sends to the Boston Literary World some passages from a recent letter of the novelist. Mr. Blackmore's is among the sturdiest of English intellects, strong and wholesome and dogmatic, and anything that he says has blood in it and is interesting. Concerning rumours of a recent illness he writes:

"Who set those reports agoing about my (supposed) ill-health I know not, and have not taken the trouble to contradict them; though many good friends have been put to the trouble of inquiring where no cause was. Except that I cannot walk much, through some sciatic affection or muscular degeneration, there has been nothing for a querulous mortal to groan about all the winter."

We are glad to have this testimony from his own hand.

MR. BLACKMORE goes on to give some facts about his new romance "Dariel," which is now running in Blackwood:

"Dariel—the name of perhaps the finest pass on earth, through the centre of Caucasus—is pronounced, I believe, as a tribrach—i.e., with all three syllables short. . . . I am sorry that D. M. & Co. intend to illustrate it, for never yet saw I any illustrations that helped to tell my stories. The last number of the tale is to be in the October Blackwood's; when the book is to appear I do not know. Although it has all been typewritten long ago, I am so dissatisfied with the last few chapters that I have rewritten them more than once, and they are not fairly settled now. But I am convinced more and more that there is a lot of luck, as well as skill, in the handling of every line, no less than in the plan and formation of the whole."

The opinion of most authors concerning the illustration of stories must be similar to Mr. Blackmore's.

FINALLY, he has a nice little outburst on, the dignity of fiction.

"Nine people out of ten speak, with happy contempt, of a novel as a trumpery concoction. Some man, the other day—a leading reviewer—said to me, 'Oh, I never care to review a novel! A work of history has some interest. Facts, facts are the things to deal with.' I asked him if there was any occurrence, or any character in so called history, about which opinions diametrically opposite were not held by inquirers of equal intelligence; and I told him that I had been an eye-witness of two incidents, reported the very next day in the papers, and that I could hardly recognise either as meant for an account of what I had seen. What then of narratives centuries after the events, and generally from pens made to fit into some pocket? But for generations yet to come fiction will be looked upon as a dolly for an infant."

Mr. Blackmore, by the way, is just seventy-two.

MR. QUILLER-ROUCH's competition in the Pall Mall Magazine has closed. He offered a guinea to the person who should state correctly the name of "the man (or woman) who is (or has been during the past ten years) master (or mistress) of the best style in English prose"; and at the same time he wrote his own selection on a piece of paper and enclosed it in an envelope. In the result 31 votes were given to Mr. Pater, 13 to Mr. Hardy, 12 to Mr. Stevenson, 11 to Mr. Ruskin, 9 to Mr. Lang, 7 each to Mr. Froude and Mr. Barrie, 6 each to Mr. Meredith and Mr. Kipling, 4 to Mr. Henry James, and 3 each to Matthew Arnold, Sir Walter Besant, Mr. Conan Doyle, and Miss Marie Corelli. A great number of writers received 2 and 1.

THE correct answer was Mr. Andrew Lang, and one-ninth of a guinea has gone to the nine persons who named him. Mr. Couch, in his justification of this choice, holds that Mr. Lang has more of the Attic quality than any living writer of English. Xenophon, he adds, will do to compare with Mr. Lang.

"If," said Prof. Gilbert, the other day, in his little book on Ancient Greek Literature. 'Xenophon became in Roman times a model of Atticism, it is due to his ancient simplicity and ease, his inaffectata jucunditas. He is Attic in the sense that he has no bombast, and that he can speak interestingly on many subjects without raising his voice.' Add a touch of lace to the coat, qualify the simplicity with scholarship, and the jucunditas with the sophisticated modishness of modern humour, and you have a description that will serve for Mr. Lang."

This parallel is passable, as parallels go. But when are we to have Mr. Lang's Anabasis?

LAST Tuesday's Chronicle contained a letter which in the press of Jubilee matter escaped the notice it merits. This neglect shall be part of our justification for quoting from it. The other part is the light it sheds upon the open-air prowess of certain literary men who are better known as wielders of the pen than the bat. There is so much tendency abroad to consider an author capable only of desk work and talk that any testimony to the contrary is valuable. And when Dr. Grace, Prince Ranjitsinhji, Mr. W. W. Read, and Robert Abel can all produce books it is time to insist upon the skill of writers at cricket.

THIS letter endeavours to preserve certain incidents in the recent historic match between the Allahibaris eleven and the Broadway eleven. Allahibaris is the title chosen by a band of literary cricketers. It is Persian, and means "The Lord help us." Mr. Barrie, who is captain, prefers to spell it Allahibarries. The Broadway team, which is represented chiefly by Mr. Alfred Parsons and Mr. F. D. Millet, consists of artists. The match was played at Broadway, among the Cotswolds, on Monday.

PARTICULARS of the match, contributed by a member of the Allahibaris, follow:

"The innings of my own side, I may say, was most brilliant. The captain scored 1 rapidly, and seemed set for a lengthy innings, when on the next delivery he was bowled. A large number of wickets were down for 3 runs, when Mr. Conan Doyle became associated with the editor of your esteemed journal [Mr. Massingham]. The ensuing partnership was of the most remarkable character. Mr. Doyle despatched the ball among the surrounding heights for 4's, while the editor obstructed his wicket with a successful maladroitness unparalleled in the history of modern cricket. The innings closed for 74, of which 46 were off Mr. Doyle's bat."

BROADWAY went in, and Mr. Conan Doyle's bowling "carried all before it, until, at the fall of the seventh wicket, Mr. Plunket Greene played a forcing game. The ninth wicket fell on a tie—74. Mr. Herkomer and Mr. Millet were the batsmen, and the latter had already offered a stubborn defence to two succeeding balls of Mr. Doyle's." Mr. Barrie then attempted to put Mr. Doyle on at both ends, but was frustrated. "There was a stillness as of death, followed by a full pitch. It was driven by Mr. Herkomer for two. The game was won, and a shout went up from the pavilion that made the Cotswolds shiver. The next ball Mr. Herkomer was bowled! Mr. Millet carried out his bat for a finely played 0." "I may add," says the writer, "that the following morning at breakfast Mr. Barrie stated that by mental arithmetic he had arrived at the conclusion that the score of the Allahibaris was 78 and not 74, and that consequently they were the victorious team. The motion, however, was not seconded, and fell to the ground."

In this country the publisher allows him to be embarrassed and financially injured by the cycling craze. In America he is wiser. Messrs. Lippincott have just added bicycles to the stock-in-trade of their wholesale business.

THE July number of Macmillan's Magazine will contain an article on "Slavery in West Central Africa," by Major Mockler-Ferryman, who in 1889-90 acted as private secretary to Major (now Sir Claude) MacDonald on his special mission to West Africa to inquire into the working of the Royal Niger Company. It will also include a description of the Zoological Gardens at Amsterdam, by Mr. C. J. Cornish; and a mystical tale of the Eastern Seas, by Mr. Hugh Clifford, British Resident at the Malay State of Pahang.

A PHOTOGRAPHIC facsimile of the MS. of Omar Khayyam's Rubaiyat in the Bodleian Library, from which Edward Fitzgerald made his earliest studies of the subject, will shortly be published by Mr. H. S. Nichols. The photographs will be accompanied by a transcript of the MS. into modern Persian type, and by a literal translation and copious notes by Mr. Edward Heron-Allen.

The Antiquary for July will contain, among other articles, "The Hermitage Museum at St. Petersburg," "The Demolished Churches of York," and "The Instrument of the Pax."

LITERARY GLORY.

UGHT great writers to be decorated? If they ought, then Literature has been used despitely by the dispensers of Jubilee honours. The names of our authors, great or little, are not there. Mr. Lecky, to be sure, is a Privy Councillor, but the honour is done not to the writer alone, but to the writer prevailed upon to turn politician. Literature, therefore, is utterly abolished from the Honours List particularly designed to mark the glory of the sixty years of Victorian rule.

And yet the literary glory is a large part of the glory of any reign. "The spacious times of great Elizabeth" would never have been so described but for Elizabethan writers. "A book is a greater event than a battle," declares Disraeli, who ought to know, having produced both; and already Victorian wars are interesting chiefly for the place they have taken in our literary history. Would the survivors of the Charge of Balaclava itself have been given a view of Tuesday's window, even by advertising newspapers, if Tennyson had not written his verses? The life of "horse and hero" in popular memory will depend on Tennyson's place as a poet, and on this particular poem's place in his poetry. Similarly, Tennyson's dedication to the Queen may cause her to be remembered for centuries after the episodes of her career most noised abroad to-day have gone into oblivion. And then there is our friend the ballad-maker, whose precedence over even the law-makers is assigned in a popular proverb. This very pre-eminence of Men of Letters makes the absence of their names on the Honours List an odd thing in one way, but a very natural thing in another. They have their reward; and it is more than queens can give them.

No one supposes that Tennyson, whom a baronetcy did not tempt, added to his reputation by accepting a peerage. To saddle your descendants, who are not likely to be geniuses, with a title that has its origin in genius is to add another to the invidious hereditary burdens of mankind. Imagine the pity or the indignation with which a poor little Lord Shakespeare of to-day would be regarded at his club? If Tennyson gains nothing by a title, Wordsworth loses nothing by not having one; Keats loses nothing, nor Shelley either, neither would George Meredith gain anything, nor John Ruskin. The world will tolerate no prefix for such as these. If they were Lords or Sirs the title would be forgotten; assuredly they are Misterys no more.

"Mr." Shelley—Leigh Hunt calls him so for the last time in his preface to the Masque of Anarchy, after Shelley's death. There is no Mr. Wordsworth or Mr. Coleridge now. Let there be Lord Byron by all means; and if Scott's literary fame suffers declension, you shall know it by this sign—he will be spoken of more and more as "Sir Walter."

Still, if titles are a symbol of the nation's respect, people have the feeling that honour should go to those to whom it is most due. Titles, say some, should at least be offered to great authors if only to be by them refused. That is a hard doctrine, and how shall dispensers of titles bear it? You cannot ask them to cheapen their own wares. They must not see that going a-begging for which they desire that others shall beg. When Mr. Watts refused a baronetcy every baronet felt a little ruffled. We must not expect self-sacrifice from mammon; the discarded coronet lying in the dust at the foot of Box Hill, or sinking into the clear depths of the lake at Conistoun.

There is, of course, the other, some might say the patriotic view, that these men should take titles so that titles may be adorned by their wearing of them. But would the State live up to this concession of the Men of Letters? Would it see that no title was unworthily bestowed? How can you trust it when you know into what mud has the knighthood of Van Dyck and of Rubens been allowed to sink? We realise what kings and queens and prime ministers are capable of when they figure as patrons of the Arts. We know what they have done, or what Lord Salisbury has done, last of all with the Laureateship. Yet has not even he his ready apology? He can say that if you left to literary men as a body the selection you would not necessarily get a poet. The answering example of the Academy presidentship before him gives him confidence in his plea. With a gravity that grows upon us, we who love books and pictures, and live by admiration of them, protest against the denial of the Ideal, the separation between the craft and the office, which these appointments proclaim. Until the Laureateship is a poetical appointment, not a political one, the Presidentship of the Academy an artistic and not a social one, we have no hope that other and unofficial honours for Art and Letters shall be awarded with conscience and discretion; and, until they are so awarded, we are better without them, and need hardly discuss whether, when the millennium comes, the acceptance or rejection of them is higher wisdom on the part of those who are already knights of the pen in popular speech, and are in truth the kings that have the hearts of the people in their keeping, and that really dominate their lives.

MARK TWAIN, BENEFACTOR.

A FEW years ago Mr. Kipling called on Mark Twain at Hartford. Afterwards, in an account of his visit, he described the temptation which had beset him to steal the great man's corn-cob pipe as a relic. It was a nice touch of homage, coming from the man who has done more than any other to carry on the traditions established by the American writers, and in so doing in a large measure to supersede him. These traditions may be briefly described as the wish to set down as bluntly and forcibly as possible whatever one has to say, and the refusal to allow any intermediary between oneself and one's subject. Before Mr. Kipling rose glowing in the East, Mark Twain held the field. He was the ideal of masculine writers. There were no half ways with his readers—either they swore by him through thick and thin or unconditionally they cast him aside. Probably no author has been so little read by women, although, on the other hand, there was hardly a boy in the English-speaking world who would not have bartered his soul for Mark Twain's corn-cob pipe as a relic. He did just what boys and elemental men like: he came straight to the point; he feared no one; and he esteemed laughter above all the gifts of God.

Thus it was from twenty-five to a dozen years ago. But then, in the early eighties, Mark Twain's old manner became changed. He abandoned his zest in lawless life and the records of his personal impressions in the serious places of the earth, and he turned to satire and romance. His sorrowing readers had only just perceived the melancholy truth when Soldiers Three appeared, in its quiet blue-grey covers, to mark the beginnings of a new sledge-hammer pen and divert their grief. British India won; and to-day Mr. Rudyard Kipling is the ideal masculine writer, and his is the pipe that is coveted by boys and elemental men. He is a finer artist than Mark Twain, his sympathies are wider, his genius is more comprehensive, and yet, when all be said, the fact remains that Mark Twain is his literary progenitor.

On his own ground, despite a huge and generally tiresome band of imitators, American and English, Mark Twain has never been equalled, hardly approached. Mr. Kipling is his son only in manner: in matter the two are wide asunder. Mark Twain is the most objective of writers: Mr. Kipling would penetrate to the innermost man. Mark Twain stands by with alert eye and twitching mouth, setting down in nervous, sinewy sentences whatever strikes him as picturesque, interesting, or humorous. He is catholic: for a good swearer, for a grotesque horse, or for the Sphinx itself he has the same apprehensive glance, the glance of the reporter of genius. It is there that he and Mr. Kipling take hands—they are both superb journalists at bottom, but whereas one adds to his journalistic equipment an extravagant sense of fun, the other is enriched by dramatic power and knowledge of hearts.

Mark Twain at his best is the most bracing companion in the world—he is so amusing and amused, and withal so sane. He is so unburdened by sentiment or reverence—and most of us have too much of both. It was the absence of these qualities which made The Innocents Abroad the refreshing book it was. A generation bred up on Mr. Ruskin was left gasping by the impudence of this American, who declined to put on fine phrases and tread delicately just because he had exchanged his own country for an older. It was the first Transatlantic democratic utterance which found its way into the hearing of the mass of English people. Mr. Bret Harte's idylls of the Californian mines had paved the way; but he only described the rough Western diamond—this was the diamond itself, articulate. People who were tired of formal diction and machine-made periods, turned to Mark Twain as thirsty travellers turn to a spring. He gave them a new language, a freer air. He brought the Far West vociferous to our doors. He acquainted us with America's national humour—its extravagance, its carelessness, its unscrupulousness, its daring. He was the first man who had ever laughed in catacombs, the first to connect Michael Angelo with fun.

But Mark Twain did more than this. Not only did he offer broad comic effects and sagacious criticism of life, he passed on to add notable contributions to that mass of data concerning human nature which novelists and dramatists have been accumulating these many centuries. Tom Sawyer has been called the completest boy in fiction, and it would be hard to prove this praise at fault; and Huck Finn is surely immortal. It was said that in some of his poems Nature took the pen from Wordsworth and wrote for him. In Huckleberry Finn it may be said that natural man took the pen from Mark Twain and wrote for him. That great book, which is likely to remain the standard picaresque novel of America, is the least trammelled piece of literature in the language. It is worthy to rank with Gil Blas.

To neglect Mark Twain's later books is easy, and, one fears, inevitable; but it should be done only with compensating references to those that came before in the great period that culminated with Huckleberry Finn. In condemning The £1,000,000 Bank Note, and its companion stories, let us recall the perfection of "yarning" in some of the first collections. Let us especially recall "Higgins":

"Yes, I remember that anecdote," the Sunday-school superintendent said, with the old pathos in his voice, and the old sad look in his eyes. "It was about a simple creature named Higgins, that used to haul rock for old Maltby. When the lamented Judge Bagley tripped and fell down the court-house stairs and broke his neck, it was a great question how to break the news to poor Mrs. Bagley. But finally the body was put in Higgins' waggon, and he was instructed to take it to Mrs. B., but to be very guarded and discreet in his language, and not break the news to her at once, but do it gradually and gently. When Higgins got there with his sad freight he shouted till Mrs. Bagley came to the door."

"Then he said, 'Does the Widder Bagley live here?'"

"The Widow Bagley? No, sir."

"I'll bet she does. But have it your own way. Well, does Judge Bagley live here?"

"Yes, Judge Bagley lives here."

"I'll bet he don't. But never mind, it ain't for me to contradict. Is the Judge in?"

"No, not at present."

"I jest expected as much. Because, you know—take hold o' suthin', mum, for I'm a-going to make a little communication, and I reckon maybe it'll jar you some. There's been an accident, mum. I've got the old Judge curled up out here in the waggon, and when you see him you'll acknowledge yourself that an inquest is about the only thing that could be a comfort to him!"

In turning without too much regret from the unrealities of Joan the Maid, let us remember that its author could once write of the chivalry of the mining camps:

"It was a wild, free, disorderly, grotesque society! Men—only swarming hosts of stalwart men—nothing juvenile, nothing feminine, visible anywhere!"

"In those days miners would flock in crowds to catch a glimpse of that rare and blessed spectacle, a woman! Old inhabitants tell how, in a certain camp, the news went abroad early in the morning that a woman was come. They had seen a calico dress hanging out of a waggon down at the camping-ground—sign of emigrants from over the great plains. Everybody went down there, and a shout went up when an actual, bona fide dress was discovered fluttering in the wind. The male emigrant was visible. The miners said:

"Fetch her out!"

"He said: 'It is my wife, gentlemen. She is sick; we have been robbed of money, provisions, everything, by the Indians; we want to rest.'"

"Fetch her out! We've got to see her!"

"But, gentlemen, the poor thing, she——"

"Fetch her out!"

"He 'fetched her out,' and they swung their hats and sent up three rousing cheers and a tiger; and they crowded around and gazed at her, and touched her dress, and listened to her voice with the look of men who listened to a memory rather than a present reality—and then they collected twenty-five hundred dollars in gold and gave it to the man, and swung their hats again, and gave three more cheers, and went home satisfied. . . .

And voting A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur tedious and in bad taste, let us remember the wonderful bombast which Mark Twain puts into the mouths of the two braggarts on board the Mississippi raft, in that chapter of Huckleberry Finn which strayed into Life on the Mississippi.

"Then the man that had started the row tilted his old slouch hat over his right eye; then he bent, stooping forward, with his bag sagged and his south end sticking out far, and his fists a-shoving out and drawing in in front of his, and so went around in a little circle about three times, swelling himself up and breathing hard. Then he straightened, and jumped up and cracked his heels together three times, before he lit again (that made them cheer), and he began to shout like this—

"'Whoo-oop! bow your neck and spread, for the kingdom or sorrow's a-coming! Whoo-oop! I'm a child of sin, don't let me get a start! Smoked glass here for all! Don't attempt to look at me with the naked eye, gentlemen! When I'm playful I use the meridians of longitude and parallels of latitude for a seine, and drag the Atlantic Ocean for whales! I scratch my head with the lightning, and purr myself to sleep with the thunder! When I'm cold, I bite the Gulf of Mexico and bathe in it; when I'm hot I fan myself with an equinoctial storm; when I'm thirsty I reach up and suck a cloud dry like a sponge; when I range the earth hungry, famine follows in my tracks! Whoo-oop! Bow your neck and spread! I put my hand on the sun's face and make it night in the earth; I bite a piece out of the moon and hurry the seasons; I shake myself and crumble the mountains! Contemplate me through leather—don't use the naked eye! I'm the man with the petrified heart and bileron bowels! The massacre of isolated communities is the pastime of my idle moments, the destruction of nationalities the serious business of my life! The boundless vastness of the great American desert is my enclosed property, and I bury my dead on my own premises!' He jumped up and cracked his heels together three times before he lit (they cheered him again), and as he came down he shouted out: 'Whoo-oop!' bow your neck and spread, for the pet child of calamity's a-coming!"

Let us judge of a man by his best. Let us remember Scotty Briggs' interview with

SIR RICHARD STEELE

From the Picture by Jonathan Richardson in the National Portrait Gallery

the minister concerning Buck Fanshawe's funeral, and the story of Jim Blaine's grandfather's old ram, and the great Horace Greeley correspondence, and the jumping frog of Calaveras County, and Tom Sawyer and the whitewashed fence, and the great Grangerford-Shepherdson feud, and the death of Boggs, and the performance of the King's Cameleopard or Royal Nonsuch, and the contest between the Child of Calamity and the Corpse-maker of Arkansas, and the great duel between Gambetta and Fourtou, and Jim Baker's story of the blue jays, and the taming of a genuine Mexican plug—these are the incomparable passages to associate with the name of Mark Twain.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXXIII.—SIR RICHARD STEELE.

THERE is one story of Steele which gives us the keynote to his character and life. It is told in a letter of Dr. Hoadley, who heard it from his father, the Bishop of Bangor. The bishop was one night at a Whig meeting held at the "Trumpet" in Shire-lane, Addison and Steele being both present, and Steele, who was then Sir Richard, sitting next his Lordship. During the proceedings the immortal memory of King William was given as a toast, and what does John Sly, hatter and wag, do but enter the room on his hands and knees, bearing a full tankard, and then leave it in the same way. It was a poor enough joke, so poor that among the graver guests merriment was difficult; but Steele felt for the humorist, and turning to the stolid bishop, said earnestly, "Do laugh: it is humanity to laugh." Humanity. There we get Steele's keynote. He was before everything human and humane. All his faults were faults of unchecked humanity; all his virtues—and he was rich in them—were elemental.

In some ways Steele never grew up at all. He remained a boy, a child, to the end. Look at this letter, one of scores and scores, written to his second wife:

"Sep^r. 19th. 1708, five in the Evening.

"DEAR PRUE,—I send you seven pen'orth of Wall nuts at five a penny, which is the greatest proof I can give you at present of my being with my whole Heart y^e."

"RICH^d. STEELE."

But before the package could be dismissed he had diminished the "greatest proof" of his affection by six, for outside he added, "There are but 29 walnuts." Another of his notes, written at "se'en at night," contains the frank statement, "I am, Dear Prue, a little in Drink but at all times Y^r. Faithful Husband." Probably no man found it more difficult to tell a lie than Richard Steele.

Although often careless and ill-considered, his work abounds in felicities of thought and language; but where he and Addison come into direct comparison, Addison's writing is finer, more delicate, enriched with a more durable humour. To Steele belongs the credit of creating Roger de Coverley, but it was Addison who made him immortal. It was Addison who showed us Sir Roger at church, and Will Wimble, and Sir Roger in the Abbey, and Sir Roger at the play, and it was Addison who brought the old man to his end. Steele had not his friend's classic touch; but in no man's work is there more genial humanity and easy fluency. Steele is the father of all light essayists.

THE BOOK MARKET.

THE JUBILEE AND THE BOOK TRADE.

IT occurred to me yesterday afternoon that it would be interesting to see what the Diamond Jubilee has spelled to the booksellers. I called at Mr. Denny's shop in the Strand.

"Will you tell me, Mr. Denny, what the effect of the Jubilee on bookselling has been during, say, the last month?"

Mr. Denny looked solemn, and replied:

"It has been, I need hardly tell you, very harmful. And, what is more, its effects go much farther back than a month. I have distinctly noted them from the early spring. People have had the Jubilee in their blood, and the reading mood has been at a low ebb."

"And has this affected the most saleable kinds of literature?"

"Oh, yes, decidedly. I could name several authors of the first class whose recent books have fallen quite flat; it must be a serious thing for them."

"Well, but has not the sale of Jubilee literature compensated you a good deal?"

"No, I cannot say that. I have not been greatly struck by many of its items. The new Prayer-book, with the Jubilee Service in it, has gone well, very well. But even there we have not had the free hand we usually get. Prayer-books, you know, have ordinarily no published price; and the bookseller may put a full, fair profit upon them. But these Jubilee Prayer-books have been published at a price; still, we have done well with them."

"And what else has gone well?"

"We have sold a great many Hospital Fund Stamps—a hundred pounds' worth in this shop alone. And the Programme of the Jubilee, issued from the Graphic office, the proceeds of which are to go to the Prince of Wales's Fund, has sold excellently. In Parliament-street we were selling five hundred a day. The Clubs took them in large quantities."

"But you wish me to understand that general literature has suffered a big slump?"

"Oh, dear, yes."

"And after the Jubilee?"

"There will be no recovery worth talking about till September. I expect an early autumn season, and a desperately busy one. You see we shall have to push neglected stock alongside of new stock, and that is always uphill work."

"Thank you."

I now looked up Mr. Bumpus, in Holborn. He confirmed Mr. Denny's account of the stagnation in ordinary literature, but to my question as to whether the sale of Jubilee literature had compensated him, Mr. Bumpus replied cheerfully:

"Yes, I think we are about level: the Jubilee Bibles and Prayer-books have sold so splendidly."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, they have been bought to give to choir-boys. You see, in a great many villages the people have been at their wits' end for a suitable means of celebrating the Jubilee, and they have in many cases decided to present each choir-boy with a copy of the Jubilee Bible and Prayer-book. Nor have they done it by halves. We have sold a large number of the more expensive bindings for this purpose. The Jubilee Hymn and Form of Service was in huge demand. How many copies do you think I have sold here?"

"Ten thousand."

"I sold sixty-five thousand leaflet copies."

"That is remarkable. What else has been good business?"

"The Graphic guide to the Procession went splendidly; it was so well done. The awkward thing was, that no more than thirteen copies could be supplied to one order. We had to keep men constantly on the march between here and the Graphic office in order to meet the demand. Some of the Jubilee books have sold quite well, notably Mr. P. Anderson Graham's The Victorian Era. It is odd, but it is true, that there has been small demand for personal biographies of Her Majesty; but books treating of the Victorian age, as a whole, have been much in request."

"And what about Mr. Holmes's Life of the Queen?"

"Well, you are, of course, aware that its publication has been postponed for two months. Even then only the large-paper copies will be seen. I doubt if the ordinary edition will be out till the late autumn. However, I look upon this book as a safe thing; for though it misses the Jubilee season, it will be supreme as an autumn and a Christmas book."

"Do you expect a revival in the book-trade now?"

"I hope to see it. I expect to sell bound sets of standard authors to our Colonial friends, and I am ready for them. As for general publishing, I shall look for some revival. For the last month the publishers have been simply bottled up, and I think they must publish something or burst. There is every sign of a tremendous autumn season."

ART.

THE DECORATION OF STREETS.

WHILE the reds and blues upon which everything turns are generally bad colours, harsh and violent, it is impossible that London, dressed for a national festival, should be well decorated. Those two colours are almost everything; and in the London Jubilee just passed the blue was almost always, and the red was always, a bad colour of its kind. The intention had obviously been to get the "brightest" colour possible, and the mistake had been to think that the sharpest and most violent was the brightest. This is not so, for a colour may be intense, hard, and high in tone and yet not bright, for brightness, rightly so called, is the happiness of the eyes conferred by a suggestion of the luminous quality in colour. To call it gold would be to give the hint too strongly, but the quality is golden and luminous, though it may be profoundly latent in atmospheric blues and greys. Now the popular blue and red generally chosen by Londoners to represent the national colours are precisely the blue and red from which this allusion to gold and light has been completely banished, and inasmuch as it can be more completely expelled from blue than from any other colour or combination of colours, a bad blue is the worst colour in the world. London, then, has been largely decorated with the worst colour in the world.

The right and original blue of the Union Jack was indigo, a soft, grave, and noble blue, which has the suggestion of warmth in very subtle degree. If all the national blue of the Jubilee had been indigo there would have been great beauty in the streets. The relative depth of tone, too, would have made the higher colours look well, for equality of tone—especially between red and blue—is far from charming. As for the red it has been more universally bad than the blue, but yet it has not been so great an offence—a bad red being less distressing than a bad blue. But it was the work of St. James's-street on the 22nd to prove how all beauty could be discharged from red and blue—high, sharp, intense, and equal in tone, one being no deeper than the other. In this place, very conspicuously, and more or less everywhere else, these two colours were arranged, with white, in narrowish stripes—the best way to repeat and insist upon the offence of the contrast. The red brought to town by the Orientals might have given a lesson in red. Theirs was no soft, dull colour, such as might please none but educated eyes. It was red in its fulness and strength, gorgeous and splendid, very much the red of Mr. Abbey. Nothing could be more popular, nor anything more salient and superb for a show. It was a good red, and in every sense "bright"; whereas the red which was the outcome of our Occidental dyes, the result of all our preparation and science, displayed on almost every house in town, was an almost primary red, untouched by the quality of gold, very high in tone, but indescribably harsh and thin.

Take the white next, to complete the national colours. It was well, perhaps, that in some cases the white should be as absolute as possible; for not only is the popular eye not sufficiently educated to enjoy the secondary white of wool, but pure white has its own charm, especially in sunshine. Nevertheless, a great beauty would have been brought about by the occasional use of wool-white and ivory-white; this, however, was not to be seen, and all the white was bleached, not as the sun and water bleaches flaxen cloth in the north of Italy, but as bleaching-powder bleaches cotton in the north of England.

As for the other colours, yellow was the only one much in use. It made a very ill effect as a trimming to the coarse red with which whole streets and districts were hung, especially about Pall Mall West and the north of Trafalgar-square to Charing Cross. The best use of yellow is with white, for yellow and white have a magical kind of effect in increasing each other's value and brilliance; a fine yellow with a rather soft and deep blue looks well; so does orange with indigo, or with atmospheric or grey blue. But it had occurred to no citizens (or to so few that a careful survey could not find them) to mingle their yellow with either white or blue. The yellow was, by common consent, combined with red. In quality, too, it was not the best. There is no absolutely bad yellow to be achieved even by manufacture, but this best of colours is capable—in its less happy moments—of a certain coarseness. This is to be found even in a few flowers. Of the yellow fringes of the Jubilee it must be said that they were not of the best yellow. Of orange there was extremely little. One house near the Marble Arch made a kind of peace amid the struggle of blatant red and blue by showing orange softly mingled with brown. Otherwise, for this colour, so happy and so decorative, one had to look among the shabbier streets. It was to be had there, in perfection, on barrows.

The summing-up, then, as regards colours should be: let any future popular dressing-up of London turn upon indigo, a richer, more splendid, and more golden red, and wool-white—for the national colours; and upon yellow mingled with pure white, and orange with soft blues, for the colours of choice. Green does not seem at all popular in London, except for artificial leaves, and may be left out of this general counsel. In giving it I make no great demands upon the general education. To ask for anything more subtle, or to require the colours of research or the sweeter tints of delicate combination would be out of place in the west of Europe.

If popular taste were better educated, however, an easy way of giving to any western town a beauty of temporary decoration, fine enough to satisfy even fastidious eyes, would be, needless to say, the use of Oriental ornament ready made. Something was done this week by the hanging of houses and windows with strings of Japanese and Chinese lanterns, and always with charming effect. These were beautiful by day and lovely by night. They made one wish that for every house so decorated there had been a hundred. The popular love of strong colour need not have been baffled thereby, for the red of some lanterns is as intense as it is fine. Generally, however, they were delicate. Although my chief subject is colour, I may add that their movement added much to the gaiety of the street; they floated to the breeze, not streaming one way, but all at odds, for they hung from short lines, and these swung in as those swung out, with the happiest effect of animation. Really good colour might have been displayed to the London sun by hanging out Oriental rugs; but London is not used to that manner of decorating, and would not like it, probably. It has long been the Italian way, and goes better with the blank and simple surfaces of Italian cities than with our busy and detailed bricks and many windows. But London is so rich in Persian rugs that the idea is still rather tempting.

Nothing could well be worse than the Venetian masts in Piccadilly, tawdry and feeble at once with their silly muslin shields and fans. Venetian masts, to have any beauty, should be close together, multitudinous, and seen clear against the sky. Placed close, and with an added beauty of whiteness, were the masts in St. James's-street before the decorations were finished, and before the absurd columns with nothing to support were so adorned as conspicuously to spoil everything in the same picture. The masts made a pretty perspective. Further east some other masts stood up well, with the infinite advantage of a sky background. There is nothing more charming than such delicate lines as these make at a distance. Velasquez knew the happy effect well when he painted "The Surrender of the City of Breda," known as "The Lances," in the Museum at Madrid. His thirty lofty lances stand up close together, with cloud and sky beyond. Precisely the same decoration is made by hop-poles and, even better, by the sticks upon which they train peas and beans in kitchen gardens. These have delicate twigs added in. All slender things against sky are delightful, whether leaves or lines, but nothing is much better than the etchings of rows of peas. And it is in a country vegetable garden that the fancy rests, led thither by the prettiest thing in a London made strangely hideous for the Jubilee.

A. M.

D R A M A.

HOW greatly, to be sure, actors and playwrights are the creatures of circumstance! A good play makes the one, a bad interpretation mars the other, neither set of conditions having anything to do, properly speaking, with the genius of the parties concerned. If Mme. Sarah Bernhardt were making her début in "Lorenzaccio" she would be dismissed as a bore, and would find it hard to obtain a second hearing. The play is Alfred de Musset's, touched up by a modern adapter. Alfred de Musset, despite one or two small pieces figuring to his credit in the repertory of the Comédie Française, was no playwright; but I doubt whether he is fairly to be reproached with giving to the stage such a hopelessly inert piece of work as "Lorenzaccio." It is a tentative effort in tragedy, a mere sketch of a drama which he probably put aside as unworkable. He appears to have had some conception of a youthful Hamlet actuated by political interests, for such Lorenzaccio is; but no great dramatic insight was needed to perceive, after drafting the story, that such a motive was inadmissible. The stage works upon the grand cardinal passions of human nature. Politics are too trivial an adjunct to be worth considering. Even money—a greater interest than politics nowadays—has little or no capacity for moving the public apart from love. A few years ago a play adapted from the Scandinavian was produced at the Haymarket by a popular actress, having for its motive the struggles of the heroine to attain pecuniary success in business, and for its climax in the third act not the union of two divided hearts, but bankruptcy with a composition of so much in the pound. It failed. In real life the financial interest is strong, no doubt. On the stage it is still nothing, or less than nothing, as the example of that ill-starred Haymarket play attests; and as much may be said of politics, which, although powerful enough from time to time to plunge the whole community into a turmoil, are powerless, in a dramatic sense, to evoke the smallest emotion. This fact probably the poet realised after he had written out at length the episode of sixteenth century Florentine politics in which Lorenzaccio figures. He never adapted the work to the stage, and it would have been doing him a service to have allowed it to remain on that upper shelf where the dust is never disturbed.

WHAT can have possessed Mme. Sarah Bernhardt to unearth this dreary fragment for the purpose of playing therein a part wholly unsuited to her genius it is hard to say. Lorenzaccio is a moony Florentine youth who has conceived the idea of ridding his native city of the tyranny of the Duke Alexander de Médici. He is himself a Médici, cousin to the Duke, and of this relationship he avails himself in order to worm himself into the Duke's confidence and to become his boon companion. To what end? Apparently to be able to seize a favourable opportunity of stabbing his patron in the fourth act, though for this certainly there is no need to wait. The opportunity is just as good in the first act as in the fourth. The interval is spent by Lorenzaccio in moody soliloquies and much searching of heart, after the manner of the Prince of Denmark. But while the development of this portion of the play seems excessively elaborate, in other and equally important respects it is extremely meagre. Before we can sympathise with the Duke's assassination we must see something of his tyrannies, of his oppressions and injustices, his debaucheries. But so far as we are permitted to know him in the Adelphi version of the play, and in the stalwart person of M. Darmont, the Duke is rather a good sort; a patron of the Arts and popular with the masses. One had rather it were Lorenzaccio, with his tiresome musing and speechifying, who was assassinated. For the playing of this character Mme. Sarah Bernhardt dons doublet and hose for the first time in my experience. And how killing this sombre mannish garb is to all her feminine graces as an actress only those who have seen it can realise. In the first place, it dwarfs the actress's height, making her look a mannikin; and, secondly, by some curious effect of shading or of the association of ideas, it hardens her features, or casts them in a disagreeable mould. For the rest, in Lorenzaccio there is not a pang of love or jealousy, not a tear, not a sigh! Nothing but some rash political resolve, the necessity for which is not apparent. What a part! One has no patience with this nightmare creation. Frankly, if that were Sarah I should never want to see her again.

"LORENZACCIO" was put on for a run, but the management of Mme. Sarah's French play season have wisely recognised its insufficiency, and the great actress will accordingly be seen once more in those familiar rôles of the Dumas and Sardou drama which have spread her reputation over both hemispheres. More than any other worker living upon the breath of popular applause, the actor is apt to deceive himself with regard to the merits of his impersonation; and I dare say Mme. Sarah labours under a sense of injustice at the reception of her Lorenzaccio. She has declared that the part is an infinitely complex one. If so, its complexity is not felt across the footlights; it condemns the actress, so to speak, to burn her own smoke. After its brief return to the light, this unfortunate work of de Musset's will now, I apprehend, be relegated to darkness for evermore. We can ill spare Mme. Sarah from the round of characters in which, Duse and Réjane notwithstanding, she is still unique. The voix d'or may not be all it used to be—it would have been a miracle had her throat been able to defy the wear and tear of touring in all climes under haphazard conditions; and the actress's figure is certainly less alert and less lissome than formerly, when it was jokingly said on the boulevard that the effect of her getting into a balloon was the same as that of throwing out ballast. But in that aptitude which consists in expressing, by whatsoever means, the appropriate emotion of a scene of passion, Mme. Sarah remains unmatched.

THE spray of honours shed by the Diamond Jubilee has not missed the theatrical profession, which now boasts two knights within its ranks. Sir Henry Irving no longer occupies a pinnacle of distinction in gloomy isolation from his colleagues; he has been joined by Mr. Bancroft. Sir Squire Bancroft Bancroft, as he will henceforth be known, is the second actor who has won his Sovereign's favour in this realm, for it need hardly be explained that the late Sir Augustus Harris owed his knighthood to his City connection exclusively. In view of the extravagant hopes indulged by successful theatre managers and their friends, this result may be esteemed meagre and disappointing especially as Mr. Bancroft has long ceased to be a working member of the profession. But unbiassed opinion will certainly declare that a better selection of a new theatrical knight on public grounds could not have been made. Sir S. B. Bancroft has done more than any living actor, save Irving, to raise the social status of the theatre, although the younger generation are forgetting the triumphs of Robertsonian comedy; he has, moreover, personal distinction, and he has means. The last condition is not the least important. The theatre is notoriously a hazardous business, and it would be awkward if some of the young leviathans of management now disporting themselves in the sun of popular favour were compelled after receiving their titles to sink into deep water, as not a few of their leviathan predecessors have done. As regards Robertsonian comedy, by the way, Mr. Hare is proving at the Court Theatre, by his remarkable assumption of Old Eccles, that the dramatic fibre of "Caste" is that of which classics are made. The part makes the actor, not, as in the case of so many modern pieces, the actor the part. It seemed for a time as if the support, the influence, or tradition of the Bancroft management was essential to the popularity of "Caste." Mr. Hare has changed all that. His Old Eccles is a completely New Eccles, and most of the impersonations by his company are in the same category, and yet applause waits upon all. Decidedly "Caste" is destined to survive—perhaps the only sample of the teacup and saucer drama which will.

J. F. N.

MUSIC.

THE "Selection" programme at the Handel Festival included no novelties. There are many, no doubt, who would like to have heard something new, for Handel is a rich mine far from exhausted, but to the general public the music which they know best proves the most attractive. It is for this reason that, in spite of strong hints from admirers of Handel who would like to hear one or other of the many little known oratorios of which the names are inscribed in the Central Transept, the directors cling to "The Messiah" for the opening day; that work, the words and music of which are so familiar, is sure to draw. The fine Coronation Anthem, "Zadok the Priest," in connexion with the Jubilee festivities, was, of course, most appropriate, and the performance on Wednesday was worthy of the occasion. The principal solo vocalists of the afternoon were Mme. Albani, Miss Clara Butt, and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley, who were all well received.

"Israel in Egypt," on the Friday, was the great success of the Festival. Mr. Manns, at rehearsal, took special pains with this work, of which the immense greatness is only revealed by such a chorus as is assembled for the Festival. And the singing on this last day was superb; all the members seemed on their mettle to do honour to the great master. How much Handel borrowed from other composers is a matter of special interest to all who seek to fathom the ways of genius; but of whatever fragments the oratorio may be compounded, they were certainly welded by him into one mighty whole.

The principal soloists were Miss Ella Russell, Miss Marian McKenzie, and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley. The duet, "The Lord is a Man of War," was given in its proper form, and not, as on previous occasions, by a number of singers; this return to the intentions of the composer deserves note and commendation. One little point by way of criticism. It may be necessary to give the chorus some cue before the unaccompanied piano passages in "He rebuked the Red Sea," but the two chords played on the organ might surely have been softer; even the very softest that can be struck spoils to some extent the effect of the pause, and also of the wonderful contrast between the opposed clauses. While speaking of the organ, the valuable services of Mr. Walter W. Hedgecock, during the whole of the Festival, deserve honourable mention.

"SIEGFRIED" was given at Covent Garden on Monday evening, and although the eve of the Jubilee, the house was well filled; to-night, when it will be performed for the second time, there will probably not be a vacant seat. The "Siegfried" was M. Jean de Reszke, who achieved another triumph. Lohengrin, Walthar, Tristan, Siegfried: these are the steps by which he has won high place among the best interpreters of Wagner. In face and figure he thoroughly realised one's conception of Siegfried, and he was in very fine voice. There were certainly moments in which earnestness and enthusiasm were not at their highest point, yet there was nothing of sufficient importance to interfere with the general effect. M. de Reszke must, of course, be judged by a very high standard—a standard, indeed, which he himself, has set up. Criticism is comparison, but this artist can only be compared with himself. In voice he eclipses all rivals; it is only as an interpreter of Siegfried that discussion becomes possible. After the second performance I hope to speak again about him. Herr Lieban's "Mime" is a wonderful creation; the picture he presents of the cunning, wretched dwarf is perfect in all its details, and yet it bears no trace of exaggeration. Praise, however, is superfluous, and the function of the critic is reduced to mere admiration. M. E. de Reszke, by reason of his commanding presence and rich voice, rendered the visit of "The Wanderer" to the cave of Mime more welcome than is usually the case. Miss Susan Strong (Brünnhilde), Mme. Schumann-Heinck (Erda), and M. David Bispham (Alberich) all rendered efficient service. The scene with the dragon serves, by the way, to remind us that great men are not infallible. If only Wagner had kept the monster out of sight, how much better it would have been for the music-drama! One hears so much about the terrible monster which is to teach Siegfried what fear is, and when at length it appears the most rigid Wagnerian can surely scarcely refrain from a smile. Thus Wagner, through excess of realism, has weakened a strong drama. The bear in the first act is also a mistake, but, like good children, the animal is only seen for a short time and not heard. M. Anton Seidl conducted with his usual earnestness and watchfulness.

M. PADEREWSKI was the star at Mr. Wood's concert on Saturday afternoon at the Queen's Hall. As an interpreter of Chopin he stands alone. He may not always reveal the full grandeur of Beethoven, and his readings of Schumann, however clever and characteristic, do not always satisfy those who can remember Mme. Schumann in her best days. The music of the Polish composer, on the other hand, with its florid, delicate writing, its fanciful moods, and its emotional rather than intellectual character, thoroughly suits M. Paderewski. The Concerto in F minor is not a great work, in the sense that Beethoven's in E flat, or Schumann's in A, are great, but it contains some beautiful themes, and the technical display is of the purest. The pianist's reading was admirable, especially of the romantic slow movement—a vision, as it were, of some happy past never to return. M. Paderewski also played a Scherzo from Henri Litolf's Concerto in D minor. The music is clever and light, and showed off to the best advantage the pianist's nimble fingers and feathery touch. The audience clamoured for an encore, and so at last M. Paderewski repeated the Scherzo; what they really wanted was a piano solo, and this he, wisely, would not grant. The orchestral accompaniments to both pieces were excellently rendered under the direction of Mr. Wood. Miss Clara Butt sang well in "Divinités du Styx," the music for its full effect demands, however, greater dramatic power and intensity.

M. SARASATE gave his second and last recital at St. James's Hall on Saturday afternoon. There was a large audience, and the performances gave as usual satisfaction. The programme was an interesting one, but contained no novelty, and thus I was tempted away to the Queen's Hall to hear the Litolf Scherzo. At his two concerts the great violinist was assisted by Dr. Otto Nertzel, an intelligent pianist and excellent accompanist.

J. S. S.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

In the columns of the Daily Telegraph Mr. Courtney writes: "Rarely has there been a more singular instance . . . of a story which is no story at all, but an extended footnote—a study of certain well-defined characteristics of Napoleon—a thing which one might have done in an essay . . . but which, it may be, stands out all the better because it is a part, and an overpowering part, of an imaginary narrative [the signification of this sentence is more evident than its construction]. . . . The figure of Napoleon is a singularly vivid piece of portraiture; a little cynical, it may be even a little malicious, but delineated with a mastery of dramatic effect which makes it unforgettable." The author has "a perfect genius for psychology." "Mr. Conan Doyle," says the Speaker, "has succeeded in realising Napoleon, and he makes him known to us as he really was. . . . It is not a small thing that we should have found among ourselves a writer who can thus interpret history . . . in the spirit and with something of the genius of Scott himself." The Spectator writes: "The sketches of the Emperor are so well done, and so happily are the curious mental and physical traits of Napoleon worked in, that we quite regret that Mr. Doyle did not boldly take Buonaparte for his central figure throughout." So also the Athenaeum describes the work as "a powerful sketch of Napoleon, written with the author's accustomed vivacity." The Daily News thinks that "middle-aged readers will probably be reminded of scenes in Charles Lever's now little read novels, wherein the Emperor plays an important part; but the author of Uncle Bernac has the advantage of a more direct and picturesque style." The Saturday Review thinks Mr. Doyle "might at least have taken a leaf out of Sibylle's book and printed a prefatory note, 'Don't read the first eight chapters . . .'" As to the real business of this "Memory of the Empire," perhaps we knew something of this before; at any rate, it will do no one any permanent harm to see a bird's-eye view of it again."

"THIS book," writes the Saturday, "is the most exacting volume we have read for a long time; and that because . . . it so nearly reaches its mark and yet so decisively misses it. . . . The failure . . . lies in the fact that we get no clear, definite picture of St. Paul. . . . Mr. Baring Gould has spent all his strength upon the environments. . . . The place of Paul in Christian history has been very variously determined. Some, like Comte, have regarded him as the true founder of Christianity. Others, again, have presented him as the corrupter and formaliser of the simple religion of Jesus. . . . Mr. Baring Gould has brought out with great point and wealth of illustration the elements of truth in both positions." The British Review institutes a comparison with Dean Farrar's book on the Bible. "What the Dean has done for the Bible, its writers and prophets as a whole, Mr. Baring Gould has done for the Apostle Paul. He has stripped him of every rag . . . of the supernatural. . . . A large portion of Mr. Gould's volume might well be taken, if studied by itself, to be the work of a satirist of Christianity"; but "the contempt which Mr. Gould pours on the Apostle of the Gentiles and his writings is intended by him to bring into greater prominence the truth of the Gospel which the Apostle of the Gentiles preached. . . . Mr. Gould is a much cleverer man than Dean Farrar; but his intellectual position is, if possible, even weaker."

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO., ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,
the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY, now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their
Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.
Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B; H; B; H.H; B.B; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL, CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos :

*The objections to them, and how they have
been met.*

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

NOVELS FOR HOLIDAY READING.

SIX SHILLINGS.

BY FRANCIS PREVOST.

FALSE DAWN.

"There is a mingled delicacy and power.....intensely interesting.....The book is one to be read and remembered."—Speaker.
"Beautifully written, with real and rare powers both of psychology and of word-painting."—Academy.

BY LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

LAZY TOURS.

"Has the inestimable power of taking her reader along with her."
"Compels us to read her book from end to end."—Daily Chronicle.
Manchester Guardian.

BY MRS. E. H. STRAIN.

A MAN'S FOES.

"A powerful and impressive historical novel.....A chronicle of intense and unflagging interest."—Daily Telegraph.
"A Man's Foes" is the best historical novel that we have had since Mr. Conan Doyle published "Micah Clarke".....An exceptionally fine romance."—Daily Chronicle.

BY PERCY ANDREAE.

THE VANISHED EMPEROR.

"We can honestly say it is years since we read a story so original, so striking, or so absorbing."—Manchester Courier.

BY FRANCIS HINDES GROOME.

KRIEGSPIEL: THE WAR GAME.

"Seemingly at one bound Mr. Groome has taken rank among the most promising novelists of the day, so full is 'Kriegspiel' of interest, of stirring incident, and of vivid and varied sketches of men and manners from contemporary English life."
Illustrated London News.

FIVE SHILLINGS.

GUY BOOTHBY'S NOVELS.

Profusely Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

THE FASCINATION of the KING.

[Ready immediately.]
After the remarkable success of Mr. Boothby's previous novels, "Dr. Nikola," "The Beautiful White Devil," "A Bid for Fortune," &c., this book will be eagerly welcomed, and will, it is anticipated, secure an even greater success.

FOURTH EDITION.

DOCTOR NIKOLA.

"Weird and wonderful, and the adventures are such as to thrill the hardened novel-reader."—Speaker.
"One hair-breadth escape succeeds another with rapidity that scarce leaves the reader breathing space.....The interest of their experiences is sufficient to stay criticism and carry him through a story ingeniously invented and skilfully told."—Scotsman.

SIXTH EDITION.

THE BEAUTIFUL WHITE DEVIL.

"Shows admirable powers of invention. A more exciting romance no man could reasonably ask for."—Yorkshire Post.
"An original idea worked out in original fashion. A book for all who like stories told in a bright, healthful style."—Globe.

THIRD EDITION.

A BID for FORTUNE.

"It is impossible to give any idea of the verve and brightness with which the story is told. Mr. Boothby may be congratulated on having produced about the most original novel of the year."—Manchester Courier.

FOURTH EDITION.

IN STRANGE COMPANY.

THIRD EDITION.

THE MARRIAGE of ESTHER.

BY ARTHUR MORRISON.

MARTIN HEWITT, INVESTIGATOR.

"Most people like tales of this sortand no one writes them better than Mr. Morrison does. The narratives are written not only with ingenuity, but with conviction, which is, perhaps, even the more valuable quality."—Globe.

CHRONICLES of MARTIN HEWITT.

ADVENTURES of MARTIN HEWITT.

BY LOUIS F. AUSTIN.

AT RANDOM.

"A series of fantasies which it would be difficult to overpraise for their grace, their beauty, and their lightness. There is in them, too, a certain seriousness and depth which add to the attraction. Nothing of the kind so good has recently been published, and they will interest many by the sheer swiftness and strength of their style who may not see all that has gone to the making of them."—Dr. ROBERTSON NICOLL, in the British Weekly.

BY FRANCIS PREVOST.

RUST of GOLD.

"A series of nine fin de siècle stories of great power and picturesqueness.....As word-pictures they are simply masterpieces."—Daily Telegraph.

ON the VERGE.

BY MAX PEMBERTON.

JEWEL MYSTERIES I HAVE KNOWN.

"Mr. Pemberton has attempted a great deal more than to give mere plots and police cases, and he has succeeded in capturing our attention from the first story to the last."
The Bookman.

THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

FORDHAM'S FEUD. Second Edition.

"Altogether outside the conventional groove. Interest in the story never flags."
"A clever plot told with real dramatic force."—Star.
Scotsman.

THE EXPIATION of WYNNE PALLISER.

"Phenomenal success. It is the best of this author's many excellent romances."
Globe.

THE CURSE of CLEMENT WAYNFLETE.

"Telling us wonderful incidents of inter-racial warfare, of ambushes, sieges, surprises, and assaults almost without number.....A thoroughly exciting story, full of bright descriptions and stirring episodes."—Daily Telegraph.

A VELDT OFFICIAL.

"We have seldom come across a more thrilling narrative. From start to finish Mr. Mitford secures unflagging attention."—Leeds Mercury.

BY COULSON KERNAHAN.

CAPTAIN SHANNON. Second Edition.

"Here is a story which every novelist should have thought of years ago. No man, possibly, but Conan Doyle could have treated such an admirable first idea as well as Mr. Kernaahan has treated it."—Daily Chronicle.

A DEAD MAN'S DIARY. Sixth Edition.

"There can be no doubt of the force and freshness of most of the book, of the fine literary quality of some of the chapters, and of the interest of the whole.....There is, too, many a burst of beautiful English."—Mr. I. ZAREWILL, in Ariel.

A BOOK of STRANGE SINS. Fifth Edition.

"A writer possessing not only a fine literary gift, and a marvellous power of intense emotional realisation, but a fresh, strange, and fascinating imaginative outlook."
Daily Chronicle.

BY ETHEL TURNER.

THE LITTLE LARRIKIN. Third Edition.

"So brightly written and so full of delicate touches of both humour and pathos."
Pall Mall Gazette.
"The character of Lol is exquisitely drawn, and the sayings and doings of the curiously-headed little wag furnish the material for some of the most amusingly delightful pages of the book."—Western Daily Mail.

BY CONAN DOYLE.

A STUDY in SCARLET.

"One of the cleverest and best detective stories we have yet seen.....Mr. Conan Doyle is a literary artist, and this is a good specimen of his skill."—London Quarterly Review.

BY HENRY HERMAN.

LADY TURPIN.

"A breathlessly exciting tale."—The Bookman.
"Ingenuously constructed, and throbbing with excitement."—Sheffield Telegraph.

HIS ANGEL.

"His Angel" is well, even brilliantly, written, very much after the style of Charles Reade's famous novels of colonial adventure."—Black and White.

BY HEADON HILL.

THE QUEEN of NIGHT.

"A story of rare merit, in which knowledge of the world and of mankind is admirably utilised."—Scotsman.

BY ADA CAMBRIDGE.

A HUMBLE ENTERPRISE.

"It is a delightful story, refreshingly original, singularly well told, and absorbingly interesting from beginning to end."—Daily Mail.

BY FERGUS HUME.

THE DWARF'S CHAMBER.

"An exciting tale.....cleverly worked out.....Interest and entertainment from one end to the other."—The Bookman.

THE CRIME of the "LIZA JANE."

"The plot is well conceived and will keep even the habitual novel-reader in a state of pleasurable suspense till the end."—North British Daily Mail.

BY ANNIE E. HOLDSWORTH.

SPINDLES and OARS.

"We do not exaggerate when we say that there are very few books of living writers which we would not gladly exchange for such a work as she has now given us."
Manchester Courier.

BY JOSEPH HOCKING.

FIELDS of FAIR RENOWN.

"As a story the book will charm as much as its teaching will profit. In point of plot, incident, surprise, and descriptive power, it is not a whit behind any of Mr. Hocking's previous works, and that is saying a good deal. The author is a born story-teller; but what strikes us even more than his power to rivet the attention of his readers, is the great moral earnestness by which he is consumed."—Free Methodist.

ALL MEN are LIARS.

"This is a notable book. Thoughtful people will be fascinated by its actuality, its fearlessness, and the insight it gives into the influence of modern thought and literature upon the mind and morals of our most promising manhood."—Christian World.

BY RICHARD MARSH.

THE CRIME and the CRIMINAL.

[Ready immediately.]
"A most novel plot, worked out with the sensational power familiar to all readers of Mr. Marsh's previous works."

LONDON: WARD, LOCK & CO., LIMITED, SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 48, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

DATE DUE

~~JUL 05 2002~~

JUL 05 2002

